i. OLD TESTAMENT.—'The law was given by Moses,' says St. John (1^{17}); 'grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.' Yet the relation of OT to NT is misconceived when it is apprehended as one of antithesis rather than development. There is no doubt that the religion of OT is ordinarily represented as founded upon law, and that the very considerable element of grace which enters into it is ignored. But OT piety recognizes that what righteousness it has is founded in divine grace and imparted through divine revelation. It is grace which gives the law itself (cf. Gal 3^{19-24}), and faith, which is that by which grace is received and made effective, is not overlooked—Gn 15^{6}, Ex 14^{31}, Nu 20^{12}, Dt 1^{32} 9^{23}, 2 Ch 20^{20}, Ps $106^{12.24}$, Is 7^{9} 28^{16}, Hab 2^{4}. It is true that as grace gives the law, so through the law it seems to give men a right or claim in virtue of their compliance with the law, which is inconsistent with the later revelation of faith as the principle of the new life. The favour (in the Psalmist and Prophets, the righteousness) of God gives to the obedient (or the repentant, cf. Ps 17 and 26, also Ps 7) a claim, as it were, against God, Ps 119^{132} etc. At the same time OT fully recognizes that it is the divine grace which forgives sin (Ps 32. 51. 130. 143). Grace, as an attribute of God, appears in OT in conjunction with truth or faithfulness (Ps 85^{10} 89^{14} 98^{3} etc.), but also with righteousness and judgment (Hos 2^{19}). God is gracious as hearing prayer (Ex 22^{27}), as departing from His anger (Ex 32^{12}), and as exercising freely His choice of love (Ex 33^{19}); He lifts upon the pious the light of His countenance (Nu 6^{25}). It is by the divine acts that this attitude of forbearance and conciliation is more particularly manifested. Even in the midst of the ruin occasioned by the Fall, the purpose of mercy is represented as being declared and its work begun, words of promise mingle with words of condemnation, the divine solicitude shines amidst the clouds of divine anger (Gn $3^{15.21}$). Through the same tenderness Abel and Enoch find favour in the sight of God, Noah is warned and escapes the general doom (Gn 6^{8}), Abraham is selected to be the bearer of the new revelation (Gn 12. 15), and the promises made to him are repeated to his descendants (Gn 26. 28). Through it Moses is chosen and fitted for his work (Ex 33^{17}). In all that concerns Israel as a people the same free choice is exhibited and exercised. The promises freely made to the fathers are fulfilled when, through Moses, Israel is chosen from among all nations (Ex 19^{5}, cf. Dt 10^{14}) to be the people of God, and that from no merit of its own (Nu 11. 12. 14. 21, etc.; cf. Dt 9^{7} etc.). This choice is evidenced by the deliverance from Egypt (Ex $15^{13.16}$), and is a pure act of grace (Dt 7^{7} 8^{14-18} 9^{4-6}). In the Prophets we have a further development of this point of view. Their whole religious attitude is determined by it. That God had chosen Israel to be His people is their most sincere conviction, and the problems which perplexed them, and gave birth to some of their most profound and spiritual suggestions, arose out of the relation of the sins of the people and the consequent divine chastisements, to this firmly held conviction (cf. Is 55^{6} 63^{9} 65^{1}, Jon 4^{11}, Mic $7^{18.19}$). It is true that as, on the one hand, the unworthiness of the mass of the people led them to distinguish from the nation at large the true Israel, the faithful remnant; so, on the other hand, they were led to conceive the possibility of God's gracious purpose as embracing those who were not of Israel, and of the heathen being brought through Israel into the enjoyment of some of Israel's privileges. At the same time, all their wealth of metaphor is employed to depict God's loving care and guidance, His deliverances and compassions as illustrated in the history of the people, and to emphasize His continued patience, His touching appeals and generous offers, and the glory of His declared purposes. Even in His anger God remembers mercy (La 3^{31}, Jl 2^{13}, Hab 3^{2}), and yet all that He does is on behalf of those who are too often ungrateful and rebellious (Is 43^{21-25} 44^{1-5} 48^{8-11}, Jer 18^{8-11}, Ezk $16^{1ff.}$, cf. Ps 78). In the relation of the individual to the nation we find an important modification of the idea of grace. Grace is mediated to the individual through the nation. His imperfections are forgiven because he is a member of a chosen people; as belonging to an elect nation he is himself elect. The Pss express this assurance of the believer, which finds utterance in his prayers when afflicted and his thanksgivings after deliverance (Ps $3^{4.7}$ 4^{8} 7^{10} 11^{7} 16. 17^{7-9} 18. 32. 51. 103, etc.). If thus in the view of the Psalmists and Prophets there is no limit to God's willingness to be reconciled, if even His judgment has a core of mercy, and His love always proves itself stronger than human sin, the other side of OT religion is, in turn, not to be minimized. If God has a special love to Israel, it is through a covenant that this love finds expression, and the covenant takes the form of law. The people are bound to obedience, and the blessings of the covenant can be enjoyed only on this condition. So far from grace being ignored in OT, it permeates it, as we have seen, throughout. But grace is not yet fully revealed; it is still dominated by the ideas of righteousness and retribution. It speaks the language of law, and the law is, as already noted, its own greatest gift. Israel has reason to boast itself of its law; the possession of it is an honour and a privilege distinguishing Israel from other nations (Ex $19^{4.5}$, Dt 33^{2-5}). Thus, though by no means the sole element, law remains the distinctive element in OT. Obedience is pre-eminently the condition of blessing. God in giving the law is emphatically the God of Israel (Ex 20^{2}). In OT His anger against sin is declared, His mercy and long-suffering are proclaimed; but these rest side by side, an unsolved antinomy, waiting the fuller revelation.

ii. NEW TESTAMENT.—The new 'covenant' is the fulfilment of the old; the plan of grace which lay at the root of the former dispensation comes into full expression in the life and work of Christ (Ti 2^{11} 3^{4}), and in the declarations of the apostles—Ro $3^{24.25}$ RV, 'Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God set forth to be a propitiation (ἱλαστήριον, Heb. כַּפֹּרֶת, the place of expiation, "the central seat of the saving presence and gracious revelations of God," see Cremer, s.v., and, for another view, Sanday-Headlam, ad. loc.), through faith, by his blood, to show his righteousness, because of the passing over of the sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God.' Thus the great work of grace is redemption, which has its origin in God (1 Jn $4^{10.\ 19}$), in His eternal good pleasure (εὐδοκία), Eph 1^{3-6}, and is carried out by His will and power. Therefore, as we have seen, the Christian revelation is called 'the grace of God,' 'the grace of God our Saviour,' 'the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ,' or simply 'grace.' The love which it manifests is expressed, not only by word, but by the most unchallengeable of deeds, when God sends forth His Son and gives Him up as a sacrifice for the sins of men (Jn 3^{16}, Eph 1^{7}, Ro 5^{6-8} etc.). This love is not called forth by any merit or worthiness on the part of man (2 Ti 1^{9}, Tit 3^{5}), but is the free spontaneous outflowing of divine compassion—'it is the gift of God' (Eph 2^{4-9}, Ro 3^{24} 11^{6}, cf. 4^{4} 5^{8}). We may compare the representations contained in the parables of Jesus generally, especially those of Lk 15, and note how He seeks the lost, would shelter Jerusalem as a hen gathereth her chickens together, and calls the weary and heavy laden to Himself. But it is not only this great central act of love, upon which the whole plan of redemption is built up and without which it would be impossible, which is ascribed to divine grace and is its outcome; every step in the subsequent process, all that is embraced in the work of the Holy Spirit, is regarded as due to grace. It is through it that the call comes to men (Gal 1^{15}, 1 Th 2^{13}), and that men are made willing to answer to it (Jn $6^{44.\ 45}$). It is the grace of God which opens the heart (Ac 16^{14}), which gives repentance (Ac 5^{31} 11^{18}, 2 Ti 2^{25}, He 6^{6}), by which faith is imparted (Eph 1^{19}, Ph 1^{29}, cf. Lk 17^{5}), also assurance of God's love (Ro 5^{5} $8^{15.\ 16}$), hope (2 Th 2^{16}, 1 P 1^{3-5}), love towards God (2 Th 3^{5}) and towards the brethren (1 Th 4^{9}). By means of it we become God's children, righteous and holy (Ac 15^{11}, Ro 3^{24} 4^{16}, Tit 3^{7}), and receive strength to do good and to avoid evil (2 Th 2^{17} 3^{3}). The position of the redeemed is one of grace (Ro 5^{2}, 1 P 2^{10}), and by it sanctification is completed (1 Th $5^{23.\ 24}$). On the one hand, grace may be received in vain (2 Co 6^{1}); on the other, men may grow in grace (2 P 3^{18}). This grace of the Holy Spirit was promised by Christ Himself (Jn 7^{39} 14^{26} 15^{26} 16^{7}, Ac 1^{5}), is exercised in His service (Jn 14^{2-6} 16^{13-15}), and becomes the principle of the new life. The grace of God, in fact, bestows joy and peace and every good work (Ro 15^{13}, 2 Co 9^{8}). It has been remarked that as one cannot be the cause of one's own birth or resurrection, as in such events man must be purely passive, the employment of metaphors like the 'new birth' (Jn 3^{3-7}), or the 'new creature' (2 Co 5^{17}, Eph 2^{10}), or the new, the 'resurrection' life (Eph 2^{5}, Col 2^{13} 3^{1}), emphasizes the fact that renewal of heart and life is accomplished only by the power, the grace of God. Thus the Christian is what he is by divine grace (1 Co 4^{7} 15^{10}); and as he ought at all times to pray (1 Th 5^{17}, cf. 1 Ti 2^{8}, Mt 7^{7-11}, Lk 18^{1}) to the Source of all good for that of which he feels the need, so, for every benefit which he receives, he ought to give thanks and praise to God (Ro 6^{17}, 1 Co 1^{4}, 1 Th 1^{2} 2^{13} 3^{9}).

This positive and direct statement of the teaching of OT and NT with reference to the necessity and value of grace and its range of action might be supplemented and confirmed by a corresponding statement of the corruption and powerlessness of man due to sin as set forth in the same sacred pages. The more helpless man is seen to be, the greater is the need for the intervention of a Power above him and independent of him. This consideration brings us within sight of a problem which has much divided the Church in all ages, but which it does not fall within the province of this article to discuss in these its later developments. The problem is the relation of the divine to the human in the work of redemption, how far the initiative lies with God and man respectively, or how far they co-operate, and what, indeed, is meant by co-operation in such a case. It has driven Augustine and Pelagius, Calvin and Arminius, into opposite camps. All that can be done here is to inquire how far the roots of the doctrinal views identified with the names of these great teachers can be traced in the Bible. The passages which have been already cited tend on the whole to illustrate one side of this great controversy—that, namely, which grounds salvation on the free loving will and purpose of God. But, no doubt, many others may be, and have been, adduced which set forth no less distinctly the human side of salvation with its responsibilities and activities. This is especially the case with those which contain exhortations to repentance and faith. From the time of the Prophets μετάνοια was a condition of being saved. If men were commanded to repent, the implication was that it is in their power to do so. In some cases, it is true, we cannot argue from an injunction to the possibility of fulfilling it, but in this we cannot dispute that it is, in some sense, possible for man to repent, without taking away all meaning and reality from God's design of saving them. Such references to repentance are found in Ps $95^{7f.}$ (cf. He $4^{7ff.}$), Ac 2^{38} 8^{22}, Rev $2^{5.\ 16.\ 21}$ 3^{3} etc., cf. Mt 21^{32}. Similarly with faith: μετανοεῖτε and πιστεύετε are usually conjoined, and belief must be as personal as repentance. It is intended to be, not the result of momentary impression, but a spontaneous moral act. In Ro 1^{5} faith is spoken of as 'obedience,' a moral attitude which men are expected to assume. Exhortations to faith are found in Mk 1^{15} 5^{36}, Jn 6^{29} 10^{38} 12^{36} $14^{1.\ 11}$ 20^{27}, Ac 16^{31}. Repentance and faith are the chief elements in conversion. In Jer 31^{18} Ephraim cries, 'Turn thou me, and I shall be turned,' where the latter clause ought to be 'I shall return,' or 'that I may turn,' implying the element of personal activity (see art. CONVERSION, vol. i. p. 478ᵃ, footnote); and the image of the closed door in Rev 3^{20} indicates that it must be opened from within to Him that knocketh. Allusions to conversion are found in Ac 3^{19} 14^{15} 26^{20}, cf. 2 Co 3^{16}. While, on the one hand, the work of God begins with the calling, κλῆσις, Ro 8^{30}, whence Christians are known as κλητοί, Ro 1^{7}, the hearing must be a willing hearing, not like that of Jerusalem (Mt 23^{37}) or of the Jews (Jn 5^{40}), but like that of the disciples (Jn $17^{6.\ 8}$). The same element of human activity is implied in exhortations to perseverance (Ac 14^{22}, 1 Co 16^{13}, 1 Th 3^{2}), to watchfulness (Mt 24^{42}, Mk 13^{35}, 1 Co 16^{13}, 1 P 5^{8}, Rev 3^{3} 16^{15}), to struggle and endeavour (1 Co 9^{24-27}, 2 Ti 2^{5} 4^{7}), to labours on behalf of the brethren (Ro 14^{19} $15^{2.\ 14}$, Gal 6^{1}), and, in general, to the exercise of all the virtues, as well as to the performance of all the duties, of the Christian life. In every case language is used which, if it stood alone, would be taken as indicating that these things lie fully within the power of men to observe and do. Repentance, faith, etc., are regarded as works of men as well as gifts of God. Victory in that new life to which they are summoned can be achieved only by the zealous application of every energy of the soul. The promises which are held out to the faithful, and the threatenings which are denounced against the disobedient, all show the responsibility under which we act, the momentous results of choice.

But though later analysis, and the theories which figure in doctrinal history, have brought to light and emphasized this duality in the scriptural representations of human experience in salvation, though some thinkers and teachers have been willing to sacrifice the one side to the other, abolishing human liberty in order to exalt divine grace, or ignoring divine grace in order to safeguard human liberty,—it is noteworthy that the biblical writers betray little consciousness of the antagonism. St. Paul is clear and emphatic in his declarations as to grace—it is absolute, gratuitous—'by grace ye are saved'; but he is no less ready and willing to make his appeal to human liberty (Ro 2^{3-10}, Ph 3^{15-17}): 'Work out your own salvation,' he cries, 'with fear and trembling, for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to work for his good pleasure' (Ph $2^{12.\ 13}$ RV), where both elements appear together as indefeasible portions of the same Christian experience. If OT closed with an antinomy of wrath and mercy, law and grace, side by side, equally real, but so far from being mutually destructive that in the experience of the devout they were equally necessary and illustrated one another, so NT closes with its own unsolved antinomy,—human individuality, free, responsible, but sinful and degraded, owing its salvation to the love of Him who is rich in mercy, who first loved us, who despite human weakness and wickedness makes that mercy effectual, and the evil that is overcome redound to the praise of the glory of His grace.

LITERATURE.—Among sources of suggestion and material for an exhibition of the biblical doctrine of grace, special mention should be made, in regard to the word χάρις, of Cremer's Bib. Theol. Lex. of NT[2], and Grimm's Greek-English Lex. of NT, J. H. Thayer's edition; and in regard to the classification of passages, of C. Bois's article 'Grace Divine' in Lichtenberger's Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses; see also the Biblical Theologies of Oehler, Schultz, Weiss, Schmid, and the Historical Theology (Index, s.v.) of Cunningham. A. STEWART.

GRACIOUS.—This adj. is found with three distinct meanings. 1. Favourable, merciful, the most frequent use of the word, as Ex 33^{19} 'And [I] will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will show mercy on whom I will show mercy' (וְחַנֹּתִי אֶת־אֲשֶׁר, LXX καὶ ἐλεήσω ὃν ἂν ἐλεῶ, quoted in Ro 9^{15}). 2. Favoured, accepted (for the word 'gracious' has the distinction of being used actively of the person bestowing, and passively of the person receiving favour). There are two examples in AV, 1 Es 8^{80} 'Yea, when we were in bondage, we were not forsaken of our Lord; but he made us gracious before (ἐποίησεν ἡμᾶς ἐν χάριτι ἐνώπιον) the kings of Persia, so that they gave us food'; Sir 18^{17} 'Lo, is not a word better than a gift? But both are with a gracious man'; Gr. παρὰ ἀνδρὶ κεχαριτωμένῳ; Vulg. 'cum homine iustificato,' whence Wyc. and Dou. 'with a iustefied man'; Cov. 'but a gracious man geveth them both,' so Gen. and Bishops. The same form (perf. ptcp. pass. of χαριτόω 'to bestow favour on,' 'bless') is found in Lk 1^{28} Χαῖρε, κεχαριτωμένη; EV 'Hail, thou that art highly favoured,' AVm 'graciously accepted' or 'much graced'; the previous VSS follow the Vulg. ('Ave gratiæ plena') 'Hail full of grace,' except Gen. 'Hayle thou that art freely beloved,' and Bish. 'in high favour.' Shaks. has this meaning of 'gracious' in As You Like It, I. ii. 200—'If I be foiled, there is but one shamed that was never gracious'; and III Henry VI. III. iii. 117—

'But is he gracious in the people's eye?'

3. Attractive, winning.—There are four examples: (1) Pr 11^{16} 'a gracious woman retaineth honour' (אִשָּׁה חֵן), lit. 'a woman of grace'; LXX γυνὴ εὐχάριστος; Vulg. 'mulier gratiosa': 'a gracious woman' is Wyclif's tr[a], and all the versions agree with him. The meaning is 'a woman of grace of appearance.' (2) Ec 10^{12} 'The words of a wise man's mouth are gracious' (חֵן, lit. 'are grace,' as AVm; cf. Lk 4^{22} below). (3) Jer 22^{23} 'how gracious shalt thou be when pangs come upon thee.' The Mass. text gives חָנַנְתָּ (Kethîbh נחנתי), which can only be Niph. of חָנַן to be gracious. Luther understood it in the sense of 'be beautiful,' 'winning,' and tr[d] 'wie schön wirst du sehen'; after whom the Gen. gave 'how beautiful shalt thou be,' and AV 'how gracious shalt thou be.' The passive meaning 'favoured' or 'pitied' gives a better sense, however, and hence RV 'How greatly to be pitied shalt thou be,' and the Bishops, 'O howe litle shalt thou be regarded.' But the versions imply another reading, נֶאֱנַחְתָּ from [אנח], found only in Niph. 'to groan.' Thus LXX καταστενάξεις; Vulg. 'quomodo congemuisti.' This meaning is clearly most suitable, and is adopted by nearly all mod. editors. Wyc. follows Vulg. 'Hou togidere weiledist thou,' and so Dou. 'how hast thou mourned together.' Similarly, Cov. 'O how greate shall thy mourning be.' Rothstein (in Kautzsch) 'wie wirst du ächzen.' (4) Lk 4^{22} 'And all bare him witness and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth' (ἐπὶ τοῖς λόγοις τῆς χάριτος, RV 'words of grace'). The meaning here, says Plummer, is 'winning words.' He adds, 'The very first meaning of χάρις (χαίρω) is "comeliness," "winsomeness"'—Hom. Od. viii. 175; Ec 10^{12}, Ps 44^{3}, Sir 21^{16} 37^{21}, Col 4^{6}—'and in all these passages it is the winsomeness of language that is specially signified.' Vulg. translates 'mirabantur in verbis gratiæ,' whence Wyc. 'wondriden in the wordis of grace,' and Rhem. 'they marveled in the wordes of grace.' All the rest of the versions, beginning with Tindale, have 'wondered at the gracious words'; and it is doubtful if RV should have returned to 'words of grace'; to have changed the adj. to 'winning' would have prevented misunderstanding and been more in accordance with the Eng. idiom. In illustration of this use of the word we find Bacon, Essays ('Of Beauty,' p. 176), 'In Beauty, that of Favour is more then that of Colour, and that of Decent and Gratious Motion, more then that of Favour.' So Shaks. Twelfth Night, I. v. 281—

'And in dimension and the shape of nature
A gracious person: but yet I cannot love him.'

And Chapman, Homer's Iliads, xviii. 23—

'Himself he threw upon the shore,
Lay, as laid out for funeral, then tumbled round, and tore
His gracious curls.'

J. HASTINGS.

GRAFF.—From γράφειν, to write, was formed γραφεῖον, a style or pencil for writing with: this was adopted into Lat. graphium; and passed into old Fr. graffe, which gave Eng. 'graff,' a slip of a cultivated tree inserted into a wild one, so named because it resembled a pencil in shape. From this substantive was formed the verb 'to graff,' which then yielded another substantive 'graft' (like 'weight' from 'weigh'); and by and by this subst. 'graft' attracted the verb to its own form. So that, whereas both subst. and vb. were once 'graff,' now both are 'graft.' The change from 'graff' to 'graft' was in process in Shakespeare's day. As subst. he uses only 'graff,' Pericles, v. i. 60—

'The most just gods
For every graff would send a caterpillar.'

But as vb. he has both 'graff' (with past ptcp. 'graft') and 'graft' (with past ptcp. 'grafted'). Thus II Henry IV. v. iii. 3, 'Nay you shall see mine orchard, where, in an arbour, we will eat a last year's pippin of my own graffing'; Rich. II. III. iv. 101—

'Pray God the plants thou graft'st may never grow.'

In the Pr. Bk. of 1549 (Collect for 7th Sun. after Trinity, Keiling, p. 129) is the prayer 'Graff in our hearts the love of thy name': this runs through the edd. of 1552 and 1559, but in ed. 1604 is changed into 'graft.' Again in the Com. Service (Keiling, p. 228), 'Grant . . . that the words which we have heard this day with our outward ears, may through thy grace be so graffed inwardly in our hearts,' continues through all the edd. till that of 1662, when it becomes 'grafted.' The word is rare in the Eng. versions. It occurs as a var. reading in Wyclif's NT of 1380 at 1 Ti 6^{10}. Then in Ro 11^{17} Wyc. (1388) has 'art graffid among them' as tr^{n} of ἐνεκεντρίσθης ἐν αὐτοῖς (or rather of the Vulg. 'insertus es in illis'), and at v.^{19} 'the braunchis ben brokun, that y be graffid in.' Tindale, however, tr^{d} ἐνκεντρίζω by 'graff' in all its occurrences (Ro $11^{17.\ 19.\ 23\ bis.\ 24\ bis.}$),* and he was followed by all the versions except Coverdale. Tind. used 'grafte' and 'graffed' as the past tense or past ptcp., and in this also he was strictly followed, except that Rhem. (which tr^{d} independently from the Vulg.) used 'graffed' always, and was followed by AV. Cov. has 'grafte' in v.^{17}, which must be the ptcp. of 'graff,' but in all the remaining occurrences he uses the form 'graft' for the pres. tense and 'grafted' for the past. RV uses 'graft' and 'grafted' throughout.

The subject of grafting will be spoken of under Olive. We may illustrate it and the word here by quoting Gosson, Schoole of Abuse (Arber's ed. p. 63), 'Though the Mariner have skill to governe his vessel, it lieth not in his cunning to calme the seas: though the countriman know how to graffe an ympe [ἔμφυτος, shoot, scion], his toile will not alter the taste of the Crab.' Holland, Plinie, xvii. 14, 'The first is to set the graffe or sion betweene the barke and the wood: for in old time truly, men were afraid at first to cleave the stocke, but soon after they ventured to bore a hole into the very heart of the wood: and then they set fast into the pith just in the mids thereof, but one sion or graffe, for by this kind of graffing, impossible it was that the said pith should receive or bear any more.' Evelyn, Pomona, iii.—'Make choice of your graffs from a constant and well-bearing branch. As to the success of graffing, the main skill is, to joyn the inward part of the cion to the sappy part of the stock, closely, but not too forceably; that being the best and most infallible way, by which most of the quick and juicy parts are mutually united, especially toward the bottom.' Bp. Hall (Works, ii. 1) uses the form 'griffe': 'Elizabeth was just, as well as Zachary, that the fore-runner of a Saviour might be holy on both sides: if the stock and the griffe be not both good, there is much danger of the fruit.' J. Hastings.

GRANARY.—See Garner.

GRAPES. — See Vine. Wild Grapes. — See Cockle.

GRASS.—Four words are tr^{d} grass in OT:—1. יֶרֶק yereḳ, χλωρός. This word signifies green or greenness. Once it is tr^{d} 'grass' (Nu 22^{4}); twice 'green thing' (Ex 10^{15}, Is 15^{6}); thrice it is followed by other words, דֶּשֶׁא (Ps 37^{2}, Is 37^{27}) and עֵשֶׂב (Gn 1^{30}), and in these cases it is used as an adj. signifying 'green.'

2. חָצִיר ḥâẓîr.—This word is from a root (unused in Heb.) signifying to be green (Arab. ḥaḍira), from which is derived the noun ḥaḍrah, signifying primarily greenness, secondarily purslain, cucumbers, melons, and the like. It is now used for vegetables or herbage in general. In OT ḥâẓîr is used once for leeks, LXX πράσα (Nu 11^{5}). Twice it is tr^{d} 'hay' (Pr 27^{25} RVm 'grass,' LXX χλωρός; Is 15^{6} RV 'grass,' LXX χόρτος). In all the remaining passages in which it is used in both AV and RV it is tr^{d} 'grass.' LXX, however, renders it once (Is 35^{7}) by ἐπαύλεις, AV and RVm 'a court'; twice (2 K 19^{26}, Ps 90^{5}) by χλόη; twice (1 K 18^{5}, Job 8^{12}) by βοτάνη; once (Is 37^{27}) by χόρτος ξηρός; and in the ten other places where it occurs (Job 40^{15}, Ps 37^{2} 103^{15} 104^{14} 129^{6} 147^{8}, Is $40^{6.\ 7}$ 44^{4} 51^{12}) by χόρτος.

3. דֶּשֶׁא deshe' (root uncertain; the vb. רשא, Jl 2^{22}, Gn 1^{11}, is probably a denominative. Like ḥâẓîr, it is variously rendered in both EV and LXX. It is tr^{d} four times 'herb' (2 K 19^{26}, Is 66^{14} LXX βοτάνη; Ps 37^{2} LXX χλόη, Is 37^{27} where it is dropped out of the LXX); twice 'tender herb' (Dt 32^{2} LXX ἄγρωστις, Job 38^{27} RV 'tender grass,' marg. 'green-sward,' LXX χλόη); once 'green' as an adj. to pastures (Ps 23^{2} LXX τόπου χλόης); twice 'tender grass' (2 S 23^{4} LXX χλόη, Pr 27^{25} LXX πόα); and four times 'grass' (Gn 1^{11}, Jer 14^{5} LXX βοτάνη, Job 6^{5} LXX σῖτα, Is 15^{6} RV 'tender grass,' LXX χόρτος).

4. עֵשֶׂב 'ésebh. This word (of uncertain root) is tr^{d} in ten places 'herb' or 'herbs' (Gn $1^{11.\ 30}$ 3^{18}, Pr 27^{25}, Is 42^{15} LXX χόρτος, Gn 2^{5} LXX χλωρός, Ex 9^{22} $10^{12.\ 15}$ LXX βοτάνη, Ps 104^{14} LXX χλόη); and in eleven 'grass' (Dt 11^{15} LXX χορτάσματα, Dt 32^{2} RV herb, 2 K 19^{26}, Ps 72^{16} $102^{4.\ 11}$ 106^{20}, Jer 14^{6} RV herbage, Am 7^{2} LXX χόρτος; Job 5^{25} LXX παμβότανον; Is 37^{27} left out by LXX altogether).

It will appear from the above analysis—

(a) That all the above terms are indefinite, applying to herbage in general.

(b) It is improbable that the Hebrews discriminated rigidly between the true grasses, i.e. the modern botanical order Graminæ (or even the group of grass-like plants, including sedges and rushes), and other herbage. If they did, it does not appear from their nomenclature. The Arabic does not contain any such distinction. With all the general culture and knowledge of natural history of our age, grasses, in popular language, include some plants other than those of the order Graminæ, as pepper-grass, Lepidium sativum, L.; orange-grass, Hypericum Sarothra, L., etc.

(c) It is quite plain that neither the LXX nor our own translators have been at any pains to render these words always by the same Gr. or Eng. equivalent. Thus in Is 15^{6} both חָצִיר and דֶּשֶׁא are rendered χόρτος, the first being tr^{d} AV hay, RV grass, and the second AV grass, RV tender grass. In Is 37^{27} חָצִיר is rendered χόρτος ξηρός, AV and RV grass, while עֵשֶׂב and דֶּשֶׁא are left out in the LXX, and rendered in AV and RV respectively grass and herb. In Gn 1^{11} דֶּשֶׁא עֵשֶׂב is rendered βοτάνην χόρτου. The reader will detect numerous other illustrations of this point. Much as it is to be regretted that the translators, ancient and modern, have not rendered these words uniformly, we must accept the fact. The nearest we can approach to a specialization of the term is to regard עֵשֶׂב as referring to herbage in general, including vegetables suitable for human food; חָצִיר to grasses; דֶּשֶׁא to forage plants; and יֶרֶק to verdure. They might be then rendered as follows: 'ésebh = herbs, ḥâẓîr = grass, deshe' = pasture grass or tender grass, and yereḳ = green thing.

Grasses are very numerous in Bible lands. In Pal. and Syria they are represented by 90 genera and 243 species. Few of them grow in masses. Turf is almost unknown. With the exception of the cereals, none of the grasses are cultivated in this land. See Hay.

In NT grass is always the tr^{n} of χόρτος. But χόρτος is also tr^{d} by blade (Mt 13^{26}, Mk 4^{28}) and hay (1 Co 3^{12}). In Mk, l.c., the χλωρὸς χόρτος is the first evidence of early spring (cf. Jn $6^{4.\ 10}$).

GRATE, GRATING (מִכְבָּר). — Half-way up the altar of burnt-offering was attached a projecting ledge—such, at least, is the now generally accepted interpretation of the obscure word כַּרְכֹּב (Ex 27^{5} 38^{4}), regarding which the author of the Priests' Code gives us no further information—which appears to have run right round the altar. Underneath this projection was attached 'a grating (AV grate) of network of brass' (Ex 27^{4} RV, 35^{16} $38^{4.\ 30}$ 39^{39}),

* Besides this passage in Ro, the verb occurs in biblical Gr. only Wis 16^{11} in the sense of 'prick' (so AVm and RVm, but RV 'bite'). It comes from κέντρον, a goad.

which completely covered the lower half of the altar. It was probably, as the etymology suggests (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. sub כבר), a strong netting made of bronze (נְחֹשֶׁת) wire, with meshes sufficiently open to allow the sacrificial blood to be dashed against the lower part of the altar. For other conjectures regarding the nature and purpose of the mikbār, see the art. TABERNACLE (section dealing with the Altar of Burnt-offering).

GRATITUDE.—See THANKFULNESS.

GRAVE.—The usual OT word tr^d 'grave' is קֶבֶר ḳeber (also fem. form קְבוּרָה); and the usual NT word is μνημεῖον (with the occasional μνῆμα). See BURIAL, SEPULCHRE. But in AV שְׁאוֹל shĕ'ōl is often so tr^d, and ᾅδης once (1 Co 15^55). See HADES and SHEOL.

GRAVE.—In Sir 39^3 (and in the 1st Prologue) occurs the expression 'grave sentences' as tr^n παροιμίαι, RV 'proverbs.' The meaning of the adj. is 'weighty,' as in Knox, Hist. 406, 'Thus the Queen's Majesty being informed of the truth by her said Advocate, sent again and stayed the said meeting, and sent to the Town a grave Letter'; and Shaks. Macbeth, III. i. 21—

> 'We should have else desired your good advice,
> Which still hath been both grave and prosperous.'

In this use 'grave' is but one step removed from the lit. sense of 'heavy' (as Lat. gravis), which we find in Chapman, Homer's Odysseys, viii. 257—

> 'This said, with robe and all, he grasp'd a stone,
> A little graver than was ever thrown
> By these Phæacians in their wrastling rout.'

One step farther removed is the use of the word in NT as tr^n of σεμνός, 1 Ti 3^8. ^11, Tit 2^2, applied to deacons, their wives, and aged men, in the sense of 'serious.' Cf. T. Fuller, Holy and Profane State, iii. 19 (p. 202), 'He is a good Time-server that complyes his manners to the severall ages of this life: pleasant in youth, without wantonnesse; grave in old age, without frowardnesse. Frost is as proper for winter, as flowers for spring. Gravity becomes the ancient; and a green Christmas is neither handsome nor healthfull.' J. HASTINGS.

GRAVE.—The verb to 'grave' is used in earlier versions in the sense of 'dig,' as Is 37^25 Cov. 'Yf there be no water, I wil grave and drynke' (EV 'I have digged, and drunk water'). But the only meaning in EV is 'carve,' modern 'engrave.' So Tindale has the word in Gn 4^22 'Tubalcain a worker in metall and a father of all that grave in brasse and yeron'; and in Ex 39^6 'And they wrought onix stones cloosed in ouches of golde and graved as sygnettes are graven with the names of the children of Israel.' He also has 'stonegraver' Ex 28^11 (EV 'engraver in stone'), and 'graver' as the tool, 32^4 (EV 'graving tool'). For Graven Image see IDOLATRY, IMAGE. J. HASTINGS.

GRAVEL.—Wyclif used 'gravel' as a synonym for 'sand.' Thus Gn 22^17 'I shal multiply thi seed as sterris of hevene, and as gravel that is in the brenk of the see'; Mt 7^26 'And every man that herith these my wordis, and doth hem nat, is liche to a man fool, that hath bildid his hous on gravel, or soond'; Ac 27^41 'And whanne we felden into a place of gravel gon al aboute with the see, thei hurtliden the schipp.'*

In the last passage Rhem. has 'And when we were fallen into a place betwene two seas, they graveled the ship.' This use of 'gravel' as a verb led to the fig. phrase 'to gravel one,' that is, 'bring one to a standstill in argument,' a phrase used by Thomas Fuller in Holy and Profane State, ii. 4 (p. 63), 'When Eunomius the Heretick vaunted that he knew God and his divinity, S. Basil gravells him in 21 questions about the body of an ant or pismire: so dark is man's understanding.'

In AV also there is practically no distinction between 'gravel' and 'sand,' unless it is made by the addition of 'stones.' The word occurs (1) Is 48^19 'Thy seed also had been as the sand, and the offspring of thy bowels like the gravel thereof' (כְּמֹעֹתָיו, RV 'like the grains thereof,' after LXX, Jerome, Targ., Ewald, Del., Orelli, and others; but RVm 'like that of the bowels thereof' [referring to the fish], after Ges., Hitzig, Knobel, Keil, Nägelsbach, and others [Cheyne, 'as the entrails thereof']. The word, which occurs only here, is of uncertain derivation and meaning); (2) Pr 20^17 'Bread of deceit is sweet to a man; but afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel,' and (3) La 3^16 'He hath also broken my teeth with gravel stones' (both חָצָץ, from [חָצַץ] to divide, therefore 'broken small'); (4) Sir 18^10 'As a drop of water unto the sea, and a gravelstone in comparison of the sand' (ψῆφος, RV 'a pebble'). J. HASTINGS.

GRAY.—The epithet 'gray' occurs only in reference to hair, and is the tr^n either of שִׂיב sîbh, to be gray-headed (1 S 12^2, Job 15^10), or of שֵׂיבָה sêbhâh, hoariness, old age (Gn 42^38 44^29. ^31, Dt 32^25, Ps 71^18, Pr 20^9, Hos 7^9). RV prefers 'hoary' in Pr 20^29.

The word has been spelt both 'gray' and 'grey' from earliest times. Shaks. has in Hamlet (II. ii. 199), 'The satirical rogue says here that old men have grey beards,' but in Lear (II. ii. 72), 'Spare my gray beard, you wagtail?' In AV 1611 the spelling is uniformly 'gray,' but in Ps 71^18, Pr 20^29 the word is usually spelt 'grey' in modern editions.

GREAT SEA (הַיָּם הַגָּדוֹל Nu 34^6. ^7, Jos 15^12. ^47, Ezk 47^19. ^20 48^28), called also הַיָּם הָאַחֲרוֹן the hinder, i.e. western sea, Dt 11^24 34^2, Zec 14^8, Jl 2^20; יָם פְּלִשְׁתִּים Sea of the Philistines, Ex 23^31; הַיָּם The Sea, Gn 49^13, Nu 13^29 34^5, Dt 1^7 etc. Lat. Mare Internum.*

The Mediterranean was essentially the 'Great Sea' and 'Hinder Sea' to the writers of the Bible; being the western boundary of the Holy Land, beyond which their geographical knowledge did not far extend. Maritime adventure and commerce was not the direction in which Israelitish ambition extended, except perhaps for a short period during the reign of Solomon; and although the lands allotted to the tribes of Judah, Dan, Ephraim, Manasseh, Zebulun, and Asher touched the coast of the Mediterranean at various points, the waters of the Great Sea were seldom traversed by their ships. This was due to several causes: first, the history of the Israelites previous to the Exodus was essentially of an inland character; secondly, during and after the invasion of Palestine their efforts were too much directed towards dispossessing the inhabitants and retaining their hold on the countries they had conquered, to give them time and opportunity for extending their sway beyond the coast; thirdly, the absence of natural commodious harbours on the Mediterranean seaboard; and lastly, the presence of the Phœnicians on the north, and of the Philistines on the south, along the coast-line. These nations, especially the former, had command of the sea, and rendered adventure in that direction either useless or impracticable to the children of Israel. From a period as far back as the Exodus the Phœnician settlers had established themselves at various points along the coast, and in course of time formed a confederation, essentially maritime, extending from beyond the Orontes on the north to Joppa (Japho) on the south, a length of 300 English miles.† To the south of Joppa the country of the Philistines commenced and extended to 'the River

* Wyc. even uses 'gravel' in the plu., Dt 33^19 (1380) 'hid tresours of graveils' (after Vulg. 'thesauros absconditos arenarum'), Dou. 'sandes.'

* It is intended to treat this subject only in so far as it is connected with biblical history.

of Egypt,'* thus effectually excluding the Israelites from the command of the sea. The only port, in fact, to which in the time of the monarchy this nation had full access seems to have been Joppa, which, from its position as the nearest to Jerusalem, became the chief centre of the import and export trade. Thither in the time of Solomon the timber required for the construction of the temple and the royal palace, which had been cut in the Lebanon, was transported; and thither, doubtless, were conveyed the wheat, the barley, the oil, and the wine, which the Phœnicians received in exchange for their firs and cedars (2 Ch $2^{10.\ 15}$). In the time of the Maccabees, however, this port became the property of the Jews (1 Mac 10^{76}). Another port, Acco,—now known as Acre,—situated on the northern shore of the bay of that name, was assigned to Zebulun ('a haven of ships,' Gn 49^{13}), but it is doubtful if it was ever occupied by that tribe for any considerable time. It is the best natural roadstead on the Syrian coast, and was conquered and retained by the Assyrians in their wars with Palestine and Egypt. In later times it played an important part in the wars of the Crusades, and has become celebrated in recent times for its successful resistance to Napoleon, when held by a Turkish garrison and supported by a British fleet under the command of Admiral Sir Sidney Smith (1799). The port under the name of Ptolemais is mentioned as having been visited by St. Paul on his third missionary journey (Ac 21^{7}).

Mediterranean Coast.—From the Bay of Iskenderun on the north to el-'Arîsh on the south, a distance of 450 miles, the coast of the Levant (the eastern part of the Mediterranean) is remarkably straight, with few deep bays or prominent headlands. All along the Syrian coast as far as Beirût, the land rises with a rocky and bold front from the waters. At Acre the coast recedes and the land gently slopes upwards along the banks of the Kishon, forming the plain of Esdraelon. South of this valley, the long ridge of Mount Carmel protrudes into the waters and terminates in a bold headland; and from its southern slopes the Vale of Sharon gradually expands in breadth and ultimately merges into that of Philistia; and the coast-line follows an almost unbroken semicircular curve towards the Delta of the Nile.

Sandhills.—When the early settlers, coming from the head of the Persian Gulf to the shores of the Mediterranean (about B.C. 1500), first surveyed its blue waters they beheld groves of palms lining the coast, in consequence of which the Greeks called the land 'Phœnicia.'† These palms have long since disappeared, and their place is generally occupied by enormous banks of sand gradually moving inwards from the coast as they are impelled by the westerly winds. Most of the ancient coast towns, both of Phœnicia and Philistia, are buried to a greater or less extent beneath these sandhills, which, when not prevented by artificial means, are still moving inland, and have become a source of danger and loss to the inhabitants. These sandhills, according to Sir H. Kitchener, cover a large tract of country between southern Philistia and Ismailia.

New Testament Notices.—Once in the history of our Lord did He with His disciples visit the coast of the Great Sea; this was on the memorable occasion when, endeavouring to obtain a brief period of repose, He visited the borders of Tyre and passed through (ἦλθεν διὰ Σιδῶνος) Sidon,‡ and performed a miracle of healing on a Gentile, the daughter of a Syro-phœnician woman. But in the missionary journeys of St. Paul, and especially in the incidents connected with his final voyage to Rome (Ac 27. 28), we are brought into contact with numerous seaports, headlands, islands, and bays, commencing with Cæsarea on the coast of Phœnicia and terminating with the port of Puteoli (Puzzuoli) on the western coast of Italy. In following the narrative of this voyage we can trace its course from point to point on the map, and we gain some insight into the dangers of navigation at a time when the mariner's compass was unknown, when nautical charts were rude, or were perhaps unused by the commanders of ships, and when the heavenly bodies alone were guides to the ship's course when out of sight of land. [For the description of St. Paul's voyages in the Mediterranean, consult Smith, *Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul*², 1856; the works on St. Paul's Life, as Conybeare and Howson, Lewin, Farrar, Stalker, Iverach; the Commentaries on the Acts; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller; and the various Bible Appendixes, 'Aids' (Queen's Printers), 'Helps' (Oxford), 'Companion' (Cambridge), 'Manual' (Collins)]. GREAVES (1 S 17^{6}) in the phrase מִצְחַת נְחֹשֶׁת miẓḥath nĕḥôsheth, 'greave of bronze.' The singular rendering is perhaps to be preferred (not so Wellh. and Driver, in loco). The Roman legionary in later times wore one greave, and that on his right leg. Cf. passage quoted from Polybius (e) under ARMOUR.
W. E. BARNES.

GRECIANS, GREEKS.—Both these terms are used indifferently in AV of OT Apocr. to designate persons of Gr. extraction (1 Mac 1^{10} 6^{2} 8^{9}, 2 Mac 4^{36} etc.). In Jl 3^{6} AV has 'Grecians,' RV and AVm 'sons of the Grecians,' as the tr. of בְּנֵי הַיְוָנִים. This is the only passage in OT where either Grecians or Greeks are named, although Greece (under the name JAVAN, which see) is several times mentioned (Dn 8^{21} 10^{20} 11^{2}, Zec 9^{13}). In NT the linguistic usage of EV makes a distinction between the terms Greeks and Grecians. Greeks uniformly represents the word Ἕλληνες, which may denote persons of Gr. descent in the narrowest sense (Ac 16^{1} 18^{4}, Ro 1^{14}), or may be a general designation for all who are not of Jewish extraction (Jn 12^{20}, Ro 1^{16} 10^{12}, Gal 3^{28}. See GENTILES). It is remarkable that in Is 9^{12} even פְּלִשְׁתִּים (Philistines) is reproduced in LXX by Ἕλληνες. Grecians, on the other hand (Ac 6^{1} 9^{29}), is AV tr. of Ἑλληνισταί (see following art.), which means Gr.-speaking Jews (RV Grecian Jews). An interesting question is that of the correct reading of Ac 11^{20}. Were those to whom the men of Cyprus and Cyrene preached, Grecians or Greeks? in other words, were they Jews or Gentiles? The weight of MS authority is in favour of Ἑλληνιστάς (the reading in TR, and adopted in AV and RVm), which has the support of B and indirectly of ℵ* (εὐαγγελιστάς) D^{2} L and almost all cursives. It is retained in the text of WH. Internal evidence, on the other hand (see, however, WH's Introd. to Gr. NT, App. 93 f.), is generally supposed to necessitate the reading Ελληνας which is found in ℵ³ A D, and is accepted by Scrivener, Lachm. Tisch. Treg. and text of RV (see Scrivener's *Introd. to Crit. of NT*⁴, ii. 370 f.).
J. A. SELBIE.

GREECE, HELLENISM.—The names Greek and Greece do not occur in the Gr. or Heb. Bible, being designations under which the Italian races came to know Hellas and its inhabitants. In Gn 10^{2} Javan ('Ιωάν) is correctly used to denote the Gr. stock in general. So in Æsch. Pers. 178, 563 the Persian interlocutors speak of Greeks as the Iâones.

The old Armenians used the same word; and at a very remote date the Yevana are mentioned in the ancient Egyptian epic of Ramses II. among the allies of the Hittites.

As early as the 7th cent. B.C. the names Hellas and Hellenes were used by the Greeks to distinguish themselves from the Barbari. And the same are used in the LXX (Jl 3^{6}, Is 66^{19}, Ezk 27^{13}, Zec 9^{13}) and in NT.

It has been lately conjectured on archæological grounds that the Philistines were the same race with the Pelasgians, who built the pre-historic city of Mycenæ, and used the primitive alphabet discovered recently by Mr. Arthur Evans in Crete and the Peloponnese. If this be so, the Jews from their first entry into Canaan were in conflict with the forerunners of the historical Greeks. 'That among the various elements,' says Mr. Evans, 'from the Ægean coastlands, who took part in the Philistine confederation, men of Greek stock may already have found a place as early as the 12th or 11th cent. B.C. can at least no longer be regarded as an improbable hypothesis. It is, perhaps, not without some actual warrant in fact that in the LXX of Is 9^{12} the Philistines themselves are translated by "Ελληνες.'* Renan (Hist. of People of Israel, Eng. tr. ii. 15) adopts the same view.

However this may be, the hist. relations of Jews with Greeks begin mainly about the age of Alexander of Macedon, and as the result of his conquests. He, and the Diadochi kings who succeeded him, deliberately set about the Hellenization of Asia, Syria, and Egypt. If Alexander did not found all the 70 new cities in Asia ascribed to him by Plutarch, he was at least the founder of Alexandria.

But the bloom of Gr. civilization could not be transferred to Asia and Egypt, for it had passed away. The old independent city life was crushed, partly by the previous internecine conflicts of the Greeks, partly by the all-engulfing conquests of Philip and Alexander. Under the Diadochi, who became despots of an Oriental type, there was none of the old Gr. freedom. The new Gr. settlers themselves, brought into close contact with Asiatics, became half orientalized. Something of the old subtlety in speculation remained, something of the plastic skill of the older art. But the combined strength, simplicity, and lovely symmetry of Gr. genius was lost. Moral philosophy alone, in the hands of the Stoics, remained a vigorous activity; but now that the free state was a thing of the past, it was rather the life and duties of the individual than the collective life and needs of the organized community that formed the matter for criticism and theory.

Alexander and his successors invited the Jews to join in this work of colonization, and they responded freely. In Egypt, indeed, there were already Jews serving in the army of Psammitichus I. as early as B.C. 650; and under Jeremiah went many others. But of these was left a mere remnant, when, on the occasion of the foundation of Alexandria, a fresh mass of Jewish colonists was introduced. Here they had an ethnarch of their own, and privileges from the first; and they increased so much that Philo (in Flac. ii. 523) before A.D. 40 estimated their number at a million. From Egypt they spread westward, and already, in Sulla's time, were an important class in Cyrene. In the East the bulk of the Jewish race still remained, of course, in the old lands of the Captivity, beyond the Euphrates, there contracting Persian and Assyrian beliefs and culture rather than Greek. But in the Gr. cities of Syria they were, from the time of the Diadochi, very numerous. In Damascus Jos. (BJ VII. viii. 7) says there were 18,000 slain in the war of A.D. 66–70 alone. Antioch was full of them, as were all the coast cities, from Sidon southwards. In Asia Minor, as early as the middle of the 4th cent. B.C., Aristotle met an educated Jew who was Greek not only in speech, but in spirit (Jos. c. Ap. i. 22). In Phrygia and Lydia, Antiochus the Great planted 2000 families of Mesopotamian Jews (Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 4)—a proof that it was not from the small district of Judæa alone and from the remnant restored by Cyrus that the new Jewish colonists were drawn by the Seleucid kings. However, since Ptol. Lagos transferred 100,000 from Judæa to Egypt (Aristeæ Epist.), there must have been a great surplus of population in the Holy Land itself at the beginning of the 3rd cent. B.C. Philo (de Legat. ii. 587) has preserved a letter of Herod Agrippa to Caligula, testifying to the extent of the Greek diaspora in the year A.D. 38. 'Jerusalem,' wrote Agrippa, 'is the capital city, not of a single country, but of most, because of its colonies in Egypt, Phœnicia, Syria in general, and Hollow Syria, as also in Pamphylia, Cilicia, most districts of Asia (Minor), as far as Bithynia and the extreme parts of Pontus.' In the same way, he continues, Europe was full of Jews: Thessaly, Bœotia, Macedonia, Ætolia, Attica, Argos, Corinth, the best and larger part of Peloponnese. And not the mainland only. For Eubœa, Cyprus, Crete, and the islands generally, were full of Jews.

Many of these Jewish colonists adopted Gr. speech, habits, and culture. They wrote and thought in Greek. They read the Gr. poets and orators; admired and were spectators of Gr. plays; joined Gr. philosophic sects, Pythagoræan, Peripatetic, Stoic or Epicurean. On the other hand, distinctively Jewish sects, like that of the Alexandrian Therapeutæ, ramified, according to Philo (ii. 474), in many parts of the inhabited world, esp. in Greece. Of the interpenetration of the Jewish by the Hellenic genius which resulted, we have left in religious literature three great monuments, the LXX, the NT, and the works of Philo; not to mention numerous extra-canonical apocrypha, some originally written in Aram. or Heb., but mostly surviving in a Gr. form alone. Foremost among the latter in religious interest are the surviving fragments of Enoch and the Jewish Sibylline poems.

The copious works of Philo have probably survived by mere accident; but that they are a mere remnant of a larger Jewish-Gr. literature is evident from the anonymous references to other writers with which his pages abound. Christian writers, especially Eusebius, have preserved the names of, as well as extracts from, several Hellenistic writers of early date: e.g. of a Philo who wrote an epic on Jerus., of a poet Theodotus, and of Ezekiel who wrote a drama about Moses. Among the philosophic writers Aristobulus is remarkable as the first to use, so far as we know, the allegorical method of expounding the Mosaic law, about B.C. 170–150.

These writers were Alexandrine, but there are many more Gr. authors who were probably Pal. Jews or even Samaritans. Among these, Alex. Polyhistor (B.C. 80–40) has preserved to us in his works, as cited by Eusebius, fragments of the chronicler Demetrius (B.C. 222–205), of Eupolemus (B.C. 158–157), and Artapanus, Aristeas, and Cleodemus, all four Jewish historians. Jason of Cyrene (c. B.C. 160) wrote a history of the Maccabæan wars, of which 2 Mac is an abridgment made before Philo's age. The Wisdom of Sol. was probably written in Alexandria before Philo's day. Numenius and Longinus, in the 2nd and 3rd cents. A.D., wrote to some extent under Jewish influence, but were not Jews.

* See art. on 'Primitive Pictographs and Script from Crete and the Peloponnese' in Journ. of Hellenic Studies, vol. xiv. pt. 2, 1894, p. 369.

It is of peculiar interest to know how far Hellenism had, in the 300 years preceding Jesus of Nazareth, invaded Judæa itself. The circumstance that the strictly Jewish territory of Judæa, Galilee, and Peræa was wedged in between large and affluent Gr. cities on the E. and W., would in itself suggest considerable inroads of Hellenism. Nor must it be forgotten that at least at every passover thousands of Gr.-speaking Jews were present in Jerus., and that many of them were domiciled there, as is clear from their having synagogues.

In Ac 2^{9} we read that on the day of Pentecost there were present in Jerus. Jews not merely from Parthia, Media, Elam, and Mesopotamia, but from Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phrygia, Pamphylia, Egypt, Libya about Cyrene; also sojourners from Rome, Cretans, and Arabians. Not all of these would speak Gr., but many the vernaculars of their districts. But the enumeration shows how polyglot a multitude was to be met with in Jerus. on any feast day. There is no reason to doubt the tradition that the bilingual Jewish doctors who, perhaps, by order of Ptolemy Philadelphus, translated the Law and the Prophets some time early in the 3rd cent. B.C., were sent from Jerus. itself by the high priest Eleasar. For the Jews of Jerus. made, as early as B.C. 300, alliance with Sparta, which was renewed a century and a half later (1 Mac $12^{7.\ 8.\ 19\text{-}22}$, cf. $14^{18\text{ff.}}$). They also made treaties with Gr. cities in Asia; and under the Seleucids, prior to the Maccab. revolt, rapid strides had been made towards their Hellenization. Nor was this revolt directed against the Gr. language, philosophy, and architecture; but was rather excited by the despotic attempt of Antiochus to enforce idolatry. Still it is probable that the success of the revolt was a check to Hellenizing influences, and stimulated the use, not, indeed, of Hebrew, which was already a dead language, and unintelligible to the masses, but of the local Aramaic. If the returned Jews of an earlier generation had not been so gratuitously intolerant of their old Samaritan co-religionists, there would have been a more compact mass of Sem.-speaking people to oppose the inroads of Gr. language and habits. As it was, the very metropolis of Galilee was a Gr. city.

Whatever reaction against Hellenism the Maccab. uprising may have called into being, it is yet certain that Judæa contained during the 1st cent. B.C. a powerful minority of Gr. Jews. The rulers, even of the patriotic Hasmonæan house, bore Gr. names, and the entire influence of the Idumæan usurpers, Herod and Archelaus, who succeeded, was cast on the side of Hellenism. The temple of Herod was a Gr. building; so were all the other monuments and tombs of that epoch. There was a Gr. circus and hippodrome in Jerus., and Herod was surrounded by Gr. philosophers and writers.

The NT itself bears witness to the strength of the Gr. element in the very cradle of the new religion. Of the apostolic writings there is not a single one—with the dubious exception of the Heb. Matthew—which was not from the first written in Gr.; and the Gr. style of Paul, of Peter, of Jude, of James, and of the authors of the two Gospels which claim apost. authorship, is not the style of writers who were tyros or late learners, but of men who had read and spoken Greek from childhood. They were certainly bilingual Jews; and if it is probable that Jesus habitually taught in Aram., it is not less probable that He, like most of His disciples, knew Greek. Philip, who certainly spoke Gr. (Jn 12^{21}, Ac 8^{35}), besides having a Gr. name, came from Bethsaida Julias, a grecized town; whence also came another apostle with a Gr. name, Andrew, and Peter himself (Jn 1^{44}). We hear of believing Greeks (not Gr. Jews) in the entourage of Jesus (Jn 12^{21}); and the cry of anguish, Eli, Eli, lamα sabachthani, could only have been misunderstood by a Gr.-speaking crowd. How strong was the Hellenistic party in the Church from the first, is clear from the fact that it was their grievances which led to the appointment of the seven, all of whom bore Gr. names, while one, at least, was a proselyte of Antioch (Ac 6^{5}). The mention of the widows of the Hellenists proves that this party in the earliest Church was composed of settled residents in Jerus., and not of mere birds of passage, like the Libyan, Cyrenian, Alexandrine, Cilician, and Asiatic Jews mentioned in the same context. Stephen, who argued with all these, and was also one of the new deacons, must have talked Greek to them; and his speech, which is full of LXX citations, was no doubt delivered in Greek. Later on, in Ac 21^{40}, St. Paul, indeed, addresses the mob in Jerus. in the Heb. dialect, that is, in Aramaic. But that is far from warranting Schürer's inference (HJP II. i. 48), that this mob knew no Greek. For the context (Ac 22^{2}) proves that St. Paul did so only to conciliate them, and therefore as an exception. It is clear that they did not expect it, and were surprised to hear him whom they had just accused of introducing a Gr. into the temple, address them freely in Aramaic. They expected him to speak to them in the same Gr. tongue in which he had been conversing with the chief captain. And it is noticeable that on this occasion, as at Stephen's martyrdom, it was Gr.-speaking Jews (of Asia, Ac 21^{27}) who had stirred up ill-feeling against the followers of the new Messiah.

Many other facts point to the diffusion of a knowledge of Greek in Judæa. The coins of the Hasmonæan epoch bore Greek as well as Aram. legends; those of the Herodean dynasty and of the Romans, Greek alone. The Mishna, which represents the Judæa of that age, is full of Gr. loan-words, even for the commonest objects of life.* In the temple the notices warning Gentiles off from the inner precincts were in Gr. and Latin. It is probable even that the poor and despised in the cities of Judæa were more familiar with Gr. than were the rich Sadducees or the legalistic Pharisees. Thus Jos. at the end of his work (Ant. XX. xi. 2) writes as follows: 'With Gr. letters I was careful to acquire an adequate grammatical acquaintance; though my country's custom was an obstacle to my talking Gr. accurately. For with us they do not approve of those who learn thoroughly the language of many races, because they esteem this accomplishment as one common, not only to the inferior class of free men, but to such servants as care to learn. They allow real wisdom to belong only to those who clearly understand the law and can interpret the meaning of the Holy Scripture.' From the above it is clear that though the Jewish aristocracy disdained to talk Gr., they did not equally disdain to read and write it; and that a command of the spoken idiom looked at askance by Pharisees, scribes, and Sadducees, was yet diffused among the humbler classes. It was just of these humbler people, the 'am-hāārez, who knew not the law (Jn 7^{49}), but who could often talk Gr., that the teaching of Jesus took hold. They composed the earliest Church, and were the lost sheep of the House of Israel.

The crushing reverses which the Jews experienced at the hands of the Rom. power from 70 till 150 A.D., first in Judæa and later in Cyprus, Alexandria, Cyrene, and elsewhere, drove the race in upon itself and soon established a prejudice against any Jewish books not written in Hebrew. A little before A.D. 70, when the final agony was at hand, it was forbidden by the Rabbis to Jewish fathers to have their sons any more instructed in

* See Schürer, HJP, as above, § 22.

Greek,* which proves that till then it had been a common practice. The writing of divorcement might, according to the Mishna, be in Greek (Gittin, ix. 8); and the LXX was recognized by official Judaism (Megilla, i. 8). In spite of the prejudice aroused against Gr. by the events of A.D. 70, two or three new Gr. translations of OT were made for the use of Gr. Jews in the hundred years which ensued. But the prejudice continued to grow, and the cruelties perpetrated upon Jews by the Christians, so soon as they got the upper hand, must have intensified it. And the result is seen to-day in the circumstance that of all the voluminous Jewish-Greek literature which once existed, nothing survives except what the Christian Church has kept. No doubt the vigilant censorship of the Cath. Church is, in part, responsible for this deprivation, which we of to-day feel so keenly. For the fanaticism which destroyed all heretical works so-called was not likely to spare Jewish books. Still, the prejudices of the Jews themselves must be largely to blame.

The tendencies and characteristics of Greek Judaism will be further dealt with under the articles ISRAEL and RELIGION.

It is enough here to point out that the Gr. Jews were not alien, as is often supposed, from the Messianic hope. The Jewish Sibylline poems know of it; and Philo, in spite of all his Hel. training, held it with intense fervour, as is clear to any one who will read his two tracts de Præmiis et Poenis and de Exsecrationibus.

The relations of the Jews to their Gr. fellow-townsmen were invariably hostile on both sides. They were constantly ready to massacre each other. This hatred was due to the fact that in each city the Jews formed a community apart, often under archons or ethnarchs, or an assembly of their own. They could join in no heathen festivals, nor eat any meats, nor even use oil for anointing which they had not themselves prepared. How much the Gentiles resented this Jewish exclusiveness is clear from hints in Juvenal, Tacitus, and other ancient writers. The Jews, in fact, held the same position in a pagan community as do the Mohammedans of India among the Hindoos who surround them. Add to this that the Gr. Jews lost no opportunity of making converts among the pagans, and were especially successful in winning over the women. These converts were, of course, obliged to cut themselves adrift from their old friends and families—a circumstance which intensified the hatred of the Greeks for a religion and race at once exclusive and usurping. The propagandism of the Christians had from the first the same result. The new religion, like the old, spread among Gentiles at the expense of family ties and affections; and on their ruin ultimately consecrated the principles and edifice of monasticism. In the Jewish sects of Essenes and Therapeutæ, esp. of the latter, we may trace similar results arising out of similar conditions within Gr. Judaism itself. The Rom. Government, however, always recognized Judaism as the religion of a race, and therefore as something respectable and deserving of protection from Gentile assaults. For Christianity, which was not a national cult, and for that reason a more rapid solvent of family and citizen ties, the Government had less solicitude; and was less anxious, as a rule, to protect it from the storms of popular hatred which it everywhere excited. For further information on such points, see art. on PROSELYTE; and on the whole subject of Greek Judaism, see Schürer, HJP (esp. II. i. 11–51, and II. iii. 156–381), before each chapter of which is given an array of the chief authorities on every part of the subject. F. C. CONYBEARE.

GREEK VERSIONS. — See SEPTUAGINT and VERSIONS.

GREEN.—See COLOURS (vol. i. p. 457[a]).

GREET, GREETING.—In OT 'greet' occurs only once, 1 S 25[5] 'Go to Nabal, and greet him in my name' (וּשְׁאַלְתֶּם־לוֹ בִּשְׁמִי לְשָׁלוֹם, lit., as AVm, 'and ask him in my name of peace'). The AV is from Wyc. 1388 (through Bish.); the 1382 ed. has 'salute,' which is the word in Cov. and Dou.; Gen. 'aske him in my name how he doeth.'

In Apocr. the usual Gr. formula of salutation, χαίρειν, is tr[d] 'greeting' in 1 Es 6[7], Ad. Est 16[1], 1 Mac 12[20] 15[2. 16]; and 'sendeth' or 'send greeting' in 1 Es 8[9], 1 Mac 10[18. 25] 11[32] 13[36] 14[20], 2 Mac 11[16. 22. 27. 34]. RV omits 'sendeth' or 'send.' In 2 Mac 1[10] χαίρειν καὶ ὑγιαίνειν is tr[d] 'sent (RV send) greeting, and health.' In Sir 6[5] we have 'a fair-speaking tongue will increase kind greetings' (εὐπροσήγορα, RV 'courtesies').

As a simple formula of salutation χαίρειν occurs but thrice in NT, Ac 15[23] AV 'The apostles and elders and brethren send greeting unto the brethren which are of the Gentiles,' RV omits 'send'; 23[26] AV 'Claudias Lysias unto the most excellent governor Felix sendeth greeting,' RV omits 'sendeth'; Ja 1[1] AV 'James . . . to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad, greeting,' RVm 'wisheth joy.' And in 2 Jn [10. 11] λέγειν χαίρειν, which in AV is tr[d] 'bid one God speed,' is in RV rendered 'give one greeting.' But the most frequent use of 'greet' in AV is as a variation for 'salute' in the rendering of ἀσπάζομαι (Ro 16[3. 5. 6. 8. 11], 1 Co 16[20], 2 Co 13[12], Ph 4[21], Col 4[14], 1 Th 5[-6], 2 Ti 4[21], Tit 3[15], 1 P 5[14], 2 Jn [13], 3 Jn [14]). Elsewhere, with two exceptions, this verb is tr[d] 'salute'; and there is little doubt that the Revisers have done wisely in giving 'salute' also in the passages where AV has 'greet.' For the unwary reader is sure to imagine a difference of Greek and of meaning when he finds, e.g. in Ph 4[21] 'Salute every saint in Christ Jesus. The brethren which are with me greet you'; or in 3 Jn [14] 'Our friends salute thee. Greet the friends by name.'

The two exceptions are (1) Ac 20[1] ἀσπασάμενος ἐξῆλθε πορευθῆναι [edd. πορεύεσθαι] εἰς τὴν Μακεδονίαν, AV 'embraced them and departed for to go into Macedonia,' RV 'took leave of them and departed,' Ramsay 'bade them farewell'; (2) He 11[13] ἀλλὰ πόρρωθεν αὐτὰς ἰδόντες, καὶ πεισθέντες [edd. omit κ. π.], καὶ ἀσπασάμενοι; AV 'but having seen them [the promises] afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them'; RV 'but having seen them and greeted them from afar,' which Schaff (Companion to Gr. Test. and Eng. Version, 1883, p. 454) quotes in his 'Select List of Improved Readings.'

In like manner the subst. ἀσπασμός is tr[d] 'greeting' in Mt 23[7], Lk 11[43] 20[46], and elsewhere (Mk 12[38], Lk 1[29. 41. 44], 1 Co 16[21], Col 4[18], 2 Th 3[17]) 'salutation.' RV gives 'salutation' everywhere.

J. HASTINGS.

GREYHOUND (זַרְזִיר מָתְנַיִם zarzîr mothnayim, Pr 30[31]).—These Heb. words signify 'one girt in the loins' (AV and RV 'greyhound,' AVm 'horse,' RVm 'war-horse'). Some have supposed that the intention is to describe a wrestler, owing to his commanding figure. The LXX has 'a cock walking proudly among the hens' (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.). G. E. POST.

GRIEF.—Grief comes from Lat. gravis, heavy, sad, through Fr. grief or gref. And although it is now used to denote mental anguish only, it formerly covered bodily pain as well. In its use (as in some of the Heb. or Gr. words of which it is the tr[n] in AV) the distinction between bodily and mental pain is not very sharp. Still, its application may be expressed as follows:—

1. Bodily pain or disease. (1) Heb. כְּאֵב kĕ'ĕb, Job 2^{13} 'they saw that his grief was very great' (RVm 'his pain'); so $16^{5.6}$. (2) מַכְאוֹב mak'ôb, 2 Ch 6^{29} 'when every one shall know his own sore and his own grief' (RV 'sorrow,' Oxf. Heb. Lex. 'pain'—clearly the meaning here); Ps 69^{26} 'they talk to the grief of those whom thou hast wounded' (RV 'they tell of the sorrow'; RVm 'pain'—so Perowne, Del., Cheyne, de Witt, and others; LXX τὸ ἄλγος). (3) חָלָה ḥâlâh, to be sick, used in the Niph. ptcp. as an adj. (qualifying מַכָּה 'wound'), and tr^{d} in EV 'grievous,' Jer 10^{19} 14^{17} 30^{12}, Nah 3^{19}, but as a subst. in Is 17^{11} and tr^{d} 'grief.' The Hiphil of the same vb. is tr^{d} in Is 53^{10} 'Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him; he hath put him to grief' (RVm 'made him sick,' i.e. by bruising him so sorely [see Dillm. in loc.], LXX καθαρίσαι αὐτὸν τῆς πληγῆς, Vulg. 'conterere eum in infirmitate,' Orelli 'to crush him by heavy sickness'). (4) חֳלִי ḥŏlî, Is $53^{3.4}$ (RVm 'sickness'); Jer 6^{7} (RV 'sickness'; the parallel is מַכָּה 'wound'), 10^{19} (RVm 'sickness'). (5) ὀδύνη, Sus ^{10} 'And albeit they were both wounded with her love, yet durst not one show another his grief.' This meaning of 'grief' is clearly seen in Shaks. I Henry IV. v. i. 134—'Can honour set to a leg? No. Or an arm? No. Or take away the grief of a wound? No. Honour hath no skill in surgery then?'; or in Parkinson, Theatre of Plants (1640), p. 1489—'The oyle which is made of the berries [of the bay] is very comfortable in all cold griefes of the joynts.'

2. Mental affliction. (1) יָגָה yâgâh, in Hiph. to cause sorrow, La 3^{32}, and the subst. יָגוֹן yâgôn, sorrow, Ps 31^{10}, Jer 45^{3} (RV 'sorrow' in both places). (2) כָּעַס ka'as, vexation, 1 S 1^{16}, Ps 6^{7} 31^{9}, Pr 17^{25}, Ec 1^{18} 2^{23}; and its dialectic variety כָּעַשׂ ka'as, Job 6^{2}. (3) λυπέω, to cause grief, 2 Co 2^{5} 'If any have caused grief, he hath not grieved me' (RV 'have caused sorrow'); and the subst. λύπη, Wis 8^{9} 11^{12}, Sir 37^{2}, 1 Mac $6^{8.9.13}$. (4) ἀκηδία, Sir 29^{5} 'But when he should repay, he will prolong the time, and return words of grief' (λόγους ἀκηδίας, RV 'words of heaviness,' so the word is tr^{d} by EV in its two remaining occurrences in LXX, Ps 119^{28}, Is 61^{3}). (5) Once the vb. στενάζω, to groan, He 13^{17} 'they watch for your souls, as they that must give account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief' (καὶ μὴ στενάζοντες, RVm 'and not with groaning,' Vaughan 'with lamentations over lost souls'). Shaks. uses the word in both the foregoing senses in one line, II Henry IV. I. i. 144—

> 'Even so my limbs,
> Weakened with grief, being now enrag'd with grief,
> Are thrice themselves. Hence, therefore, thou nice crutch!'

3. In one of the passages referred to above, Pr 17^{25}, the word has evidently an active meaning, though the Hebrew is כָּעַס ka'as, which expresses usually the feeling of vexation: 'A foolish son is a grief to his father.' This meaning is seen also in Gn 26^{35} 'Which were a grief of mind unto Isaac and to Rebekah' (מֹרַת רוּחַ, RVm 'bitterness of spirit'); 1 S 25^{31} 'And it shall come to pass . . . that this shall be no grief unto thee, nor offence of heart unto my lord, . . . that thou hast shed blood causeless' (לְפוּקָה, RVm 'cause of staggering'; LXX βδελυγμός [possibly, says Driver, a corruption of the unusual λυγμός, the word in Aq. and Symm.] καὶ σκάνδαλον; Vulg. 'in singultum et scrupulum cordis'; Dou. 'an occasion of sobbing to thee, and a scruple of heart to my lord'); Jon 4^{6} 'And the Lord God prepared a gourd, and made it to come up over Jonah, that it might be a shadow over his head, to deliver him from his grief' (מֵרָעָתוֹ, RV 'from his evil case'); Sir 26^{6} 'But a grief of heart and sorrow is a woman that is jealous over another woman' (ἄλγος); 1 P 2^{19} 'For this is thankworthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully' (λύπας, RV 'griefs'; Vulg. 'tristitias,' hence Wyc. 'sorews or hevynesses,' and Rhem. 'sorowes.' But the meaning is clearly 'things that cause sorrow,' 'grievances,' and no doubt this was Tindale's meaning in introducing 'grief,' followed by all the rest of the versions). For 'grief' was frequently used in the sense of 'grievance,' as Shaks. Pericles, I. ii. 66—

> 'Bear with patience
> Such griefs as you yourself do lay upon yourself.'

Grievance occurs but once, Hab 1^{3} 'Why dost thou show me iniquity, and cause me to behold grievance?' (עָמָל, RV 'perverseness' as the word is tr^{d} by AV in Nu 23^{21}). The Heb. is a common word for 'toil,' but also has the double sense of misery and mischief—see Davidson, in loc. Wyclif's word is 'traveile' after Vulg. 'laborem,' Dou. 'labour'; other VSS 'sorrow.' 'Grievance' seems to be original to AV, and it is used in the sense of affliction, grief, as Shaks. Two Gent. of Verona, IV. iii. 37— 'Madam, I pity much your grievances.'

Grieve. The verb to grieve, now almost entirely intrans., is so in AV only once, Jer 5^{3} 'thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved' (וְלֹא־חָלוּ, either from חוּל to writhe in pain, or [with most edd.] from חָלָה to be sick [wrongly accented]; RV 'they were not grieved'). The trans. vb. occurs often, and with the following meanings:—

1. To make sorry, Dt 15^{10} 'Thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him;' (יֵרַע, lit. 'be evil,' that is 'sad,' the opposite of the 'good' [טוּב] or 'cheerful heart' of Jg $19^{6.9}$ etc. So 1 S 1^{8}, Neh 2^{10} 13^{8}); 1 S 2^{33} 'and to grieve thine heart' (וְלַאֲדִיב, prob. a corrupt reading for וִיכַלֵּיוֹת, from דוּב to pine away—Driver); 15^{11} 'And it grieved Samuel' (וַיִּחַר לִשְׁמוּאֵל, which must mean 'was wroth,' as RV. But LXX [ἠθύμησε, 'was despondent'] must have read וַיִּכְאַב. Weir suggests וַיִּצַּר, which is accepted by Driver. Vulg. gives 'conturbatus est,' Wyc. 'was sory,' Dou. 'was strooken sadde,' Gen. 'was moved'; but Cov. 'Therefore was Samuel angrye,' which Rog. changed to 'was evell apayd' [=was ill content], and he was followed by the Bishops); Job 30^{25} 'was not my soul grieved for the poor?' (עָגַם); Ps 73^{21} 'Thus my heart was grieved, and I was pricked in my reins' (יִתְחַמֵּץ; RVm 'was in a ferment,' a change for which, says Cheyne [Expos. 3rd ser. vi. 44], we may be thankful, adding, 'Fancy a sufferer, of the school of the author of Job, saying that "his heart was grieved"'; he also refers to Segond's bold and happy rendering, 'Lorsque mon cœur s'aigrissait, et que je me sentais percé dans les entrailles.' Oxf. Heb. Lex. tr. 'my heart was soured or embittered'); Is 54^{6} 'as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit' (עְזוּבָה וַעֲצוּבַת רוּחַ; Cheyne, 'as an outcast and downcast woman'; La 3^{33} 'For he doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men' (וַיְגֶה); Dn 7^{15} 'I Daniel was grieved in my spirit in the midst of my body' (אִתְכְּרִיַת רוּחִי); 2 Es 10^{8} 'seeing we all mourn and are sad . . . art thou grieved for one son?' ('tu autem contristaris in uno filio'); Mk 3^{5} 'being grieved for the hardness of their hearts' (συνλυπούμενος, the prep., says Gould, probably denoting the sympathetic character of the grief; He was grieved because they hurt themselves).

2. To be heavy on, weary, harass: Gn 49^{23} 'The archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him' (וַיְכָרְרֻהוּ); Dillm. 'became bitter against him' [lit. 'treated him bitterly']; Spurrell, 'harassed him'; Job 4^{2} 'If we assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved?' (תִּלָּאֶה, lit. 'wilt thou be wearied?') So Pr 26^{15} 'The slothful man hideth his hand in his bosom; it grieveth him to bring it again to his mouth' (AVm 'he is weary'); Ps 78^{40} 'How oft did they . . . grieve him in the desert' (יַעֲצִיבוּהוּ); 112^{10}

'The wicked shall see it and be grieved' (וְכָעַס, Oxf. Lex. 'be vexed or indignant,' as in Neh 3^{33}, Ec 5^{16}); Ac 4^{2} 16^{18} (both διαπονέω). For this meaning of 'grieve' cf. 2 S 3^{34} Wyc. 'Thin hondis ben not boundun, and thi feet ben not greved with fettris'; Is 7^{13} Cov. 'Is it not ynough for you, that ye be grevous unto men, but ye must greve my God also?'; and Child, Ballads, iv. 150—

'Yet in suche fere yf that ye were,
Amonge enemys day and nyght;
I wolde withstonde, with bowe in hande,
To greeve them as I myght.'

3. To cause loathing, to disgust: Ex 1^{12} 'They were grieved because of the children of Israel' (יָקֻצוּ, RVm 'abhorred'); Ps 95^{10} 'Forty years long was I grieved with this generation' (אָקוּט; LXX προσώχθισα; Vulg. 'offensus fui,' Wyc. 'offended I was'; Del. 'had I a loathing at'; Kay 'loathed' or 'rejected with abhorrence'). The same vb. (in Hithp.) is tr^{d} 'grieve' in Ps 119^{158} 139^{21}, where RVm gives 'loathe'; He $3^{10.17}$ (quot^{n} of Ps 95^{10}, and the only occurrences in NT of προσοχθίζω, which is the tr^{n} in LXX of גָּעַל to loathe, קוּא to spue out, קוּץ to be disgusted with, etc.: see Thayer, s.v.). Cf. Ex 17^{18} Tind. 'And the fishe that is in the river shall dye, and the river shall stinke; so that it shall greve the Egyptians to drinke of the water of the ryver.'

4. To give pain, to hurt: Est 4^{4} 'Then was the queen exceedingly grieved' (וַתִּתְחַלְחַל, Oxf. Heb. Lex. 'and she writhed [in anxiety]'); Is 57^{10}, Am 6^{6} (both חָלָה to be sick, one in Piel 'to become sick,' other in Niph. 'to be made sick'); Ro 14^{15} 'If thy brother be grieved with thy meat' (λυπεῖται). This meaning, being always fig. in AV, is scarcely distinguishable from (2) above, but it was once quite distinct, and is used literally by Spenser, FQ I. viii. 17—

'Thereat he rored for exceeding paine,
That to have heard great horror would have bred;
And scourging th' emptie ayre with his long trayne,
Through great impatience of his grieved head.'

Grievous follows grieve pretty closely in meaning. 1. Burdensome, as Gn 12^{10} 'the famine was grievous in the land'; 1 K 12^{4} 'Thy father made our yoke grievous'; Is 15^{4} 'His life shall be grievous unto him'; Ph 3^{1} 'To write the same things unto you, to me, indeed, is not grievous'; 1 Jn 5^{3} 'His commandments are not grievous.' Cf. Ex 18^{18} Tind. 'The thinge is too grevous for the, and thou art not able to do it thi selfe alone.' 2. Distressing, irritating, Ex 8^{24} 'a grievous swarm of flies'; Ps 10^{5} 'His ways are always grievous'; Pr 15^{1} 'grievous words stir up anger'; 15^{10} 'Correction is grievous unto him that forsaketh the way'; Ac 20^{29} 'after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you.' So Is 19^{4} Cov. 'I wil delyver Egipte also in to the hondes of grievous rulers, and a cruel king shal have the rule of them.' 3. Threatening, alarming: Ps 31^{18} 'Let the lying lips be put to silence which speak grievous things.' Cf. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 150, 'At these wordes all they that were present began to murmure, and to cast a disdaynous and grevous loke upon Gysippus'; and Bunyan, PP (Clar. Press ed. p. 105), 'So when he arose, he getteth him a grievous Crab-tree Cudgel, and goes down into the Dungeon to them.' 4. Heinous, severe: Gn 18^{20} 'their sin is very grievous'; Jer 16^{4} 'They shall die of grievous deaths.' So Shaks. Jul. Cæs. III. ii. 84—

'If it were so, it was a grievous fault,
And grievously hath Cæsar answered it.'

5. Sorrowful: Gn 50^{11} 'This is a grievous mourning to the Egyptians.' Cf. Hakluyt, Voyages, i. 159, 'The grievous complaynts of our liege subjects concerning traffique.'

Grievously is either severely, Is 9^{1}, Jer 23^{19}, Wis 19^{16}, 2 Mac 9^{23}, Mt 8^{6} 15^{22}; heinously, La $1^{8.20}$, Ezk 14^{3}; or painfully, 2 Mac 7^{39} 14^{28}. Cf. Taverner's Bible, 3 Mac 4 Heading 'The people had pyty to se them so grevouslye handled'; Udal, Erasmus' Paraphrase on Mk 5 'The common sort are wont to take the deathe of yong folkes much grievouslyer then of old.'

Grievousness occurs but twice, Is 10^{1} 'Woe unto them that decree unrighteous decrees, and that write grievousness which they have prescribed' (עָמָל, i.e. burdensomeness, oppression; RV 'perverseness' as the same word is tr^{d} by EV in Nu 23^{21}. In Hab 1^{3} it is 'grievance' in AV [as above]); Is 21^{15} 'They fled . . . from the grievousness of war' (מִפְּנֵי כֹּבֶד מִלְחָמָה, lit. 'from the face of the weight of war,' Vulg. 'a facie gravis prœlii,' Wyc. 'fro the face of the grevous batail'). Udal uses the word in the sense of heinousness (Erasmus' Paraphrase on Mk 5), 'Consider not the multitude and grievousnes of thyne offences; onelye regarde that Jesus is he that came to save all men, and is able to doe all thinges with a beck.'

J. HASTINGS.

GRINDER.—The 'grinders' of Ec 12^{3} are the grinding women at the mill (see MILL). But in the margin of Job 29^{17} the 'grinders' are the molar teeth. Cf. Holland, Pliny, xi. 37, 'The great grinders which stand beyond the eye-teeth, in no creature whatsoever do fall out of themselves,' and Fuller, Worthies (Ches-shire), 'How necessary these are for man's sustenance, is proved by the painfull experience of such aged persons, who wanting their molare teeth, must make use of their gums for grinders.'

GRISLED (modern 'grizzled') is the tr^{n} of [בָּרֹד] bârôd, 'spotted' (perhaps as with בָּרָד 'hail') in Gn $31^{10.12}$ of rams, and in Zec $6^{3.6}$ of horses. Shaks. uses both spellings, Pericles, iii., Gower—

'The grisled north
Disgorges such a tempest forth.'

Hamlet, I. ii. 240—

'Ham. His beard was grizzled? No?
Hor. It was, as I have seen it in his life,
A sable silvered.'

The word means 'grey,' and in middle Eng. a 'grisel' was a grey-haired man, as Gower, Conf. Amantis, iii. 356, 'That olde grisel is no fole.' It has no connexion with grisly = hideous. See COLOURS.

GROSS is used in AV of darkness (Is 60^{2}, Jer 13^{16}), and of man's heart (Mt 13^{15}, Ac 28^{27}). In the first case 'gross darkness' is tr^{n} of עֲרָפֶל, which is tr^{d} simply 'darkness' everywhere except in those two places and in Job 22^{13} (AV 'dark cloud,' RV 'thick darkness'), Dt 5^{22} (EV 'thick darkness'), Ezk 34^{12} (יוֹם ע״ EV 'dark day,' RVm 'day of thick darkness'). The meaning of 'gross' is thus simply 'thick,' 'impenetrable.' In the second case 'make gross' is tr^{n} of παχύνω, which means lit. 'make thick or fat,' and fig. 'make stupid,' and occurs in NT only in those two places, where it is an exact quotation from LXX of Is 6^{10} (EV 'Make the heart of this people fat'). Gross has thus the metaphorical sense of dull, stupid, crass.

Gross means properly 'large,' 'bulky,' as Shaks. Lear, IV. vi. 14—

'The crows and choughs that wing the midway air
Show scarce so gross as beetles.'

Then it expresses that which is big and plain, as Tindale, Works, i. 97, 'Scripture speaketh after the most gross manner'; and Udal, Erasmus' Paraphrase on 1 Jn 1 (fol. 271), 'In dede the unbelief of mans heart required, that the trueth should be credited by grosse outward experimentes.' And, yet more figuratively, it was used to express density of mind, as Knox, Hist. 424, 'The Earle of Athole, who was thought to be a man of grosse judgement.' In NT it expresses more than mental dulness, which involves moral culpability only as it is the result of wilful rejection of light.

GROUND (אֲדָמָה, אֶרֶץ, γῆ) is used in AV indifferently with 'earth' as the tr. of the Heb. and Gr. words enumerated under EARTH. In RV, on the contrary, there appears to be an attempt (although it has not been carried out with uniformity) to retain 'ground' as the tr. of אֲדָמָה, and 'earth' as that of אֶרֶץ. The following examples of the word deserve notice—

1. In older English 'ground' was used where we should now prefer either 'earth' or 'land,' as Jer 27[5] 'I have made the earth, the man and the beast that are upon the ground' (עַל־פְּנֵי הָאָרֶץ, RV 'upon the face of the earth'); Ezk 19[13] 'in a dry and thirsty ground' (אֶרֶץ, RV 'land'). Cf. Is 53[8] Cov. 'Whose generacion yet no man maye nombre, when he shalbe cut of from the grounde of the lyvinge.' 2. In Sir 18[6] 'ground' is used figuratively for the bottom of a thing, 'As for the wondrous works of the Lord, there may nothing be taken from them, neither may anything be put to them, neither can the ground of them be found out.' This is Coverdale's tr[n], and it has been adopted by all the VSS after him, except the Douay, though the Gr. is merely οὐκ ἔστιν ἐξιχνιάσαι. The Vulg. has simply 'nec est invenire,' whence Wyc. 'nethir it is to fynde,' and Dou. 'neither is it possible to finde.' RV gives 'Neither is it possible to track them out.' Ground is used in the Preface to AV 1611, with the same meaning, 'Therefore let no mans eye be evill, because his Maiesties is good . . . but let us rather blesse God from the ground of our heart, for working this religious care in him, to have the translations of the Bible maturely considered of and examined.' 3. In 1 Ti 3[15] 'ground' means basis or 'foundation,' 'the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth'; Gr. ἑδραίωμα, AVm and RVm 'stay.' This is the only occurrence of the word in classical or biblical Greek. The Vulg. renders by 'firmamentum,' whence Wyc. 'sadnesse' [=strength], all other VSS having 'ground.' So in Preface to AV, 1611, 'The Edition of the Seventy . . . was used by the Greek Fathers for the ground and Foundation of their Commentaries.' Cf. T. Fuller, Holy Warre, iii. 2, p. 112, 'But well did one in the Council of Trent give these titular Bishops the title of figmenta humana, mans devices; because they have as little ground in Gods word and the ancient Canons for their making, as ground in Palestine for their maintenance.' The same meaning is expressed by the verb 'to ground,' which is found in AV as a ptcp. only, Is 30[32] 'And in every place where the grounded staff shall pass, which the LORD shall lay upon him, it shall be with tabrets and harps' (וְהָיָה כָּל מַעֲבַר מַטֵּה מוּסָדָה, AVm 'every passing of the rod founded'; RV 'every stroke of the appointed staff,' RVm 'every passing of the staff of doom'*); Eph 3[17] 'being rooted and grounded in love'; Col 1[23] 'If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled' (both τεθεμελιωμένοι). Cf. Mt 7[25] ‖ Lk 6[48], Tind. 'the wyndes blewe and bet upon that same housse, and it fell not, because it was grounded on the rocke.' In Ex 9[18] Tind. uses the word in the slightly different sense of established, 'Tomorow this tyme I will send doune a mightie great hayle; even soch one as was not in Egipte sence it was grounded.' J. HASTINGS.

* The passage is difficult. Most of the Eng. VSS, like the LXX, paraphrase rather than translate. The rendering of AV, which is nearly that of Vulg. ('Et erit transitus virgæ fundatus') is barely intelligible, even after it is improved by Kay, 'And every passing of the staff of sure foundation.' An easy emendation of the Heb. is שֵׁבֶט מוּסָר 'rod of correction,' of Pr 22[15], but Skinner thinks it too easy to be worth much, besides that it only replaces one singular expression by another. Modern edd. as a rule prefer something like RVm. Thus Del. 'every stroke of the rod of destiny'; Plumptre, 'wherever shall pass the destined rod'; Cheyne, 'whenever the destined staff passeth over,' referring to Hab 1[12] 'O Jehovah, thou hast appointed them [same verb] for judgment.'

GROVE.—1. אֲשֵׁרָה 'ăshērâh, ἄλσος, lucus. Wherever the word grove occurs as the tr[n] of 'ăshērâh it should be transliterated as in RV. See ASHERAH.

2. אֶשֶׁל 'ēshel, ἄρουρα. Abraham is said to have planted a 'grove' (AV Gn 21[33] marg. 'tree'). Saul abode 'under a tree' (AV 1 S 22[6] marg. 'grove in a high place'). The bodies of Saul and his sons were buried 'under a tree' (1 S 31[13] AV). In all these passages RV correctly renders 'ēshel, which is the same as the Arab. 'athl, by 'tamarisk tree.' See TAMARISK. G. E. POST.

GRUDGE.—Skeat (Etymol. Dict.[2] s.v.) derives 'grudge' originally from the imitative sound kru or gru, seen in Gr. γρῦ, the grunt of a pig; 'grunt' and 'growl' coming from the same root. Hence its primary meaning is to express audible discontcnt, murmur, as Paston Letters, 138, 'I here a gruggyng.' In this sense 'grudge' is of frequent occurrence in the earlier versions. Thus Lk 15[2] Wyc. (1380), 'And Farisees and Scribis grucchiden, seyinge, For this man receyveth synful men, and etith with hem' (Tind. and all others 'murmured'); 19[7] Wyc. (1380), 'And whanne alle men sayen, thei grucchiden, seyinge, For he hadde turned to a synful man' (Tind. 'And when they sawe that, they all groudged'; Rhem. 'they murmured,' and so AV); Ac 6[1] Wyc. (1388), 'the Grekis grutchiden [1380, 'grucchinge'] agens the Ebrews' (Tind. 'ther arose a grudge amonge the Grekes agaynste the Ebrues,' Rhem. and AV 'a murmuring'); 1 Co 10[10] Wyc. (1380), 'Neither grucche [1388, 'grutche'] ye, as summe of hem grucchiden [1388, 'grutchiden'], and thei perisheden of a wastour, or destrier' (Tind. 'Nether murmur ye as some of them murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer'); Mk 14[5] Tind. 'And they grudged agaynste hir' (Wyc. [both VSS] 'thei groyneded in to hir'; Rhem. and AV 'they murmured against her'); Ps 2[1] Pr. Bk. 'Why do the heathen grudge together?' (changed in 1662 into 'so furiously rage together'). About 1611, says Trench (On AV of NT, p. 48), 'to grudge' was ceasing to have the sense of 'murmur openly,' and was already signifying 'to repine inwardly'; and a 'grudge' was no longer an open utterance of discontent and displeasure at the dealings of another, but a secret resentment thereupon entertained. Accordingly 'grudge' of the earlier VSS was sometimes displaced in AV by 'murmur' (a change, however, which had in every such case except Nu 17[5] been made already by Dou.-Rhem.); but it was retained in a few places, —'by an oversight,' says Trench. These places are: Ps 59[15] 'Let them ['the pack of hounds with which Saul is hunting David'—Del.] wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied' (וְיָלִינוּ; AVm 'If they be not satisfied then will they stay all night,' so RV 'and tarry all night if they be not satisfied');* Wis 12[27] 'For look for what things they grudged, when they were punished' (ἠγανάκτουν, Vulg. 'indignabantur,' RV 'whereat they were indignant'); Sir 10[25] 'And he that hath knowledge will not grudge when he is reformed' (οὐ γογγύσει; Vulg. 'non murmurabit,' RV 'will not murmur thereat'); Ja 5[9] 'Grudge not one against another, brethren, lest ye be condemned' (μὴ στενάζετε, Vulg. 'Nolite ingemiscere,' RV 'murmur not').

* AVm and RV give the only possible tr[n] of the Mass. text, and they are in agreement with most mod. edd. (Del., Per., de Witt, Kirkp. etc.), as well as with the Gen. version 'and surely they shal not be satisfied, thogh thei tarie all night.' The AV is the rendering of וְיָלִינוּ or וְיָלִנּוּ, and is after LXX (γογγύσουσιν), Aq., Vulg. ('murmurabunt'), Jer., Wyc. 'thei shal grucche' (1388, 'grutche'), Luth., Cov. ('grudge,' so Rog., Cran., Bish.), Dou. ('murmur'); and it is preferred by Burgess and Cheyne. Wellh. (PB) gives 'They shall be sated, forsooth, and be quieted.'

This meaning of the word may be illustrated by Elyot, The Governour, ii. 183, 'Semblably there be some that by dissimulation can ostent or shewe a highe gravitie, mixte with a sturdy entretaynement and facion, exilinge them selves from all pleasure and recreation, frowninge and grutchinge at every thinge wherein is any myrthe or solace, all though it be honeste'; so Sir John Maundevile, Voiage, p. 69 (ed. 1727), 'Thanne passe men be the welle that Moyses made with his honde in the Desertes, whan the people grucched, for thei found no thinge to drynke.'

In the same sense the subst. 'grudging' has been retained in AV in 1 P 4[9] 'Use hospitality one to another without grudging' (TR ἄνευ γογγυσμῶν, edd. γογγυσμοῦ, RV 'without murmuring'). Cf. Ex 16[7] Wyc. 'I have herd forsothe youre grucchynge agens the Lord; what forsoth ben we, that ye grucchen agens us?' (Tind. 'because he hath herde youre grudgynges agaynst the Lorde: for what are we that ye should murmure against us?'); Nu 17[5] Tind. 'So I wyll make cease from me the grudgynges of the children of Israel which they grudge agenst you.' So Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 150, 'Leave youre grudgynges and menasinge countenaunce towarde Gysippus'; and Chaucer, Persones Tale, 499, 'After bakbyting cometh grucching or murmuracion; and somtyme it springeth of impacience agayns God, and somtyme agayns man.'

The modern meaning of the word is found twice in AV, in the phrase 'bear a grudge against,' and in the adv. 'grudgingly': Lv 19[18] 'Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people'; 2 Co 9[7] 'Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerful giver' (ἐκ λύπης, lit. 'out of sorrow,' as RVm).

GUARD.—1. The guards of a foreign ruler (king of Egypt, Gn 37[36] al.; king of Babylon, 2 K 25[8] al., Jer 39[10] al., Dn 2[14]) are called הַטַּבָּחִים haṭṭabbâḥîm (Aram. טַבָּחַיָּא ṭabbâḥayyâ), 'the slayers.' The singular טַבָּח ṭabbâḥ (1 S 9[23, 24]) is translated 'cook,' but the literal meaning is 'slayer [of animals],' for in the East the cook has a double duty ('slay and make ready,' Gn 43[16]). In RVm (Gn 37[36] al.) ṭabbâḥîm is translated 'executioners'; but though the guards carried out executions, it may be doubted if this work gave them their name. In the Apocrypha the guards of a Persian king (1 Es 3[4]) and of Holofernes (Jth 12[7]) are called οἱ σωματοφύλακες.

2. An Israelite king had רָצִים râẓîm, lit. 'runners' (1 S 22[17] RV [also in 21[7], if we adopt, with Driver, Grätz's doubtful conjecture רָצִים 'runners,' instead of MT רֹעִים 'herdsmen'], 2 K 11[6]) who ran before his chariot (1 K 1[5]), and kept watch at his door (1 K 14[27, 28] = 2 Ch 12[10, 11]). In 1 S 31[6] they are called his 'men' (his 'house,' 1Ch 10[6]). David had also foreign guards, CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES (which see). At a later time the Carites, הַכָּרִי hakkârî (2 K 11[4] RV), were probably foreign guards. On the other hand, מִשְׁמַעַת mishma'ath, 'guard' (2 S 23[23] = 1 Ch 11[25]) probably means 'council' (as 1 S 22[14] RV), the body which heard (fr. שָׁמַע shâma', 'to hear') the king's affairs (but see Driver, ad loc.). The guard had an armoury or guardroom, בֵּית הָרָצִים bêṯ hârâẓîm (1 K 14[28]), perhaps in the house of the forest of Lebanon (1 K 10[17]). In the fallen state of Judah after the Return, Nehemiah's guards (if regular guards they were) are called (not râẓîm, 'runners,' for the word suggests 'pomp,' but) אַנְשֵׁי הַמִּשְׁמָר 'anshê hammishmâr, 'men of the watch' (Neh 4[23]).

3. The well-known Prætorian Guard is mentioned in two places of the NT, in Ac 28[16] (a passage absent from WH and from RV text) τῷ στρατοπεδάρχῃ (-χῳ), 'the captain of the guard' ('of the prætorian guard,' RVm), and in Ph 1[13] ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ, 'throughout the whole prætorian guard,' RV.

4. There is mention in Mt 27[65, 66] (ἔχετε κουστωδίαν, 'ye have a guard,' RV) of the Temple Guard, which, under a Roman officer, was stationed in the Tower of Antonia, and had charge of the high-priestly vestments (Jos. Ant. XV. xi. 4).

5. In Mk 6[27] σπεκουλάτωρ (Lat. speculator, 'a soldier of his guard,' RV) properly means 'a look-out officer.' Ten such officers were attached to each legion. They were used for bearing despatches (Suet. Calig. 44), and for executions (Senec. De Ira, i. 16). See Wordsworth on Mk 6[27], and Benson, Cyprian, p. 505 note.

W. E. BARNES.

GUDGODAH (חַגְדְּגָדָה).—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites, mentioned only Dt 10[7], whence they proceeded to Jotbathah. There can be little doubt that Hor-haggidgad in the itinerary of Nu 33[33] indicates the same place. The general considerations which suggest a site for it in or near the Arabah are given in § iv. of the art. EXODUS, and the position of Wady Ghudaghid (which runs into the Wady Jerafeh, see maps of Robinson and Palmer) is suitable, but the identity of name is exceedingly doubtful (see Driver on Dt 10[7]). It should be noted that Gudgodah has the def. art. in Heb., and that the LXX translates Γαδγάδ, as it does in the case of Horhaggidgad (wh. see).

A. T. CHAPMAN.

GUESS is used intrans. (followed by 'at') in the sense of 'divine,' 'find out,' Wis 9[16] 'Hardly do we guess aright at things that are upon earth' (μόλις εἰκάζομεν, Vulg. 'difficile æstimamus,' RV 'divine,' RVm 'conjecture'); Sir 9[14] 'As near as thou canst, guess at thy neighbour, and consult with the wise' (στόχασαι τοὺς πλησίον; Vulg. 'cave te a proximo tuo'; RV 'guess at thy neighbours'; Edersheim, 'seek to make out,' or 'search out'). Shaks., who uses the word chiefly transitively, has it in this sense also, as Ant. and Cleop. III. iii. 20—

> 'Guess at her years, I pr'ythee';

and Lucrece, 1238—

> 'Their gentle sex to weep are often willing;
> Grieving themselves to guess at others' smarts.'

GUEST occurs three times in EV of OT, and in every instance it is the tr[n] of a Heb. term (קְרֻאִים) which means simply 'called.' A similar term is used in Arabic. Thus we have the 'guests' at Adonijah's feast, 1 K 1[41, 49]; the 'guests' of the 'foolish woman,' Pr 9[18]; the 'guests' whom J" consecrates to partake of the sacrifice consisting of Israel, Zeph 1[7] (see Davidson and Nowack, ad loc.). In NT we read of the 'guests' (ἀνακείμενοι, lit. 'those reclining') at the wedding feast. In Lk 19[7] RV more exactly substitutes 'gone in to lodge' for AV 'gone to be guest.' The Gr. is καταλῦσαι, which occurs in the same sense in Gn 19[2] 24[23, 25] (both לין), Sir 14[25, 27] 36[31] [Eng.[26]].

Guest-chamber (κατάλυμα) occurs in Mk 14[14], Lk 22[11], and in RV is substituted for 'parlour' of AV in 1 S 9[22]. The Heb. is לִשְׁכָּה, which here means 'sacrificial dining-room.' See INN.

The Heb. term (קרוא) may suggest a wayfarer who is hailed and urged to come in, and is suggestive at once of the infrequency of travel and the simplicity of the ancient life. It is still the universal custom for those who are sitting at meat in the open air to invite any passers-by to join them. Masons sitting at their mid-day meal by the roadside invite any passer-by who happens to look at them. In the house, the master or mistress passing through the kitchen where the servants are taking food, will be courteously invited to partake. Usually such invitations are a mere expression of courtesy, and it is not expected that they will be acted upon; but the custom, now largely artificial, explains what the reality must have been.

Job mentions, as an item in his self-defence, that he did not eat his morsel alone (Job 31^{17}).

In the East, no figure is more invested with chivalry than the guest. In his own right he cannot cross the threshold, but, when once he is invited within, all do him honour and unite in rendering service (Gn 18. 19, Jg 19; cf. Trumbull, Oriental Social Life, 73 ff.). For this relationship of host and guest, see further under HOSPITALITY.

G. M. MACKIE.

GUILT.—See SIN. GUILT-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE.

GUILTY.—The adj. ἔνοχος (= ἐνεχόμενος, 'held in,' 'in the grip of') is tr^{d} 'in danger of' in Mt $5^{21.\ 22\ ter}$, Mk 3^{29} (RV 'guilty of'); and in He 2^{15} 'subject to'; but in its remaining occurrences it is rendered in AV 'guilty of,' Mt 26^{66} 'He is guilty of death,' RV 'worthy of,' RVm 'liable to'; Mk 14^{64}; 1 Co 11^{27} 'guilty of the body and blood of the Lord,' so RV; Ja 2^{10} 'For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all,' RV 'is become guilty of all.' The phrase is quite un-English, and, although it is found elsewhere, as in the translation of the First Article of the Judgement of the Synode of Dort (1619), 'Forasmuchas all men have sinned in Adam, and are become guiltie of the curse, and eternall death,' it is used, no doubt, in imitation of the Eng. versions.* The expression is introduced by Wyclif after the Vulg. 'reus est mortis'; Tind. in Mt 26^{66}, Mk 14^{64} used 'worthy of,' and was followed by all the versions, except the Rhem., which again tr^{n} the Vulg. 'guilty of,' and the Rhem. tr^{n} was accepted by AV; in 1 Co 11^{27}, Ja 2^{10} all the VSS have 'guilty of.' J. HASTINGS.

GULF.—Aldis Wright (in Shaks. Macbeth, on IV. i. 23), following Wedgwood, says that 'gulf' in the sense of arm of the sea is derived from Fr. golfe, It. golfo, and connected with Gr. κόλπος; but in the sense of whirlpool or swallowing eddy it is connected with Dutch gulpen, our 'gulp,' to swallow, and with the old Dutch golpe, a whirlpool. There are certainly the two distinct meanings, at any rate. Thus Hakluyt, Voyages, iii. 206, 'among which high and low lands there is a gulfe or breach in some places about 55 fadome deepe, and 15 leagues in bredth'; and Shaks. Henry V. II. iv. 10—

> 'England his approaches makes as fierce
> As waters to the sucking of a gulf.'

In the latter sense the word is used figuratively, as T. Fuller, Holy and Profane State, ii. 16—'Nor do I honour the memory of Mulcaster for anything so much, as for his Scholar, that gulf of learning, Bishop Andrews.' But it is in the former sense that the word is used in AV. It is found only in Lk 16^{26} 'Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed.' The Gr. is χάσμα, which occurs only here in NT, and in LXX only 2 S 18^{17} where it translates פַּחַת the great 'pit' (EV) in the forest into which they cast the body of Absalom. The Gr. χάσμα gives our word 'chasm,' but that word was scarcely in use* before 1611, and is not found in any of the versions. Wyc. (after Vulg. 'chaos† magnum') has 'a greet derke place,' and Rhem. more literally 'a great chaos'; Tind. chose 'a great space,' and was followed by Cov., Rog., Cran.; the Gen. introduced 'a great gulfe' (with 'swallowing pit' in the margin), and the Bishops, AV, RV have accepted that rendering.

The Rabbinical conception of the separation between the two parts of Hades was a thin wall, a mere hand- or finger-breadth (Weber, Lehre des Talmud, 326 f.). J. HASTINGS.

GUNI (גּוּנִי).—1. The eponym of a Naphtalite family, Gn 46^{24}=1 Ch 7^{13} (cf. Nu 26^{48} where the gentilic Gunites occurs). 2. A Gadite chief, 1 Ch 5^{15}. See GENEALOGY. According to Klostermann, Driver, and Budde, we should also read 'the Gunite' (הַגּוּנִי) for 'Jonathan' in 2 S 23^{32}; and for 'the Gizonite' in 1 Ch 11^{34}. Luc. has in the first passage ὁ Γουνύ and in the second ὁ Γουνί.

GUR (גּוּר 'dwelling,' 'sojourning').—An 'ascent' by Ibleam and Beth-haggan, 2 K 9^{27}. Possibly, these two are the modern Yebla and Beit Jenn. But see IBLEAM.

GUR-BAAL (גּוּר־בַּעַל, 'dwelling of Baal').—An unknown locality named in 2 Ch 26^{7}. The LXX has οἱ κατοικοῦντες ἐπὶ τῆς Πέτρας, as though Petra were intended, which is possible, as the inhabitants were Arabs.

GUTTER (צִנּוֹר; RV 'watercourse').—The meaning of this word, and indeed of the whole passage (2 S 5^{8}), is very uncertain (cf. Driver, in loc.), but the rendering of the RV is supported by its use in later Hebrew. The same word occurs in the plural at Ps 42^{7}, where it is usually rendered 'cataracts.'

J. F. STENNING.

* Is this T. Fuller's meaning in Profane State, v. 5—'Putting her [Joan of Arc] to death would render all English men guilty which should hereafter be taken prisoners by the French'?

* The Oxf. Eng. Dict. has found only two occurrences before 1611, Fitz-geffray, Sir F. Drake (1596), 31, 'Earth-gaping Chasma's, that mishap aboades'; and Holland, Pliny, i. 17, 'The firmament also is seene to chinke and open, and this they name Chasma.'

† For the various readings of the Vulg. see Plummer, in loc.

H

HA.—The Heb. interjection הֵאָח he'âḥ is once tr^{d} 'ha, ha,' Job 39^{25} 'He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha,' of the neighing of the war-horse. The Revisers have changed this into 'Aha!' and have been taken to task for giving the horse a human cry. The older versions were still more 'human,' as Wyc. (1382) 'Fy!' or (1388) 'Joie!' Cov. 'tush,' Dou. 'Vah.' 'Ha, ha' comes from the Gen. Bible. See AH, AHA.

HAAHASHTARI (הָאַחַשְׁתָּרִי, perhaps 'royal,' from Pers. khshâtra, 'lordship' or 'realm'; cf. the similar adjective in Est 8$^{10.\ 14}$).—A descendant of Judah, 1 Ch. 4^{6}. See GENEALOGY.

HABAIAH (חֲבָיָה 'J" hath hidden').—The head of a priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel. On account of their being unable to trace their genealogy they were not allowed to serve (Ezr 2^{61}). In the parallel passage Neh 7^{63} the name is written Hobaiah (חֲבַיָּה, cf. Baer on Ezr 2^{61}). In 1 Es 5^{38} he is called Obdia. See GENEALOGY.

*HABAKKUK (חֲבַקּוּק, Ἀμβακούμ, Habacuc).*—The eighth of the minor prophets. Of Habakkuk's personal life nothing is known with certainty, though it has been inferred, from the fact that he is termed specifically (1^{1} 3^{1}) 'the prophet,' that he held a recognized position as prophet, and, from the expression 'on my stringed instruments' in 3^{19}, that he was a member of the temple choir, and belonged, consequently, to the tribe of Levi. The first of these inferences is a possible one,† though it does not add much to our knowledge of Habakkuk. The second is doubtful, both on account of the uncertainty attaching to the pron. my, which is against the analogy of other similar notices (Ps 4, etc.), and also on account of the doubt (supposing the pron. to be correct) whether at this time the 'singers' were necessarily Levites.

CONTENTS OF H.'S BOOK.—The book opens with a dialogue between the prophet and his God. He contemplates with dismay the reign of lawlessness and violence in Judah,—'The wicked doth compass about the righteous; therefore judgment goeth forth perverted,'—and expostulates with God for permitting it to continue unchecked (1$^{2-4}$). 1$^{5-11}$ J" answers that the instrument of punishment is near at hand—the Chaldæans, that bitter and hasty nation, which march through the breadth of the earth to possess dwelling-places that are not theirs, whose advance is swift and terrible, whose sole law is their own imperious will (v.^{7b}), who mock at the strongest barriers set to oppose their march, and who, as their victorious arms subjugate one country after another, impiously deify their own might—'this his power becometh his god.' But the answer raises only a fresh difficulty in the prophet's mind; as he contemplates the Chaldæans, and thinks of their rapacity, their inhumanity, their savage and contemptuous treatment of the nations falling into their hands, the thought forces itself upon him, Can this be God's method of rectifying injustice? if He has 'ordained' the power of the Chaldæans 'for judgment,' can it be part of His pure and holy purpose that they should to such a degree exceed the terms of their commission, and trample recklessly and indiscriminately upon all the nations of the known world? Is not this the prevalence of wrong upon a larger scale? In 2$^{1-4}$ Habakkuk places himself in imagination upon his prophetic watch-tower (cf. Is 21^{6}), and 'looks out' to see what answer the Almighty will vouchsafe to his 'complaint,' or impeachment of the justice of God's government of the world. J"'s answer, the significance of which is betokened by the terms in which it is introduced—it is to be written, namely, on tablets, that all may read it easily—is this: *The soul of the Chaldæan is elated with pride: but the righteous shall live by his faithfulness. The answer expresses a moral distinction; and the distinction carries with it the different destinies of the Chaldæan and of the righteous,—destruction (it is implied), sooner or later, for the one, and life for the other. After dwelling for a moment more particularly—in a verse (v.^{5}), of which the first words are desperately corrupt—upon the ambitious aims of the Chaldæans, the prophet develops at length the ruin destined in the end to overtake him, in the form of a taunting poem (מָשָׁל), which he imagines, with dramatic vividness and propriety, to be pronounced against him by the nations whom he has outraged. The מָשָׁל consists of five 'woes' (cf. Is 5$^{8ff.}$), denouncing in succession the insatiable lust of conquest displayed by the Chaldæans, the suicidal policy pursued by them in establishing their dominion, the dishonesty and cruelty by which the magnificence of their cities was maintained, their wild and barbarous triumph over the nations which fell under their sway, their irrational idolatry (vv.$^{6-19}$). At the close of the last 'woe,' the prophet passes by contrast from the contemplation of the dumb and helpless idol to the thought of the living God, enthroned in His heavenly palace, before whom the earth must hold reverential silence (v.^{20}).

Ch. 3 is very different in character from chs. 1. 2. Though called in the title a 'prayer,' the prayer, strictly so called, is limited to v.^{2}, the main part of the chapter consisting of a lyric ode, of remarkable sublimity and poetic force, in which the prophet develops the thought of J" coming to judgment, and executing vengeance on His people's foes. The prayer is that J would 'revive' His 'work in the midst of years,' i.e. renew or repeat, in the midst of the centuries that have passed since the exodus, the great 'work' (Ps 44^{1}) of deliverance wrought by Him of old. The ode which follows is the amplification of the thought thus expressed. The prophet pictures a theophany (vv.$^{3-15}$) in which J" appears for the deliverance of His people and the discomfiture of His foes. The theophany is manifestly delineated in colours suggested by the thought of the exodus, and in part (as v.^{3}) even borrowed from old poetic descriptions of it. The tenses (as sometimes is the case in

* The form of the name is peculiar. It is, in appearance, an irregular reduplicated form for what would more normally be חֲבַקְקוּק, חַבְקֻקוּל, אַסְפְּסָח, אַרְמְדֹם, חַרְבְּרוּת), from חָבַק to embrace (Gn 29^{13} etc.; of a child, 2 K 4^{16}), whence Jerome, in the Pref. to his Commentary on the prophet, explains it as περίληψις, or amplexatio. Frd. Delitzsch (Proleg. 84; Assyr. Handwörterb. 281) derives it from the Assyr. ḫambaḳûḳu, the name of some garden plant. The LXX form Ἀμβακούμ presupposes the pronunciation חֲבַקּוּק, or חֲבַקּוּק, with the double b resolved into mb (cf. König, Lehrgeb. ii. 473), and the final ḳ of the last syllable assimilated to the final m of the first syllable (cf Βεελζεβουλ).

† The title, 'the prophet,' is applied in the superscriptions of their books to none of the other canonical prophets except Haggai and Zechariah. It is, however, very common in the historical books when a prophet is mentioned (as 2 K 14^{25} 19^{2}); and it is also appended very often to Jeremiah's name in certain sections of his book (20^{2} 28$^{5.\ 15}$ etc.).

* Not faith: but moral steadfastness and integrity; see the use of אֱמוּנָה in 2 K 12$^{16(15)}$ 22^{7}, Jer 5^{1} 9$^{3(2)}$, Pr 12^{22} 28^{20}.

Hebrew poetry) are ambiguous; and it may be doubtful whether in vv.[3-15] the poet is describing, in ideal colours, the past which he desires to see renewed, or the renewed work itself, which his imagination pictures as resembling the past. In either case, he describes (vv.[5-7]) J''' as approaching from His ancient seat in Edom (Paran, cf. Dt 33[2]; Teman [in N.W. Edom], cf. Seir and Edom, Jg 5[4]); the light of His appearing illumines the heavens; the earth quakes, and nations flee in consternation. In vv.[8-11] the poet asks, What is the purpose of J'''s manifestation? Is He wroth with seas or rivers that He thus comes forth, causing the mountains to tremble, the sea to toss and roar, the sun and moon to hide themselves in terror? No; He comes forth for the salvation of His people, to annihilate those who sought to scatter it, and who delighted in the prospect of being able to ruin the people of God (vv.[12-15]). The description of the theophany ended, the poet, speaking in the people's name, reverts to the thought of v.[2a]. The prospect of J'''s manifestation cannot be contemplated without alarm, even by Israel; the poet's heart palpitates with fear (v.[16d. e] is very obscure, and in parts evidently corrupt); on the other hand, even when scarcity and barrenness prevail in the land, he still cherishes a calm and joyous confidence in his God, who, he is persuaded, will yet ensure His people's salvation, and equip them (v.[19]) with fresh life and strength.

DATE OF THE BOOK.—It is clear from internal evidence that H. prophesied towards the beginning of the Chaldæan supremacy; but the precise date of his prophecy is difficult to fix. It depends in fact, at least in part, upon the answer given to a difficult question connected with ch. 1, which must therefore be considered first. The explanation of this chapter adopted above is the usual one; but it must be admitted that there are difficulties connected with it, and that it has failed to satisfy many recent scholars. In the first place, whereas the establishment of the power of the Chaldæans appears, in 1[5] (where it is represented as incredible to those who hear of it) and in 1[6] (where the phrase used is 'Behold, I am raising up'), to lie in the future; elsewhere, and especially in 1[13-16] 2[8a. 10. 17], the prophet describes their treatment of conquered nations, and reflects upon the moral problems to which this gave rise, in a manner which seems to imply that he and his countrymen were perfectly familiar with it. Secondly, if 1[2-4] be the prophet's complaint respecting the injustice prevalent in Israel itself, which (1[5-11]) is to be avenged by the Chaldæans, how can he consistently complain of the Chaldæans' treatment of his people, and pronounce judgment upon them on account of it? Thirdly, the subject of the complaint in 2[1] is naturally, it is urged, the same as that of 1[2-4]; whereas, in the explanation adopted above, it is different. Fourthly, the 'wicked' and the 'righteous' in 1[13] are naturally the same, respectively, as the 'wicked' and the 'righteous' in 1[4]; whereas, upon the same explanation, they are different (the wicked and the righteous in Israel itself in 1[4], the Chaldæans and Israel in 1[13]). Upon these grounds it was argued by Giesebrecht (Beiträge zur Jesaiakritik, 1890, p. 197 f.) that the true sequel to 1[4] was 1[12]; that 1[5-11] (announcing the advent of the Chaldæans) was a complete, independent prophecy, written before the rest of chs. 1–2, and not now in its original place, and that 1[2-4] describes the tyranny of the Chaldæans (v.[3b]), and its consequences as shown in the relaxation of law and religion (vv.[3c. 4a]) in Judah. Wellhausen and Nowack (in their Commentaries) agree. It is true, 1[5-11] does seem to presuppose a different historical situation from 1[12-17], and, with 1[2-4] (as ordinarily understood), may well have been written down by H. at an earlier date: the book as a whole, as Kirkpatrick observes (Doctrine of the Prophets[1], 268), 'is the fruit of religious reflection; it exhibits the communing and questioning of the prophet's soul with God,' which doubtless was 'spread over some considerable time,' and presents conclusions which were no doubt reached only after 'a prolonged mental struggle.' Hence there is nothing unreasonable in the supposition that 1[2-11] reflects the impression left upon the prophet's mind when he first thought of the Chaldæans as the instrument appointed for the punishment of Judah's sin, and that 1[12ff.] expresses the perplexity which he became conscious of afterwards, when the character of the Chaldæans had become more fully known to him. For the other inferences mentioned above there does not seem to be a sufficient foundation. The explanation which refers 1[2-4] to the tyranny of the Chaldæans, and its effects in Judah, is unnatural and forced. Nor is there any intrinsic reason why 'righteous' and 'wicked' should refer to the same persons, respectively, in 1[4] and 1[13]; that would be necessary only if it were the case that the prophet had the same individuals in view in the two passages—which is just what here has to be shown, even if the terms of 1[2-4] are not opposed to it.

A very original view of chs. 1–2 has been propounded by Budde (Stud. u. Krit. 1893, p. 383 ff.; Expositor, May 1895, p. 372 ff.). According to this scholar 1[2-4. 12-17] refers not to the Chaldæans but to the Assyrians; 1[6-11] stood originally after 2[4] as a description of the power (the Chaldæans) which would shortly bring the rule of the Assyrians to an end, and 2[6-20] gives expression to the joy with which the nations would greet their fall. In the original prophecy the Chaldæans thus appeared as the liberators of Israel from the yoke of Assyria; but events so cruelly belied the rôle thus given to them, that it was believed incredible that a prophet could ever have ascribed it to them; accordingly a later editor transferred 1[6-11] to its present place, adding 1[5] as an introductory verse, and by the transposition so altering the original sense of the prophecy that 1[12-17] 2[4ff.] could now be read only as referring to the Chaldæans, who thus, from being the power destroying the Assyrians, became the power to be destroyed. The explanation is ingenious, but of a kind that could be deemed probable only if it rested upon exceptionally strong grounds, which, however, in the present instance, cannot be said to be the case; cf. more fully Davidson, pp. 50–55.

The most probable date for the prophecy of H. is shortly before B.C. 600—1[2-11], if the view adopted above be correct, being written somewhat earlier than the rest of the prophecy. Nabopolassar had made Babylon the seat of an independent monarchy in 625; in 607, with the help (as recently discovered inscriptions inform us*) of the Ummanmanda, Nineveh had been destroyed; in 604, Nabopolassar's son, Nebuchadrezzar, had inflicted a defeat upon Pharaoh-necho at Carchemish (Jer 46[2]), the natural result of which, as Jeremiah at once saw (ch. 25, etc.), could only be that the whole of Western Asia would fall into the hands of the Chaldæans. The Chaldæans invaded Judah for the first time in 601 or 600 (2 K 24[1]). Our knowledge of the progress of the Chaldæan arms, and of the effects which the news of it produced in Judah, is not minute enough to enable us to fix dates with precision; but while 1[2-11] may belong to the earlier or middle part of the period which has been here referred to, when (v.[5]) the power of the Chaldæans was being consolidated, but (v.[5]) the formidable character which it would ere long ('in your days') attain was still not realized in Judah, the familiarity shown in such passages as 1[14-17] 2[5b. 8. 17] etc. with their treatment of subject nations, and the reflections which their threatened interference in Judah arouses in the prophet's mind, point to the close of the same period as that to which the main part of the prophecy belongs.

CRITICAL QUESTIONS CONNECTED WITH THE BOOK.—Those connected with ch. 1 have been sufficiently discussed above; it remains to consider those arising in connexion with ch. 2 and ch. 3. As regards ch. 2, Stade (ZATW, 1884, p. 154 ff.) and Kuenen (Einl. § 76. 4–7 ; 77. 9) argue that the 'Woes' in vv.[9–20] are partly unsuitable if supposed to be addressed to the Chaldæan king, and partly, especially in vv.[12–14], that they consist largely of citations and reminiscences of other passages, including some late ones (e.g. v.[12] from Mic 3^{10} ; v.[13] from Jer 51^{58} ; v.[14] from Is 11^{9} ; cf. also v.[16b] with Jer $25^{15f.}$, and vv.[18–20] with Is $44^{9ff.}$ $46^{6f.}$, Jer 10^{1-16}), and hence they infer that the original close of H.'s prophecy, 2^{6b-8}, was expanded in the post-exilic age by the addition of a series of Woes, directed against 'some heathen or heathenly-disposed enemy of the congregation,' or (vv.[13f. 18–20] Kuenen) the heathen generally. It is difficult to think that the grounds for this conclusion are sufficient. Though some of the passages referred to may not suit the Chaldæan king, there is no adequate reason for holding them inapplicable to the personified Chaldæan nation ; while as regards vv.[12–14], H. may naturally himself have quoted Isaiah and Micah : v.[13] may well be the original of Jer 51^{58} (especially when the very dependent character of the prophecy in Jer 50^{2}–51^{58} is borne in mind), and there is nothing to prevent 2^{18-20} being a satire on the vanities of idolatry, quite independent of II Is or Jer 10. Budde (l.c. p. 391 f.) sees no ground for questioning vv.[12]. 9-11. 15-17 ; Wellhausen (p. 164) considers it indubitable that the whole of vv.[9–20] is directed against the Chaldæan (though he thinks that vv.[8b. 17b], where they stand, are unsuitable, and that vv.[12-14. 15-17] contain indications of belonging to a later age than that of H.) ; Nowack questions only vv.[8b. 12-14. 17b-20]. See, further, Davidson, pp. 56–58.

* See Davidson, p. 137 f., with the references.

Whether the ode in ch. 3 is really the work of H. may be more doubtful. The title and the musical notes (vv.[3. 9. 13. 19]), both resembling closely those in the Psalter, suggest the inference that it was excerpted from a liturgical collection, and placed here by a compiler (Kuenen, § 76. 8 ; Cheyne, Origin of the Psalter, p. 157 ; Wellh. ; Nowack ; and others). The same scholars (following Stade, l.c. p. 157 f.) argue further that the ode was originally an independent poem, unconnected with the prophecy of H. : to the circumstances of H.'s age, so clearly reflected in chs. 1–2, there are here no allusions ; the community is the speaker (vv.[14. 18. 19], and no doubt also in vv.[2. 16]) ; it trusts that J'' will interfere in its behalf ; but the description of the foe (vv.[13. 14]) is quite general, there are no features pointing specifically to the Chaldæans ; and the comparison to a murderer delighting 'to devour the afflicted in a secret place' (cf. Ps $10^{8. 9}$) suggests attacks made insidiously against the theocracy, rather than the open warfare of the Chaldæans ; while, at least in v.[17], the calamities referred to (failure of crops and flocks) are altogether different from those which were the burden of Hab 1–2. Conversely, the promise in 2^{4}, which is the prophet's consolation, does not at all suggest a theophany as its complement ; and whereas in $2^{7ff.}$ the Chaldæans are overthrown by the natural retribution which overtakes a despot, when his power has become effete, the foe, in ch. 3, is overthrown by the direct interposition of J''. It is true the calamities mentioned in 3^{17} might, in the abstract, be regarded as results of the Chaldæan invasion of Judah ; but, as Davidson remarks, 'the verse does not suggest a condition of scarcity and barrenness arising from' such a cause, 'but rather one due to the incidence of severe natural calamities' ; and had the poet been writing under the pressure of a hostile invasion, the invasion itself would naturally have been expected to form the prominent feature in this picture, rather than the misfortunes following in its train. So, again, it is no doubt true that the downfall of the Chaldæan, though brought about (ch. 2) by natural causes, might in ch. 3 be represented as the result of J'''s interposition (cf. Is 13) ; but even after making every allowance for the fact that chs. 1–2 are only elevated prose, while ch. 3 is written in a lyric strain, it remains that the thoughts most characteristic of chs. 1–2 are not developed further in ch. 3, but replaced by different ones. Kirkpatrick (Smith's DB^{2} s.v., Doctrine of the Prophets, p. 276–283) seeks to show that the ode in ch. 3 forms an integral element in the prophet's book ; but his arguments show, not so much that it is natural or necessary, as that it is possible so to explain it ; the destined fall of the Chaldæan tyrant is sufficiently declared in 2^{5-20}, and ch. 3 is not needed to render the announcement more explicit. Nor again, though $2^{2)}$ would lead on naturally to the theophany in ch. 3, can it be said, in view of the contrast to vv.[18. 19] which the verse expresses to require it, or to be incomplete without it. Wellh. (p. 166) insists strongly that vv.[17–19] is not the original close of the poem, and that it cannot be used for determining the real aim of vv.[2–16]. If vv.[17–19] might be regarded as an appendix attached to vv.[2–16] by a later hand, one ground for doubting H.'s authorship of the latter would be certainly removed. There would remain the other differences between 3^{2-16} and chs. 1–2, alluded to above : it is also felt by many to be doubtful whether the nation—which seems to be what is intended by the term—would, in the age of H., be described as J''s 'anointed' (3^{13}), and whether this usage does not presuppose a period in which the attributes and position belonging originally to David and his descendants were transferred to the people (cf. Davidson's note). On the whole, while reluctant to conclude that the ode of ch. 3 is not the work of H., and while readily allowing that the reasons adduced do not demonstrate that it is not his, the present writer must own that it contains features which seem to him to make it difficult to affirm his authorship confidently.

TEACHING OF THE BOOK. — Theologically, the different point of view of H. as compared with Jeremiah is observable. Jeremiah is so deeply impressed by the spectacle of his people's sin, that he regards the Chaldæans almost exclusively as the instruments of judgment ; their destruction is seen by him only in the distant future, and is viewed rather as involved in God's purpose to restore His people, than as a retribution for their own tyranny and excesses. H., on the other hand, though not unmindful of Judah's faults (1^{2-4}), is engrossed chiefly by the thought of the cruelties and inhumanities of the oppressor ; it is these which, in his eyes, call for judgment, and the outraged nations of the earth execute it upon their tyrant. Further, H. is conscious of a problem, a moral difficulty, which is not the case with Jeremiah.* The wrong-doing of the Chaldæans is more unbearable than the evil it was meant to punish ; hence their continued successes seem to the prophet to be inconsistent with J'''s righteousness, and it is the existence of this inconsistency which forms the motive of this book. Thus while Jeremiah bewailed the sins and coming misfortunes of his people, for their own sake, H. brooded over the moral problems which the contemplation of them raised in his mind. The age, we may be sure, was to all the faithful servants of God one of trial and perplexity ; but, in virtue of their different temperaments and mental habits, the two contemporary prophets were impressed by different aspects of it.

The central and distinctive teaching of the book lies in the declaration of 2^4; and, as indicated above, the true sense of this is, that while the wild excesses of the tyrant carry in them the germ of certain ruin, the 'faithfulness' of the righteous (not his faith) will be to him a principle of life. It is evident that this declaration is no solution of the moral anomaly which the prophet discerns. The Chaldæan might indeed, in virtue of his very nature, be doomed ultimately to perish, but his empire survived for 70 years; and meanwhile H.'s compatriots, so far from abiding in peace and security, experienced the indescribable hardships of siege and exile. But 'live' is here used in the full and pregnant sense which it sometimes has in the OT (e.g. Ezk 18), of living in the light and consciousness of the divine favour; and what H. thus promises is not mere material prosperity, but the moral security—of course often not unaccompanied by material benefits—which righteousness brings with it even in the midst of external calamities (cf. Is 33^{14-16}), and the sense of divine approval which even then does not desert it. It is enough for the prophet if he can mitigate the difficulty which pressed upon him, as it pressed no doubt upon many of his contemporaries, by recalling to them these two truths of God's providence, the doom which, at least ultimately, overtakes the tyrant, and the moral security enjoyed by the righteous.

With regard to the use made of 2^4 in the NT, 'another man,' writes Wellhausen quaintly, 'has made the antithesis in this verse famous, by breathing into it another spirit.' Its second clause is quoted, namely, twice by St. Paul (Ro 1^{17}, Gal 3^{11}; cf. also He 10^{38}), in the sense, 'The just shall live by faith,' in support of his doctrine of justification by faith. This sense, whether it was intended or not by the LXX translators, whose version the apostle used, was at any rate one which the Greek word used by them permitted; and it was accordingly adopted by St. Paul in his argument. But it is not the sense belonging to the Heb. אֱמוּנָתוֹ.* The NT gives us here what is in reality a development of the prophet's thought. The apostle, familiar with the verse as it read in the LXX version, amplifies and spiritualizes the words of H., interpreting them in a sense which does not properly belong to them, but which, as it was suggested, or permitted, by the Greek, fitted them in that form for use in his argument.†

Literary and Textual Characteristics.—The literary power of H. is considerable. Though his book is a brief one, it is full of force; his descriptions are graphic and powerful; thought and expression are alike poetic; he is still a master of the old classical style, terse, parallelistic, and pregnant; there is no trace of the often prosaic diffuseness which manifests itself in the writings of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. And if ch. 3 be his, he is, moreover, a lyric poet of high order; the grand imagery and rhythmic flow of this ode will bear comparison with some of the finest productions of the Hebrew muse.

The text of H. is manifestly, in many places, more or less corrupt,—in some places, unfortunately, even beyond hope of restoration.

Legends relating to Habakkuk.—Although, as said above, the prophet's personal life is in the OT a blank, Jewish haggādāh found much to tell of him,—often, indeed, in defiance of chronology and historical probability. Thus, according to one legend,—based, no doubt, upon a connexion fancifully established between the command, 'Go, set a watchman,' in Is 21^6 and the words of Hab 2^1 'I will stand upon my watch,'—H. was supposed to have been the sentinel set by Isaiah to watch for the fall of Babylon! Some of the later Rabbis, connecting his name with the words in 2 K 4^{16} 'Thou shalt embrace a son,' imagined him even to be the son of the Shunammite woman, whom Elisha restored to life. In the LXX text of Bel and the Dragon, as given in the Cod. Chisianus (Swete, vol. iii. pp. xii, 586), this story is prefaced by the words ἐκ προφητείας Ἀμβακοὺμ υἱοῦ Ἰησοῦ, ἐκ τῆς φυλῆς Λευί, showing both that this story was taken from an apocryphal work attributed to Habakkuk, and also that the prophet was described in it as the son of Jesus (Joshua, or Jeshua), and of the tribe of Levi. What authority there may have been for the statement that his father was Ἰησοῦς, we do not know: the description of him as belonging to the tribe of Levi may be merely an inference from the expression in 3^{19}, quoted above.* According to the 'Lives' of the prophets, which, in two recensions, are attributed respectively to Dorotheus (in the Chron. Pasch., under Ol. 70, ed. Dind. 1832, i. 282) and Epiphanius (Opp. 1622 or 1682, ii. 247 f.), he was of the tribe of Simeon, ἐξ ἀγροῦ Βῆθι τοῦ Χάρ (Epiph. ἐξ ἀγροῦ Βηθζοχήρ), which Delitzsch thinks may be the Βαιθζαχαρία where Antiochus Eupator defeated Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac $6^{32.33}$),—though this was not in Simeon, but in Judah, 70 stadia from Bethzur (Jos. Ant. XII. ix. 4), and the modern Beit-Sakariyeh, about 10 miles S.W. of Jerusalem (Rob. BRP iii. 284). The same writers relate further, that when Nebuchadrezzar advanced against Jerusalem H. fled to Ostrakine (now Straki), a city on the Egyptian coast, 26 miles from the Rhinocorura, but that, after the Chaldæans had withdrawn, he returned to his own lands, where he died and was buried, two years before the return of the Jews from Babylon (B.C. 538). Eusebius states in one place (Onom. 246, 68) that his tomb was shown at Gabatha (Gibeah), elsewhere (256, 3; 270, 35), that it was shown at Echelah or Keeila (Keilah),—12 and 18 miles, respectively, S.W. of Jerusalem; and, according to Sozomen (HE vii. 29), the site of his grave, at or near Keilah, was revealed in a dream to Zebennus, bishop of Eleutheropolis. In the Middle Ages, however, it was said by Jewish writers that H. was buried at Hukkok (Jos 19^{34}), in the tribe of Naphtali, a little N.E. of Tabor. The most widely diffused tradition about H. is that found in Bel and the Dragon $^{33ff.}$, according to which H., while carrying pottage to his reapers, was suddenly directed by an angel to carry it to Daniel, who had been cast a second time, by Cyrus, into the lions' den in Babylon: upon protesting that he had never seen Babylon, and did not know where the den was, he was lifted up miraculously by a lock of his hair (cf. Ezk 8^3) and carried through the air to Babylon; having there provided Daniel with his repast, he was immediately taken back by the angel to his own place. Later Jewish writers, and many of the Fathers, allude to the same legend.†

* A word expressing the idea of steadfastness or faithfulness, might, no doubt, if limited to a relation towards a particular person, pass readily into that of fidelity, or loyalty, towards him; and this, again, might pass on into that of belief, or faith, in him; but there is no evidence that this Heb. word passed actually through these possible changes of meaning.

HABOR (חָבוֹר; A Ἀβώρ, B Ἀβώρ and Ἀβιώρ, Habor), still called Khabour. Strabo (xvii. § 27) and Procopius (Bell. Pers. ii. 5) call it Aborrhas (Ἀβόρρας), Isidore of Charax (p. 248) Aburas (Ἄβουρας), Zosimus (iii. 12) Aboras (Ἄβωρας), Pliny Chaboras, Ptolemy (v. 18) Chaboras (Χαβώρας). According to the Bible (2 K 17^{6} 18^{11}, 1 Ch 5^{26}), it flows through Gozan. The Habor is an important tributary of the Euphrates, rising in Mons Masius (now called Karej Dagh), to the N. of the celebrated city Râs el-'Ain (Resaina), and flowing S.S.W., through a circuitous channel with fertile banks, into the Euphrates at Karkeseea = Abou-psera (Layard), after a course, to a great extent navigable, of nearly 200 miles. Sir H. Layard, standing on the conical hill of Koukab (about lat. 36° 20′ long. 41°), saw the main stream running from the N.W. and receiving (on the N.) the waters of the Mygdonius (Jerujer), which entered it after passing Nisibis and other cities. Both banks are covered with mounds, doubtless remains of Assyrian cities. The name of the Habor is found in the Assyrian inscriptions.

Tiglath-pileser I. (about B.C. 1120) boasts of having killed ten mighty elephants in the land of Haran and 'on the banks of the Habor.' Assur-naẓir-apli (B.C. 885–860) crossed the Tigris, conquered the district of the Ḫarmiš (or Ḫar-rit or Ḫaršit), then marched to the Euphrates after subjugating the district around the mouth of the Habor (piâte ša nâr Ḫabur, 'the mouths of the river Habor,' from which it would seem that the river flowed into the Euphrates through several outlets). According to 2 K 17^{6} 18^{11} and 1 Ch 5^{26} it was to the banks of this river that Shalmaneser and Sargon transported the exiled Israelites. It is now well known that this river has nothing to do with the 'Chebar' of Ezekiel (1^{3} etc.). The name Habor is perhaps of non-Semitic origin, and may mean 'fish-river' (g'a 'fish' + bur 'river,' Frd. Delitzsch).

HACHILAH (חֲכִילָה 'dark'). — A hiding-place of David which was discovered to Saul by the Ziphites, 1 S 23^{19} 26^{1-3}. It was a hill (גִּבְעָה) in S. Judah, on the edge of the wilderness of Ziph; lying on the 'right' (i.e. to the south) of the desert (yĕshîmôn), according to the first of the above passages, or, according to the second, 'before' (עַל־פְּנֵי) the desert. It may be the hill Dahr el-kôlâ, N. of Wady el-W'ar (PEF Mem. ii. 313; Buhl, GAP 97). Glaser (Skizze, ii. 326) would read Hachilah also in 1 S 15^{7} instead of Havilah (חֲוִילָה).

C. R. CONDER.

HACHMONI, HACHMONITE. — Both represent one and the same Heb. word חַכְמֹנִי, but in 1 Ch 27^{32} the latter is translated as a pr. name, 'Jehiel the son of Hachmoni,' whereas in 1 Ch 11^{11} Jashobeam is called 'a Hachmonite.' We should probably render it in both cases as a gentilic name. In 2 S 23^{8}, which is parallel to 1 Ch 11^{11}, we have 'the Tahchemonite' הַתַּחְכְּמֹנִי, which is probably a textual error for הַתַּחְכְּמֹנִי. (Cf. Klosterm., Driver, Wellhausen, Budde, Kittel, ad ll. cit., and see ADINO, JASHOBEAM). J. A. SELBIE.

HADAD (הֲדַד, Ἀδάδ, Ἀδάρ).—1. Hadad was the supreme Baal or god of Syria (Macrob. Saturn. i. 23. 18). The Assyr. inscriptions, however, identify him with the air-god Ramman or Rimmon, and accordingly in Zec 12^{11} we find Hadad-Rimmon, 'Hadad is Rimmon.' But it is probable that Rimmon in certain parts of Syria represented the sun-god, and not, as in Assyria, the god of the atmosphere. Besides Adad or Hadad, the cuneiform texts give the abbreviated Dadu and Dadda as in use among the Syrians, and from certain Bab. contract-tablets it would appear that Ben-Hadad, 'the son of Hadad,' was another Syrian deity, who, with his father Hadad and mother Atargatis (Athtar-'Athi), made up the usual Semitic trinity. In the religions of Asia Minor the place of Ben-Hadad is taken by Attys, a name which may perhaps be the same as Hadad.

2. (הֲדָד) A son of Ishmael (Gn 25^{15} = 1 Ch 1^{30}, AV Hadar). The MT is supported by the LXX (Χοδδάν, Χαλδά, Χοδδάδ, Χονδάν). The Samar. Pent. has הדר, some MSS and the Pesh. have חור, Targ. Onk. has הדר.

3. A king of Edom, son of Bedad (perhaps for Ben-Dadi; Bu-Dadi is the name of the Can. governor of Yurza [now Yerzeh], S.W. of Taanach in the Tel el-Amarna tablets). He came from the city of Avith, and 'smote Midian in the field of Moab' (Gn 36^{35} = 1 Ch 1^{46}). See further, Hommel, AHT, 221 f.

4. Another king of Edom (1 Ch 1^{50}), whose name is miswritten Hadar in Gn 36^{39}. His capital city was Pau. See AHT 264.

5. A member of the royal house of Edom (1 K $11^{14ff.}$) who escaped while 'yet a little child' from the massacre of his family by Joab after David's conquest of Edom. He was carried first to Paran and then to Egypt, where the Pharaoh received him hospitably, and assigned him lands and food. He married the Pharaoh's sister-in-law, and his son Genubath was brought up as an Egyptian prince. After the death of David and Joab, Hadad returned to Edom, and there worked 'mischief' to Solomon. Edom, however, continued to be dependent on Judah, as we learn from 1 K 9^{26}, 2 K 3^{9} 8^{20}. A. H. SAYCE.

HADADEZER (הֲדַדְעֶזֶר), 'Hadad is a help' (2 S $8^{3.\ 12}$, 1 K 11^{23}), wrongly written Hadarezer in 2 S $10^{16.\ 19}$, 1 Ch $18^{3.\ 5.\ 7.\ 8}$ $19^{16.\ 19}$. The name is the Heb. equivalent of the Aram. Hadadidri, which is given in the Assyr. inscriptions as the name of the king of Damascus, who is called Ben-Hadad II. in the OT. Bricks have been found in Babylonia stamped with the name of Hadad-nadinakh[ês] (Hadad-nadin-akhi) in Gr. and Aram. letters, which makes the reading of the divine name quite certain.

Hadadezer was son of Rehob and king of Zobah (Assyr. Zubitê), on the eastern frontier of Hamath. His dominions included Damascus in the south, and extended to the Euphrates in the north. He was defeated by David 'as he went to recover his border (or rather the pillar which marked the limits of conquest) at the river Euphrates.' The Syrians of Damascus who thereupon came to his assistance were also defeated, and Damascus itself was occupied by the Israelites. The gilded shields of H. were sent to Jerusalem, and large quantities of bronze were obtained by David in the cities of Berothai and Tibhath (the Tubikhi of the Tel el-Amarna tablets and the Egyp. geographical lists). Toi king of Hamath, who had been at war with H., now sent an embassy to congratulate the Isr. monarch on his victories. At a later date, when war had broken out between David and the Ammonites, H. despatched 20,000 footmen from Zobah and Beth-rehob to the help of the Ammonites, other troops being also furnished by the Syrian princes of Maacah and Tob. The combined host, however, was annihilated by Joab, who proceeded to overrun Ammon. H. now obtained the help of the Aramæans on the eastern side of the Euphrates; but the Syrian army, under the command of Shobach (called Shophach 1 Ch 19[16]), was utterly defeated by David at Helam, which is probably the Khalman of the Assyr. inscriptions, usually identified with Aleppo. Josephus (Ant. VII. vi. 3) transforms Helam into a Syrian general, Khalaman, and tells us that Hadadezer, under the name of Hadad, was mentioned by Nicolaus Damascenus in his history of Damascus. The battle of Helam completely broke the power of Zobah.

HADADRIMMON (הֲדַדְרִמּוֹן), mentioned in Zec 12[11] along with the valley of Megiddon. It is commonly supposed to have been the place of national lamentation over the slaughter, by Necoh of Egypt (2 K 23[29], 2 Ch 35[22-24]), of Josiah, the last promising king of Judah. Hitzig suggested (Commentar über den Jesaja, 1833, on 17[8]) that the mourning was for Adonis, as in Phœnicia; and he was followed by Movers, Kneucker, Leyrer, W. R. Smith, and Merx. Baudissin (in Studien zur Sem. Relig.-geschichte), however, concludes to stand by the former position. LXX reads κοπετὸς ῥοῶνος, and the Vulg. Adadremmon. The usual identification is with Rummaneh, a small village S. of Megiddo, and N.W. of Jenîn (cf. G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. 389, n. 2).

HADES (Ἅιδης, ᾅδης).—The term used in the LXX and NT for the abode of the departed, the unseen world into which men pass at death. It is a word of very frequent occurrence in the OT, of very rare occurrence in the NT. In the AV of the OT it is unhappily rendered by 'hell' (Dt 32[22], 2 S 22[6], Ps 16[10] 18[5] 116[3] 139[8], and often), 'the pit' (Nu 16[30, 33]), and 'the grave' (Gn 37[35], 1 S 2[6], Job 7[9] 14[13], Ps 30[3] 49[14, 15] etc.). The original sense of the English word 'hell' appears to have been simply that of the hidden, unseen place, and in the general sense of the 'realm of the dead' it occurs in the statements of the Creeds on the article of Christ's Descent to Hell, as well as in old English ('The Harrowing of Hell' in the Exeter Book; Chaucer, The Milleres Tale, v. 3572; Spenser, Son. 68). Its use in the AV, therefore, has been defended, e.g. by Bp. Horsley, on the ground that 'in its primary and natural sense it signifies nothing more than the unseen and covered place' (Sermons, ii. 20). But the English Revisers, recognizing the difficulty of disconnecting the word from its usual associations, have displaced 'hell' by 'Hades' in the NT. In the OT they have adopted a less uniform practice. In the historical books they have left the rendering 'the grave' or 'the pit' in the text, and have placed on the margin the note 'Heb. Sheol,' to 'indicate that it does not signify the place of burial,' as they explain in their Preface. In the poetical books they usually give Sheol in the text, and put 'the grave' in the margin. In Is 14 they retain 'hell' in the text and give 'Sheol' in the margin, on the ground that in that paragraph the word 'hell' has 'more of its usual sense, and is less liable to be misunderstood,' while 'any change in so familiar a passage which was not distinctly an improvement would be a decided loss.' The American Revisers, however, have followed the more consistent course of giving 'Sheol' in the text of the OT, and dispensing with the variant renderings 'the grave,' 'the pit,' 'hell'; as 'Hades' is given by both English and American Revisers in the text of the NT. (See also the article on HELL.)

The word Hades is a familiar term in classical Greek. It is usually supposed to be derived from a privative and ἰδεῖν, videre, 'see,' and hence it is rendered Nelucus by Hermann. This etymology is thought to be rendered extremely doubtful by the presence of the aspiration, and so Voss (Hymn Dem. 348) would derive the word from ἅδω, χάδω, in the sense of πολυδέκτης, der Umfasser, the 'all-receiving,' 'all-devouring.' Though the Attic form, however, was Ἀιδης, ᾅδης, the more ancient form, as generally in Homer, was Ἀΐδης, -ao and -εω, which form, except in the Epic genitive Ἀΐδεω, occurs also in the Tragic poets. So in Milton (PL ii. 963, 964)—

'and by them stood
Orcus and Ades, and the dreaded name
Of Demogorgon.'

In Homer, the word (also in the form Ἀϊδωνεύς there, in Hesiod, and, though rarely, in the Tragedians) occurs only as a proper name, the name of the god of the nether world, Pluto; in Hesiod (Th. 455), the son of Kronos and Rheia, and older brother of Zeus. Hence, in Homer, the forms εἰς Ἀΐδαο, εἰν Ἀΐδαο with or without δόμους, δόμοις, in the sense of 'into' or 'in the lower world'; in Attic the forms ἐν and εἰς Ἅιδου; and in the NT the ἐν ᾅδου of the TR, and the later MSS in Ac 2[27, 31] displaced by the εἰς ᾅδην of the RV and the older MSS. Later the word became an appellative, denoting the underworld itself, the habitation of the dead, corresponding to the Latin Orcus, Inferi, Infernum, Inferna.

In the LXX and the OT Apocr. the word represents the Heb. שְׁאוֹל, and sometimes other Heb. terms, as בּוֹר (Is 14[19] 38[18]), דוּמָה (Ps 93 [94][17] 113[15] [115[17]]), מָוֶת (Pr 14[12] 16[25], Is 28[15]), מוּת (Job 33[22]), צַלְמָוֶת (Job 38[17]). These latter, however, are only occasional occurrences. In the vast majority of cases (some 59 in the canonical books alone, and often in the Apocr.) 'Hades' is the equivalent of שְׁאוֹל, and it carries with it the sense which that term has as a designation of the world beyond the grave.

The conceptions formed of that world by different peoples have been very various. They have been largely affected by racial, geographical, and climatic circumstances, and have not been altogether constant in the history of the beliefs of the progressive peoples. By far the more prevalent, however, has been the idea that would most naturally occur to men as they looked down into the grave which hid their departed kinsfolk from their gaze—that of an underworld, the opposite in all respects of the open, visible, sunlit world of activity. In various forms this general conception has held the mind of races as different as the lusty Teutonic tribes, the Zulus of Africa, the savages of North and South America, the Samoan islanders, the Asiatic Karens, the Italmen of Kamschatka, the Egyptians, the Babylonians and Assyrians, the Greeks and Romans. It was also the popular conception of the ancient Hebrews, and the Hebrew form of the idea had special affinity with that of the Babylonians and Greeks. In the OT, therefore, Hades expresses the general view of the world of the departed as a dark, deep underworld, in which the deceased continue to exist, but in a state of being devoid of the joy, the activity, the fulness, and the substantiality of real life. For the most part, too, in the OT it is an abode from which there is no return, and in which there are no moral distinctions; a condition involving separation at once from living men and from the living God; one in which rich and poor, king and slave, good and evil, subsist together in the same inane, shadowy, cheerless condition, without positive reward for the righteous or penalty for the wicked. Though not without occasional hints and suggestions of better things, the OT, reflecting the popular Hebrew modes of thought on the subject, presents Hades neither as a distinct stadium between death and a larger future, nor as a scene of moral issues, but as the common gathering-place for the departed, into which all alike go down, beyond which there is nothing to be clearly seen or certainly looked for, and from which there is no open way of restoration to the old strength of life, far less any elevation to a new and higher life, near or afar.

The idea of Hades and the existence after death, however, did not continue to stand at this level. In course of time, by the experience of faith, the teaching of the prophets, and the operation of other influences which we less clearly understand, it changed in more than one direction. The process is seen in the OT itself, especially in the poetical books and in the writings of the prophets, yet in different ways. In the former, faith is seen overleaping the dark domain of Hades, negativing the thought of a perpetual existence in its dreary and futile depths, having visions and forecasts of a more satisfying future (e.g. Ps 16. 17. 49. 73, Job $14^{13\text{-}17}$ 16^{18}–17^{9} $19^{23\text{-}27}$ etc.). In the latter we find not merely surmises and anticipations, but definite teaching, which grows from less to more till it declares the hope of a resurrection of Israel's dead, and an awakening from the sleep of death to everlasting life or to everlasting contempt (Is 26^{19}, Dn $12^{2.\ 3}$). But that is the most that the OT books give.

The process of change, however, went farther. It is reflected in the apocryphal, the rabbinical, and especially the apocalyptic literature. New ideas became connected with Hades and the future, yet without settling into a uniform faith or obtaining general acceptance in any one mode. In some of the books the old conception of Hades is continued with little or no change (Sir $17^{27.\ 28}$ 41^{4}, Bar 2^{17}, To $3^{6.\ 10}$ 13^{2}, 1 Mac 2^{69} 14^{30}). In these there is little or nothing beyond a simple acquiescence in the fact of man's mortality (Sir $41^{1\text{-}4}$). In others there is the hope of an immortality for the soul, but no certain hope of a resurrection of the body (Wis 2^{23} $3^{1\text{-}4}$ $4^{13.\ 14}$ 15^{3}). In others there is the definite statement of the completer belief in a future life with moral issues, the doctrine of the bodily resurrection being in some cases less prominent and less distinct than that of a general continuance of life or return to life (Enoch $22^{12.\ 13}$ $51^{1\text{-}5}$ 61^{5} 91^{10} 92^{3}, Ps-Sol 3^{16} 13^{9} etc.), in others more so (2 Mac $7^{9.\ 14.\ 23}$ $12^{43.\ 44}$; cf. Sibyll. 1^{440} $2^{274.\ 275}$ $4^{228.\ 229}$, Apoc. Bar $30^{1\text{-}5}$ 50^{1} 51^{6}, 2 Es 7^{32}). In others the idea that Hades is a place of relative moral awards appears, though in no very definite or pronounced form (Wis $3^{1\text{-}10}$ $5^{1\text{-}14}$ $6^{18\text{-}20}$ $17^{14\ \text{etc.}}$ as compared with $3^{17.\ 18}$ etc., 2 Mac $7^{9.\ 11.\ 14.\ 29}$ $12^{43\text{-}45}$ 14^{46} etc.); while in the apocalyptic books the prevailing conception has come to be that of an intermediate state, with relative rewards for the good and penalties for the evil (Enoch 10^{12} 22. 100^{5} 103^{7} etc., Book of Jub. 5^{243} 7^{248} 22^{21} 24^{27} 36; cf. 2 Es $7^{31\text{-}35.\ 36*\text{-}38.}$ $61.$ $75*\text{-}101*$ etc. (James, T. and S. iii. 2); Apoc. Bar $52^{1\text{-}3}$ etc.). In the rabbinical literature further developments of opinion are seen, especially in the direction of regarding Hades as an intermediate state with purgatorial processes for those of Israel and (at a later stage) with two distinct compartments or divisions within it—one of preliminary blessedness, and another of preliminary woe. Our Lord and His apostles spoke to the ideas which the Jews of their time had on these subjects as on others. Regard must be had to this in interpreting the occurrences of the word Hades in NT. The question is, how far these modifications of the prevalent OT idea of Hades are reflected in the NT; what precise sense is to be attached to the term there; and to what extent it has a doctrinal significance or suggests doctrinal conclusions.

The small place which is given to the term itself, or to any equivalent for it, in the NT is the first thing that calls for attention. The word occurs only ten times in all, including parallels, according to the best text. It is found nowhere in John's Gospel, the Epistles of Paul, the Epistle to the Hebrews, or the Catholic Epistles. Three of its occurrences are on Christ's lips, viz. Mt 11^{23} (with its parallel Lk 10^{15}) 16^{18}, Lk 16^{23}. In two of these the word is obviously used in a figurative sense: in the one to express, in the case of Capernaum, an absolute overthrow, a humiliation as deep as the former loftiness and pride had been great; in the other, to express, in the case of the Church, a security which shall be proof against death and destruction. The third occurrence, in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, is of a different kind, and has even been taken to put our Lord's imprimatur on the Jewish idea of two compartments in Hades, distinct from, yet near, one another. The point of the parable, however, is the broad moral lesson of the penalty of a selfish life. Everything else is secondary and ancillary to this. That being so, the use of the word here is ethical rather than doctrinal. It does not take us beyond the broad fact that there is a state of being into which men pass at death, and that the divine righteousness follows them thither with moral decisions affecting their conditions there and reversing antecedent estimates and circumstances. In the second chapter of Acts the word occurs in a quotation from the 16th Psalm, and with an application of that utterance of OT faith to the case of Christ, His death and His resurrection; in which, therefore, it has again the broad sense of the world of the departed into which Christ passed like other men, though only to be raised from it. Neither do the passages in the Apocalypse of St. John carry us beyond this. In the first (1^{18}), where Christ claims to have 'the keys of death and Hades,' we have simply the declaration of His power over death and the habitation that receives the dead, His ability to deliver or bring up from these. In the second (6^{8}) we have a personification of Hades as a demon following Death, the rider on the pale horse, to devour those slain by him. In the third and fourth ($20^{13.\ 14}$) Death and Hades appear again as demon figures, striking down and swallowing men, but compelled at last to render up their victims, and doomed themselves to be destroyed by Christ. In the passage in 1 Co (15^{55}) the reading ᾅδη in the second clause must give place to θάνατε.

We gather, in the second place, that in all the NT passages (except Mt 11^{23}, Lk 10^{15}) Hades is associated with death; that it expresses the general conception of the invisible world or abode into which death ushers men; and that it presents this habitation of the future, not as a final state, but as an intermediate scene of existence with relative moral distinctions. It appears, further, that the prevalent ideas connected with it, in its association with death, are those of privation, detention, and righteous recompense, the thought of the relative reward of good being subordinate, if expressed at all, to that of the retribution of evil and to that of the penal character pertaining to Hades as the minister of death. Otherwise the NT Hades shows little or nothing of the change which had come upon the old conception of Sheol, or the world of the dead, in the course of the history of Jewish thought and belief. In none of the passages in which the word itself occurs have we any disclosures or even hints of purgatorial fires, purifying processes, or extended operations of grace. In none of them have we anything approaching the Virgilian picture of the underworld, with its schooling in punishment, its washing out or burning out of guilt, its boon of forgetfulness (Æn. vi. 723–731, Mackail's trans.; cf. Conington's Virgil, ii. 418, 419). They are silent as regards all such things as the Limbus Patrum, the Limbus Infantum, etc., of the Roman Catholic theology, the division of Hades into distinct sections for different classes of the dead, the topographical definitions of the underworld in which both poetry and theology have indulged. Nor is there anything in them like the precise and developed doctrine of later times on the condition of men in the space between death and resurrection, or like those theories of a sleep of the soul, a ministry of Christ in Hades, a continuance of disciplinary processes, an extension of converting and restoring agencies, and other similar ideas, which have been connected with the general idea of a Status Medius in the theologies of various Churches and in the systems of divines of different schools, Roman Catholic, Greek Catholic, and Protestant. In its ideas and in its definite teaching the NT turns for the most part on the present life, with its moral choices and spiritual responsibilities, and on the state of being that follows the judgment, with its final decisions. It makes little of the mysterious space that comes between the two.

It is the modern Haditheh in the low hills, about 3¼ miles N.E. of Lydda. See SWP vol. ii. sh. xiv.; Robinson, BRP iii. 143; Guérin, Judée, i. 320; Buhl, GAP 197.

HADLAI (חַדְלַי).—An Ephraimite, 2 Ch 28^{12}. See GENEALOGY.

HADORAM (הֲדוֹרָם).—1. The fifth son of Joktan (Gn 10^{27} B Ὀδορρά, 1 Ch 1^{21} A Κεδουράν), and so presumably the name of a Yemenite district or tribe not otherwise known. It has been conjectured that the Ἀδραμῖται (Ptol. vi. 7. 10) or the Atramitæ (Plin. vi. 32, xii. 30) are here referred to, but the latter are probably to be identified with the people of Hadramaut (see Dillm. ad loc., and art. HAZARMAVETH).

2. The son of Tou king of Hamath, who was sent by his father on an embassy to David after the latter's victory over Hadadezer king of Zobah (1 Ch 18^{10}). In the parallel passage 2 S $8^{9f.}$ Tou is less correctly given as Toi (תֹּעִי for תֹּעוּ), while Hadoram wrongly appears as Joram (יוֹרָם): the LXX, however, gives Ἰεδδουράν, and in 1 Ch 18^{10} Ἰδουραάμ.

3. In 2 Ch 10^{18} Hadoram (הֲדֹרָם) is given as the name of the superintendent of the levies in the reign of Rehoboam. The parallel passage 1 K 12^{18} has preserved the more correct form Adoram (אֲדֹרָם), while the LXX (to 1 Ch) has the fuller form Adoniram (Ἀδωνιράμ). See ADONIRAM, and cf. Driver, Text of Sam. 267. J. F. STENNING.

HADRACH (חַדְרָךְ, Assyr. Ḫatarikka). — The capital of a region in Syria, and a place of importance in the times of Uzziah and his successors. The name occurs but once in the Bible, namely, in Zec 9^{1}; but in that one place it is made emphatic. The 'land of Hadrach' is there mentioned as having the same interest with Damascus, and as in relations with 'all the tribes of Israel,' and with Hamath, Tyre, Zidon, the several Philistine peoples, the sons of Javan, Egypt, and especially Assyria.

The Assyr. records for a certain period prominently mention Hadrach in connexion with Damascus, Arpad, Hamath, Samaria, Judah, though they give no details. Assur-dan III. made an expedition thither in his first year, B.C. 772, another in his eighth, and another in his eighteenth year. Hadrach is mentioned in inscriptions that bear the name of Tiglath-pileser (B.C. 745–727), and in others which Assyriologists attribute to Tiglath-pileser, though the fragments of them now known do not bear his name. The period is that in which the 'shepherds' of Israel were Zechariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, Pekah, and Hoshea; when the realm of Jeroboam II., including the peoples from the Mediter. to the Euphrates, was falling to pieces before the Assyrian. The Assyr. kings speak of themselves as overthrowing a confederacy, headed by Uzziah of Judah, and extending as far as Hamath. At different times in this period they deported Israelites from the northern tribes, and from east of Jordan (1 Ch $5^{6.\ 26}$, 2 K 15^{29}).

Apparently, the identification of Hadrach with Ḫatarikka is beyond doubt, and the writer of this prophecy had this period in mind, whatever bearing these facts may have on the various critical and historical questions that arise (see Schrader, *KAT*² 453, and Del. Paradies, 279).

HAFT.—'The haft of a knife, that whereby you have or hold it,' says Trench (Study of Words, 303); and the two words are no doubt etymol. connected, but the connexion is not quite so immediate. Haft occurs once in AV, Jg 3^{22} 'And the haft also went in after the blade' (חַנִּצָב, the hilt of a sword, or handle of a knife). Wyc. (who has 'pommel' here, [1388, ether hilte]) uses 'haft' in Dt 19^{5} 'the yren, slipt of fro the haft, smytith his freend, and sleeth' (1388, 'helve'). Cf. also Gower, Confessio Amantis, iv.—

> 'But yet ne fond I nought the haft,
> Which might unto the blade accorde.'

HAGAB (חָגָב, Ἀγάβ), Ezr 2^{46}.—His descendants were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. The name, with that preceding it in Ezr, is absent from the parallel list in Neh 7, the loss being apparently due to the similarity between the names Hagabah and Hagab. It appears in 1 Es 5^{30} as Accaba.

HAGABA (חֲגָבָא, Ἀγαβά B, Ἀγγαβά A), Neh 7^{48}.—The head of another family of Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel.

HAGABAH (חֲגָבָה, Ἀγαβά).—The slightly different form in which the last-mentioned name appears in the parallel list in Ezr 2^{45}. In 1 Es 5^{29} it becomes Aggaba (AV Graba, B* om., A Ἀγγαβά).

HAGAR (הָגָר 'flight,' 'emigration'). — i. THE NARRATIVES.—Hagar was the name of an Egyptian woman (Gn 16^{1} 21^{9}) in the service of Sarai. The fact that she is expressly called an Egyptian has given rise to the conjecture that she was one of the 'maidservants' who were presented by Pharaoh at the time when the Egyptian king 'entreated Abraham well' for Sarai's sake (12^{16}). It would appear that Hagar stood in that intimate relation with Sarai which we find occupied by the maidservants of Rebekah (24^{59}) and of Leah and Rachel ($29^{24\text{-}29}$). She was the property of her mistress, not of her master; and Sarai finding that in the course of nature she could herself have no hope of having children, proposed that Abraham should take Hagar as his concubine. Hagar being Sarai's property, Sarai would claim Hagar's children as her own (cf. Rachel and Leah in $30^{3.\ 9}$). Accordingly, Hagar became Abraham's concubine; and, finding herself with child, appears to have suffered herself to indulge in expressions of exultation, as if of triumph over a defeated rival. The true wife and the servant concubine, in their jealousy and hatred, present a picture of Bedawîn tent-life, true enough to facts, however repugnant to Western ideas. Sarai bitterly resented the insult, and complained to Abraham. The patriarch resigned all claim over his concubine; he refused to interfere himself, and handed Hagar over to the tender mercies of Sarai. Sarai's harshness enraged Hagar; and the latter, goaded to desperation, fled from her mistress into the wilderness. The wilderness of Shur 'before (i.e. E. of) Egypt' represents probably the desert region of Jîfar between Philistia and the E. borders of Egypt proper (cf. Ex 15^{22}). Presumably, Hagar bethought herself of fleeing to her native country; for through this desert passed the usual caravan route to Egypt. While she was resting by a spring in the desert the Angel of J″ appeared to her (v.[7]); bade her return to her mistress and be submissive to her; he also encouraged her by telling her of the son that should be born to her; his name was to be Ishmael; he would be as untameable as a wild ass; he would be at war with all men; 'in the sight of all his brethren' should he live (not merely, 'to the E. of them,' עַל־פְּנֵי) his wild, independent, defiant life. Hagar, according to the Hebrew tradition, gave the name Beer-lahai-ro'i to the spring, because as the angel departed she realized who he was; and she looked after him who had seen her in her affliction and had comforted her. 'The well of the living one who sees me'; this was the popular interpretation of the name of the well in after-times associated with the vision granted to Hagar [see BEER-LAHAI-ROI]. 'The Bedawîn even yet associate with Hagar's name a well a considerable distance south of Beersheba in Muweilih, one of the principal stations on the caravan road, and also a rock dwelling, Bait Hagar, in the neighbourhood' (Dillmann, in loc.). Hagar was obedient to the vision, and returned to her mistress. The birth of Ishmael is recorded in the brief extract from P (16^{15}), which also mentions that Abram was then eighty-six years old. Eleven years had passed since the call of Abram.

Nothing more is related of Hagar until the 21st chapter, where we are told of the birth of Isaac (vv.[1-7]). On the occasion of the festival which was held perhaps two or three years later (see Del tzsch and Dillmann, in loc.), Sarah saw Hagar's son 'playing' (מְצַחֵק, not 'mocking' or 'persecuting,' as no object is expressed); and her maternal jealousy took fire. She was seized probably with a dread lest the inheritance should pass to the son of the concubine. She demanded from Abraham the expulsion of Hagar and her boy. The demand, to Abraham's credit, displeased him sorely. But God spake to him, apparently at night; bade him sacrifice his fatherly feelings, and obey Sarah's word. Abraham the next morning took bread and a skin of water, and gave them over, with the lad, to Hagar, who was thus sent forth a homeless wanderer into the wilderness of Beersheba, in the neighbourhood of which Abraham presumably was encamped ($21^{14.\ 32}$ 22^{19}). According to this tradition Ishmael was still a child, and was soon worn out. The water-skin was quickly emptied; Hagar laid the child down under a bush (v.[15]); she saw there was no hope for his life unless she could find water; in despair, and so that she might not witness his dying agonies, she retired a bowshot's distance. It was then that God heard the voice of the lad (not of his mother); and the angel of God called to Hagar, and encouraged her. The boy was not to die, but to live. 'Arise, lift up the boy, take fast hold of him by thy hand; for I will make of him a great nation.' Then God opened her eyes; she saw, what before she had not perceived, a well of water close at hand; she filled the empty skin with water, and gave her boy to drink. He revived, and grew to be a strong man, a famous archer. He dwelt in the desert of Paran; and his mother, herself an Egyptian, took for him an Egyptian wife (v.[21]).

The purpose which was served by the preservation of these two narratives was probably a different one in each case. In ch. 16 we have a tradition the preservation of which in the Book of Genesis seems to be due to the fact that (1) it illustrated the varied trials to which Abraham's faith and patience were subjected before the fulfilment of the divine promise was granted; (2) it proclaimed the futility of the human endeavours to compass by human means that which could only be accomplished in accordance with the divine purpose. To every Israelite it also emphasized the fact that the chosen family had been providentially watched over from its very beginnings; the humblest members of the household received the blessing of the divine Vision. In ch. 21 we have a similar thought; but here the separation of Hagar from the tent of Abraham is due, not to a voluntary flight, but to an express divine oracle. Undoubtedly, too, this story reflects the pride of the people in the purity of their descent. The nations around Palestine were, according to the popular Hebrew belief, all of them offshoots from the family of Abraham; but the stock of typical patriarchal Israel had no contamination from Canaan or from Egypt.

There was, however, another side to the narratives. It cannot but have struck the Israelite reader that the first mention of 'the Angel of J″' (16^{7}) is in connexion with the manifestation to Hagar, this despised Egyptian concubine. The light 'ad revelationem gentium' had begun to shine; and the story of Hagar is the first of a remarkable series in which appear Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, and Naaman. Thus the story of Hagar is a striking instance, on the very threshold of the history of the Covenant People, of that wider and more generous view of divine mercy which was ordinarily ignored by popular Hebrew particularism.

The name Hagar in Arabic denotes a 'fugitive.' The word is familiar to us in Hegira, the 'epoch-making' flight of Mohammed. Some have thought that the biblical narratives of Hagar ('flight') and Ishmael ('God heareth') have been expanded out of a mere play upon the words; others have thought that the original names may have been adapted so as to correspond with the distinctive incidents of well-known primitive narratives, and that thus the tradition of actual facts has been made to serve the additional purpose of accounting for the origin of neighbouring tribes. It cannot be doubted that the narratives represent an early Israelite belief that the mountain tribes and clans on the south and south-east frontier of Palestine were descended from the same Hebrew stock, from the same Semitic group, as Israel. The Ishmaelite Bedawîn were regarded as sons of Abraham, but as of inferior caste; and Hagar supplied the recollection of a tradition that they were also connected with Egypt. Renan (Hist. of Isr. i. 81 n., Eng. tr.) would derive the name Hagar from the Arabic ḥagar (=a rock), 'by the primitive equivalence of ה and ח'; he regards Hagar as the personification of the tribes of Arabia Petræa, and apparently derives the story of Hagar from the resemblance of the two words meaning 'rock' and 'fugitive.'

ii. Sources of the Narratives.—The story of Hagar is to be found in two passages in Genesis, the one ch. 16, the other ch. 21^{8-21}. The former passage is almost entirely derived from J (the Jahwist narrative), the only exceptions being vv.$^{1a.\ 3.\ 15.\ 16}$, which are from P (the Priestly Narrative, so also 25^{12}), and vv.$^{9.\ 10}$, which are probably from the Redactor. The latter passage is entirely from E (the Elohist narrative). The two passages furnish material for instructive comparison. In both cases we have a tradition respecting Hagar, a concubine of Abraham. In the earlier chapter she flies from her mistress; in the later she is expelled by Abraham at Sarah's demand. In both traditions a divine manifestation is granted to her in the wilderness. In ch. 16 (J) it is 'the Angel of JHVH' who appears to her 'in the wilderness, by the fountain (עַיִן) in the way to Shur' (16^{6}). In ch. 21 (E) it is God (Elohim) who hears her child weeping, and 'the Angel of God' (Elohim) who speaks to her, and she sees 'a well of water' (בְּאֵר מָיִם). In ch. 16 (J) Hagar is the 'handmaid' (שִׁפְחָה) of Sarai; in ch. 21 (E) she is the 'bondwoman' (אָמָה). In ch. 16^{11} (J) Hagar's son is to be called Ishmael because J^{m} had heard her 'affliction'; in ch. 21^{17} (E) 'God heard the voice of the lad.'

It is possible, if $16^{9.\ 10}$ be an addition by R, that the J tradition regarded Ishmael 'as born and bred in the desert,' and did not record the return of Hagar to the tent of Abraham (Kittel). It was, however, necessary to introduce the mention of her return in order to account for the E tradition of ch. 21.

It will be observed that, according to P, Ishmael was fourteen years old when Isaac was born (Gn $16^{1.\ 3.\ 15.\ 16}$ $21^{1.\ 2-5}$); but in E the language used of Hagar (21^{9-21}) would imply that Ishmael was still a child.

iii. References to Hagar by St. Paul and Philo.—St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Galatians (4^{25}), makes an allegorical use of the story of Hagar. 'Hagar, the bondwoman,' is set over-against 'Sarah, the freewoman'; 'Ishmael, the child after the flesh,' against 'Isaac, the child of the promise.' St. Paul is presenting the antithesis of 'the old covenant' and 'the new,' 'the earthly Jerusalem' and 'the heavenly.' Sinai, the mountain of the law, which was in Arabia, the dwelling-place of 'the son of Hagar' (Bar $3^{2.\ 3}$), is set over-against Mount Sion, the mountain of gracious promise, the home of the true Israel (see Lightfoot on Gal 4^{25}).

This allegorical treatment of the story of Hagar corresponded to the rabbinic method of teaching in the apostle's time. St. Paul's expansion of the story (ἐδίωκεν τὸν κατὰ πνεῦμα) reproduced the traditional Jewish feeling (cf. Bereshith Rabba, 53. 15) of hostility towards the Arab tribes, whose constant inroads upon the southern frontier of Judæa seemed to repeat the conduct of Ishmael towards Isaac. The Hagarenes mentioned in Ps 83^{6}, 1 Ch $5^{10.\ 19.\ 20}$, were regarded as typical members of this group of hostile clans. (These tribes were possibly the same as the Ἀγραῖοι, who are mentioned by Eratosthenes in Strabo, xvi. iv. 2, p. 767, as dwelling in the northern part of Arabia). St. Paul, in his reference to the Hagar narrative, frankly uses it as an allegory (Gal 4^{24}); and, as in at least one other instance (1 Co 10^{4}), he does not shrink from employing for his purpose the 'Haggadic' expansion of the original version.

Philo allegorizes the narrative in various passages, notably in De Cherubim, i. i. 139; De Congr. Erud. grat. ii. i. 500. Abraham represents the human soul searching after true wisdom and divine knowledge. He is united first to Sarai, the sovereign virtue (ἡ ἄρχουσα ἀρετή), but from her he has no offspring; he has not progressed sufficiently to win spiritual advantage. At her bidding he next unites himself to Hagar the Egyptian—who represents secular learning, the necessary training of the intellect (τὰ ἐπώνυμα τῆς Ἄγαρ προπαιδεύματα). This union is at once fruitful; and its issue is Ishmael, who represents sophistry—Hagar (ἡ μέσος καὶ ἐγκύκλιος παιδεία) and Ishmael (ὁ σοφιστής) must both be driven forth to make way for the reunion with the true virtue which abides forever in the home of the human soul. The name Hagar he interprets by παροίκησις (='sojourning'), as if it were connected with gêr (De Congr. Erud. grat. i. 520), 'a sojourner'; cf. παροικεῖ σοφία οὐ κατοικεῖ (De sacrific. Abelis et Caini, § 10. i. 170).

iv. Later Traditions.—Jewish tradition expanded and embellished the story in a variety of ways. In ch. 16 'the desert of Shur' appears as 'the desert of Ḥagra' in the Targum of Onkelos and Jerusalem. In ch. 21 the Targum of Jerusalem adds that Abraham dismissed Hagar 'with a letter of divorce.' The Targums of Jonathan and Jerus. in 25^{1} identify Keturah with Hagar, 'who had been bound (rt. ktr, קטנרה) to him from the beginning'; so also Rashi. Rashi, in his commentary on 6^{1}, records the belief that Hagar was a daughter of Pharaoh, who, after seeing the wonders that had been done for Sarah, declared that it was better for his daughter to be a bondservant in the house of Abraham than a mistress in the palace of another. Commenting on 21^{9}, he records the Jewish interpretation mentioned by Jerome in his Quæst. ad Genesim, according to which Ishmael's 'playing' was a form of 'idolatry' (cf. Ex 32^{6}). Again, on v.^{14}, he says, 'Abraham put Ishmael on Hagar's shoulder; for Sarah had overlooked him with an evil eye, and he had been seized with fever so that he could not walk.'

One of the Jewish derivations of Hagar's name is based upon a play on the words הא אגרך 'here is thy wage.'

'The Moslems naturally modify the biblical account in favour of their own nation; they contend that Hagar was Abraham's lawful wife, and that Ishmael obtained, therefore, as his eldest son, the extensive tracts of Arabia, whilst the younger son, Isaac, received only the limited territory of Canaan; that Hagar was born at Farma, then the capital of Egypt and the residence of the Pharaohs, but that she died at Mecca, and was buried in the precincts of the temple of the Caaba' (Kalisch on Gn 16^{1-3}, quoting D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 420).

Buxtorf (in his Lexicon Chald. Talmud. et Rabbin., Basle, 1639, s.v. הגרי) says, 'Judæi hodie Ungaros sic vocant, quasi Hagrios vel Hagarios Turcas autem Ismælitas vocant. Hinc Psal. 83 pro הַגְרִים in Targum est הונגראי Ungari.'

HAGGAI (חַגַּי 'festal,' LXX Ἀγγαῖος, cf. חַגִּית 2 S 3^4; Phœn. חגי, חגת, CIS lxvii. 1; Palmyr. חגגו, Vogüé, 61*a*).—The prophet whose prophecies are contained in the book which bears his name. His first prophecy is dated the 2nd year of Darius, i.e. B.C. 520; his main purpose was to rouse the community of the returned exiles to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem.

A. Historical Introduction.—The high hopes with which the Jewish exiles started home from Babylon in 536 were not destined to be fulfilled in the early years of the Return. Instead of proceeding at once to restore the ruined temple to its former glory, the Benê hag-Golah ('sons of the Captivity') were obliged to content themselves with setting up the altar of burnt-offering (Ezr $3^{2f.}$, confirmed by Hag 2^{14}). It is possible that the foundations of the temple were formally laid;* but the great work of restoration remained unaccomplished for the next sixteen years. Various causes contributed to this state of inaction. During the fifty years of the Captivity the Judæan exiles had lived without temple and altar, and no doubt many felt that delay in restoring them need not involve serious damage to religion. The more enthusiastic party would probably have made some effort but for the series of disasters which fell upon the Jewish community. There was, first of all, the active hostility of the neighbouring Samaritans; the firm refusal of whose plausible offer to assist in the building turned them into the implacable foes of Jerusalem (Ezr 4^{1-5}). Then the invasion of Egypt by Cambyses in 527 must have brought with it great suffering for the Jewish colonists; no peace or security was possible while Palestine was being overrun by the vast hordes of the Persian army on their way to Egypt (see Zec 8^{10}, Hag 1^6). A succession of bad seasons followed; the land suffered from prolonged drought; harvest and vintage failed; the fortunes of the colony sank to their lowest ebb (Hag $1^{6.\ 9-11}$ $2^{16.\ 17}$). In Jerusalem itself some of the old social abuses made their appearance; luxury and self-seeking among the wealthier classes took the place of zeal for the cause of religion (Hag $1^{4.\ 9}$). The leaders of the community did nothing, the first enthusiasm had cooled down, and the great object of the Return remained unaccomplished. Meanwhile important events were taking place in the Persian empire. During the early years of his reign (521–515) Darius was engaged in a desperate struggle to secure the kingdom he had won. Province after province revolted; rebellions broke out everywhere, now in the very heart of the empire, now in its farthest extremities. While Darius was suppressing the Babylonian usurper Nidintubel, Elam and the neighbouring countries attempted to throw off the Persian yoke. At the beginning of 520 Darius subdued Babylon, and then marched against the Median pretender Phraortes; but before this campaign was over, Babylon revolted a second time.* It seemed like a vast upheaval of the heathen world, a shaking of the heavens and earth. There were still prophets in Jerusalem who could read the signs of the times, and they were not slow to grasp the bearing of these vast movements upon the interests which they had at heart. The central authority was weakened, the original permit of Cyrus had not been repealed: now was the opportunity for a religious and patriotic enterprise. Haggai came forward in 520—and Zechariah was soon by his side—with the divine command to start at once upon the rebuilding of the temple. The neglect of this first duty, so the prophet insists, has been the cause of all the recent misfortunes; but when once it has been discharged the divine blessing will descend, and the glorious promises of the great prophet of the Restoration (e.g. Is 60) will be fulfilled at last. There will be a shaking of heaven and earth; the powers of the heathen kingdoms will be overthrown; and Zerubbabel, the treasured and chosen of J", will be preserved for the great hereafter. The prophet's appeal was addressed primarily to Zerubbabel and Joshua, the civil and religious leaders of the community, and it produced the desired effect. The work of rebuilding was taken vigorously in hand; and four years later (516) the temple was solemnly dedicated (Hag $1^{14f.}$ $2^{3.\ 18}$, Zec 4^{8-10} 6^{12-15} 8^9, Ezr $5^{1f.}$ 6^{14-18}, 1 Es 6^1 7^3).

B. The Prophecies.—The prophecies of Haggai are arranged in four groups, each one headed by the date on which it was delivered. They cover a period of four months, from September to December of the year 520.†

i. First prophecy: September; 1^{1-15}, Haggai comes forward on the 1st of the month, perhaps because there would then be a gathering of the people to celebrate the festival of the new moon. He addresses Zerubbabel by his Babylonian title of Peḥah ('governor'), and Joshua by his new title of High Priest (lit. 'great priest'; before the Exile it was 'chief,' lit. 'head priest,' or 'the priest'), because as official leaders of the community they were principally to blame for the neglect of religious and patriotic duty. He denounces the popular excuse that the time had not yet come‡ for the temple to be built. 'The fact is, you have thought more of your own comfort than of God's glory, and built your own houses in a fashion which recalls the luxury of your forefathers (1 K 6^9 7^8, Jer 22^{14}), while you have allowed the temple to lie in ruins. Consider your ways! look back at the experiences of the past sixteen years, and learn the lesson of the disappointment, misery, and insecurity you have suffered. Consider your ways! think of your present state of inaction. If you would regain the favour of God,§ go up to the mountains and fetch timber, and begin at once to build the House. The drought, the bad harvests, the dis-

* All contemporary authorities give the 2nd year of Darius, the 16th of the Return, 520, as the date of the foundation of the temple, Hag $2^{15.\ 18}$, Zec 8^9, Ezr $5^{2.\ 16}$. The account of the laying of the foundations in the 2nd year of the Return, 535, contained in Ezr 3^{8-13}, belongs to a later document, written about 200 years after the events narrated. It is possible that this later account may have some historical basis; there may have been a purely formal foundation, such as Haggai and Zechariah could entirely disregard. See Driver, LOT^{6} 547.

* See the great Behistun inscription of Darius, Records of the Past, i. 107–130.

† In the pre-exilic period the year was reckoned from autumn to autumn; but during the Exile a change of reckoning occurred, prob. due to Babylonian influence, and the year ran from spring to spring (see Ex 12^2), i.e. April–April. The old Heb. names of the months were dropped, and at first the months were known by numbers, as in Hag, Zec; then the Bab. names of the months were gradually introduced as in Zec, Ezr, Neh. See Wellh. Proleg.^{3} 110; Benzinger, Hebr. Arch. 201; Nowack, Lehrb. Hebr. Arch. i. 218 f.; and art. Time.

‡ In 1^2 the text must be corrected to make sense; see VSS and RVm. The first עֵת 'time,' is not given by VSS; it must either be struck out, or pointed עַתָּה 'now,' or corrected to עוֹד 'yet.'

§ In commenting on the form of the word 'and I will be glorified,' v.^{8} (אכבר for אכבדה), the Talm. says, 'There are five points in which the first temple differed from the second; they are the ark and the mercy-seat and the cherubim, the fire, and the Shechinah, and the Holy Spirit, and the Urim and Tummim. eases of the past seasons, are nothing but a punishment* for the selfish neglect of your foremost duty.' The prophet's earnest and direct appeal stirred the slumbering energies of both leaders and people, and they proceeded to do work in the House of J".† This was on the 24th day of the sixth month, i.e. little more than three weeks after Haggai first came forward.

ii. Second prophecy: October; 2^{1-9}. In spite of the enthusiasm aroused by the prophet's first address, and before the work could have advanced much beyond the repairing of the foundations, a feeling of despair began to damp the ardour of the workers, both leaders and people. Those who were old enough to recollect the former temple circulated depressing comparisons: 'This new temple will never be like the old one.'‡ To arrest the spread of this despondent spirit Haggai promptly brought a message, this time of strong encouragement. It was useless to spend vain regrets upon the past, when all their energies were needed for the present. J" was still present with His people; § and the time was fast approaching for Israel to enter upon its glorious career. The completion of the temple was to be the signal for a convulsion of the universe and a revolution in the Gentile world. Then this very temple, which now appeared too great for their resources and too mean for their desire, would be filled with the treasures of the Gentiles.‖ That day would see the long-delayed fulfilment of the great promises;¶ and then there would be no comparison between the first temple and the second, for the glory of the latter House would far excel the glory of the former.

iii. Third prophecy: December; 2^{10-19}. On this occasion Haggai came before the people with a parable, a warning, and a promise. There was much still to depress the spirit of the builders besides the discouraging comparisons of those who could not look beyond the glories of the past. Nothing as yet had taken place to correspond with the inspiring hopes of the prophet. The general state was one of misery, not far from famine. The drought lasted so long that it seemed hopeless to expect any produce from the land. The seed lay useless in the barns; it was impossible to sow it in the sun-parched earth; the vines and fig-trees had borne no fruit (v.[19]). And yet, said the people, is not the land holy, the favoured soil of J"? Has He not pledged His promise to it? Is not His altar here?

To show the falseness of this reasoning, which argued that because the land was holy therefore it must be fruitful, Haggai asks the priests for instruction (torah) on a ceremonial point; their reply suggests the true principle. The contagion of holiness is transmitted only slightly, if at all (Lv 6^{27}), while uncleanness has a far-reaching effect (Lv 7^{21}, Nu 19^{22}). Altar* and sacrifices avail nothing while the people neglect their first duty. To allow the temple to lie in ruins is the guilt which taints everything; the blight which rests upon the land is a proof and punishment of their uncleanness.† But now that they have set to work in earnest, and laid the foundation of the temple (v.[18]),‡ better days will follow. The seed is in the barns—it shall yield a harvest; the vines and the fig-trees, as yet unfruitful, shall yield their wine and oil; and God's blessing shall descend upon His land (v.[19]).

iv. Fourth prophecy: same date as iii. The prophet turns from the people to the prince, and addresses Zerubbabel alone. In the vast upheaval which is to accompany the approaching judgement,§ Zerubbabel will remain unshaken. As the representative of the Davidic dynasty, and therefore the object of patriotic hopes,‖ he receives an assurance of the divine protection and the perpetuity of his race.¶ Under Persian domination the prophet dare not promise more.

There can be little doubt that the prophecies of Haggai have come down to us in a very abbreviated form. It is the main heads of his discourses, rather than the discourses themselves, that have been preserved. Compared with Amos and Hosea, the style of Haggai is monotonous and prosaic. He is fond of repetitions, e.g. the reiterated 'Con-

* In v.[10] the second word עֲלֵיכֶם 'for your sake,' is prob. an erroneous repetition of the first עַל־כֵּן. In v.[12] the second אֱלֹהֵיהֶם 'their God,' is rendered by LXX, Syr. Vulg. 'unto them,' אֲלֵיהֶם, which is to be preferred.

† V.[13] is suspicious; it interrupts the connexion between v.[12] and v.[14]; and it is not in Haggai's style, e.g. for יְ֝הוָה מַלְאַךְ H. writes הַנָּבִיא בְּמַלְאֲכוּת יְ֝הוָה, for בַּאֲשֶׁר שְׁלָחוֹ v.[12]. See Böhme, ZATW vii. 215; Stade, GVI ii. 114 n.; Wellh. Skiz. u. Vorarb. v. 169; Nowack, Kl. Proph. 305. The last part of the verse may have been taken from 2^{4}. On this verse was based the curious tradition that Haggai, like John the Baptist and Malachi, was really an angel in human form. See Jerome, Opera, ed. Bened. 1704, tom. iii. p. 1691, and Cyril Alex. Opera, ed. 1638, tom. iii. p. 637, commenting on this verse.

‡ The parallel account in Ezr 3^{12} refers to the second year of the Return. But as Ezr 3^{8-13} was written long after the events recorded (see above), it is not impossible that the 'weeping of the old men' really belongs to this occasion (so the contemporary authorities, Hag 2^{3}, Zec 4^{10}), and has been transferred to the earlier date under a misapprehension.

§ The first part of v.[5] down to 'Egypt' scarcely makes grammar (RVm has to insert 'Remember'), and interrupts the context. LXX omits. Prob. a marginal gloss, which has crept into the text. 'My spirit abideth in the midst of you' (Zec 4^{6}) will thus follow 'I am with you.'

‖ In v.[7] translate 'and the desirable things of all the nations shall come.' The word חֶמְדַּת is sing., but collective in meaning, and so construed with a plur. vb.; cf. Is $6^{0}{}^{5}$. The construction is rightly understood by LXX καὶ ἥξει τὰ ἐκλεκτά, Pesh. Targ. Ital. Old interpreters referred the verse directly to the Messiah, e.g. Vulg. et veniet desideratus cunctis gentibus, and Jerome, Comment. in loc. This tr[n] is not correct, but the verse is Messianic, in the same sense as Is 60.

¶ Such as Mic $4^{1.2}$, Is $2^{2.3}$ $60^{5-7.11.13.17}$ 61^{6}, Jer 3^{17}; cf. Zec 2^{11} 8^{22}, To 14^{5}. Apparently, Haggai's idea is that the Messianic era will begin immediately after the great upheaval which is to follow the completion of the temple. In v.[9] LXX begins a new sentence with 'And in this place . . .,' adding καὶ εἰρήνην ψυχῆς εἰς περιποίησιν παντὶ τῷ κτίζοντι τοῦ ἀναστῆσαι τὸν ναὸν τοῦτον, which Wellh. (Sk. u. Vorarb. v. 169) ingeniously reproduces by וְשָׁלוֹת נפש לְחַיּוֹת כל הֵיסוֹד לקוֹמם הַהֵיכל הזה (cf. 1 Ch 11^{8}, Ex 9^{18}, Ps 122[7]), 'and rest of soul, to repair all the foundation, to raise up this temple.' The sentence is so peculiar that it is difficult to regard it as a mere addition of LXX; at the same time it is not easy to see why it should have dropped out of the MT. It is not required to complete the sense of the passage.

* In v.[14] 'there' points to the altar erected immediately after the Return (Ezr 3^{3}). LXX adds at the end of the verse ἔνεκεν τῶν ἡμιμάτων αὐτῶν τῶν ὁρθρινῶν, ὀδυνηθήσονται ἀπὸ προσώπου πόνων αὐτῶν, καὶ ἐμισεῖτε ἐν πύλαις ἐλέγχοντας. So Ital. But first clause is a corrupt reading of יען לְקֹהֵם שָׁהֵר as יען, and does not belong to this place; the second clause is a gloss adapted to the context; the third is taken from Am 5^{10} (Wellh. in loc.).

† V.[15] 'From this day and upwards'; the latter word points to the future (cf. 1 S 16^{13} etc.); but before giving a promise for the future (v.[19]) the prophet recalls, in a parenthesis, the sufferings of the past 16 years (vv.[16.17]) as a warning. In v.[17] the words אֵין אִתְּכֶם אֲלַי are untranslatable and corrupt. Read וְלֹא שְׁבְתֶּם אֲלַי 'and ye did not turn unto me' (Am 4^{9}, from which other expressions in this verse are taken).

‡ V.[18] the meaning is, 'Consider, from this day and onwards, nay, start from the day when the foundations were laid four months ago; J"'s blessing will date from the time when the work began.' The date in v.[18] is awkward and unnecessary; perhaps inserted by a reader from v.[10].

§ Some verb seems to have fallen out at the end of v.[22]; Wellh. suggests יִפְּלוּ 'shall fall.'

‖ What Haggai hints, Zechariah makes more explicit; Zerubbabel is to be the Messianic king of the future (Zec 3^{8} $6^{9ff.}$).

¶ 'For the signet,' cf. Jer 22^{29}, Ca 8^{6}, Sir 49^{11}. The authenticity of vv.[20-23] has been questioned by Böhme (ZATW vii. 215 ff.) on the ground of (α) certain differences of style, e.g. v.[20] 'the word of J" came unto H.' instead of the usual 'the word of J" came by the hand of H. the prophet,' and (β) the repetition of the prophecy in 2^{6b} 7^{a}. With regard to (α) cf. v.[10] and Jer 46^{13}, MT and LXX; no great weight can be laid upon the form in which such sentences have been handed down. With regard to (β), the prophecy does not go beyond prophetic thought in Haggai's time; and as it is addressed to Zerub. alone (hence שְׁנִית v.[20]) the repetition is natural, and forms a fitting conclusion to the book.

sider your ways,' 'saith J" of hosts' ($2^{7-9.\ 23}$), and the repeated address to Zerubbabel and Joshua by their full titles. At the same time he is capable of finer writing, e.g. $1^{6.\ 11}$ $2^{6.\ 7.\ 21.\ 22}$. Compared with his colleague Zechariah, Haggai shows less freedom and variety in his description of the Messianic age. Both prophets belong to the period of the decline of prophecy. They seem to be conscious that their prophetic gift does not possess the direct and copious inspiration of the earlier prophets; for they are careful to assert repeatedly that their word is the word of J". In one respect they belong to the pre-exilic type, inasmuch as, like Jeremiah and Ezekiel, their names and personalities, and the historical circumstances of their ministry, are well known. Otherwise, they belong to the new school of religious thought which was the product of the Exile. Before the Exile, prophecy was mainly concerned with denunciation of national sins and threats of impending judgment, with summons to repentance and moral reformation; the prophets had to resist the semi-idolatrous worship of a corrupt society. But after the Exile the conditions were altered; tendencies towards apostasy and idolatry had disappeared; and we find that the main interest of Haggai is centred in the temple, and his prophetic gift is exercised in urging the restoration of a material fabric. This change in the subject-matter of prophecy 'is not to be attributed to the inferior religious capacity of the post-exilic period.' * Different circumstances called for a different form of religious expression. New problems had arisen; it was the work of Haggai, and of the religious teachers who followed him, to meet these problems, and to interpret the religion of Israel in accordance with the needs of a new age.

According to Jewish tradition, Haggai (with Zechariah, Malachi, etc.) was a member of the Great Synagogue: see Talm. Baba Bathra, fol. 15*a*, with Rashi's comment. In Aboth R. Nathan, fol. 23*b*, Haggai, Zech., and Mal. are said to have received the tradition from the prophets who were before them, and to have handed it on to the men of the Great Synagogue.

The versions mention Haggai (and Zechariah) in the headings of the following psalms:—LXX Ps 137. (Tischend.) 145. 146. 147. 148. Vulg. Ps 111 'Alleluia, reversionis, Aggæi et Zachariæ,' 145. Itala (Jerome) Ps 6 'canticum Hieremiæ et Aggæi de verbo peregrinationis, quando incipiebant proficisci,' 111 (Nestle). Pesh. Ps 125. 126. 145. 146. 147. 148 (Lee). With these cf. Epiphanius (De vitis prophetarum, ed. 1682, tom. ii. p. 248), who says of Haggai, καὶ αὐτὸς ἔψαλε ἐκεῖ (ἐν Ἱερουσαλήμ) πρῶτος ἀλληλουιά. Epiphan. also tells us that Haggai the prophet, while still young, went up from Babylon, and prophesied openly about the return (ἐπιστροφῆς) of the people, and saw the building of the temple of Jerusalem, where he died and was buried honourably near the priests. This tradition of Epiphan. is copied by Dorotheus (Synopsis de vita et morte prophetarum, Max. biblioth. vet. patr., Lugd., tom. iii. p. 422), and by Hesychius of Jerus. (ed. Migne, 1865, p. 1362), who says that Haggai was born in Babylon and was of the tribe of Levi, and was buried near the priests because he was of priestly race.

HAGGI (חַגִּי 'born on a festival').—Son of Gad, Gn 46^{16}, Nu 26^{15} P. Patronymic, Haggites, Nu 26^{15}.

HAGGIAH (חַגִּיָּה 'feast of J"').—A Levite, descended from Merari, 1 Ch 6^{30}. See GENEALOGY.

HAGGITES.—See HAGGI.

HAGGITH (חַגִּית 'festal').—One of David's wives, known to us only as the mother of Adonijah, David's fourth son, whom she bare to him at Hebron, i.e. before he became king over all Israel (2 S 3^4, 1 Ch 3^2). Adonijah is usually introduced as 'the son of Haggith' (1 K $1^{5.\ 11}$ 2^{13}).

HAGIOGRAPHA.—See BIBLE, OLD TESTAMENT.

HAGRI (הַגְרִי, AV Haggeri).—Father of Mibhar, one of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{38}. Instead of מִבְחָר בֶּן־הַגְרִי, the parallel passage 2 S 23^{36} reads מִצֹּבָה בְּנֵי הַגָּדִי 'of Zobah, Bani the Gadite,' which is probably the correct text. (Cf. Driver, Heb. Text of Sam. ad loc., and Kittel on 1 Ch 11^{38}).

HAGRITE (הַגְרִי). — Jaziz the Hagrite (AV Hagerite) was 'over the flocks' of king David, 1 Ch 27^{31}. See next article.

HAGRITES (1 Ch $5^{10.\ 19.\ 20}$, AV Hagarites).—Hagarenes (AV and RV Ps 83^6, but RVm has Hagrites), הַהַגְרָאִים, הַהַגְרִיאִים, הַגְרִים (LXX Ἀγαρηνοί, Ἀγγαρηνοί, Ἀγαραῖοι, Ἀγεραῖοι). Whether the tribe was of Aramæan or Arabian origin is uncertain. The name first appears in history in 1 Ch 5^{10} in the story of the campaign of the Reubenites in the days of Saul, in which the H. are described as driven out of the district lying to the east of Gilead. They are also named along with the two Ishmaelitish tribes, Jetur and Naphish (1 Ch 1^{31}, Gn 25^{15}), and an otherwise unknown tribe, Nodab, as the chief object of attack on the part of the three Israelitish tribes east of the Jordan, on which occasion, according to our present text, the H. and their allies lost 100,000 men (1 Ch 5^{19-22}). That their wealth consisted in cattle is indicated in the same passage by the statement that no less than 50,000 camels, 250,000 sheep, and 2000 asses fell into the hands of the conquerors. The question has been often raised as to whether the name H. designates a particular tribe. Bertheau on 1 Ch 5^{10} assumes that the name is a late designation of the Bedawîn tribes of Arabia generally current in the times of the Chronicler. It does indeed so happen that the name occurs only in very late writings, only in Ch and in Ps 83. Yet even there, at least in the psalm just referred to, it occurs alongside of the names of other Arabian and even Ishmaelitish tribes, which would have been included under it had it been used in this general sense. Many of the Jewish writers assumed that the H. were simply the descendants of Hagar. Dillmann and others think it extremely doubtful whether the name has any connexion with that of Ishmael's mother. It is not even quite certain that they were Ishmaelites. It is, however, quite evidently the intention of the Chronicler to represent the H. as including several other Ishmaelite tribes, without perhaps regarding them as coextensive with the Ishmaelites. That he associated their name with that of Hagar is also highly probable. Their name occurs in the midst of a group of Aramæan tribes (Schrader, COT, ii. 32) in the list of Tiglath-pileser III. (c. B.C. 727). In all probability they are the same as the Ἀγραῖοι of the Greek geographers, described as neighbours of the Nabatæans in Northern Arabia (Strabo, XVI. iv. 2; Pliny, vi. 32; Ptolem. v. xix. 2). They are certainly not to be identified with the Gerrhæans, a rich commercial people on the Persian

* See Montefiore, Hibb. Lectures, 1892, p. 297 f.

Gulf, of peaceable habits, quite unlike the restless combative Hagrites. Whether or not the οἱ υἱοὶ Ἀγαρ of Bar 3[23] are to be identified with the H. is a matter of little consequence. Perhaps this late writer, belonging to the later years of the apostolic age, intended only a vague reference to children of the East famous for their wisdom. The strange fancy that reads a reference to this people in St. Paul's allegory of Hagar and Sinai (Gal 4[24]) need only be mentioned as a curiosity in exegesis. On the use and probable meaning of the word Hagar in that passage, see an admirable and extremely interesting note in Lightfoot's Galatians[10] (1890), pp. 192–200. If, as some believe, we have a reminiscence of the H. in the name Hedjâz, applied to the northern part of the strip of land to the east of the Red Sea, we must suppose them to have been driven gradually southward from their earlier home. Individual Hagrites appear in the history of David—one, named Jaziz, as the king's chief shepherd (1 Ch 27[31]), another, named Mibhar, as one of the heroes about the king (1 Ch 11[38]). But see preceding two articles.

HAHIROTH.—See PIHAHIROTH.

HAIL.—The interjection Hail! was originally an adj. meaning 'healthy,' 'in good health,' and came from the Scand. heill, 'hale,' 'whole.' It appears as a salutation in the oldest English, but always joined to the verb 'to be' in the imperat. and retaining its adj. force. Thus in Anglo-Sax. Gospels, Lk 1[28] 'Hâl wes thu'='Hale be thou!' Mt 28[9] 'Hâle wese ge'='Hale be ye.' So 'All hail' meant originally 'altogether whole,' hail being still an adj. But the verb being omitted, 'hail' and 'all hail' came to be used purely as an interjection. And so Shaks. is able to use 'all hail!' apart from the construction of the sentence, Rich. II. IV. i. 169—

> 'Did they not sometime cry "all hail" to me?
> So Judas did to Christ.'

And in Macbeth, I. v. 6, he turns 'all hail' into a verb, 'Whiles I stood rapt in the wonder of it, came missives from the king, who all-hailed me, "Thane of Cawdor."'

Hail! is found in the Gospels only, and always as tr. of Χαῖρε (the imperat. of χαίρειν, to rejoice), a common salutation in Greek writers, and represented in Lat. by Ave! or Salve! The Vulg. uses 'Ave!' in all the passages, Mt 26[49] 27[29], Mk 15[18], Lk 1[28], Jn 19[3]. The Eng. 'hail' is as old as Wyc.; it was introduced again by Tind. and accepted by all the VSS except Gen. in Mt 26[49] 27[29] 'God save thee.' In Mt 28[9] the plu. χαίρετε occurs, where Wyc. gave 'Heil ye'; but Tind. 'All hayle,' whom the rest of the VSS followed, except Gen. 'God save you.' J. HASTINGS.

HAIL (בָּרָד bārād, ἡ χάλαζα) is mentioned in Scripture 31 times, and always as an instrument of divine judgment. A grievous hail was the seventh plague in Egypt (Ex 9[18ff.]); and as in that country hail, like rain, falls rarely, and when it occurs is generally slight (the annual rainfall in Cairo being under an inch), the catastrophe was the more remarkable, and was the first of the plagues which were directly fatal to men (vv.[19. 25]). Hail is, however, not unknown in Egypt. On Aug. 13, 1832, a brief and local but severe hailshower fell, and some of the stones are said to have weighed several ounces.

The ancient Egyptian word for hail, ār, is also applied to a driving shower of sand and stones: in the contest between Horus and Set, Isis is described as sending upon the latter ār n šā, 'a hail of sand.' In Coptic hail is named ⲁⲗ ⲛⲧⲉ ⲧⲫⲉ, 'stones from heaven.'

Lightning being also comparatively infrequent, this feature of the plague is emphasized in the narrative, 'flashing continually amidst the hail' (RVm v.[24]; see also Wis 16[16ff.], Sir 46[6], Ps 18[12. 13] 78[48] 105[32]).

Hail accompanies electrical disturbances, and is commonest at the earlier part of the day, before the ascending current from the heated land is established, and when there is the greatest variation of temperature and amount of vapour in successive strata of the atmosphere. The vapour, carried aloft by whirling currents, condenses as it ascends through colder strata into waterdrops which at higher levels become frozen, and, when carried laterally out of the ascending current, fall as hail. Often in their descent they are again caught by the ascending vortices and become nuclei of additional condensation, becoming coated with fresh lamellæ of ice. (For forms of hailstones see Buchan's Meteorology, 2nd ed. p. 106). In the act of falling, hailstones often cohere, forming by the process of regelation solid masses, which do immense damage to vegetation, and notably to vines (Ps 78[48]). Prof. Joannis of Bordeaux records the fall of stones of 200 grammes weight.

The localization of the plague (Ex 9[26]) is in accord with common experience. The great hailstorm of 13th July 1788, which destroyed property valued at £1,000,000, crossed Europe in two belts about 12 miles apart, each belt being from 7 to 10 miles wide and about 400 miles long. The hailshower of 18th April 1850, which destroyed £27,000 worth of property in Dublin, left a whole district of the city untouched.

The season of the plague was probably the end of Jan., when the flax was in bloom and the barley (which ripens 6 months after sowing, and is harvested about the end of Feb.) was in the ear (v.[31]). Wheat, which does not come into ear until about a month later, escaped (v.[32]), to become afterwards the prey of the locusts (10[15]). At this season hailstorms are most frequent in Levantine lands. The storm in the Haurân, recorded by Mohammed el-Chateb el-Bosrawi, which destroyed many men and an immense number of cattle, occurred in Feb. 1860.

Hail falls most commonly by day, at the time when men are at their work (Ex 9[19. 20]). Out of 440 consecutive hailstorms registered, only 18 occurred at night. This was noticed long ago by Venerable Bede, 'interdiu sæpius quam noctu decidunt' (De Nat. Rer. xxxiv.).

In Ps 78[48] בָּרָד is used as a parallel with bārād. This is a hapax legomenon, and is tr. 'frost' (AV and RV), but Kimchi and Ibn Ezra regard it as meaning 'hail.' It is rendered in AVm and RVm 'great hailstones,' which is probably correct. Rashi and the Targumists suppose that the word refers to locusts (see also Lee's Lexicon, p. 211). LXX has πάχνη, hoar frost. Michaelis and Ges. conjecture 'ants,' but these guesses are groundless.

By hailstones the Amorites were smitten at Bethhoron, Jos 10[11], and the size of the stones is here emphasized, as in Sir 46[6]. There are many authentic records of large stones formed by regelation. In a storm at Kazorla in Spain, 15th June 1829, stones fell which weighed 2 kilos., and in the great storm of 24th July 1818 in Orkney the stones were as large as goose eggs, and in 9 minutes 9 inches of ice had fallen. In a similar shower on 7th May 1865 at Câtalet the hailstorms are said in the official report to have made heaps 16 feet high. One great concreted mass of stones which fell in Hungary, 8th May 1832, was 3 feet in diameter, and another was measured in Ross-shire in Aug. 1849 which was 20 feet in circumference. Such stones do immense damage. In the Indian and Colonial Exhibition there was a corrugated iron roof exhibited which was pierced in several places by hailstones, and a similar occurrence is reported by an eye-witness in Notes and Queries, Nov. 19, 1887. (For other examples of destructive hailstorms see Thomson's Meteorology, 1849). Hailstorms of great severity are recorded from Bible lands by Kitto and Thomson (Land and Book, i. 86). The discomfiture of armies by hail is not confined to this instance. Sennacherib's advance in his 7th campaign, as recorded on the Taylor Cylinder, was stopped by hail, and Esarhaddon's army encountered such another storm in the land of Khani Rabbi (WAI iii. 15). In 1339 the army of Edward III. was stopped in its march to Chartres by hail (Holinshed); and, later, a violent hailshower completed the defeat of the Austrian army at Solferino (1859).

In Job 38[22] God speaks of the treasuries of hail reserved against the day of battle and war, and in Rev 8[7] 11[19] 16[21] hail is the type of God's judgment on sin. In the latter passage stones of the weight of a talent, i.e. about 2 cubic feet in bulk, are mentioned. In Is 28[2-17] the Assyrian invasion is figuratively described as זֶרֶם בָּרָד zerem bārād, a flowing of hail, called in v.[15] the overflowing scourge, which is to sweep away the Egyptian alliance, called in the passage 'the refuge of lies.' In Is 30[30] it is the power which, in turn, is to overthrow the Assyrian. The 'hail in the downfall of the forest' of Is 32[19] may be an interjected allusion to the Assyrian invasion, but the passage with its shifting figures and assonances is peculiarly obscure. Kimchi conjectures that it may mean that it will only hail in the forest, not on the cultivated land. In Hag 2[17] hail also means divine chastisement.

In Ezk 13[11-13] hail represents the judgment of God defeating the hypocrisy which would conceal corruption; 'comminatio Dei qua contumaces verberat' (Rabanus, de Universo, xxii. 18). The word used here and in Ezk 38[22] אֶלְגָּבִישׁ 'elgâbish is peculiar, and possibly connected with the gâbish of Job 28[18], rendered 'pearls' in AV, 'crystal' in RV. In the rabbinical comment on Berachoth (54*b*) the stones of 'elgâbish are, by a false etymology, explained as hail which was sent at the prayer of a man (Jos 10[11]), and stopped by the prayer of a man (Ex 9[29]). St. Agobard, Bp. of Lyons, wrote a treatise, de Grandine, etc., to disprove the notion of human instrumentality in the procuring of hail (A.D. 835).

HAIR (שֵׂעָר, once שְׂעָר Is 7[20]; שְׂעָרָה; θρίξ, κόμη).—A luxuriant growth of hair on head and chin was regarded by the Hebrews and other Semitic peoples as an important constituent of manly grace. Absalom's long hair is noted as an element in his much prized beauty (2 S 14[26]). Solomon's youthful horsemen, 'in the most delightful flower of their age . . . had long heads of hair' (Jos. Ant. VIII. vii. 3). It was an admired distinction to have bushy (RVm 'curled') locks, 'black as a raven' (Ca 5[11]). The phrase גָּלָה אֹזֶן 'he uncovereth the ear' (1 S 20[2. 12] 22[8]), may possibly refer to long locks, covering the ear, pushed aside to whisper a secret. Among women, long dark tresses were held most captivating (Ca 7[5]), and they have always worn the hair long (Jn 11[2], 1 Co 11[5. 6]); but in NT times long hair was a dishonour to a man (1 Co 11[14]). Men dreaded baldness, as suggesting a suspicion of leprosy (Lv 13[40]), and this possibly explains the youths' disrespectful conduct to Elisha (2 K 2[23]).

Other Asiatics, and the Greeks, observed similar customs. The Babylonians wore their hair long, 'binding their heads with turbans' (Herod. i. 195). The Greeks loved rich waving hair; the youthful gods, Bacchus and Apollo, were figured with plenteous locks. The Egyptians, on the other hand, shaved both head and face. To be unshaven marked the sloven; if, however, this was due to hardships of war, it was honourable (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, ii. 330). Enslaved foreigners were forced to shave (Gn 41[14]). The long-haired Asiatics and Greeks excited among the Egyptians both ridicule and disgust (Herod. ii. 37, 49, 91). Boys' heads were shaven very early. Herodotus accounts for the strength of Egyptian skulls by their exposure, clean-shaven, to the full glare of the sun (Herod. iii. 12). The locks in front of the ears were preserved, as the sign of immaturity, and removed when manhood was reached. These locks are represented on the statues of Harpocrates and other younger deities (Wilk. iii. 130). Adult princes wore a badge at the side of the head, which perhaps contained the youthful lock in earlier days, and continued to indicate that while the father lived they had not attained the dignity of kinghood (ib. iii. 326). Large use was made of false hair, in wigs (ib. ii. 229) and in beards, to the forms of which special significance attached (see BEARD). Women wore their own hair, plentiful growth being highly esteemed. A woman's head was never shaved; but the locks, when long and beautiful, were sometimes cut off and preserved, to be laid in her tomb after death (ib. ii. 21 n.). The slave-woman's hair was differently dressed from that of her mistress (ib. ii. 338, 339). Moslem influence has modified Egyptian customs. In shaving the heads of men and boys a tuft is left on the crown; the cheek above the under jaw is shaven, and the part under the chin. The moustache is left unshaven. Female infants are never shaved; and women wear their hair long, usually in plaits and ringlets.

Of the terms used for dressing the hair, and the fashions of wearing it among the Hebrews, we may note the following:—מַהֲלָפוֹת, LXX σειραί (Jg 16[13. 19]), of Samson's 'seven locks,' which probably resembled the long 'plaits' affected now by the young Arab warriors. Jezebel 'tired her head,' וַתֵּיטֶב (2 K 9[30]), which means simply that she set her hair in order. צַמָּה 'locks' (Ca 4[1. 3] 6[7], Is 47[2] AV, following Kimchi; RV, following LXX [in Ca σιώπησις, in Is κατακάλυμμα], tr. 'veil'). עָנָק (Ca 4[9]), literally 'collar' or 'necklace,' may have been a lock falling round the neck—Vulg. in uno crine colli tui. תַּלְתַּלִּים (Ca 5[11]), LXX ἐλάται, Vulg. elathæ palmarum, tresses hanging gracefully like the pendulous palm branches. תָּלָה (Ca 7[5]; compare Is 38[12]), is a figure supplied by the thrum, or slender threads binding the web to the weaver's beam. רְהָטִים (Ca 7[5]; compare Gn 30[38. 41]), probably 'gutters,' or channels conveying water to the flocks, their orderly arrangement suggesting flowing tresses. מַעֲשֶׂה קְקָשָׁה (Is 3[24]), literally 'turned work,' applied to curls, or artificially twisted hair. צִיצִת 'a lock,' probably the forelock, from the curve resembling that of a flower or wing. Judith 'braided,' διέταξε, 'the hairs of her head' (10[3]). For other references to modes of wearing the hair, see 1 Ti 2[9], 1 P 3[3], Jos. Ant. XIV. ix. 4, and BJ IV. ix. 10.

That the barber's trade was practised we know from Ezk 5[1]. The hairdresser and the instruments of his art figure in the Mishna (Shabbath, § 6). The Egyptians used wooden combs, with large teeth on one side and small on the other, ornamented as if for wearing in the hair (Wilk. ii. 349). Ointment was commonly used by the Hebrews in dressing the hair (Ru 3[3], 2 S 14[2], Ps 92[10] 133[2], Ec 9[8], Mt 6[17], Jos. Ant. XIX. iv. 1). Anointing the hair was a sign of festivity (Ps 45[7]) and a mark of hospitality (Ps 23[5], Lk 7[46]). Solomon's young horsemen produced striking effects by sprinkling their heads with gold dust every day (Jos. Ant. VIII. vii. 3). Herod the Great dyed his hair to conceal his great age (Ant. XVI. viii. 1); but the practice was unusual (Mt 5[36]). Wigs were not unknown (Jos. Vita, 11). Orientals have from of old worn ornaments in the hair. It is doubtful if שְׁבִיסִים (Is 3[18]), LXX ἐμπλόκια, were 'networks' (RVm) or sun-shaped ornaments, distinguished from the crescent or moon-shaped, mentioned in the same verse (Schrœder, De Vest. Mul. Heb. cap. 2). To-day coins are most used by women: the long plaits often worn have frequently one or more gold pieces dangling at the end. A blue bead knotted into the hair of children is a potent charm against the evil eye.

The Hebrews were forbidden to cut off the corners of their hair (Lv 19[27]). They may have adopted the Egyptian practice of wearing the front locks in youth, removing them on the threshold of manhood. But neighbouring peoples attached a religious significance to this act. The Arabians cut their hair in imitation of Orotal—the Arabian Bacchus—'in a circular form, shaving it round the temples' (Herod. iii. 8). This usage is referred to in Jer 9[26] 25[23] 49[32]. The young man wore his front locks untouched; their removal marked his entrance into man's estate, and his initiation into the worship of Orotal. Among the Bedawîn to-day the front locks are found only on growing lads. The Greek ephebi offered the long hair of their childhood at Delphi; the cut adopted was called θησηίς, as the god was said to have cut only his front locks here. The Hebrews were thus distinguished from the idolatrous peoples around them. A curious evidence of this ancient prohibition is seen among the Palestinian Jews, who closely crop the whole head, leaving only the two locks in front of the ears, which hang down in long ringlets by either cheek.

The first hair has often been held sacred. In Arabia, in Mohammed's time, when a child was born its head was shaved, and the scalp daubed with the blood of a slaughtered sheep. Lane noted that at the first shaving of a boy's head the Egyptian peasants slew a goat, and all who cared partook of the feast provided. These were 'the more recent settlers, whose pagan Arabian ancestors . . . gave as alms to the poor the weight of the hair in silver or gold' (Lane, Mod. Egyp. 573). Burckhardt observes that 'among the Maazy Arabs . . . it is a festival in the family when the son's head is shaved for the first time.' Lucian says the Syrian boys and girls of his time, on growing up, cut off and dedicated their first hair at some sanctuary. Phœnician maidens, as a preliminary to marriage, had to sacrifice either their hair or their chastity at the feast of Byblus. Lv 19[27] is rendered in the Syriac 'ye shall not let your hair grow long,' and it is explained that the custom of the heathen was 'to let the hair grow for a certain time, and on a fixed date to shave the head in a temple or beside a fountain.'

Herodotus mentions the Egyptian custom of dedicating the weight in silver of the hair taken from a child's head (ii. 65). A similar custom among the Arabs is traced to the example of Fâtima. Absalom's abundant tresses, cut, collected, and weighed 'at every year's end,' the sacred season of pilgrimage, may suggest some similar religious observance. The one clear biblical instance of hair in an offering is in connexion with the Nazirite vow. The hair must grow and be kept from all pollution during the period of consecration: the bushy locks were the visible sign of the Nazirite's condition. Contact with impurity necessitated the shaving and sanctifying of the head, and the period of consecration began afresh. When the vow was accomplished, the head was shaved at the door of the Tent of Meeting, and the hair burned in the fire under the sacrifice of peace-offerings (Nu 6[1-21]). In Mohammedan law, the resolve to visit a distant shrine is reckoned a vow; and the hair must be neither cut nor even washed, until the purpose is accomplished. Then by cutting the hair the pilgrim passes back from the consecrated to the common condition (Wellhausen, Skizzen, iii. 117). Examples are found in St. Paul's vow (Ac 18[18]), and that of Bernice (Jos. BJ II. xv. 1). A parallel may be traced between this latter and the Greek custom of vowing to offer the hair to the gods in return for help or protection. Achilles dedicated his hair to the river-god Spercheus, on condition of his safe return from Troy. At the great feasts of Byblus and Bambyce offerings of hair were made (Dea Syria, VI. lv.). The painted inscription at Citium (CIS 86) mentions גלבים 'barbers' among the regular ministers of the sanctuary. The idea more or less consciously underlying these practices probably was, that by means of his hair, part of himself, instinct with his life, the devotee formed a stable link of connexion with the sanctuary and the deity there worshipped.

If an important part of life was conceived as residing in the hair, we can see why that of consecrated persons was so cared for. From Ezk 44[20] we gather that certain priesthoods, like those of Egypt, shaved their heads; others, like Samuel, let the hair grow long. Profanation was avoided on the one hand by preventing its growth, on the other by keeping it untouched. Princes were also consecrated persons. נֵזֶר 'a crown' (Jer 7[29] RVm) is in origin simply the fillet binding the prince's long hair.

Among the Hebrews, Arabs, and other peoples, cutting the flesh was often associated with shaving the head in mourning, or taking part of the hair to lay in the tomb, or on the funeral pyre. Both practices are prohibited in Lv 19[27. 28] (see also Dt 14[1], Lv 21[5. 10], Am 8[10] etc.). See CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH, and W. R. Smith, RS 305 ff. Arab women, in accordance with immemorial customs, sometimes shave their heads and wrap the hair in cloths stained with their own blood. The habit of tearing the hair in mourning, which still persists among the Jews and other Oriental peoples, may probably be traced to this ancient custom. It was also a sign of mourning to let the hair fall untended and dishevelled (Ezk 24[17], Jth 10[3]). The Egyptians in mourning let all their hair grow (Herod. ii. 36). The hair of an attached relative was sometimes buried with the mummy (Wilk. ii. 339). Cutting or tearing the hair was common as an expression of violent emotion, as of fear and distress (Est 14[2]), of sorrow for national sin (Ezr 9[3], 1 Es 8[71], 2 Es 1[8]), and of grief over national calamities (Is 3[24] 15[2], Jer 7[29] 48[37], Ezk 7[18] etc.).

The hair and nails of the dead have often been regarded as charms, making it possible to maintain connexion with the departed. Possession of a man's hair in primitive magic was esteemed a potent means of getting and retaining a hold upon him. Mohammed's hair was preserved, and worn on their persons by his followers. The Arab was accustomed to cut off the hair of his prisoner before setting him free. Perhaps more than insult was intended by shaving David's messengers (2 S 10[4]).

The almond blossom turning white before it falls is the symbol of the hoary hair (Ec 12[5]). The sprinkling of grey hairs unknown to a man indicates the stealthy approach of life's winter (Hos 7^9). Grey hairs have always been revered in the East. Irreverence to grey hairs marks the ungodly (Wis 2^{10}). Evil was accentuated if it brought harm on grey hairs (Gn 42^{38}). Wisdom was reckoned as the grey hair to a man (Wis 4^{10}), and the hoary head as a crown of glory, the reward of a life of righteousness (Pr 16^{31} 20^{29}). For grey hairs to come down to the grave in peace was a token of God's favour (1 K $2^{6.\ 9}$). Grey hairs laid on men obligations of honourable and chivalrous conduct (2 Mac 6^{23}). White hair was an element in a glorious appearance (2 Mac 15^{13}), especially that of divine majesty (Dt 7^8, Rev 1^{14}).

The hair of Samson was regarded as the seat of his strength (Jg 16^{22}). The hairs of the head are taken as representing the extremely numerous (Ps 40^{12} 69^4), and the exceedingly minute (1 S 14^{45}, 2 S 14^{11}, 1 K 1^{52}, Mt 10^{30}, Lk 21^{18}, Ac 27^{34}). Fineness of aim is described as slinging stones at an hairbreadth (Jg 20^{16}). The Jews swore by the hair (Mt 5^{36}). One of the most binding oaths in the East now is by the beard. The colour of the hair assisted the priest to discriminate leprosy from other ailments (Lv 13). Pollution clung strongly to hair (Lv $14^{8.\ 9}$). On the meaning of the regulation in Dt 21^{12}, see Driver's note.

Goats' hair (עִזִּים) is named among acceptable offerings for the sanctuary (Ex 25^4 35^6); it was not used for the interior work, but only for the outer covering of the tabernacle (Ex 26^7 36^{14}). The preparation of the cloth required special skill and dexterity (Ex 35^{26}). Work of goats' hair is directed to be purified after ceremonial pollution (Nu 31^{20}). From the connexion here, it seems to have been employed then, as now, for articles of clothing. The large overall, or 'abâ', commonly worn, is almost invariably of goats' hair. It serves, among other purposes, as waterproof in rain, as great-coat in cold, and as blanket at night: it possibly corresponds to the 'garment' of Ex 22^{27} (RV). Pillows or cushions are sometimes stuffed with goats' hair (1 S 19^{13}). Goats' hair formed the material with which St. Paul was occupied as a tent-maker (Ac 18^3), the haircloth for which his native province of Cilicia was noted being known to commerce as cilicium. Of this dark-brown stuff the tents of the nomads have been made from of old (Ca 1^5), and employment is still found for great numbers in preparing materials for the 'hair houses' of the Bedawîn.

Camels' hair (θρὶξ καμήλου) is mentioned only as forming the raiment of John the Baptist (Mt 3^4, Mk 1^6). This was possibly the softer wool of the camel, the Arab. wabr, of which a more closely fitting garment is made, with sleeves, worn under the 'abâ' described above (but cf. Jerome, 'non de lana cameli, sed de asperioribus setis').

HAJEHUDIJAH occurs in RVm of 1 Ch 4^{18} in an obscure genealogical list. It is the transliteration of the Heb. הַיְּהוּדִיָּה, which, however, probably is not a proper name, but means 'the Jewess' (so RV and RVm). AV reads Jehudijah. LXX has αὕτη Ἀδειά. See GENEALOGY.

HAKKATAN (הַקָּטָן 'the smallest').—The head of a family of returning exiles (Ezr 8^{12}), called in 1 Es 8^{38} Akatan. See GENEALOGY.

HAKKOZ (הַקּוֹץ).—1. A Judahite, 1 Ch 4^8; AV Coz. 2. The eponym of a priestly family, 1 Ch 24^{10}, Ezr 2^{61} 7^{63}, Neh $3^{4.\ 21}$. In Ezr and Neh the first part of the word is taken to be the definite art. by AV, which reads Koz. In 1 Es 5^{38} the name appears as Akkos. See GENEALOGY.

HAKUPHA (חֲקוּפָא).—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2^{51}, Neh 7^{53}), called in 1 Es 5^{31} Achipha. See GENEALOGY.

HALACHA.—See TALMUD.

HALAH (חֶלַח) is mentioned 2 K 17^6 18^{11}, 1 Ch 5^{26} as one of the places whither the king of Assyria deported the captives from Samaria. LXX Ἀλάε B (once Αλλάε A), in Ch Χαάχ (! for Χαλά), A Χαλά, Vulg. Hala, in Ch Lahela (!). The description indicates plainly that it is to be sought in Northern Mesopotamia, not far from Nineveh; but the location of the name has always been disputed. The various views are: 1. That Halah is a large city of Assyria, the Calah (כָּלַח) of Gn 10^{11}, Kalkhu of the cuneiform texts, modern Nimrûd between the Tigris and the Upper Zâb, S. of Nineveh (see CALAH). This identification is quite inadmissible on phonetic grounds, as is likewise 2., Halévy's comparison with Cilicia, חלך Khilakku. The latter has also the context against it. 3. The region Chalkitis (Χαλκῖτις) in Mesopotamia (Ptol. v. 18. 4), bordering upon Gauzanitis (Gozan) and the country Anthemusia, near the rivers Chabôras (Habor) and Saokoras (or Mygdonius), would suit (so Schrader in Riehm, Handwörterbuch), if we were sure that the Greek form represents the same consonants as Halah. Of course, the modern village Gla, on the Upper Chaboras (Smith, Bible Dict.), cannot represent the name nor the modern Ḥolwan (see below). 4. Bochart (Phaleg iii. 4) compared the Calachene (Καλαχήνη) of Strabo (736, comp. Καλακινή, Ptol. vi. 1), a plain of Northern Assyria at the side of Adiabene and Armenia, E. of the Tigris. 5. This name is not to be confounded with the Chalonitis S.E. of Assyria on the Zagrus mountain (Strabo, 529, 736; Plin. vi. 30, i. 27, 31, etc.; Dion. Perieg. 1015; Polyb. v. 54). Isidorus of Charax describes the Parthian province of Χαλωνῖτις, called thus from 'the Greek city Χάλα.' This is evidently the same as Κελῶναι, Diod. xvii. 110, Albania, Tab. Pent., the modern Ḥolwan حلوان. It is claimed that this city appears in Syriac literature as Ḥalaḥ (=חלח, Assem. Bibl. Or. iii. 418), and the Καλχάς, Chron. Pasc. i. 730, would confirm this. But there are various difficulties attached to this complicated identification, and the Assyrians seem to call Holwan Ḫalwan; see Delitzsch, Paradies, 205. 6. More probability is attached to the view of Winckler (Alttestamentliche Untersuchungen, 108). The LXX understood Halah as a river, ἐν Ἀλάε καὶ ἐν Ἀβώρ, ποταμοῖς (!) Γωζάν, so that the original text may have had the plural 'rivers of Gozan.' Consequently, Winckler proposed the easy emendation בלח for חלח, i.e. the modern Balîkh river (already called Balikhi in Assyrian times, Βάλιχα, Βήλιχος, Βίληχα, Belias of the classical writers), flowing into the Euphrates not far from Rakka. This view has been accepted by most modern scholars. 7. Lately, however, Winckler himself has retracted it (Altorientalische Forschungen, 292). Two cuneiform documents mention a country Khalakhkha, Ḫalaḫḫa, i.e. חלח near Haran, in the very same region where the biblical description would place Halah. The exact position cannot yet be determined, owing to the fragmentary state of those documents; but it seems that this last explanation is the best solution of the problem. Possibly, also, the 6th explanation still deserves some attention.

W. MAX MÜLLER.

HALAK (הָהָר הַחֹלָק 'the smooth mountain,' Jos 11^{17} 12^7 (only). — This eminence has not been identified, but its approximate locality is indicated by the words 'that goeth up to Seir': and it formed the southern limit of Joshua's conquests. We may infer, therefore, that it was the summit of a smooth ascent in the valley of the Arabah to the south of the Ghôr, or Dead Sea basin; and some have supposed that it was the line of cliffs which form the margin of the Ghôr itself, about 6 miles S. of the shore of that lake. This view is, however, probably erroneous, as the expression 'smooth mountain' would not apply to an abrupt range of cliffs formed of alluvial materials, which we have elsewhere (see DEAD SEA, vol. i. p. 575[a]) identified as 'the ascent of Akrabbim' (Nu 34[4]). But from the margin of the Ghôr the Arabah Valley gradually rises towards the summit level, which it reaches immediately in front of Mount Hor on the borders of Seir; and to this line of elevation the term 'smooth' would not be inapplicable, while at the same time it would be on the line of communication between southern Palestine and Petra, the capital of Seir.

E. HULL.

HALE.—The verbs 'hale' and 'haul,' meaning to drag, are, says Skeat, dialectical varieties of the same word. They are found in all the Teut. languages (as Dutch halen, Dan. hale), and are etymol. connected with Gr. καλεῖν and Lat. calare, to summon. Hale is the older form, and it alone occurs in AV and in Shaks.,* though 'haul' was already in use. The passages are Ac 8[3] 'As for Saul, he made havoc of the church, entering into every house, and haling men and women committed them to prison' (σύρων, Amer. RV 'dragging'); Lk 12[58] 'lest he hale thee to the judge' (μήποτε κατασύρῃ, Amer. RV 'drag'). In both places 'hale' is original to AV, the earlier VSS having 'draw.' For the word cf. T. Lever, Sermons (Arber's ed. p. 23), 'This Realme is devyded in it selfe . . . by covetouse ambicion, euerye manne pullynge and halynge towardes them selves, one from another'; T. Fuller, Holy State, ii. 7, 'It [the Greek language] is full and stately in sound: onely it pities our Artist to see the vowels therein rackt in pronouncing them, hanging oftentimes one way by their native force, and haled another by their accents which countermand them'; and Milton, PL ii. 596—

> 'Thither by harpy-footed furies hal'd,
> At certain revolutions all the damn'd
> Are brought.'

J. HASTINGS.

HALHUL (חַלְחוּל).—A city of Judah mentioned (Jos 15[58]) in the list of the inheritance of the tribe of Judah along with five others, all of which have been identified except Eltekon. Jerome places it near to Hebron (Onomast. s. 'Elul'). It is the modern Ḥalḥul, a large village 4 miles north of Hebron, which lies in the mountains of Judah, on a hill about a mile to the east of the road to Jerusalem. On the opposite side of the road is Beit-sur (Beth-zūr), a rocky fastness built by Rehoboam for the defence of his kingdom (2 Ch 11[7]), and used in the wars of the Maccabees as a defence against Idumæa (1 Mac 4[61]). Between these two places, lower down, is the fountain Dhirweh, the traditional site of the baptism of the eunuch by Philip. Not far to the north is the head of Pilate's great aqueduct leading to Jerusalem, 41½ miles by the aqueduct (13 miles as the crow flies), the fall being 365 ft. in that distance (Tent Work in Palestine, 'Halhul'). A mile to the east of Ḥalḥul is Beit 'Ainûn, identified by Robinson as Beth-anoth, where are extensive ruins and large drafted stones. Farther to the north is Jedûr (Gedor), a small ruin. About the site of Ḥalḥul are ruins and rock-cut tombs, including a Byzantine ruin and an ancient church (ruined). The mosque Neby Yunâs (Jonah) is a modern building on a platform of rock, which appears to have been artificially levelled (BRP i. 216, iii. 282; SWP iii. 329). Ishak Chelo in 1334 (Carmoly, p. 242) speaks of Ḥalḥul as containing the sepulchre of Gad, David's seer (1 S 22[5], 2 S 24[11]; Benj. of Tud. by Asher, ii. 437). See, further, Dillm. on Jos 15[58], and Guérin, Judée, iii. 284 ff.

C. WARREN.

* Pope gives 'hauld' in his Shaks. at II Henry IV. v. v. 37, and it is approved by some editors. In Ac 8[3] AV of 1611 spells the word 'hail.'

HALI (חֲלִי).—A city belonging to the tribe of Asher, Jos 19[25]. The site is doubtful. It may be the ruin 'Alia on the hills N.E. of Achzib, about 13 miles N.E. of Acre. See SWP vol. i. sh. iii., and Guérin, Galilée, ii. 62. Buhl (GAP 231) doubts this identification.

C. R. CONDER.

HALICARNASSUS ('Αλικαρνασσός) was one of the six Dorian colonies on the coast of Caria (see COS). Trœzen was its mother city. Though excluded from the Dorian confederacy (Hexapolis) on account of some ancient dispute (Herod. i. 144), it was a very important city in respect of politics, commerce, literature, and art. During the Persian domination it prospered greatly under a dynasty of tyrannoi established by Lygdamis. His widow, Artemisia, dynast in 480, possessed great influence with Xerxes. Maussollos (377–353) made the city supreme over most of Caria and part of Lycia, under the suzerainty of the Persian king. The monument built in his honour by Artemisia, his sister-wife, who survived him, was reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world: scanty remains of it are now in the British Museum. Halicarnassus, having faithfully adhered to the Persian cause, endured a long siege by Alexander the Great, B.C. 334, and was burned by the conqueror. A number of the inhabitants were safe in the acropolis (called Salmakis), which Alexander did not succeed in capturing. They rebuilt the city; but it never again became a great city, though always* an important one till it was ruined by the Turks. Its prosperity benefited much from the measures of Q. Cicero when he was governor of Asia in B.C. 61. Its silver coinage ceased after B.C. 168; but it continued to coin in bronze as late as the 3rd cent. after Christ, and appears in all the lists of bishoprics. In literature its greatness is shown by Herodotus, Dionysius the historian, Dionysius the writer on music, Pigres, Panyasis, etc.

Halicarnassus was one of the states to which the Roman Senate sent letters in favour of the Jews in B.C. 139, 1 Mac 15[23] (see CARIA). It must therefore have been a free and self-governing city at that time. The decree of the city passed in the 1st cent. B.C., granting to the Jews religious liberty and the right to build their Proseuchai beside the sea (Jos. Ant. XIV. x. 23), attests the existence of an early Jewish colony in the city; and this was natural, as H. was a considerable centre of trade, owing to its favourable position on a bay opposite Cos, on the north-west side of the Ceramic Gulf. The city extended round the bay from promontory to promontory, and contained, among other buildings, a famous temple of Aphrodite.

The site of Halicarnassus is now called Bodrum (i.e. 'fortress'), from the Castle of St. Peter which was built by the Knights of St. John (whose headquarters were in Rhodes) under their Grand Master de Naillac, A.D. 1404. The castle stands on the point of a lofty rocky promontory, which projects southwards, and divides the bay of Halicarnassus into two harbours; in ancient times it was probably an island (Zephyria). A Turkish village occupies part of the site of the city. In the castle were found many remains of the Mausoleum, which were sent to London in 1846 by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. A very full account of the city, with plans, etc., is to be found in the works of Sir C. Newton, who excavated there in 1857. HALL.—In Mk 15^{16} AV renders ἔσω τῆς αὐλῆς ὅ ἐστιν πραιτώριον, 'into the hall called Prætorium'; and in Lk 22^{55} ἐν μέσῳ τῆς αὐλῆς, 'in the midst of the hall.' Elsewhere AV renders αὐλή either 'palace' (Mt $26^{3.\,58.\,69}$, Mk $14^{54.\,66}$, Lk 11^{21}, Jn 18^{15}), when the reference is to the place where a governor dispensed justice; or 'fold' (Jn $10^{1.\,16}$), referring to the place where the flocks were kept all night; or 'court' (Rev 11^{2}), in reference to the court of the temple. RV gives 'court' everywhere except in Jn $10^{1.\,16}$ (10^{1} ἡ αὐλὴ τῶν προβάτων, AV 'the sheepfold,' RV 'the fold of the sheep,' 10^{16} ἡ αὐλή, AV and RV 'the fold'). See PALACE.

* The language of Cicero, ad Quint. Fr. I. i, 25 (pœne desertam urbem), must not be pressed; he is exaggerating his brother's services.

The word πραιτώριον is once in AV tr^{d} 'Prætorium' (Mk 15^{16} as above), and once 'palace' (Ph 1^{13} ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ, AV 'in all the palace,' AVm 'Cæsar's court,' RV 'throughout the whole Prætorian guard,' RVm 'in the whole Prætorium'). Elsewhere it is rendered either 'common hall' (Mt 27^{27}, AVm 'governor's house'), or 'hall of judgment' (Jn 18^{28a}, AVm 'Pilate's house'), or 'judgment hall' (Jn $18^{28b.\,33}$ 19^{9}, Ac 23^{35}). RV gives 'palace' in the text of all those places, with 'Prætorium' in the marg., which Amer. RV prefers in the text. See PRÆTORIUM.

The RV word 'palace' for prætorium comes from the Rhem. NT, which has 'Palace' everywhere, except Ph 1^{13} 'court.' Wyclif's word is always 'moot (or mote) halle.' Tind. introduced 'judgement hall.' J. HASTINGS.

HALLEL (הַלֵּל).—A name given to the group of psalms 113–118 inclusive, which the Jews from an early date have been in the habit of reciting at the three great feasts, at the feast of Dedication and at the new moons. The name 'great Hallel' is sometimes given to this group as a whole, but it is usually applied to Ps 136 (or Pss 120–136) with its twenty-six times repeated refrain of praise. Pss 113–118, or 115–118, are called the 'Egyptian' or the 'common' Hallel. During the continuance of the temple the Hallel was recited on eighteen days in the year, but on one night alone, that of the passover. On that occasion it was taken in parts, Pss 113 and 114 being sung before the meal, just before the drinking of the second cup, and Pss 115–118 after the filling of the fourth cup. It is to this sacred song that reference is made in the phrase ὑμνήσαντες, 'when they had sung an hymn,' used of our Saviour and His disciples in Mt 26^{30} and Mk 14^{26}. See Delitzsch on Ps 113; Talmud, Sopherim 18, § 2; and compare Edersheim, The Temple and its Services. W. T. DAVISON.

HALLELUJAH (הַלְלוּיָהּ 'praise ye J",' Ἀλληλουιά). —The word occurs as a short doxology in the Psalms, usually at the beginning, as Ps 111. 112, or the end, as 104. 105, or both, as 135. 146–150; in 135^{3} use is different. Except 135, the H. psalms occur in three groups, 104–106; 111–113, 115, 117; 146–150; the 2nd being interrupted by Ps 114. 116. The consecutive occurrence of these psalms may be explained in two ways. (i.) H. was usually added to psalms only of a joyful character, and these might naturally be put together by the compiler, just as hymns of thanksgiving are often put together in our modern hymnbooks. But we see very little evidence in the Psalter of arrangement according to subject. It seems, therefore, more probable that they were taken as they stand from some previous collection or collections in which all the psalms were so marked; just as in a modern hymnary all the hymns taken from Hymns Ancient and Modern might be distinguished by Amen at the end. We have an even more complete example of taking the psalms en bloc from some other source without rearrangement in 'Songs of Ascents' (Ps 120–134). The occurrence of H. in Ps 106, after the doxology which closes Book iv., may be the insertion of a reviser, to make it agree with Ps 104. 105, which have the H. at the end, when the doxology had come to be regarded as part of the psalm. The H. psalms vary considerably in character. We find such different themes as the praises of the God of Nature (104), the God of Israel (105. 106), God who hears the prayer of the poor (113) and of the sufferer (116), the superiority of God to idols (115). That these psalms are late may be proved from (1) the fact that Jah is a contracted and later* form of Jahu, which occurs in the early forms Jesayahu, Jirmeyahu, as contrasted with the later forms which we know as Isaiah and Jeremiah; (2) the use of (generally) late grammatical forms as ־ for constr. state, as in $113^{5.\,7.\,9}$, ־ for יֶשׁ, as a prefix in 135^{2} $146^{3.\,5}$; (3) the didactic character of 111^{10} 112, in the spirit of Ps 1, the Book of Job, and later parts of Proverbs; (4) the subject-matter of such a psalm as 147, which points back to the Restoration (147^{2}); (5) the fact that the historical psalms, 105. 106, presuppose PJE, and were therefore composed after the first compilation of the Hex. (see HEXATEUCH). Notice in 105^{31} the lice of P, as well as, in 105^{34}, the locusts of JE; in 106^{17} Dathan and Abiram of JE, as well as, in $106^{30.\,31}$, Phinehas, God's avenger of P.

The word passed from OT to NT. In Rev 19^{1-7} it is the keynote of the song sung by the great multitude in heaven, and from the Jewish it found its way into the Christian Church.

HALLOHESH (חַלּוֹחֵשׁ 'the speaker of charms').—An individual or a family mentioned in connexion with the repairing of the wall (Neh 3^{12}, AV Halohesh) and the sealing of the covenant (Neh 10^{24}). See GENEALOGY.

HALLOW.—'Who,' says Trench, 'would now affirm of the verb "to hallow" that it is even obsolescent? yet Wallis two hundred years ago observed—"it has almost gone out of use" (fere desuevit).' He is condemning (in English Past and Present, p. 139 f.) the American Bible Union for dismissing from their new version words that have a suspicion of age upon them. And it is still quite true that 'hallow' as a biblical word is in active use, so that the Revisers felt no necessity for excluding it from either the NT of 1881 or the OT of 1885. In AV and RV it is used as a synonym for 'sanctify,' translating in OT some part of קָדַשׁ ḳâdash, and in NT twice rendering the verb ἁγιάζω (Mt 6^{9}, Lk 11^{2}, both in the Lord's Prayer). In the Apocr. the same Gr. verb is rendered 'hallow' in 1 Es 1^{3}, Jth 9^{13}, Sir 33^{9}, 1 Mac 4^{48}; and the Lat. verb sanctificare in 2 Es 2^{41} 5^{25}.

In the older versions it is more common. It is Wyclif's only word; thus Jn 17^{19} 'And I halwe my silf for hem, that and [1388 also] thei be halwid in treuthe'; He 2^{11} 'Sothely he that halowith, and thei that ben halowid, of oon alle.' So Tind. in

* See Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 149 ff., and Jastrow in Journal of Soc. of Bib. Lit. xiii. (1894), 101–127, and in ZAW, 1896, pp. 1–16. In these papers Jastrow further contends that the final יה in many Heb. proper names is not a form of the Divine name at all, but simply an emphatic affirmative.

Lv 27[18] 'If a man halowe a pece of his enhereted londe unto the Lorde, it shalbe set accordynge to that it beareth'; and in a marg. note on Dt 20[5] (where his text is, 'Yf any man have bylt a new housse and have not dedicate it'), he says, 'Dedicat: the levites, I suppose, halowed them as we doo oure shippes.' In a note to Lv 8[2] he spells the word 'holow'—'Hence the pope fett holowenge of chirches, alters, font, belles, and so forth.' Cov. has 'unhallow' in Ezk 44[19] 'they shal put of the clothes, wherein they have ministred . . . lest they onhalowe the people with their clothes.' In his Expositions (Parker Soc. p. 180) on 1 Jn 2[18-21] Tind. uses 'sanctify' and 'hallow' together as quite synonymous: 'Christ in the Scripture is called The Holy, because He only sanctifieth and halloweth us.' This quotation shows the origin of the word also: from A.S. hálig, holy, came hálgian, to make holy, middle-Eng. halyien, later halwe.

The words of Mt 6[9], Lk 11[2] are as old as Wyc. 'halowid be thi name,' and are found in all the versions except the Rhemish (1582), which has 'sanctified be thy name'; but the mod. editions of Rhem. (as 1898) have changed to 'hallowed be thy name.' J. HASTINGS.

HALT.—1. To be lame, to limp: Gn 32[31] 'He halted upon his thigh' (צֹלֵעַ עַל־יְרֵכוֹ, Amer. RV 'went halting'). The same vb. is tr[d] 'halt' in Mic 4[6. 7], Zeph 3[19] (Amer. RV always 'is lame'). T. Fuller (Holy State, iii. 15) says, 'Wounds in warre are most honourable: Halting is the stateliest march of a Souldier; and 'tis a brave sight to see the flesh of an Ancient as torn as his Colours.' And Rutherford, with a reference to Mic 4[6. 7], speaks of 'God's kirk' (Letters, No. xli.): 'He will have her going through a thousand deaths, and through hell, as a cripple woman, halting, and wanting the power of her one side, that God may be her staff.' The adj. 'halt' is given as the tr. of χωλός in Mt 18[8], Mk 9[45], Lk 14[21], Jn 5[3], though everywhere else (except Ac 14[8] 'a cripple' in AV and RV) the same adj. is rendered 'lame' (Mt 11[5] 15[30. 31] 21[14], Lk 7[22] 14[13], Ac 3[2] 8[7], He 12[13]). In Lk 14[21] RV gives 'lame,' but keeps 'halt' in the other three places. Tind. has 'halt' in Mt 11[5] 'The blynd se, the halt goo, the lepers are clensed.'

2. To stumble, to fail, Ps 38[17] 'For I am ready to halt,* and my sorrow is continually before me' (לְצֶלַע נָכוֹן, AVm 'ready for halting,' Del. [so Amer. RV] 'ready to fall,' with note, 'if God does not graciously interpose, he will certainly fall headlong'; Wellh.-Furness [in PB] 'on the verge of falling'); Jer 20[10] 'All my familiars watched for my halting' (שֹׁמְרֵי צַלְעִי, Streane, 'those who watch my side,' implying a reading צֵלַע, 'ribs,' 'side'; RV 'they that watch for my halting'; Cheyne, 'either laid traps for me, or waited for me to commit some error for them to take advantage of,' who points out that the phrase 'my halting' is taken[?] from Ps 35[15] 38[17]). To those two passages in AV the Eng. (not Amer.) RV adds Job 18[12] 'Calamity shall be ready for his halting' (לְצַלְעוֹ, AV and RVm 'at his side'), and Ps 35[15] 'But when I halted they rejoiced' (וּבְצַלְעִי, AV 'But in mine adversity'). Tindal in his exposition of Mt 5[17-19] (Expositions, Parker Soc. p. 38) shows us this meaning of 'halt' arising from the meaning already illustrated, 'I come not to destroy the law, but to repair it only, and to make it go upright where it halteth.' Then cf. Glanvill (Ser. 5), 'We have many observers, whose malice makes them critical and curious; they lay in wait for our haltings, and are glad at heart when they have caught an opportunity to revile us.' In Preface to AV 1611 the translators say of Roman Catholic scholars that they 'doe either make new Translations themselves, or follow new ones of other mens making, or note the vulgar Interpretor for halting.'

3. To waver, 1 K 18[21] 'How long halt ye between two opinions?' (אַתֶּם פֹּסְחִים; Amer. RV 'go ye halting'). The figure is the uncertain gait of one who is divided in mind between J" and Baal. The same verb is used in v.[26] of the irregular dance round the altar of Baal. Cf. Purchas, Pilgrimage, 343, 'Their religion halteth betwixt divers religions of the Turkes, Persians, and Christians of the Iacobite and Nestorian Sects.'

4. The mod. sense of come to a standstill, stop, does not occur in AV, but is introduced by RV into Is 10[32] 'This very day shall he halt at Nob' (לָעֲמֹד, AV 'remain'). J. HASTINGS.

HAM (חָם, Χάμ).—The name of one of Noah's three sons (Gn 10[1] etc.), and founder of one of the three great families into which the biblical ethnologists divide the world. There seems little doubt that this word is the Egyptian name of Egypt (Hier. Kem, sometimes p t' o-n-Kem, 'land of Egypt,' Demot. Kemi, Theb. Kēme, Bashm. Kēme, Memph. Khēme), and indeed in the poetical language of the Psalms the 'land of Ham' is a synonym for Miẓraim (105[23. 27] 106[22], cf. 78[51]; Brugsch, Geogr. Inschr. 73). The meaning of the word is 'black,' which appears in the Arab. aḥamm, fem. ḥammā, as well as in many Coptic derivatives (Peyron, Lex. Copt. 66). The origin of the appellation is to be found in the blackness of the soil of the Delta (Plutarch, de Is. et Osir. 33), since the Egyptians do not call themselves by this name, which corresponds with an epithet applied to rich soils generally (Ebers, Ægypten u. die Bücher Mose's, 55).

2. The narrative of Gn 9[21-24] has been analyzed with great ingenuity by Budde (Urgeschichte, 290 ff.), partly after the suggestions of Wellhausen, whose results are in the main as follows. The narrative is based on a document in which the place of Ham was occupied by Canaan; this is rendered practically certain by vv.[24. 25], in which Noah, perceiving what his youngest son had done unto him, proceeds to curse Canaan, who is mentioned no less than three times in Noah's speech (vv.[25-27]). It is therefore probable that in v.[22] 'Ham, the father of Canaan,' is a correction for 'Canaan' (cf. for the method 1 Ch 20[5]), and indeed these words show very clear signs of alteration. The family of Noah, then, according to the earlier account, consisted of Shem, Japheth, Canaan; and the legend accounts for the subjugation of the third to the two others, implying a state of things in which the word 'Canaanite' was synonymous with 'slave.' The act imputed to Canaan is that of a little boy, and hence chronological difficulties arise if the Noah of the story be identified with the Noah of the Flood. The three sons, moreover, represent nations occupying the same country (probably Canaan), whose mutual relation is accounted for by the story, but who do not appear to have been intended to represent the progenitors of the nations of the earth. While the name 'Shem' lends itself readily to interpretation, if a caste be signified ('men of name' or 'note,' whence 'name' or 'note' became personified), only vague conjectures can be made about the original import of 'Japheth'; but l. 16 of the Marseilles inscription shows us that we possess only an imperfect tradition of the caste-system in Semitic peoples.

3. The same ethnologist who made Noah the second founder of the human race had to divide the nations of the earth among his sons; the names Shem and Japheth being unknown except in this tradition, could be employed without difficulty; but the name 'Canaan' had very distinct import, and yet was too insignificant to count as one of the three world-races. For this name, therefore, in the ethnological table another known name was substituted, and the native name of Egypt lent itself well to this purpose. That Cush and Mizraim should be included under the name of Kemi need occasion no surprise, as these two nations were known conjointly; that Cush is made the eldest son (Gn 10^6) is perhaps due to Ethiopia being farthest from Palestine, but it may have political significance. That Canaan should be reckoned as Hamite has been thought strange, some accounting for it on the ground of national antipathy on the part of the Israelites, while others (e.g. Dillmann, ad loc.) thought it due to a tradition current in antiquity which made the Canaanites immigrants from the South. The above account of the introduction of the name Ham really gets rid of the difficulty; for Canaan's place having been taken by Ham, a place had to be found for Canaan, and this could only be in Ham's family. Ham's name was not substituted for Canaan's in the speech of Noah, partly perhaps owing to its repeated recurrence, partly perhaps because the curse of slavery could not be made to fall on the powerful nations represented by Ham's elder children. The recension of Gn which we have, where the father is made to sin, and one of the sons to receive the curse, shows us the difficulty solved as far as it was capable of solution.

4. The classification of Canaan under Ham led to a serious result for the ethnological table: whereas Canaan in the older scheme represented a subject caste, the name now had to include all the non-Israelitic inhabitants of Palestine, among whom were many races decidedly 'Semitic' in character, such as the Phœnicians. Some further difficulty was introduced by confusion between the Cush and the Cossaei, but the ground for making all the tribes mentioned in v.[7] etc. Cushites will probably remain hidden long. The Put (which see) are probably included with the Egyptians and Nubians as being in any case a southern race. The Egyptian classification of mankind compared by M. Lefébure (PSBA, 1887, p. 167 ff.), while it offers some slight analogy to that with which we are dealing, does not seem to explain the name 'Ham,' or throw any real light on the problems.

5. The name 'Ham' occurs in 1 Ch 4^{40}, where certain settlers at Gerar found the land quiet and well cultivated, because the previous inhabitants were 'from Ham.' Some of the Rabbis compared the statement in Jg $18^{7.27}$, where very similar language is used about people who lived 'after the fashion of the Sidonians' (also, according to the tables, Hamites, through Canaan), and indeed the passage of Ch would seem to be modelled on that of Jg. It is not, however, easy to render the words in Ch satisfactorily, since 'from Ham' should mean from the country called Ham, which is not here very intelligible, and 'of the children of Ham,' or 'from the days of Ham,' would not naturally be thus abbreviated. There is therefore ground for supposing the text corrupt, and indeed the Pesh. substituted מֵהֶם 'of them' for the מִן הָם of the text. An easier alteration is מנחם, supposing that word to have the sense of the analogous Syriac form מנחין 'peaceful, easy-going,' of which examples are given in Thes. Syr. col. 2314.

HAM.—According to Gn 14^5 Chedorlaomer and his allies smote the Zuzim (who may be the same as the Zamzummim of Dt 2^{20}) בהם. This last is vocalized in MT בָּהָם, which is represented by AV, RV 'in Ham.' Jerome (Quæst. in libr. Gen.) reads בְּחָם. Most of the VSS vocalize בָּהֶם, hence LXX ἄμα αὐτοῖς, 'with them.' Olshausen conjectures בְּחֲמָת 'in Hamath.' It is most probable that a proper name is intended. If 'Ham' be the correct reading, it is the name of a place that is otherwise unknown. Dillmann, following Tuch, suggests that it may have been the ancient name of the Ammonite capital Rabbath Ammon. The strange argument of Sayce (HCM 160 f.), that the form חָם points to a direct transcription of Gn 14 from a cuneiform document, is dealt with by Ball (SBOT, ad loc.).

J. A. Selbie.

HAM (חָם), Land of.—A poetical designation of Egypt, used in the Psalms in reference to the sojourn there of the children of Isr. (Ps $105^{23.27}$ 106^{22}); so also 'the tabernacles (RV 'tents') of H.' (Ps 78^{51}) stands for 'the dwellings of the Egyptians.' Probably in Heb. thought H. was here used as the name of the son of Noah rather than as a name for Egypt. Two derivations have been proposed for it: (1) The native name for Egypt itself was Kmt, in Coptic times pronounced Kêmi (hardly Khêmi), and strictly signifying the 'black land' or alluvial soil of the cultivable part, as opposed to the Deshert or 'red land,' i.e. the sandy deserts which enclosed Kêmi on all sides except the N. (2) The chief Priapic god of the Egyptians was sometimes called Menu (in Greek Min), but at other times probably Khem. If the latter reading is correct, it is almost identical with the name of the progenitor of the Hamitic peoples, and it is very remarkable that the most primitive sculptures hitherto found in Egypt represent this god (see Petrie's Koptos). Menu was especially worshipped on the important route from the coast of the Red Sea to Koptos, and this would impress the fact of his worship on the E. neighbours of Egypt. The characteristics of Menu are in accord with the shamelessness recorded of H. in Gn $9^{20ff.}$. The derivation from Kmt is improbable, for phonetic reasons.

HAMAN (הָמָן, Ἀμάν), the son of Hammedatha, appears in the Bk of Est as the enemy of the Jews, and the chief minister of Ahasuerus. He is described as the Agagite (Est $3^{1.10}$ etc.), but in the LXX as a Bugean (Βουγαῖος, 3^1 12^6), or a Macedonian (9^{24} 16^{10}). The Heb. term we should probably understand of a descent from the Amalekite king Agag (so Jos. Ant. XI. vi. 5, and Targ.), in which case the author of the book perhaps meant to contrast the descendant of Israel's ancient enemy with Mordecai, the descendant of Kish, the Benjamite. Provoked by Mordecai's refusal to bow before him, H. procured from the king a decree authorizing the massacre of all the Jews in the Persian dominions on the 13th Adar. He also prepared a gallows 50 cubits high for Mordecai. But queen Esther, having heard of the plot, invited H. and the king to a banquet, and there denounced H., who was forthwith hanged on his own gallows. The queen also obtained permission for her countrymen to defend themselves, and among other victims of the Jews' vengeance the ten sons of H. were slain and their bodies gibbeted.

In later times, at the Feast of Purim, it seems to have been customary to hang an effigy of H.; but as the gibbet was sometimes made in the form of a cross, riots between Jews and Christians were the result, and a warning against insults to the Christian faith was issued by the emperor Theodosius II. (Cod. Theod. XVI. viii. 18; cf. 21). The origin of the name H. is uncertain; Jensen connects it with the name of an Elamite divinity, Humman or Humban (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.).

HAMATH (חֲמָת 'fortress,' 'citadel,' or perhaps 'sacred enclosure,' see W. R. Smith, RS[1] 140 [ed.[2] p. 150]; Ἡμάθ, Ἐμάθ, Αἰμάθ, Emath).—At the time of Amos, this was the chief city of a kingdom of the same name which surrounded the capital, extending to the S. of Riblah and even including that place (2 K 23[33] etc.). Situated on the banks of the Orontes (now called el-ʿÂṣi), in a narrow valley with Jebel al-Aʿla on its north and south-east, and the Nusairîyeh mountains (the Mons Bargylus of the ancients) to the west, it lay on a very frequented and convenient trade-route. The opening between the Nusairîyeh mountains above Tripoli and the north point of the Lebanon chains is called in the OT 'the entrance of Hamath' (Nu 34[8], Jos 13[5], Ezk 47[18-21]). N. of Homs the Orontes pass leads to Hamath, S. toward Baal-gad in Cœle-Syria, E. to the great plain of the Syrian desert, and W. to the Kaʿat al-Hosn and the Mediterranean.

'The entrance' or 'the approach' to Hamath is often mentioned as a territorial limit (Nu 34[8], Jg 3[3] etc.), and usually denotes the accepted northern boundary of Israelitish dominion (Jos 13[5]). The province is called 'Great Hamath' (Am 6[2]), and is mentioned with Damascus, Tyre, and Zidon (Zec 9[2]), as well as with Arpad (Jer 49[23]), in the prophecies against Hadrach.

Originally a Hamite colony (Gn 10[18]), it flourished at the time of David (2 S 8[10]) under a king named Toi (or Tou), who had friendly intercourse with the Israelitish ruler. Hamath (possibly identical with Hamath-Zobah [which see] of 2 Ch 8[3]) came, however, afterwards under the dominion of Solomon (compare 1 K 9[21. 24] with 2 Ch 8[4]), and its king was no doubt among the many princes who 'brought presents and served Solomon all the days of his life.' Hamath was regarded as the granary of N. Syria, and there Solomon built store-cities (2 Ch 8[4]). But, on the death of that king, Hamath seems to have regained her independence, as is shown by the inscriptions of Shalmaneser II. (B.C. 860), where we see that her king, Irḫulēni, made an alliance with the Hittites, Damascus (under Addu-idri = Ben-Hadad = Ben-Hadad-hidri), Ahab of Israel, and several other states. Jeroboam II. of Israel, about the year B.C. 810, 'recovered Hamath' (2 K 14[28]) from Judah, and partly destroyed it, as well as Gath, which, in the prophecies of Amos, is spoken of along with it (Am 6[2]). In the Assyrian inscriptions Eni-îlu (Eniel), king of Hamath, brings tribute to Tiglath-pileser III. (730), who had parcelled out the land of Hamath among his generals, annexing 19 districts to Assyria, and transported 1223 people of Hamath to the sources of the Tigris. Sargon boasts of having rooted out the land of Hamath and dyed the skin of the foolish (?) Ilu-bi'di (variant Yau-bi'di) like wool, colonizing Hamath with 4300 Assyrians. One of those exiled thither by this king was the Mede Deioces. After what seems to have been the capture of the place by Sennacherib's Rabshakeh, or 'chief of the captains,' Hamath lost much of its importance. It is spoken of in Is 11[11] as one of the places containing Israelitish exiles, and is mentioned in 1 Mac 12[25] in connexion with the movements of Jonathan and Demetrius.

The Greeks and Romans knew it under the name of Epiphaneia, which had been given to it by Antiochus Epiphanes (Jos. Ant. I. vi. 2), though the inhabitants still called it Hamath, and its present name, Ḥamāh, is but slightly changed from its old form. In 1310 Abulfeda, the eminent Arabian scholar, a descendant of the family of Saladin, was appointed governor of the district, which had been under the Moslem power since A.D. 639, and with his death (1331) Hamath's prosperity declined.

In 1812 Burckhardt visited Hamath, saw the 'Hamath-stones' (so-called Hittite inscriptions in relief on black close-grained basalt); and the enormous water-wheels, used for bringing the waters of the Orontes to the houses and gardens situated on the hill above the river. He does not, however, mention the catacombs, said to have existed high up on the right bank. The town, which is divided into four quarters, Hadher, el-Jisr, el-Aleyat, and el-Medine (the quarter of the Christians), contained at Burckhardt's visit about 4446 houses and nearly 11,000 male inhabitants.

HAMATHITE (הַחֲמָתִי).—The gentilic name from HAMATH (which see), Gn 10[18] = 1 Ch 1[16].

HAMATH-ZOBAH (חֲמַת-צוֹבָה, B Βαισωβά, A Αἰμάθ Σωβά, Luc. Ἐμαθσουβά).—The identity of this city is still doubtful. By some scholars it is even regarded as the same as Hamath, but the Greek form Βαισωβά would seem to indicate that it was distinct from that place. It is mentioned only once in the Scriptures (2 Ch 8[3]), when Solomon is said to have 'prevailed against it,' and, being spoken of in connexion with Tadmor and Hamath, we may conclude that it was in the same neighbourhood. That it was another Hamath to which Zobah was added to distinguish it from the better-known city of Hamath is possible, but at present unprovable. It has not yet been found in the cuneiform inscriptions, consequently no light is thrown on it from that source. I. A. PINCHES.

HAMMATH (חַמַּת 'hot spring').—'Father of the house of Rechab,' 1 Ch 2[55]. See GENEALOGY.

HAMMATH (חַמַּת 'hot spring').—One of the 'fenced' cities of Naphtali, Jos 19[35], probably the same as Hammon of 1 Ch 6[76] [Heb. [61]] and Hammoth-dor of Jos 21[32]. It is doubtless the Ḥamata of the Talmud (Erubin, v. 5; Megillah, 2*b*), the Emmaus or Ammathus of Jos. (Ant. XVIII. ii. 3) and the modern Hammâm, 35 minutes' walk S. of Tiberias, so famous for its hot baths. There are four springs, the water of which reaches a temperature of 144° Fahr. The taste is described by Robinson as excessively salt and bitter, like that of heated sea-water; there is also a strong smell of sulphur, but no taste of it. The neighbourhood is crowded, especially in the month of July, with patients from all parts of Syria. The baths are considered to be very efficacious in rheumatic complaints.

HAMMEAH, THE TOWER OF, AV The tower of Meah (מִגְדַּל הַמֵּאָה, πύργος τῶν ἑκατόν, turris centum cubitorum, turris Emath), Neh 3[1] 12[39].—A tower on the walls of Jerus. which stood near the tower of Hananel (which see), between the Sheep gate on the east and the Fish gate on the west. These two towers, which apparently had not been pulled down when the walls were dismantled in the time of Ezra, were probably situated near the north-eastern corner of the city (cf. Jer 31[38], Zec 14[10]). Perhaps they were both defences of the fortress (bîrah) which commanded the temple area. The origin of the name 'tower of Hammeah,' or 'tower of the hundred' (RVm), is obscure. It has been suggested in explanation that the tower was 100 cubits high, or that it was approached by 100 steps, or that it required a garrison of 100 men (see Ryssel, ad loc., pp. 153, 201 f.). H. A. White.

HAMMEDATHA (הַמְּדָתָא, Αμάδαθος [?,-ης]), Est $3^{1.10}$ 8^{5} $9^{10.24}$).—The father of Haman. The name is probably Persian; for the termination compare Aridatha; possibly the etymology is mâh=moon+data=given (Oxf. Heb. Lex.).

HAMMELECH (הַמֶּלֶךְ) occurs as a proper name in AV and RVm of Jer 36^{26} 38^{6}, but there is little doubt that the rendering ought to be 'the king,' as in RV and AVm (LXX τοῦ βασιλέως).

HAMMER.—The Heb. word כַּקֹּבָה maḳḳâbâh (in Jg 4^{21} כַּקֹּבֶת) is tr. in Arab. by two words, mîtadat, a wooden mallet, and maṭraḳat, the ordinary Arabic word for a hammer. It was a mîtadat, a mallet used by the Bedawîn and others for driving tent pegs into the ground, which Jael used to kill Sisera, Jg 4^{21}. By many, maḳḳâbâh is considered to be the source of the name Maccabæus, which would thus mean 'the hammerer.' פַּטִּישׁ paṭṭîsh (Is 41^{7}, used fig. in Jer 23^{29} of the word of the Lord, and in 50^{23} of Babylon, 'the hammer of the whole earth') is evidently the same as the Arab. faṭîs, a large heavy hammer.

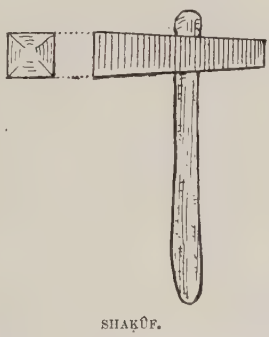
The hammer is probably the most ancient of all tools. In its original form, a stone held in the hand, it is often used at the present day. The form soon changed; a stick fastened to the stone gave the blow more precision and greater force. Metals superseded stones, and great variety was given to the shape of the hammer head, so as to produce a more exact effect. The hammer is a most important and valuable tool; the permanent effect produced by a blow of the lightest hammer is greater than that obtained by the steady pressure of a mass of iron many hundred times its weight.

MAHADDI.

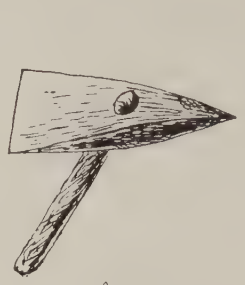
Different handicrafts require hammers of different shapes and weights, and, in Syria, each kind has a distinctive name. The hammers used in carpentry and smith work are much the same as those used in the same occupations in Europe. But in masonry the variety of hammers is great. In the quarry the rock is split by a large hammer, weighing from 18 to 22 lb., called the mahaddi. The head of this hammer is round at one end, being used for driving wedges into the rock. The other end is flattened from side to side, so as to confine the impact to a narrow line. This end of the hammer is used to strike the rock between the wedges, and the constant beating causes a vibration in the rock, which increases till it splits in the line of the wedges.



SHAḲÛF.

When the stone comes from the quarry, it is roughly shaped by the mahaddi, and the mason takes another kind of hammer to square it and give it a shape to fit it for building.

This hammer is called the shaḳûf. Both ends of the head of this hammer are square, but the one is 1 in. square and flat, the other is nearly 2 in. square, but sunk in the centre to the depth of half an inch, so that the edges are sharp. The flat end is used for striking off projections, while the end with sharpened edges is used for squaring and trimming the stone. The stone is often used for building after being trimmed by the shaḳûf, but sometimes a border is made round the face of the stone, leaving the middle rough.



BÎK. HEAD OF SHAḤÛTAH OR MINḤAT.

This is done by the bîk, which is a hammer with one end pointed, and the other flat and chisel-shaped.

When the stone is to be made smooth it is first made quite flat with the pointed end of the bîk, and is then worked over with a hammer called the shaḥûtah or minḥat.

The shaḥûtah has two very broad chisel-shaped ends, about 4 in. broad, cut into a number of teeth like a saw. The teeth at one end are coarse and about 12 in number, and at the other end smaller and about 24 in number.

When the stone has been carefully gone over with the shaḥûtah it is sometimes polished. This is done by rubbing it with another stone, sand and water being put between.

All these tools are of very ancient date. In the oldest part of the temple of Baalbek marks of all of these tools are found. Even the three immense stones in the west wall have their upper and under surfaces smoothed with the shaḥûtah, only the tool seems to have been much smaller than the one used in Lebanon at the present time, being only about 2 or 2½ in. broad.

MASON'S MAṬRAḲAT.

The hammer and chisel are used for very fine work, such as carving, or when a very sharp fine edge is to be given to a stone, seldom for any other purpose. The chisel is made of file steel. The hammer, called a maṭraḳat, is so shaped that lines drawn along the faces of the hammer would meet nearly at the end of the handle. Wooden mallets are never used.

The stone of Lebanon is very hard limestone, which explains why hammers are preferred to chisels in hewing it. W. Carslaw.

HAMMOLECHETH (הַמֹּלֶכֶת 'the queen'?).—Acc. to the genealogy in 1 Ch $7^{17.18}$ H. was the daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead. The correctness of the text is not beyond suspicion. LXX reads Μαλέχεθ. See Genealogy.

HAMMON (חַמּוֹן 'hot spring').—1. A town in Naphtali, 1 Ch 6^{76} [Heb. ^{61}], prob. identical with Hammath (which see). 2. A town in Asher, Jos 19^{28}. Its site is uncertain. Schultz suggested 'Ain Hamûl, some 10 miles south of Tyre, but Robinson (BRP[2] iii. 66 note) lays no great stress upon this identification. Renan (Mission de Phénicie, 708 ff.) found at Khurbet Umm el-'Amud, near the coast immediately N. of the Ladder of Tyre, two Phœnician inscriptions (CIS vol. i. pt. i.) in honour of Baal Hammon. In the valley to the E. is 'Ain Hamûl. Umm el-'Amûd, 'mother of the pillar,' includes the ruins of a building which is probably a temple of Baal. On the hill side lies a great sarcophagus with a rudely carved eagle. The texts belong to the Ptolemaic period (3rd cent. B.C.). The name may be that of the Egyptian God Amanu or Amen. See SWP vol. i. sh. iii., and vol. iii. Appendix. The identification of Hammon with Umm el-'Amûd is also considered by Guérin (Galilée, ii. 141) and Buhl (GAP 229) to be the most probable.

C. R. Conder.

HAMMOTH-DOR (חַמֹּת דֹּאר).—A Levitical city in Naphtali, Jos 21[32], probably identical with Hammath (which see).

HAMMUEL (חַמּוּאֵל, AV Hamuel).—A Simeonite of the family of Shaul, 1 Ch 4[26]. See Genealogy.

HAMONAH (הֲמוֹנָה 'multitude,' LXX Πολυάνδριον). —The name of a city to be built in commemoration of the defeat (?) of Gog (Ezk 39[16]). The passage is obscure, and the originality as well as the precise reading of the MT doubtful. Instead of וְגַם שָׁמָּה עִיר הֲמוֹנָה, Cornill would read וְנִכַּר הֲמוֹנָה 'and it is all over with this multitude.' If the words are an interpolation, the allusion may be to the city of Bethshean, which may have derived its name Scythopolis from the Scythian invasion in the 7th cent. B.C. (See Bertholet, Das Buch Hesekiel, 193).

J. A. Selbie.

HAMON-GOG (הֲמוֹן גּוֹג 'Gog's multitude,' LXX τὸ πολυάνδριον τοῦ Γώγ).—The name to be given to the valley (outside the Holy Land) where Gog and all his multitude are to be buried (Ezk 39[11. 15]). This valley, according to the MT, was the 'Valley of the Travellers' (הָעֹבְרִים), a designation which is not found elsewhere. Hence J. D. Michaelis, followed by Bertholet and many others, reads עֲבָרִים (Abarim, Nu 27[12] 33[47]). From the mountain of this name a valley may well have been called Abarim, and the locality suits the context. See further the Comm. of Hitzig, Smend, Cornill, Davidson, and Bertholet.

HAMOR (חֲמוֹר 'he-ass') appears in Gn 33[19] 34, Jos 24[32], Jg 9[28] as 'the father of Shechem,' a Hivite by race, and 'the prince (נָשִׂיא) of the land' (Gn 34[2]). Jacob bought 'the parcel of ground, where he had spread his tent,' from the Hamorites, the Benê Hamor (Gn 33[19] (J), cf. Jos 24[32]). A different tradition is preserved in Gn 48[22] (E), where Jacob gives Shechem to Joseph, and speaks of having won it by force of arms from the Amorite.

Dinah, Jacob's daughter, having been wronged by Shechem, Shechem makes an offer to take her as his wife; and is supported in his claim by his father, Hamor, who proposes also that there should be freedom of marriage between the families of Jacob and Hamor (34[14-17]). To this the sons of Jacob give their consent on condition that the Shechemites accept the rite of circumcision. The Shechemites agree to the terms, and are circumcised (v.[24]). On the third day, when the Shechemites were unable through illness to defend themselves, Simeon and Levi and their followers fell upon them, murdered Hamor and Shechem, and carried away Dinah to their own home.

In this narrative the narrator has combined two variant traditions. 'In the one, Hamor conducts the negotiations with Jacob regarding Dinah for his son (vv.[4. 6. 8-10]); he receives a reply (vv.[15-17]), and in due course lays it before the assembled citizens of the town for their approval (vv.[20-24]). In the other, Shechem himself asks Dinah from her father and brothers, and after their reply (v.[11f.]) immediately submits to the conditions they require (v.[19]).' The former is probably the narrative of P, the latter that of J.

That, under the imagery of events occurring in the history of a single family, the story preserves the recollection of important episodes in an early phase of the Israelite community, is a view which has been maintained, in recent years, by many scholars, and most ably, perhaps, by Wellhausen in his Composition des Hexateuchs (see especially pp. 312–319, 353–355). According to this view, Hamor and Shechem personify Canaanite clans in central Palestine; and Dinah a branch of the Israelite race, which settling in that region became rapidly merged with the native population. The attack by Simeon and Levi would then represent the recollection of some treacherous violation by these tribes of the terms upon which the new settlers had been welcomed and acknowledged.

The fact that Hamor means 'an ass,' and Shechem 'a shoulder' or 'a mountain-ridge,' makes it probable that we have in these names the appellatives of clans and families rather than of individuals. Mr. G. Buchanan Gray (Studies in Hebrew Proper Names, pp. 90, 99–115) has shown, as the result of investigating animal names, that 'before the amalgamation of the Hebrew tribes into a nation, totem worship and totem organization existed among some of the peoples of Canaan' (p. 115); and it is not unreasonable to connect such names as 'ass' (Hamor), 'wild ass' (Piram Jos 10[3], Anah Gn 36[2], Arad Jg 1[16]), 'mouse' (Achbor Gn 36[38]), with the 'totem-clans' among the early inhabitants of Canaan (cf. Jacobs, Biblical Archæology, pp. 64–103, on 'Totem-Clans in the Bible').

H. E. Ryle.

HAMRAN (חַמְרָן), 1 Ch 1[41] (AV Amram). — An Edomite. In Gn 36[26] the name is more correctly given as Hemdan (cf. Kittel in Haupt's SBOT on 1 Ch 1[41]).

HAMUL (חָמוּל 'spared'; on the form see Wellh. Sam. 19).—A son of Perez and grandson of Judah, Gn 46[12]=1 Ch 2[5], Nu 26[1]. The gentilic Hamulites (הַחֲמוּלִי) occurs in Nu 26[11].

HAMUTAL (חֲמוּטַל 2 K 23[31] and 24[18], Jer 52[1] according to MT vocalization. In these last two occurrences the consonants give the form Hamital חמיטל, and this is supported by LXX in all three cases: Ἀμειταλ, Μιτάτ, Ἀμειταάλ B, Ἀμιτάλ, Ἀμιτάθ, Ἀμιταάλ A, Ἀμιτάλ Luc., meaning possibly 'kin to the dew' or 'my kinsman (lit. husband's father) is the dew').—Mother of the kings Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, sons of Josiah. (See on the meaning of the name, Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 63; Hommel, Anc. Heb. Trad. 322).

C. F. Burney.

HANAMEL (חֲנַמְאֵל, perhaps for חֲנַן־אֵל 'El is gracious'; but see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 307, n. 2).—Jeremiah's cousin, the son of his uncle Shallum. It was from H. that Jeremiah, having the right of redemption, bought a field at Anathoth. Although Jerus. was besieged at the time, the purchase was readily made by the prophet because of his assurance that the time would come when property would once more be secure (Jer 32[7. 8. 9. 12. 44]).

J. A. Selbie.

HANAN (חָנָן, Ἀνάν).—1. One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in reading and explaining the Law to the people (Neh 8[7]). He is probably the same as the Levite Hanan who signed the covenant (Neh 10^{10} [Heb.^{11}]), as several of the Levit. names in this passage are found also in 8^{7}. The name is wanting in the LXX of 8^{7} and of 10^{10} (B א*); but in 1 Es 9^{48} we find Ananias (Ἀνανίας A, Ἄννας B). 2. The son of Zaccur the son of Mattaniah, one of the four treasurers appointed by Neh. over the storehouses in which the tithes were kept (Neh 13^{13}). He was probably a Levite, and perhaps represented the singers and porters; for in 11^{17} $12^{8.\ 25.\ 35}$ Mattaniah is named as a Levit. house representing the sons of Asaph. Others, however, regard H. as a layman. 3. A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8^{23}). 4. The youngest son of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch $8^{38}=9^{44}$). 5. One of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11^{43}). 6. The son of Igdaliah. The sons of H. had a chamber in the temple (Jer 35^{4}). 7. The head of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2^{46}, Neh 7^{49}). Called Anan in 1 Es 5^{30}. 8. 9. Two of 'the chiefs of the people' who sealed the covenant bore this name (Neh $10^{22.\ 26}$). See GENEALOGY. H. A. WHITE.

HANANEL (חֲנַנְאֵל 'El is gracious'). — The name of a tower on the wall of Jerusalem. It is four times mentioned in OT: in Neh 3^{1} in connexion with the repairing, and in 12^{39} in connexion with the dedication of the walls; in Jer 31^{38} and Zec 14^{10} as a boundary of the restored and glorified Jerusalem. In both the passages in Neh it is coupled with the tower of Hammeah (which see), and some have supposed it to be identical with the latter. From Neh 12^{39} we gather that these two (?) towers lay between the Sheep gate and the Fish gate, and from Jer and Zec that the tower of Hananel was at the N.E. corner of the city. Conder thinks that Hananel and Hammeah belonged to the 'castle' or 'fortress' (bîrah Neh 2^{8}, in Gr. βάρις, Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 3; BJ I. iii. 3, v. 4) of the temple. See JERUSALEM. Ryle (Ezr. and Neh. 173) also suggests that Hananel may have been 'an outwork of the great fortress at the point where the city wall ran into it.' A similar opinion is expressed by Buhl (GAP 141).

J. A. SELBIE.

HANANI (חֲנָנִי, Ἀνανί, Ἀνανίας Neh 7^{2}).—1. A brother, or more prob. near kinsman, of Neh., who brought tidings to Susa of the distressed condition of the Jews in Pal. (Neh 1^{2}). Under Neh. he was made one of the governors of Jerus. (7^{2}). The name is perhaps a shortened form of Hananiah. 2. A son of Heman (1 Ch 25^{4}). 3. The father of Jehu the seer (1 K 16^{1}). It was H. who, according to the Chronicler, reproved Asa for entering into alliance with Syria, and whom the angry king cast into prison (2 Ch 16^{7}). 4. A priest of the sons of Immer who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10^{20}). Called Ananias in 1 Es 9^{21}. 5. A chief musician mentioned in connexion with the dedication of the walls of Jerus. (Neh 12^{36}). H. A. WHITE.

HANANIAH (חֲנַנְיָה חֲנַנְיָהוּ 'J" hath been gracious'). —1. One of the prophets of the anti-Chaldæan party (LXX calls him ψευδοπροφήτης) in the reign of Zedekiah. His encounter with Jeremiah is related in Jer 28. A native of Gibeon, he was probably a priest (Jos 21^{17}), like Jeremiah himself, whose characteristic style he seems to imitate in his attack. He, too, stands in the temple (cf. 26^{2}), and, using Jeremiah's constant title for God, he prophesies the return from Babylon within two years (contrast Jeremiah's seventy, 25^{12}) of the temple vessels, Jeconiah, and the captives (contrast 22^{27} 27^{22}), and then, pointing to the yoke on Jeremiah's neck (27^{2}), he concludes as he had begun: 'I will break the yoke of the king of Babylon.' With sad irony Jeremiah replied: 'Amen; the Lord do so,' and then pointed out that, as the general tone of former true prophecy had been minatory, a prophecy of peace would need an accurate fulfilment to vindicate its divine origin. H. then repeated his oracle in symbolic form (cf. 19^{10}), breaking Jeremiah's yoke. Jeremiah retired in silence, but soon returned to tell H. that his breaking the wooden bar merely signified that Nebuchadnezzar's yoke would be of iron, and to announce H.'s death—the punishment of a lying prophet (Dt 18^{20}), who had spoken also rebellion against the Lord (Dt 13^{6}). Within two months H. died (Jer 28^{17}).

2. The first of Daniel's three companions (Dn 1^{6}). He received the name of Shadrach (whose meaning is much disputed; see Bevan, Comm. on Dan., p. 61). They joined Daniel in his ascetic resolve, and shared his triumph (1^{19}) and subsequent peril (2^{13}). Through their prayers ($2^{17\text{-}19}$) the king's dream was revealed to Daniel, and at his request (2^{49}) they were appointed 'over the affairs of the province of Babylon,' and still further promoted (3^{30}) after their miraculous deliverance from the fiery furnace. (In the Gr. interpolation after Dn 3^{23} Azariah is most prominent (Song of the three Children vv.$^{2.\ 26}$, contrast ^{66}). Their deliverance is alluded to 1 Mac 2^{59}, He $11^{33.\ 34}$. 3. See No. 2 in next article. 4. 1 Ch $3^{19.\ 21}$ a son of Zerub., identified by Lord A. Hervey with Joanan (Lk 3^{27}), Rhesa being a title of Zerub. which has crept into the text (Smith, DB s. GENEALOGY OF CHRIST). Bertheau conjectures that the six names in 1 Ch 3^{21} are all sons of H. 5. 1 Ch 8^{24} a Benjamite. 6. 1 Ch $25^{4.\ 23}$ a 'son' of Heman, leader of the 16th course of temple musicians. 7. 2 Ch 26^{11} one of Uzziah's captains who superintended the organization of the army. 8. Ezr 10^{28}, 1 Es 9^{29} Ananias, one of those 'that had married strange women.' 9. See No. 1 in next article. 10. Neh 3^{30} son of Shelemiah; one of those who repaired the wall, possibly = No. 9, and descendant of No. 13. 11. Neh 12^{12} a priest, chief of the course of Jeremiah, when Joiakim was high priest, possibly mentioned 12^{41} as present at the dedication of the walls. 12. Jer 36^{12} father of Zedekiah, who was one of the princes of Judah in the reign of Jehoiakim. 13. Jer 37^{13} grandfather of Irijah, 'a captain of the ward,' who apprehended Jeremiah on the charge of desertion to the Chaldæans. N. J. D. WHITE.

HANANIAH (חֲנַנְיָה Ἀνανιά, Ἀνανίας, 'J" has been gracious').—1. One of the guild of perfumers (AV apothecaries) who in the days of Neh. repaired a portion of the wall of Jerus., near the 'broad wall' (Neh 3^{8}). He is perhaps the same as H. the son of Shelemiah, who is mentioned as repairing another portion of the wall, near the E. gate (3^{30}). 2. The governor of the castle, i.e. of the bîrah, or fortress on the N. side of the temple. Neh., who describes him as 'a faithful man, and one that feared God above many,' appointed him one of the two officers in command of Jerus. (Neh 7^{2}).

HAND.—The word 'hand' is used in the Eng. versions of the Bible with a variety of meaning which can be but partially illustrated from other literature. This is due to the remarkable freedom with which the Heb. word יָד yâd is employed—a freedom which does not belong to χείρ to the same extent (though even in NT, chiefly through the influence of LXX, χείρ is found in some specially biblical meanings), so that the variety of usage is chiefly characteristic of OT.

It will conduce to clearness if, first of all, a résumé is given of the use of yâd in Heb., following Oxf. Heb. Lex.

1. The hand of man (Gn 3^{22} etc.), or anthropopathically of God (Ezk 8^{3}); including the wrist (Gn $24^{22.\ 30.\ 47}$ 38^{28} bis. $^{29.\ 30}$, Jg 15^{14}); standing for the finger alone (Gn 41^{42}, Est 3^{10}).

2. The hand as in use, as Gn 49^{24} 'arms of his hands,' i.e. arms which make his hands serviceable; 2 K 9^{24} 'he filled his hand with the bow,' i.e. seized it; and 'fill the hand' of the priest

=consecrate, install (perhaps from the idea of giving him the selected portions of the sacrifice : see FILL) ; a 'hand weapon' (lit. 'weapon of the hand') Nu 35[18] ; and idols the work of man's hand (Is 2[8]), as man is the work of God's hand (Job 14[15]). Special ways in which the hand is used are (1) to kiss the mouth (Job 31[27]) ; (2) to be laid on the mouth to express silence (Job 40[4], Mic 7[16]) ; (3) the debt is 'the lending of the hand' (Neh 10[31]), and the creditor 'the master of the lending of the hand' (Dt 15[2]) ; (4) the lifting of the hand (to heaven) is the taking of an oath (Dt 32[40]) or the sign of prayer (Ps 28[2]) ; (5) to shake (lit. 'brandish') the hand is to defy (Is 10[32]) ; (6) to give the hand is to pledge (Ezr 10[19]) or to submit (1 Ch 29[24]).

3. The hand as strong, helpful, (a) of man : Israel went out of Egypt 'with an high hand' (Ex 14[8]), i.e. boldly, defiantly ; and to act 'with an high hand' against J", is to act presumptuously (Nu 15[30]) ; so, to be 'short of hand' (2 K 19[26]) is to be of small power ; to strengthen one's hands is to help (Jg 9[24]) ; and the dropping down of the hands is the failure of strength (2 S 4[1]). (b) Of God : His hands are stretched forth to smite (Ex 9[15]) ; or to deliver (Ex 13[3. 4. 16], Dt 4[24]), the opposite being the 'shortened' hand (Is 50[2] 59[1]) ; it is a 'good' hand when it blesses (Ezr 7[9] 8[18], Neh 2[8. 18]), as protection is in the shadow of the hand of J" (Is 49[2]) ; and under inspiration the prophet is in the grasp of God's hand (2 K 3[15], Is 8[11], Ezk 1[3] 3[14. 22] 37[1] 40[1]).

4. The hand is used figuratively to express strength or power (cf. Assyr. idu 'strength') : Jos 8[20] 'there was not in them strength (lit. 'hands') to flee' ; Ps 76[5] 'None of the men of might have found their hands,' i.e. their powers are paralyzed in death. Of him who cannot bring a lamb or two turtle doves for sacrifice it is said, 'his hand cannot reach to them' (Lv 5[7-11] 14[21]). A display of power is 'a mighty hand' (Dt 34[12] ; cf. Job 27[11], Ps 78[42]) ; and a grand achievement 'a great hand' (Ex 14[31]).

5. (1) The 'hand' is used for the side, 1 S 4[13] 'the wayside,' lit. 'the hand of the way' (but see Driver, ad loc.) ; Dt 2[37] 'all the side of the river Jabbok' (RV), lit. 'all the hand' ; Gn 34[21] 'the land is wide of both hands,' i.e. in both directions ; Jer 6[3] 'every one in his place,' lit. 'in his hand.' (2) Other technical senses are : a sign (1 S 15[12], 2 S 18[18]) ; a part or share (Gn 47[24], 2 S 19[43], 2 K 11[7], Neh 11[1]) ; time, repetition (Gn 43[34], Dn 1[20]). And in the plu. supports (1 K 7[35. 36] 10[19] bis ‖ 2 Ch 9[18] bis), tenons (Ex 26[17. 19] bis 36[22. 24] bis).

6. There are also many peculiar prepositional phrases, but these will be best understood in their Eng. equivalents.

1. The hand is a figure for the action, influence, or power of God or man ; Jg 1[35] 'the hand of the house of Joseph prevailed' ; 1 S 22[17] 'Turn, and slay the priests of the Lord ; because their hand also is with David' ; 2 K 3[15] 'And it came to pass, as the minstrel played, that the hand of the LORD came upon him' ; Ezr 7[6] 'according to the hand of the LORD his God upon him' (so 7[9] 8[18], Neh 2[8. 18], sometimes with 'good' as epithet of 'hand,' the meaning being always the favour of God actively bestowed and proved by its results) ; Job 6[9] 'Even that it would please God to destroy me ; that he would let loose his hand, and cut me off!' Ps 78[42] 'They remembered not his hand, nor the day when he delivered them from the enemy' ; 89[48] 'Shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave?' (RV 'power of Sheol') ; 109[27] 'That they may know that this is thy hand, that thou, LORD, hast done it' ; Pr 21[1] 'The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water ; he turneth it whithersoever he will' ; Ec 9[10] 'Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might' ; Jer 15[17] 'I sat alone because of thy hand' ('The Hand of J" is a fig. expression for the self-revealing and irresistible power of J" ; it is therefore equivalent to the Arm of J" [Is 53[1]], but is used in preference with regard to the divinely-ordained actions and words of the prophets'—Cheyne).

In this connexion the foll. passages deserve attention : 1. Dt 33[8] 'Let his hands be sufficient for him' ; Heb. יָרִיב לוֹ ; RV 'With his hands he contended for himself,' RVm 'Let his hands be sufficient for him,' or 'for them.' Driver mentions Stade's 'plausible conjecture' יָרִיבוּ רִיב לוֹ (addressed to God) 'with thy hands contend for it' ; but his own tr. is 'with his hands he hath contended for it.' The verse contains Moses' blessing on Judah ; and as Judah's desire for the reunion of the people is given in the previous clause, these words are understood by Driver as expressing Judah's services for the common weal ; LXX καὶ αἱ χεῖρες αὐτοῦ διακρινοῦσιν αὐτῷ ; Vulg. 'manus ejus pugnabunt pro eo' ; Wyc. 1382 'his hoondis shulen fight for it,' 1388 'hise hondis schulen fighte for hym' ; Tind. 'let his handes fyght for him' ; Cov. 'Let his handes multiplye him' (taking רָב from רָבַב 'to increase,' not from רִיב 'to strive') ; similarly Calvin (Sermons upon Deut.), Golding's trans. 'Let his handes suffise him, because thou wilt bee his helpe against his enemies' ; whence Gen. 'His hands shalbe sufficient for him, if thou help him against his enemies' ; Bish. 'His hands shalbe good ynough for him,' whence AV ; but Dou. (after Vulg.) 'his handes shal fight for him.'

2. Ps 17[14] 'Deliver my soul from the wicked, which is thy sword : from men which are thy hand, O LORD' (מִמְתִים־יָדְךָ יהוה) ; RV 'From men, by thy hand,' RVm as AV. Nearly all mod. expositors * take the 'sword' and the 'hand' as the instruments by which J" is to rescue the soul of His servant, as RV. But King still accepts the AV tr., which makes wicked men God's sword, and worldly men His 'hand' or instrument (cf. Is 10[5] 'Ho Assyrian, the rod of mine anger!'). The passage is, however, suspected, and its opening words rejected as a gloss by Cheyne, Kautzsch, Wellhausen, et al. See Expos. Times, v. 431.

3. Ps 80[17] 'Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand' (תְּהִי־יָדְךָ עַל־אִישׁ יְמִינֶךָ), i.e. 'put forth thy power to protect the people which thy right hand made into a nation and delivered from Egypt'—Kirkpatrick. Wellh.-Furness tr. יָדְךָ 'thine arm.'

4. Ps 89[25] 'I will set his hand also in the sea, and his right hand in the rivers,' RV 'on the sea . . . on the rivers.' The ref. is to the extent of the King's dominion—from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates.

2. It follows that the hand is often a figure for the person, especially the person acting :† Lv 14[32] 'This is the law of him in whom is the plague of leprosy, whose hand is not able to get that which pertaineth to his cleansing' (RV 'who is not able') ; so Nu 6[21] ; 1 S 23[16] 'And Jonathan, Saul's son, arose, and went to David into the wood, and strengthened his hand in God' (cf. Is 35[3] 'strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees'). Shaks. occasionally uses 'hand' in the same way, as Meas. for Meas. v. i. 491—

> 'Friar, advise him :
> I leave him to your hand.'

3. The above and other idioms are found in the foll. phrases :—

1. At hand. To be at hand is to be near, whether of time or of place. When the ref. is to an event, as 'the day of the LORD' (Is 13[6], Jl 1[15], Zeph 1[7]), there is no ambiguity ; but when a person is referred to, it is sometimes a question whether place or time is spoken of. In OT 'at hand' is the tr. of קָרַב to be near (Gn 27[41], Dt 15[9], Ezk 12[23], and [in Piel] Ezk 36[8] 'for they are at hand to come' (כִּי קִרְבוּ לָבוֹא), or the adj. קָרוֹב 'near' (Dt 32[35], Is 13[6], Jer 23[23], Jl 1[15], Zeph 1[7]), of which the most luminous passage is Jer 23[23] 'Am I a God at hand, saith the LORD, and not a God afar off?' In NT 'at hand' is mostly the tr. of the vb. ἐγγίζω, to come near (Mt 3[2] 4[17] 10[7] 26[45. 46], Mk 1[15] 14[42], Ro 13[12] 1 P 4[7]), or of the adj. ἐγγύς, 'near' (Mt 26[18], Jn 2[13] 7[2], Ph 4[5], Rev 1[3] 22[10]), both of which are used of place and of time ; once also of ἐνίστημι (2 Th 2[2] 'Be not . . . troubled . . . by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand,' ὡς ὅτι ἐνέστηκεν ἡ ἡμέρα τοῦ Χριστοῦ, edd. Κυρίου for Χριστοῦ, RV 'as that the day of the Lord is now present' ; ‡ Ellicott, 'to the effect that the day of the Lord is now come') ; and once of ἐφίσταμαι (2 Ti 4[6] 'the time of my departure is at hand,' ἐφέστηκε, RV 'is come').

The only doubtful passage is Ph 4[5] 'The Lord is at hand,' ὁ Κύριος ἐγγύς. Most ancient and nearly all mod. expositors understand the reference to be to the Second Advent, the words being a translation of the Aram. Μαρὰν ἀθά of 1 Co 16[22], which some think may have been a set form of warning in the apostolic Church. But a few take the ἐγγύς to be local, 'The Lord is near us,' either referring to the perpetual presence of Christ (cf. Mt 28[20]), or (taking Κύριος as God) to God's helpful providence in time of need. See Vincent, ad loc. (who accepts the ref. to the Second Coming) ; Manning, Sermons, iii. 241 ; Harden, Ch. of Eng. Eccles. Rev., Aug. 30, 1890 ; Moule, Thoughts on the Spiritual Life (who refer to Christ's constant presence : Moule compares Ps 119[151] 'Thou art near [ἐγγύς], O Lord') ; and Expos. Times, ii. 2 f. The chief argument for the Second Coming is the apostle's use of Κύριος, on which see Winer, Gram. p. 154.

2. At no hand. This phrase occurs only in Preface to AV 1611. Its meaning is 'by no means.'

* Including Davidson, Syntax, § 109. 3, p. 154.

† This does not spoil Trench's contrast between the mod. custom of describing working men as so many 'hands' and the biblical idiom 'souls' (Ac 2[41]). See Study of Words, 95 f.

‡ The AV tr. of this passage brings it into conflict with Ro 13[12] 'The night is far spent, the day is at hand,' making the apostle deny here what he there affirms. RV removes the discrepancy.

Cf. T. Fuller, Holy Warre, ii. 36 (p. 92), 'The Caliph demurred hereat, as counting such a gesture a diminution to his State; and at no hand would give him his hand bare, but gave it in his glove.' Cf. Sir John Harington's version of Ps 137[3]—

'Come, sing us now a song, say they,
As once you song at anie hand.'

3. At the hand of=from: Gn 9[5] 'And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man' (מִיַּד, lit. 'from the hand of'; LXX ἐκ χειρός,* Vulg. 'de manu,' Wyc. 'of the hoond'); 33[10] 'Receive my present at my hand'; 2 S 13[5. 6. 10], 2 K 9[7] 'And thou shalt smite the house of Ahab thy master, that I may avenge the blood of my servants the prophets, and the blood of all the servants of the Lord, at the hand of Jezebel'; Is 1[12] 'When ye come to appear before me, who hath required this at your hand, to tread my courts?'; Rev 19[2] 'He hath judged the great whore . . . and hath avenged the blood of his servants at her hand' (ἐκ τῆς [edd. omit τῆς] χειρὸς αὐτῆς, Vulg. 'de manibus ejus': the meaning, which is 'from her' or 'upon her,' as 'upon Jezebel' in 2 K 9[7], is missed by Gen. NT, 'and hath advenged the blood of his servants shed by her hand.' The phrase is frequently used by Shaks., as Merry Wives, II. ii. 218, 'Have you received no promise of satisfaction at her hands?' In Neh 11[24] occurs the phrase 'at the king's hand,'—'And Pethahiah . . . was at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people' (לְיַד הַמֶּלֶךְ). The meaning of the phrase is clear, but the scope of Pethahiah's office is not so clear. See Ryle (Ezra and Neh. in Camb. Bible), and art. PETHAHIAH.

4. By the hand of='by,' or 'by means of': Ex 4[13] 'And he said, O my Lord, send, I pray thee, by the hand of him whom thou wilt send' (בְּיַד); Lv 8[36] 'So Aaron and his sons did all things which the LORD commanded by the hand of Moses.'

5. By strength of hand: Ex 13[3. 14. 16], as 13[14] 'By strength of hand the LORD brought us out from Egypt.' See 'With a strong hand' below.

6. To come to one's hand: Gn 32[13] 'And he lodged there that same night; and took of that which came to his hand a present for Esau his brother' (וַיָּבֹא מִן-הַבָּא בְיָדוֹ, LXX καὶ ἔλαβεν ὧν ἔφερεν δῶρα, Vulg. 'separavit de his quæ habebat,' RV 'took of that which he had with him'); Jg 20[48] 'And the men of Israel turned again upon the children of Benjamin, and smote them with the edge of the sword, as well the men of every city, as the beast, and all that came to hand' (עַד כָּל-הַנִּמְצָא, AVm 'all that was found,' RV 'all that they found'); 1 S 25[8] 'Give, I pray thee, whatsoever cometh to thine hand unto thy servants' (אֵת אֲשֶׁר תִּמְצָא יָדֶךָ, LXX ὅ ἐὰν εὕρῃ ἡ χείρ σου).

7. Fall in hand with: Only in Preface to AV, 'For not long after Christ, Aquila fell in hand with a new Translation, and after him Theodotion, and after him Symmachus'; and 'Neither, to be short, were we the first that fell in hand with translating the Scripture into English.' The meaning is 'set about,' 'undertake,' mod. 'take in hand to.'

8. From one's hand=from oneself: Gn 4[11] 'And now art thou cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand'; 38[20], cf. Ps 71[4] Wyc. 'My God, tac me awey fro the hond of the synnere; and fro the hond of the doere agen the lawe.'

9. In hand. This phrase has different meanings: (1) 'In progress,' 1 S 20[19] 'when the business was in hand' (בְּיוֹם הַמַּעֲשֶׂה, AVm 'in the day of the business,' LXX ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ ἐργασίμῃ, Vulg. 'in die quando operari licet'). Cf. Shaks. Venus, 912—

'Full of respects, yet nought at all respecting,
In hand with all things, nought at all effecting.'

(2) In one's hand='with one,' or 'in one's possession,' Gn 35[4] 'And they gave unto Jacob all the strange gods that were in their hand'; 39[3] 'And his master saw . . . that the LORD made all that he did to prosper in his hand'; Dt 24[1] 'let him write a bill of divorcement and give in her hand'; 1 S 17[22] 'And David left his carriage [RV 'baggage'] in the hand (עַל-יַד) of the keeper of the carriage'; Is 44[20] 'Is there not a lie in my right hand?'; 1 Ch 29[12] 'In thine hand is power and might; and in thine hand it is to make great, and to give strength unto all.' Sometimes, as in the last passage, the meaning is rather 'in one's power,' or 'under one's control.' So Gn 24[10] 'all the goods of his master were in his hand'; Job 12[10] 'In whose hand is the soul of every living thing'; Jer 26[14] 'As for me, behold I am in your hand: do with me as seemeth good and meet unto you'; Sir 15[14] 'He himself made man from the beginning, and left him in the hand of his counsel' (ἐν χειρὶ διαβουλίου αὐτοῦ, RV 'in the hand of his own counsel').

(3) To 'put one's life in one's hand' is to expose it, risk it, in making a venture. The phrase occurs in Jg 12[3], 1 S 19[5] 28[21], Job 13[14]; and in a slightly different form in Ps 119[109] 'My soul is continually in my hand'; cf. also Ad. Est 14[4] 'For my danger is in mine hand' (ὅτι κίνδυνός μου ἐν χειρί μου).

(4) In Gal 3[19] occurs the expression 'in the hand of,' meaning 'by means of': 'the law . . . was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator,' Gr. ἐν χειρί, a frequent tr[n] in LXX of Heb. בְּיַד. Both the Gr. and the Eng. have accepted the Heb. phrase, regardless of their own proper idiom, and that not only in the use of 'hand,' but also by using 'in'. RV prefers 'by the hand of.'

10. Lay hand on. See LAY.

11. Of one's hand='from one,' as Gn 21[30] 'these seven ewe lambs shalt thou take of my hand'; 39[1] 'And Joseph was brought down to Egypt; and Potiphar . . . bought him of the hands [ed. 1611 'hand,' so RV] of the Ishmaelites'; or=simply 'my,' as Gn 31[29] 'It is in the power of my hand [=it is in my power] to do you hurt.'

12. On this, that hand. The phrase 'on this (that, etc.) hand' for 'on this side' is now biblical and archaic. Wright (Bible Word-Book[2], 303) quotes Holland, Pliny, xxxvi. 5 (ed. 1637), 'The fierie goddesse Vesta, sitting in a chaire, accompanied with two hand-maidens set upon the ground of each hand of her.' Shaks., however, uses the expression quite freely, as Merry Wives, II. ii. 24—'I, I, I myself sometimes, leaving the fear of Heaven on the left hand, and hiding mine honour in my necessity, am fain to shuffle, to hedge, and to lurch.' In AV we find Gn 14[15] 'Hobah, which is on the left hand of Damascus'; Ex 38[15] 'and for the other side (וּלְזֶה) of the court gate, on this hand and that hand (מִזֶּה וּמִזֶּה) were hangings'; 2 K 23[13] 'And the high places that were before Jerusalem, which were on the right hand of the mount of corruption' (מִיָּמִין לְ).

13. Out of hand. The phrase 'out of the hand of' for 'out of the power of,' especially after the verb to deliver, occurs frequently. But twice we find 'out of hand,' meaning 'at once,' Nu 11[15] 'Kill me, I pray thee, out of hand' (הָרְגֵנִי נָא הָרֹג, LXX ἀπόκτεινόν με ἀναιρέσει); To 4[14] 'Give him it out of hand' (παραυτίκα). So North, Plutarch (Demosthenes, p. 853), 'Thereupon he went with a chearefull countenance into the assembly of the councell, and told them there, that he had a certaine dreame that promised great good hap,

* On the LXX text of this passage see Conybeare in JQR, v. 273.

and that out of hand, unto the Athenians'; Golding, Calvin's Sermons upon Deuteronomie (No. 192, on Dt 33[3-7]), 'Wee see then that things shall not [alwayes] come to passe out of hande, immediatly after that God hath promised them'; Golding, Calvin's Sermons upon Job (No. 119, on Job 32[1-3]), 'We knowe that the world did out of hand fall away from God'; and (in same sermon) 'Why doth he not kill me out of hande?'

14. Put one's hand. Ex 23[1] 'Put not thine hand with the wicked to be an unrighteous witness'—a lit. tr. of the Heb., which means to 'go hand in hand with.'

15. Under the hand of: Gn 41[35] 'And let them . . . lay up corn under the hand of Pharaoh' (תַּחַת יַד־פַּרְעֹה); Ex 21[20] 'And if a man smite his servant . . . and he die under his hand'; Nu 4[28] 'their charge shall be under the hand of Ithamar'; Jg 9[29] 'And would to God this people were under my hand!'; 1 S 21[3] 'Now therefore what is under thine hand? Give me five loaves of bread in mine hand.'

16. With a strong (high, etc.) hand is a phrase which is very often used of God's deliverances, Ex 6[1] 13[9] 14[8] 32[11], Dt 5[15] 7[19] etc.

For the theological significance of the word see next article. J. HASTINGS.

HAND.—The appearance of this word in the Bible is in some cases due to Eng. idiom. Thus the expressions 'at hand' (though Heb. had a corresponding idiom, Job 15[23]), and 'handful' are used where the original idea was simply that of 'nearness' or 'fulness.' So, too, in the term of measurement, 'a palm' or 'handbreadth' טֶפַח, the root idea seems to be that of extension only.

For the hand proper two words are employed—one of them יָד yâdh, denoting it open or flat, the other כַּף kaph, closed or curved. A third word, חָפְנַיִם ḥophnaim, was sometimes used of the two hands clenched or grasping an object. To these must be added יָמִין yâmîn, and שְׂמֹאל sĕmô'l, right and left, which, as in other languages, came to stand by themselves for right and left hand.

It is only idiomatic phrases derived from the various functions of the hand that call for notice here. These functions are to mark position, exert power, and express emotion, and the idioms may be conveniently arranged in three corresponding classes.

1. So usual was it to employ the hand to describe situation, that יָד from its sense of side, which is 11 times used to tr. it, came to carry that of place, and is so rendered 8 times. Cf. coast 6 times, border twice.

In three of these instances (1 S 15[12], 2 S 18[18], Is 56[5]) place evidently stands for a monument of some kind, possibly a pillar with a hand sculptured on it as an emblem of power or success. Such monuments appear to have been common in Phœnicia, and the hand has in many countries served as an emblem of good fortune.

'On the right hand,' 'on the left hand,' are, of course, common phrases, while the custom of facing the E. when denoting geographical position made these phrases in Pal. equivalent to S. and N. respectively.

The right hand was the place of an accuser in a court of justice (Ps 109[6], Zec 3[1]), but, from the sense of security given by the presence of a comrade in battle on the unshielded side, the right came to be the place of a protector (Ps 16[8] 109[31], Ac 2[25]).

Religion had also its use for these phrases. To turn from the law of God neither to the right hand nor the left is a frequent scriptural expression for loyalty to the divine King. To sit down at His right hand was the glory reserved for the exalted Son (Ps 110[1], Mk 14[62]).

2. As used to work with or to fight with, the hand became a synonym for strength (Jos 8[20]), and supplied innumerable metaphorical expressions, many of which, from their religious use, have become as universal as they are sacred. When he wished to denote God's power, the Israelite spoke of God's hand. See ARM. He saw it outstretched to perform wonders of mercy for himself, or wonders of judgment for his enemies. It was a good hand and a mighty hand, and it was watched 'as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress' (Ps 123[2]). It became, indeed, an emblem not only of might, exerted to defend or destroy, not only of help and guidance, but of Providence (Ps 77[10]). Prophetic inspiration, too, was often indicated by the phrase 'the hand of the Lord was upon' (1 K 18[46]), while God was said to speak 'by the hand of,' i.e. by means of, a prophet.

It is not always easy to determine whether the mention of the hand has passed out of the region of anthropomorphic representation into that of pure metaphor. At all events the imagery is fearlessly bold in expressions like those of Ps 74[11], Is 49[16].

3. The use of the hands to express emotion gave rise to many familiar biblical expressions. They were lifted in prayer (Ps 134[2]), extended in expostulation (Is 65[2]), clasped in a bargain (Pr 6[1]), folded in sleep (Pr 6[10]). By their movement a blessing was conveyed (Lv 9[22]), an oath was registered (Dt 32[40]), or a defiance offered (2 S 20[21]). As a religious symbol, the imposition of hands in ordination to a sacred office grew out of the natural gesture that accompanied the patriarchal blessing. See LAYING ON OF HANDS.

The act of cleansing the hands was fruitful in phrases. To wash one's own hands was a protestation of innocence (Dt 21[6-7], Mt 27[24]); to pour water on the hands of another, of dependence or discipleship (2 K 3[11]). The idea of ceremonial purity or impurity enters into the expressions 'clean hands' of the Psalms and 'unwashen hands' of the Gospels.

There is one phrase which, from the obscurity of its origin, causes a little difficulty. 'To fill the hand' (AVm where the text has 'consecrate,' Ex 28[41] etc.) was a regular term for the investiture of a priest. Some explain by the supposition that part of the sacrifice was placed in the neophyte's hand as a symbol of his office. Others think of the presentation of the priestly tithe. Another, and perhaps better explanation, makes the expression entirely metaphorical for the bestowal of office, as we might say 'the priesthood was put into his hands' (cf. Moore's Judges, p. 380, and see art. FILL). A. S. AGLEN.

HANDBREADTH.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

HANDKERCHIEF.—See NAPKIN.

HANDLE.—The 'handles of the lock' (properly, as RV, 'the handles of the bolt') of the door are referred to in Ca 5[5], the word being כַּף, kaph, usually the palm of the hand or sole of the foot. See KEY, and Lock under art. HOUSE.

The verb to 'handle' occurs frequently. Its primary meaning, to seize or use with the hand, is seen in Ps 115[7] 'They have hands, but they handle not'; and Wis 15[15] 'gods, which neither have the use of eyes to see . . . nor fingers of hands to handle' (εἰς ψηλάφησιν). So we handle the sword (Ezk 38[4]), the oar (27[29]), the pen (Jg 5[14]), the harp (Gn 4[21]), etc. In NT the meaning is touch, or feel with the hand. There are two Gr. verbs:

(1) θιγγάνω, Col 2^{21} 'Touch not; taste not; handle not' (Μὴ ἅψῃ μηδὲ γεύσῃ μηδὲ θίγῃς). RV, after Lightfoot, renders 'Handle not, nor taste, nor touch,' for ἅπτεσθαι is stronger than θιγεῖν, and is best tr^{d} by handle if that word is to be used at all, which is somewhat strong for both. (2) ψηλαφάω, Lk 24^{39} 'Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see'; 1 Jn 1^{1} 'That which was from the beginning, which we have heard . . . and our hands have handled, of the Word of life.' If 'handle' was too strong for θιγγάνω, it is scarcely strong enough for ψηλαφάω, which expresses the movement of the hands over a surface, so as to feel it and fix it, or mentally the groping after something, as the Athenians 'felt after' God (Ac 17^{27}, same verb). In He 12^{18} (only remaining occurrence in NT) it is used of the 'mount that might be touched,' i.e. as Davidson 'palpable and materially sensible.'

But the verb to 'handle' is found in other senses that are less familiar, as: Be conversant with, have to do with, Jer 2^{8} 'The priests said not, Where is the Lord? and they that handle the law (תֹּפְשֵׂי הַתּוֹרָה) knew me not'. Almost in the sense intended by Jeremiah, but somewhat more narrowly, this word 'handle' was used about 1611 of the expounding of Scripture, as in James Melvill's Diary (Wodrow, p. 182) in reference to the order of worship at Newcastle under Melvill's ministry: 'Ther salbe daylie Comoun Prayers twyse everie day, befor noone at ten houres, and efter at foure, at quhilk tyme a Psalme salbe read and handlit, sa that the soum thairof be schortlie gathered, the partes sett doun in ordour, and some schort notes of doctrine, with exhortation; bot in sic schortnes that the haill tyme occupied exceid nocht the space of ane halff houre.' And so Wodrow, Select Biog. i. 312, 'I have heard him [Mr. John Dykes of Kilrinnie] goe through a long chapter in less than an hour, and pertinently handle every purpose thereof.' This is the very meaning, however, of 2 Mac 2^{28} 'Leaving to the author the exact handling of every particular' (τὸ μὲν διακριβοῦν). In 2 Co 4^{2} we find the expression, 'handling the word of God deceitfully,' where the meaning is different. The Gr., tr^{d} 'handle deceitfully,' is the simple verb δολόω, to ensnare, corrupt; Vulg. 'adulterantes,' which Wyc. translates 'avoutrynge the word of God,' (1388) 'doynge avoutrye bi'; Rhem. 'adulterating': Tind. has 'corrupte'; Cran. introduced 'handle deceitfully,' which was adopted by Gen., Bish., AV, RV. Tindale's 'corrupt' is probably as near the meaning as one can go. But in the AV tr^{n} 'handle' means to deal with, treat. So Pr 16^{20} 'He that handleth a matter wisely shall find good' (מַשְׂכִּיל עַל־דָּבָר, AVm 'he that understandeth a matter,' RV 'he that giveth heed unto the word,' RVm as AV). In this sense the word is used also in 2 Mac 7^{39} 'Then the king, being in a rage, handled him worse than all the rest' (ἀπήντησεν); 8^{17} 'the cruel handling of the city' (αἰκισμός, RV 'shameful handling'); and Mk 12^{4} 'sent him away shamefully handled' (ἀπέστειλαν ἠτιμωμένον, WH ἠτίμησαν, RV 'him they . . . handled shamefully,' Gould 'insulted'; the verb is lit. 'dishonoured'). Cf. Ezk 18^{8} Cov. 'he handleth faithfully betwixte man and man'; Golding, Calvin's Job (Ser. cxix. on 32^{1-3}), 'The opinion and imaginacion of Jobs three freends, was that Job was a castaway before God, bycause he was handled so roughly.' J. HASTINGS.

HANDSOMELY.—In Wis 13^{11} the adv. εὐπρεπῶς is translated in AV 'handsomely,' which seems a very appropriate translation. The Bishops' Bible has 'comely' (as adv.), and RV 'in comely form.' But it is very doubtful if that can be the meaning of 'handsomely' in AV. Coming from 'hand' it is equivalent in all early examples to 'handy,' i.e. dexterously, cleverly. Bishop Keith says of Hamilton's Catechism, 'It is a judicious commentary upon the Commands, the Belief, Lord's Prayer, Magnificat, Ave Maria; and the author shows both his wisdom and moderation in handsomely eviting to enter upon the controverted topics,' and the latest edition of the Catechism (Mitchell, ed. 1882) is right in saying that 'handsomely eviting must mean artfully eluding.' Bp. Davenant in 1640 writes regarding his Animadversions to Dr. Ward, and says, 'For this uce I would have a doozen at the least sent bound: some fairly for the Bishops, all handsomely' (Fuller's Life of Bp. Davenant, 1897, p. 447), where 'fairly' means what we now express by 'handsomely,' while 'handsomely' refers to the workmanship, deftly. This is no doubt the meaning of 'handsomely' in AV. The Vulg. gives 'diligenter,' after which Wyc. and Dou. 'diligently,' and it is to be observed that the reading in ℵ is not εὐπρεπῶς, but εὐτρεπῶς. Rutherford (Letters, No. lxv.) says, 'Christ hath so handsomely [i.e. dexterously] fitted for my shoulders this rough tree of the cross, as that it hurteth me no ways.' The adj. 'handsome' is in constant use in the same sense, as Tind. Pent. (Prol. to Lv), 'Fynallye beware of allegoryes, for there is not a moare handsome or apte a thinge to be gile withall then an allegorye, nor a more sotle and pestilent thinge in the world to persuade a false matter then an allegorye.' J. HASTINGS.

HANDSTAVES (makkel yād מַקֵּל יָד Ezk 39^{9}).—A kind of club carried by shepherds chiefly for defence against wild beasts. Goliath (1 S 17^{43}) asks David, 'Am I a dog that thou comest to me with staves?' (מַקְלוֹת maḳlōth). Cf. shebheṭ under DART.

HANES (חָנֵס).—Is 30^{4} in a difficult context: 'Woe to the rebellious children . . . that walk to go down into Egypt and have not asked at my mouth, to strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh, and to trust in the shadow of Egypt! Therefore shall the strength of Pharaoh be your shame, and the trust in the shadow of Egypt your confusion. For his princes are at Zoan, and his ambassadors are come to Hanes.' There seems to be no antecedent to 'his' but Pharaoh, so some have thought that the last sentence refers to the movements of Pharaoh's advanced guard towards the frontier; but it is usually considered that the princes and ambassadors were those of the king of Judah. Zoan is well known to be Tanis. Hanes might well represent the ancient Hunenseten in its passage to the much abbreviated Coptic form Hnês. This was the name of the great city of Heracleopolis Magna in Middle Egypt. About this time, corresponding to that of the 23rd to 25th dynasty in Egypt, that country was in a feeble state, there being seldom if ever a central authority of sufficient power to keep local princes in check. Two invaders, the Eth. Piankhi and the Assyr. Esarhaddon, have given us lists of numerous independent princelings in different cities of Egypt. In the inscription of Piankhi one of these petty rulers is named as of Heracleopolis Magna, but there is no mention of one at Tanis. In Esar-haddon's list of petty states Tanis appears to be one, and another is called Hininshi; but the latter is grouped with the cities of Lower Egypt, and was apparently situated in the central part of the Delta, so that it is difficult to identify it with Hunenseten-Hnês, although there are excellent etymol. and hist. reasons for so doing. There is indeed no sign of divisions in the country in the passage quoted from Is; Pharaoh is named in the sing. as at other times. But the two cities are evidently mentioned as leading ones, and it would be satisfactory to find them in the lists above referred to. If, as Esarhaddon's list would seem to indicate, Hininshi is not Hnês, it may still, perhaps, represent the biblical H., otherwise the latter is prob. Heracleopolis Magna in Middle Egypt. Naville has compared H. with Anysis, a city of Lower Egypt mentioned by Herodotus; again, Khens seems to be the Egyp. name of a district in the N.E. delta. The LXX had lost the clue to the meaning of v.[4], and substituted, 'For there are in Tanis princes, wicked messengers' (ὅτι εἰσὶν ἐν Τάνει ἀρχηγοὶ ἄγγελοι πονηροί). An Aram. version gives for Hanes, Tahpanhes, on the N.E. frontier of Egypt. There is at least some similarity in the names. F. Ll. Griffith.

HANGING is frequently mentioned in the OT, but it is very doubtful whether the word, in connexion with capital punishment, has ever the sense which it suggests to modern ears. As the analysis below will show, in most instances where the hanging (or hanging up) of a criminal is referred to, the meaning is that, after execution in some other form, his dead body was hung up. Again, even if 'hanging' sometimes designates a mode of execution, the probability is that it is impaling that is really meant. The scriptural terms and references are as follows:—

1. תָּלָה (in 2 S 21[12] (Kerê), Dt 28[66], Hos 11[7] (?) תְּלָא), 'to hang up' anything, e.g. the earth Job 26[7], the shields on the tower of David Ca 4[4], the harps of the exiles in Babylon Ps 137[2]; especially of the hanging up of a dead body, in Gn 40[19. 22] 41[13] of the chief baker, who was probably first beheaded and then had his body impaled as an aggravation of the punishment, see Dillm. ad loc.; in 2 S 4[12] of the murderers of Ishbosheth, whose bodies, after their hands and feet had been cut off, were hung up by David beside the pool in Hebron; in 2 S 21[12] of the bodies of Saul and Jonathan, which were hung up by the Philistines at Beth-shan. The fuller expression '(hang) upon a tree' (עַל־עֵץ) occurs in Gn 40[19], Dt 21[22], Jos 8[29] 10[26 bis], Est 2[23] (in which last passage it is possible that impaling of the dead bodies is meant; cf. Herod. iii. 125, ix. 78; Plutarch, Artax. 17, Timol. 22; Justin, xxi. 4). The Deuteronomic code regulated the Jewish practice (cf. Philo, de Spec. Leg. § 28) as follows:—'If a man have committed a sin worthy of death and he be put to death, and [after his death] thou hang him on a tree, his body shall not remain all night upon the tree, but thou shalt surely bury him the same day, for he that is hanged is accursed of God (קְלֻלַת אֱלֹהִים, LXX κεκατηραμένος ὑπὸ θεοῦ, Aq. Theod. κατάρα θεοῦ, not 'a curse, i.e. reproach, insult to God,' as one school of Jewish interpreters understood it), that thou defile not thy land which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance' (Dt 21[22f.], where see Driver's note). This prescription is noted as having been carried out in the case even of the kings executed by Joshua (Jos 8[29] 10[27]). The requisite publicity has been attained by sunset and the land has been cleansed from the defilement affecting it. (On 'exposure' of this kind and its religious meaning see W. R. Smith, RS[1] 351 n.). The exposure of the bodies of Saul's sons (2 S 21[9ff.]) day after day was either exceptional, or reflects the practice of an age that was a stranger to the mildness of the Deuteronomic code (cf Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 333).

The LXX equivalent of תָּלָה is κρεμάννυμι, which appears also in the NT in Lk 23[39], Ac 5[30] 10[39], Gal 3[13], the only difference from OT usage being that it is used in all these passages of the hanging of a living body upon a cross. The language of Dt 21[23], although it had of course no direct reference to crucifixion, could readily be transferred to it, and evidently was so transferred by the Jews, as we can gather from Gal 3[13]. It was the hanging up, not the death, that brought disgrace upon the sufferer, and the epithet Tālûi (תָּלוּי 'the hung'), derived from Dt 21[23], is frequently applied in contempt to Jesus by the later Jews. See the very instructive note of Lightfoot, Galatians[6], 152[ff.].

The word תָּלָה is almost certainly used of 'hanging' as a mode of execution in Est 5[14] 6[4] 7[9f.] 8[7] 9[13. 14. 25] (possibly also in 2[23]). The EV evidently understands it in the modern sense, for both AV and RV give for עֵץ gallows (in the text, although they have 'tree' in the margin). The 'gallows' which was destined by Haman for Mordecai, but was used for his own execution and that of his sons, is said to have been fifty cubits high. It seems most probable that impaling was the form of execution adopted, and that the 'tree' was a stake for the purpose (cf. Haley, Esther, 122 ff.). It could be lowered to receive its victim, who would then be raised upon it to that lofty height, that his doom and sufferings might arrest the public gaze.

The same word (תָּלוּי) is used in 2 S 18[10] of Absalom, who was 'hanged in an oak,' i.e. caught by the neck in the fork of a branch. In La 5[12] we read of princes being 'hanged up by their hand' (בְּיָדָם נִתְלוּ). Löhr would refer their to the enemy, that is to say, the princes were hanged up by the hand of the Chaldæans. Others, taking their as =their own, suggest that there may be a reference to crucifixion.

2. In Ezr. 6[11] the Aram. יִתְסְחֵא appears to refer to being fastened on the impaling stake, although the LXX understands it more mildly, πληγήσεται, 'he shall be beaten.'

3. The only clear instances in the Bible of death by hanging, i.e. strangulation, are those of Ahithophel and Judas (2 S 17[23], Mt 27[5]), and both these were cases not of execution but of suicide. As a mode of execution it seems to have been only by the later Jews that strangling was adopted (see W. R. Smith, RS[2] 419, and art. Crimes and Punishments, p. 527[a]). In 2 S 17[23] the Heb. term employed is יֻחְנַק (imperf. Niph. of [חנק], the only other occurrences of this root being the Piel ptcp. מְחַנֵּק used in Nah 2[12] of the lion strangling prey for his lionesses, and the noun מַחֲנָק in Job 7[15] 'My soul chooseth strangling'). The LXX has in 2 S ἀπέπνιξεν, in Nah ἀπήγξατο, which is the word used also in Mt 27[5].

4. הוֹקִיעַ, Hiph. of נָקַע which in Qal means 'to be dislocated' (Gn 32[25] of Jacob's thigh) or fig. 'to be alienated' (joined with נֶפֶשׁ and followed by קִן or מֵעַל Jer 6[8], Ezk 23[17. 18]), is used in 2 S 21[6. 9] of the 'hanging up' of Saul's sons by the Gibeonites (cf. v.[13] Hoph. ptcp. הַמּוּקָעִים). Its only other occurrence is Nu 25[4] 'Take all the chiefs of the people and hang (הוֹקַע) them up unto the Lord.' The Oxf. Heb. Lex. remarks, 'some solemn form of execution, but meaning uncertain.' Dillmann, Kautzsch, and Kittel tr. simply 'aussetzen'=expose. This follows the LXX, which has in 2 S ἐξηλιάζειν and in Nu παραδειγματίζειν. By others it is taken to mean impale (Ges., following Aq., ἀναπηγνύναι) or crucify (Targ. צלב, Vulg. crucifigere, affigere). Symm. has κρεμάζειν=hang, Vulg. in Nu suspendere, but it is probable that the word expressed something more than the ordinary תָּלָה (Driver, Text of Sam. p. 269). In all probability we should read the same word (הִקְעוּ for תָּקְעוּ of MT) in 1 S 31[10], of the fastening up of Saul's body by the Philistines (so Lagarde, followed by Wellhausen, Driver, Budde, Grätz, Klostermann).

W. R. Smith (RS[2] 419) suggests that in the above passages in Nu and 2 S precipitation from a rock may be intended. 'They fell all seven together' (2 S 21[9]), and for this form of execution reference may be made to 2 K 8[12], 2 Ch 25[12], Hos 10[14]. This explanation, however, seems to lack probability, particularly if we adopt the above textual emendation of Lagarde in 1 S 31[10]. J. A. Selbie.

HANGING, HANGINGS.—1. The former is the AV rendering of the Heb. term מָסָךְ, the name given in the Priests' Code (1) to the curtain or portière closing the entrance to the Tabernacle from the surrounding court (Ex 26[36. 37] 35[15] 'the h. for the door at the entering in of the tabernacle,' 39[38] 40[5] etc.); (2) to a similar portière closing the entrance to the court itself (Ex 35[17] 'the h. for the door of the court,' 38[18] etc.); and (3) once, Nu 3[31], for the 'veil' screening off the Holy of Holies from the rest of the Tabernacle, the usual name for which is פָּרֹכֶת (Ex 26[31] and oft.), or more fully פָּרֹכֶת הַמָּסָךְ (Ex 35[12] 39[34] 40[21], Nu 4[5]). In all three cases, as we have said, the AV renders by 'hanging,' with the single exception of Nu 3[26], where we find 'curtain' (see Curtain, 2). The Revisers, however, have consistently rendered מָסָךְ by 'screen' throughout.

2. The plur. form 'hangings,' on the other hand, is the equivalent of another technical term of the Priests' Code, קְלָעִים (LXX ὁπτία), the hangings which, suspended from pillars, fenced off the court of the Tabernacle from the outer world (Ex 27[9. 11] etc.), hence the fuller designation קַלְעֵי הֶחָצֵר 'the hangings of the court' (Ex 35[17] 38[9] etc.).

For the material, workmanship, and other details of these screens and hangings, see the general article Tabernacle in this Dictionary.

3. In 2 K 23[7] we read of 'hangings for the Asherah' (RV), which the women wove even 'in the house of the Lord' itself. The original, as the margin informs us, has 'houses (בָּתִּים),' by which Jewish tradition understands 'tents' (so RVm) to shelter the image of the goddess. It is extremely doubtful, however, if bātîm (or bottîm) is correct in this connexion. The LXX has here a transliteration of some different reading (A χεττιείμ, B χεττιείν). Klostermann supposes that the Greek translators read כתים, a copyist's error for כתנים = קְתֹנוֹת (cf. Luc. στολάς). See further Oxf. Heb. Lex. i. 109*a*, s.v. בַּיִת. A. R. S. Kennedy.

HANNAH (חַנָּה, Ἄννα, that is, grace).—One of the wives of an Ephraimite named Elkanah, who lived at Ramathaim-zophim (1 S 1[2ff.]). To her great distress H. had no children, and on the occasion of one of the yearly visits which she made with her husband to sacrifice to J" at Shiloh, where the ark then was, she vowed that, if the Lord would give her a son, she would devote him to Him under the vow of a Nazirite. Her prayer was heard, and a child was born, whom she named Samuel. As soon as he was weaned, which according to Jewish custom might not be until he was about three years old, she took him up to Eli, the priest of the Lord, at Shiloh. On the same occasion she is reported to have given vent to her feelings in the beautiful song of 1 S 2[1-10]. It is necessary to note, however, that this song is pronounced by modern criticism to be wholly unsuited to H.'s position and circumstances, and is thought to have been composed later in celebration of some national success. If so, v.[5b] may have led to its association with H. (see Driver, LOT[6] 174). Of H.'s subsequent history we are told only that she was in the habit of bringing Samuel a little robe (mĕ'îl) from year to year when she came up to the yearly sacrifice; and that she became the mother of other three sons and two daughters (1 S 2[21]).

HANNATHON (חַנָּתוֹן).—A place on the N. border of Zebulun, Jos 19[14]. The site is uncertain, but the name is probably to be identified with the Talmudic Caphar Hananiah, which according to the Mishnah (see Neubauer, Géog. du Talm. 179, 226) marked the limit of Upper Galilee. This is now Kefr 'Anân, at the foot of the mountains of Upper Galilee and N.E. of Rimmon. See SWP i. 205, 207. C. R. Conder.

HANNIEL (חַנִיאֵל 'grace of God').—1. Son of Ephod, and Manasseh's representative for dividing the land, Nu 34[23] P. 2. A hero of the tribe of Asher (AV Haniel), 1 Ch 7[39].

HANOCH (חֲנוֹךְ 'dedication'(?)).—1. A grandson of Abraham by Keturah, and third of the sons of Midian (Gn 25[4]). In the parallel list of 1 Ch 1[33] AV gives the form Henoch. 2. The eldest son of Reuben, and head of the family of the Hanochites (Gn 46[9], Ex 6[14], Nu 26[5], 1 Ch 5[3]).

HANUN (חָנוּן 'favoured,' cf. Assyr. Ḫanunu, king of Gaza).—1. The son of Nahash, king of the Ammonites. Upon the death of the latter, David sent a message of condolence to Hanun, who, however, resented this action, and grossly insulted the messengers. The consequence was a war, which proved most disastrous to the Ammonites, 2 S 10[1ff.], 1 Ch 19[1ff.]. 2. 3. H. occurs in the list of those who repaired the wall and the gates of Jerus., Neh 3[13. 30].

HAP, HAPLY.—Hap, a Saxon word meaning 'luck,' 'chance,' is used once in AV, Ru 2[3] 'And her hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz,' where the Heb. is וַיִּקֶר מִקְרֶהָ, LXX καὶ περιέπεσεν περιπτώματι; AVm 'her hap happened'; Cox, 'her lot met her.' T. Fuller (Holy State, iii. 12, p. 181) says, 'Many have been the wise speeches of fools, though not so many as the foolish speeches of wise men . . . because talking much, and shooting often, they must needs hit the mark sometimes, though not by aim, by hap'; and imitates the passage in Ru when he says (Holy Warre, p. 200), 'his hap was to fall in just among the three captains.'

Haply is 'by hap.' 'Happily' is the same word under a different spelling, and had formerly the same meaning, though it has now come to mean 'by good hap.' Happily meaning simply 'by hap,' 'perchance,' is common in Shaks., though mod. edd. usually spell 'haply.' Thus Hamlet, II. ii. 402—

> 'Ham. That great baby you see there is not yet out of his swaddling-clouts.
> Ros. Happily he's the second time come to them.'

In AV 1611 the spelling is 'haply' in 1 S 14[30], Mk 11[13], Lk 14[29], Ac 5[39] 17[27]; but in 2 Co 9[4] 'happily,' which mod. edd. have changed to 'haply' also. Sometimes the word is spelt 'happly,' as in Daye's ed. of Tindale's Pent. (1573), 'Enacke, a kinde of Giauntes so called happly, because they ware chaynes about their neckes.' The word occurs in AV only in the phrases 'if haply' and 'lest haply.'

RV has tr[d] μήποτε by 'lest haply' in all its occurrences, except Mt 25[9] 'peradventure—not,' Jn 7[26] 'Can it be that,' and 2 Ti 2[25] 'if peradventure.' Also μή που (TR μήπως) is so tr[d] in Ac 27[29]. J. Hastings.

HAPHRAIM (הַפְרַיִם).—A town of Issachar, noticed with Shunem and Anaharath, Jos 19[19]. These were to the east of the tribal territory. In the Onomasticon, however (s. 'Aphraim'), it is stated to be 'now Affarea, six miles from Legio (Lejjûn) to the north.' The site in question is now called el-Ferrîyeh, on the low hills south of Carmel. It is the site of an ancient town with remarkable tombs. See SWP vol. i. sh. viii. In Baedeker-Socin's Pal.[2] 238, Haphraim is identified with el-'Afûleh, 2 miles W. of Solam (Shunem).

C. R. CONDER.

HAPPEN.—1. Ro 11[25] 'Blindness in part is happened to Israel,' i.e. is fallen upon, has come to (γέγονεν), without the idea of 'hap' or chance; RV 'hath befallen.' Cf. Jer 43[8] Cov. 'And in Taphnis the worde off the LORDE happened unto Ieremy.' 2. 2 S 1[6] 'As I happened by chance upon Mount Gilboa' (נִקְרֹא, LXX Περιπτώματι περιεπέσαν), i.e. 'I chanced to light upon.' Bunyan begins his Holy War thus: 'In my Travels, as I walked through many Regions and Countries, it was my chance to happen into that famous Continent of Universe.' Cf. Gn 44[29] Tind. 'Yf ye shall take this also awaye from me and some mysfortune happen apon him, then shall ye brynge my gray heed with sorow unto the grave'; and esp. Rutherford, Letters (No. xli.), 'I happened upon a convenient trusty bearer by God's wonderful providence.' 3. 2 Mac 13[7] 'Such a death it happened that wicked man to die,' the usual prep. being omitted. So Pr. Bk., 'Ordering of Priests,' 'And if it shall happen the same Church, or any member thereof, to take any hurt or hindrance by reason of your negligence, ye know the greatness of the fault, and also the horrible punishment that will ensue': in 1549 and 1552 the word is 'chance.' 4. The auxiliary to be (as well as to have) was formerly used with the verb to 'happen': so Jer 44[23] 'this evil is happened unto you'; Ro 11[25] (as above); and 2 P 2[22] 'But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb' (RV 'It has happened'). Cf. Mt 28[11] Tind. 'When they were gone, beholde, some of the kepers came in to the cyte, and shewed unto the hie prestes all the thinges that were happened.'

J. HASTINGS.

HAPPINESS.—This word, in its subst. shape, does not appear in the Eng. Bible, either in AV or in RV, and its synonym blessedness (occurring thrice in AV of NT) has now (see BLESSEDNESS) been changed by the Revisers (in accordance with the form μακαρισμός) into 'blessing' (Ro 4[6. 9]) and 'gratulation' (Gal 4[15]). The adj. μακάριος (almost invariably in OT representing Heb. אַשְׁרֵי 'ashrê, lit. happinesses of) is common enough in both Testaments. But while, in NT, the Revisers have reduced (cf. Jn 13[17]) the renderings by 'happy' to three (Ac 26[2], Ro 14[22], 1 Co 7[40]), and might consistently have reduced them to one (Ac 26[2]—the external happiness of St. Paul in pleading before Agrippa), the OT Revisers have left happy and blessed just where they were, except Jer 12[1], where the Heb. word (here alone in AV of OT rendered happy) is changed to at rest, its proper meaning. Even in Ps 128[1. 2] happy and blessed are left side by side to represent the same word; cf. also Pr 16[20] with Ps 34[8]. If Carlyle's dictum (Sartor Resartus) has any force, 'There is something higher than happiness, and that is blessedness,' blessed is the word for the spiritual region; and the retention of happy so often in RV of OT tends to merge this distinction in a way defensible only on the ground that outward prosperity entered largely into the OT conception of bliss.

The more usual word for happy in profane Greek, εὐδαίμων, does not occur in LXX or NT. Probably, the δαίμων component was a stumbling-block to Greek-speaking Jew and Christian; but the preference for μακάριος is altogether suitable to the atmosphere, since μακάριος, and not εὐδαίμων, represented to the Greeks the happiness of the divine life.

In the course of the gradual elevation of the word μακάριος, and the idea of happiness from the pagan to the Christian level, from Greek tragedy to the Sermon on the Mount, more than one point is worthy of note. While the ordinary pagan notion was purely external, and the tragedians, among the exponents of Gr. thought, will call no man happy till a happy death has set its seal upon a happy life (Soph. Trach. 1 ff., cf. Hdt. i. 32); yet, in their view, continued prosperity was conditioned by natural piety and reverence (Soph. Œd. R. passim, and Hdt. iii. 40); and hence their preference for εὐδαίμων, 'with a good genius attending.' The Gr. philosophical schools, on the other hand, looking for a happiness secure from 'the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,' discerned its possibility, some mainly in the moral, as Socrates, who defined happiness as εὐπραξία, well-doing, rather than εὐτυχία, good luck (Xen. Mem. iii. 9. 14); others, more strictly in the intellectual, as Plato, whose notion of happiness reached its climax in the wisdom consisting in the cognition of the Ideal Good (Rep. 519), this cognition being the crowning point of the 'resemblance to God as far as possible' (Theæt. 176*b*); others, as Aristotle, in the intellectually practical, 'the life in obedience to the intellect,' 'the rational virtuous activity of the soul in a life fully provided,' 'the performance by man of the peculiar work which belongs to him as man' (Eth. Nic. i. 6, ii. 5, x. 4); while the Stoics looked for happiness in a life 'conformed to nature,' and combined with ἀταραξία, absence of all emotion.

The difference between such philosophical notions of happiness and the biblical, lies not so much in inwardness, as in the fundamental conditions of that inwardness, its relations, its developments, its possibilities. The blessedness even of some of the noblest conceptions of the OT is linked to the external (Ps 34[8. 12. 13. 14]), though sometimes the external seems to be transcended (Ps 84[5. 7] 4[7] 119[1. 111]), and, even when the external is foremost, it always connotes righteousness and the consequent favour of God towards individual, family, or race, in the present or in the Messianic age (see BLESSEDNESS). But the element in biblical happiness which had been lacking to all previous thought was the personal relation, and that not only as faith in God, personal and ever-present (Ps 33[12. 20. 21]), but as love for Him, this being the highest requisite (Dt 6[4. 5], Jg 5[3], Ps 4[6. 7]); and the most satisfying blessedness is to be in His presence and to behold His face (Pss 16. 17. 49). In NT we reach the 'roof and crown.' The happiness is now clearly inward, spiritual and present (Mt 5[2ff.]); and now the way to the personal relation is opened up through Jesus Christ, personal, loving (Jn 15[9]), ever-living (Jn 14[6], He 10[20]). Whatever the outward may be (Ro 8[38f.]), He is God with us (Mt 1[23] 18[20]); nay, veritable evils endured for Him and with Him actually make us blessed now (Mt 5[10f.], 1 P 4[14]). More than this, He is Christ in us, the hope of glory (Col 1[27]); for the time shall come when, all hindrances being taken away, and the internal embodying itself in external realization,* 'we shall be like him' (1 Jn 3[1. 2], cf. Plato above cited) in the full enjoyment of the eternal life (1 Jn 5[11], Mt 25[46], Mk 10[30], Jn 17[22-24]). (See articles by the present writer, Expositor, 1st series, vols. ix. x. 'A Word Study in the NT, μακάριος').

HARA (הֲרָא, Vulg. Ara) occurs 1 Ch 5[26] as one of the cities or regions to which the Israelitish captives from Samaria were deported by the Assyrians. Modern scholars have often tried the hazardous etymology from הָר 'mountain' (presupposing a bad orthography instead of הרה !). From this etymology and the corresponding words of Kings, they concluded that the Western part of Media was meant, called Media Magna by classic writers, 'Irāḳ al-ajamî 'the Persian I.,' by the Arabs, or al-Jibāl, i.e. 'the mountainous region,' Kohistan by the Persians. But the name is wanting in the LXX (only Lucian's recension, ed. de Lagarde, has Ἀρραν, which looks like an emendation to the name חרן Haran). The corresponding passages 2 K 17[6] 18[11] have the expression עָרֵי מָדָי 'the Median cities,' but LXX ὄρη Μήδων 'the Median mountains.' This latter reading (which seems to be the more original text) furnishes the key to the name Hara. It is evidently due to a misreading of that original text הרי מדי, and represented originally hārê 'mountains of.' This misunderstanding is usually attributed to the Chronicler; but after the LXX, it would be rather an awkward addition by a later reader who missed the expression added in Kings. Of earlier comparisons hardly any deserve to be mentioned. Bochart (Phaleg) thought of Aria in Persia (Herod. iii. 93, vii. 62, 66). The name begins with an h according to the Persian inscriptions, but the country is too remote. No Assyrian king ever possessed Aria (Herod. vii. 62 is mistaken, and contradicts himself, identifying Arians and Medians). W. MAX MÜLLER.

HARADAH (חֲרָדָה, Χαραδάθ).—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites, mentioned only Nu 33[24. 25]. It has not been identified.

HARAN (חָרָן, 'mountaineer' (?)).—1. Son of Terah, younger brother of Abram, and father of Lot, Gn 11[26] (P), also father of Milcah and Iscah, v.[29] (J). Dillmann rejects the view of Wellh. (Prol. 330) and Budde (Urgesch. 443) that חרן is a mere variation of הרן. 2. A Gershonite Levite, 1 Ch 23[9].

HARAN (חָרָן, Χαρράν; Haran) is situated in the N.W. of Mesopotamia on the Belias, a tributary of the Euphrates, S.E. of Edessa (Oorfa), in a country rendered very fertile by watercourses from the Belias, which rises, at a distance of several miles, from the hills S. of the Euphrates. The origin of Haran is lost in antiquity, but it must have been early inhabited by Semites, perhaps Babylonians, the name of the city being expressed in cuneiform by an ideograph (Ḫarranu, 'road'), which was probably given it on account of its being a crossing point of the Syrian, Assyrian, and Babylonian trade-routes. The merchants of this city are mentioned in Ezk 27[23].

Nothing remains of the ancient city but a long range of mounds on both sides of the river and the ruins of a castle or fortress of a very ancient date, built of large blocks of basaltic rock; it has square columns 8 ft. thick supporting an arched roof 30 ft. high. The town is now represented only by a village on the slope of the hill. The small houses or huts are built (perhaps for want of timber) in the peculiar fashion depicted on the Assyrian basreliefs, i.e. with domed roofs. According to tradition, the well where Rebekah was met by Abraham's messenger (Gn 24[15]) is near the city.

Haran is first mentioned when Abram and his family dwelt there after leaving Ur of the Chaldees on his way to Canaan (Gn 11[31]), and there the descendants of his brother settled, hence the name of 'the city of Nahor,' which it also bears (cf. Gn 24[10] with 27[43]). Haran is frequently mentioned in the cuneiform writings. Tiglath-pileser I. (B.C. 1120) in his great cylinder-inscription says that he killed ten elephants in 'the land of Haran,' and four he captured alive and took to his capital Asshur. Sargon says that he 'spread out his shadow over the city Haran, and as a soldier of Anu and Dagon wrote its laws'; and Sennacherib speaks of Gozan, Haran, and Rezeph as having been destroyed by one or more of his predecessors (2 K 19[12]). The name of the eponymy for the years B.C. 742 and 728, Bel-ḫarrani-bêli-uṣur, 'Lord of Haran, protect (my) lord,' would seem to indicate that Haran was then a very important city.

The great tutelary deity of Haran was the moon-god, Sin in Assyrian, known among the Semitic nations as Baal-Kharran or Lord of Haran, though other deities must have been worshipped there. An inscribed seal in the British Museum represents a priest in adoration before an altar, a small figure in the distance, and above the altar a star with the words 'The God of Haran.' Assur-bani-apli speaks of the god Sin as dwelling in Haran. The tablet K. 2701*a*, which is a letter apparently sent to Assur-bani-apli, seems to refer to the crowning of his father Esarhaddon when on his way to Egypt. Reference is made therein to the 'bethel' or temple at Haran, where the ceremony took place, and on this occasion the god Sin is said to have appeared to those present: 'When the father of the king my lord went to Egypt, he was crowned (?) in the kanni of Ḫarran, the temple * of cedar. The god Sin stood over the standard (?), two crowns upon his head, [and] the god Nusku stood before him. The father of the king my lord entered—[the crown] was placed upon his head,' etc. Later on, Nabonidus relates that Sin was angry with Haran and with his temple E-ḫul-ḫul (the house of joy) within it, and therefore allowed the Umman-manda (wandering hordes of Medes) to come and destroy it. Nabonidus then received from the gods Merodach and Sin, in a dream, instructions to rebuild the temple at Haran, and, when he pointed out that the Medes still surrounded the city, he was told by those gods that they would be destroyed, which destruction took place three years later under Cyrus. The city being relieved of the presence of the enemy, Nabonidus was able to finish the work of Shalmaneser and Assur-bani-apli, and, at the same time, to embellish the city. In the 5th cent. A.D. the Sabæans of Haran seem to have worshipped the sun as 'Bel-shamin,' the lord of heaven, later on using the Greek name of Ἥλιος. Gula (under the name of 'Gadlat') and Tar'ata (Atargatis or Derceto) are given by St. James of Seruj as the favourite goddesses of Haran. There was also a chapel dedicated to Abraham. The Roman general Crassus was defeated near Haran, but subsequently the province of Edessa fell into the power of the Romans, and Haran appears as a Roman city in the wars of Caracalla and Julian. It is worthy of notice that Haran retained until a late date the Chaldæan language and the worship of Chaldæan deities.

HARARITE, THE (הַחֲרָרִי), according to Ges. (Thes. 392) = 'a mountain-dweller,' but more probably it should be taken as a gentilic adjective = 'a native of Harar.' No such place is mentioned in the OT, but we may infer from 2 S 23[11f.] that it was situated somewhere near the Philistine frontier, probably in the Shephelah. Two (not three) of David's heroes are distinguished by this title.

* Lit. bethel (bêt-ili).

1. Shammah the son of Agee, 'one of the thirty' (2 S 23^{33} ὁ Ἀρωδείτης). In the parallel 1 Ch 11^{34} Shammah is probably to be read for Shagee (see Driver, Sam. l.c.). Further, in 2 S 23^{11} (where we must read 'the Hararite' [הַהַרְרִי for הָרָרִי]) it is probably Shammah and not Agee (wh. see) who is thus designated. The LXX to 2 S 23^{11} (ὁ Ἀρουχαῖος) points to a reading 'the Archite' (הָאַרְכִּי), which is partly supported by its rendering of 1 Ch 11^{34} (B ὁ Ἀραχεί and ὁ Ἀραρεί; A ὁ Ἀραρί). See AGEE, SHAMMAH.

2. Ahiam the son of Sharar (2 S 23^{33}; read הַהַרְרִי for הָאֲרָרִי; B Σαραουρείτης, A Ἀραρείτης). In the parallel 1 Ch 11^{35} Sharar appears as Sacar (אֲחִיאָם בֶּן שָׂכָר הַהֲרָרִי; B ὁ Ἀραρεί, A ὁ Ἀραρί). See AHIAM, SHARAR. J. F. STENNING.

HARBONA (חַרְבוֹנָא Est 1^{10}) or HARBONAH (חַרְבוֹנָה 7^{9}). LXX has Θαρρά in 1^{10} (B), Βουγαθάν in 7^{9}. —The third of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains who waited upon king Ahasuerus. It was he who suggested that Haman should be hanged upon the gallows which he had prepared for Mordecai. The name seems to be Persian: harban=donkey-driver. H. A. WHITE.

HARBOUR.—See HAVEN.

HARD.—The various meanings of 'hard,' whether as adj. or adv., may be given as follows: 1. Literally, not soft, only Job 41^{24}, Ezk 3^{9}, Wis 11^{4}, Sir 40^{15} 48^{17}. 2. Unfeeling, cruel: Ps 94^{4} 'How long shall they utter and speak hard things?' (RV 'They prate, they speak arrogantly'); Wis 19^{13} 'they used a more hard and hateful behaviour toward strangers' (RV 'grievous indeed was the hatred which they practised toward guests'). Cf. Wyclif, Works, iii. 115, 'The vi tyme we schul trowe, that aftyr xxxij yer he suffrid hard passioun, undir Pounce Pilate.' 3. Trying, exacting: Ex 1^{14} 'hard bondage' (RV 'hard service'); 2 S 3^{39} 'The sons of Zeruiah be too hard for me'; Ps 88^{7} 'Thy wrath lieth hard upon me'; Pr 13^{15} 'The way of transgressors is hard' (RV 'The way of the treacherous is rugged'); Mt 25^{24} 'Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man'; Jn 6^{60} 'This is an hard saying; who can hear it?'; Ac 9^{5} 'It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks'). 4. Obdurate: Jer 5^{3} 'They have made their faces harder than a rock'; Ezk 3^{9} 'As an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead.' Cf. Shaks. Ant. and Cleop. III. xi. 111—

> 'But when we in our viciousness grow hard,
> (O misery on't) the wise gods seel our eyes.'

5. Strenuous: only Jon 1^{13} 'the men rowed hard.' 6. Difficult: as Gn 18^{14} 'Is anything too hard for the Lord?' (RVm 'wonderful'); 1 K 10^{1} 'She came to prove him with hard questions'; Mk 10^{24} 'How hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God!' Cf. Rhem. NT, Preface, 'Moreover, we presume not in hard places to mollify the speaches or phrases, but religiously keepe them word for word, and point for point.' 7. Close, as Jg 9^{52} 'And Abimelech . . . went hard unto the door of the tower to burn it with fire'; Ps 63^{8} 'My soul followeth hard after thee'; Ac 18^{7} 'Justus . . . whose house joined hard to the synagogue.' This meaning of the word is common in early writers: cf. Lk 2^{9} Tind. 'And loo, the angell of the lorde stode harde by them'; Job 17^{1} Cov. 'I am harde at deathes dore.' It is sometimes used of time, as in Rhem. NT, note to Jn 20^{21} 'Though he gave them his peace hard before, yet now entering to a new divine action, to prepare their hartes to grace and attention, he blesseth them againe.'

For Harden, Hardening, see next article.

Hardiness.—This subst. occurs only in Jth 16^{10} 'The Persians quaked at her boldness, and the Medes were daunted at her hardiness' (θράσος, RV 'boldness'). Cf. Sir T. Elyot, Governour, ii. 47, 'What avayled fortune incomparable to the great kynge Alexander, his wonderfull puissance and hardynes, or his singular doctrine in philosophy, taught hym by Aristotle, in deliverynge hym from the deth in his yonge and flourisshing age?' So Cov. uses 'hardy' for 'bold' in Dn 11^{16} 'no man shalbe so hardy as to stonde agaynst him'; and Barlowe, 'hardily' for 'boldly' (Dialoge, p. 68), 'Use they such crafty conveyaunce in promotyng theyr Gospell? Ye hardely, and that without any shame when they be detected of it.'

Hardly does not occur in AV in the mod. sense of 'scarcely.' Its meanings there are two: 1. Harshly, grievously, Gn 16^{6} 'And when Sarai dealt hardly with her, she fled from her face' (וַתְּעַנֶּיהָ, AVm 'afflicted her'); and Is 8^{21} 'hardly bestead and hungry' (Amer. RV 'sore'; see BESTEAD). RV introduces 'hardly' in this sense into Job 19^{3}. 2. With difficulty, Ex 13^{15} 'And it came to pass, when Pharaoh would hardly let us go, that the LORD slew all the firstborn in the land of Egypt' (בְּהַקְשׁוֹת פַּרְעֹה לְשַׁלְּחֵנוּ, RVm 'hardened himself against letting us go'); Mt 19^{23} 'Verily I say unto you, That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven' (δυσκόλως; RV 'It is hard for a rich man to enter,' a change that is commended by Beckett [Should RV be Authorised? p. 100] as much better, though less literal than AV, since the latter suggests, according to our mod. idiom, that a rich man can scarcely enter the kingdom of heaven. The same Gr. adv. occurs in Mk 10^{23}, Lk 18^{24}, and is tr^{d} in the same way in AV, a tr^{n} which RV accepts in these places); Lk 9^{39} 'and bruising him hardly departeth from him' (μόγις, WH μόλις); Ac 27^{8} 'And, hardly passing it, came unto a place which is called The fair havens' (μόλις, RV 'with difficulty'). This meaning of 'hardly' may be seen in North's Plutarch, p. 889, 'Demetrius was so scared, that he had no further leysure, but to cast an ill-favoured cloke about him, the first that came to hand, and disguising himselfe to flie for life, and scaped very hardly, that he was not shamefully taken of his enemies for his incontinencie'; and T. Adams, II Peter (on 1^{4}), 'He that hath done evil once, shall more hardly resist it at the next assault.'

Hardness.—2 Ti 2^{3} 'Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ' (σὺ οὖν κακοπάθησον, edd. συνκακοπάθησον, RV 'Suffer hardship with me,' RVm 'Take thy part in suffering hardship'). Hardness for mod. 'hardship' is found in Shaks., as Cymb. III. vi. 21—

> 'Plenty, and peace, breeds cowards; hardness ever
> Of hardiness is mother.'

Elsewhere 'hardness' is either lit. of the clods (Job 38^{38}), or fig. of the heart (Mt 19^{8}, Mk 3^{5} 10^{5} 16^{14}, Ro 2^{5}). J. HASTINGS.

HARDENING.—The moral difficulty of this subject is the ascription in OT of the hardening of men's hearts to God. Pharaoh's is the typical case; and his story is so vivid in its dramatic unity and details that we cannot wonder that practically his case is regarded as if it were unique. But it is not so; it is only a striking example of a class. Pharaoh's history sets before us the picture of a conflict between the proud head of a great empire and the Almighty, a conflict in ten onsets, or a drama in ten acts, in the last of which the human tyrant comes to the ground. As his case is a typical one, it is important to note the salient features. First of all, the result is twice foretold. The Lord says, 'I will harden his heart' (Ex 4^{21} 7^{3}). In the case of the first five plagues and the seventh (river turned into blood, frogs, lice, flies, murrain, and hail) the phrase is 'Pharaoh hardened his heart' or 'his heart was hardened' (Ex $7^{14.\ 22}$ $8^{15.\ 19.\ 32}$ $9^{7.\ 34.\ 35}$). In the sixth, eighth, and ninth (boils, locusts, darkness) the phrase is 'the Lord hardened his heart' (9^{12} $10^{20.\ 27}$). Thus the result is not ascribed to God only; both the divine and the human agencies are recognized. Whatever God had to do with the result, Pharaoh's freedom of action was not interfered with. Again, it is significant that 'the Lord hardened his heart' follows 'Pharaoh hardened.' It is the phrase used, with one exception, in the second severer series of divine judgments. When the lighter ones failed, heavier ones were sent. And even in the second series the result in one case is ascribed solely to Pharaoh (hail, $9^{34.\ 35}$). Is it not evident that the divine action described in 'the Lord hardened' was a punishment for the previous disobedience of the king? Is it not equally certain that each judgment, up to the last one, while a punishment, was also a merciful warning and call to repentance? At each stage Pharaoh might have yielded instead of refusing. It should be noted that the phrase 'the Lord hardened' is peculiar to the OT; in the NT it occurs only in quotations from the Old.

The two modes of speech, however, are not confined to Pharaoh's case, but are common in OT. We find 'the Lord hardened' in Jos 11^{20}, Dt 2^{30}, Is 63^{17}, etc., the other phrase in passages like 1 S 6^{6}, 2 Ch 36^{13}, Ps 95^{8}. The language in such passages as Jg 9^{23}, 2 S 24^{1} may seem even more startling. But if we look into the context we shall find that, as in Pharaoh's case, the divine action is a punishment of sin. This language, which before reflection seems to shock our moral sense, is partly to be explained by the OT habit of recognizing the divine action everywhere in nature and history. The thunder is God's voice; storm and tempest do His will; heathen monarchs and empires are His instruments. Men at that early stage of revelation did not discriminate as we do between the different causes at work in events. If they did reflect, they would no doubt see that the two forms of language applied to the same events under different aspects. Very little observation would show them, as it shows us, that divine appeals and commands never leave men as they find them. If not yielded to, they increase insensibility, benumb and gradually deaden moral feeling. This effect is contrary to the divine purpose, and is entirely man's fault; but it is natural and inevitable. The more powerful the appeals, the more rapid the hardening process, until God's Spirit withdraws, and leaves man to his own ways (Ro 1^{28}). Looked at from the human side, Pharaoh, like every smaller transgressor, is seen acting with perfect freedom, consciously pitting his own will against God's, despising louder and louder warnings of ruin, self-punished and self-destroyed. Looked at from the divine side, God is seen commanding, forewarning, repeating rejected opportunities, doing everything to ensure submission and safety but coerce,—and at last leaving to destruction. It is evident that we have here again the old problem of reconciling the divine foreknowledge and government with human freedom and responsibility. Each element is attested by its own evidence. Both are necessary to a complete explanation. The two regions meet at some point invisible to human eye and undefinable in human speech and thought. 'To the Hebrew mind what we call secondary causes scarcely exist, at least in the sphere of religion. That which, in given circumstances, is the inevitable result of God's providential dispensations is viewed absolutely, apart from its conditions, as a distinct divine purpose' (Skinner on Is 6^{10}).

HARE (אַרְנֶבֶת 'arnebheth, δασύπους, lepus).—Four species of hare are found in Bible lands. They are all called by the Arabs 'arnabeh, which is the same as the Heb. 1. Lepus Syriacus, Hempr. et Ehr. It is a little smaller than the Eng. hare, and of a dark grey colour. It is common along the coast, and in the wooded and hilly districts of Pal. and Syria. 2. L. Sinaiticus, Hempr. et Ehr. This species is much smaller, with a longer and narrower head, and longer ears, and is of a lighter grey. It is found in the valleys about the Dead Sea, and southward to Sinai. 3. L. Ægyptius, Geoffr. This animal is not more than 18 in. long from the tip of the nose to the root of the tail. The ears are long, and fringed inside with white hairs. It is of a light sand colour above, and nearly white beneath. It is abundant in the Jordan Valley, and in S. Judæa and the N. part of et-Tih. 4. L. Isabellinus, Rüpp. The Nubian hare. This species is even smaller than the last, and is of a rich fawn colour. It is found only in the S.E. deserts of Palestine.

The hare is a rodent, and not a ruminant. The statement (Lv 11^{6}, Dt 14^{7}) that it 'cheweth the cud' is to be taken phenomenally, not scientifically. The Arab of the present day regards it as a ruminant, and for that reason eats its flesh. As Tristram well says, 'Moses speaks of animals according to appearances, and not with the precision of a comparative anatomist, and his object was to show why the hare should be interdicted, though to all appearance it chewed the cud, viz. because it did not divide the hoof. To have spoken otherwise would have been as unreasonable as to have spoken of the earth's motion, instead of sunset and sunrise.'

HAREPH (חָרֵף).—A Judahite chief, 1 Ch 2^{51}. See Genealogy.

HARHAIAH (חַרְחָיָה, Ἀραχίας, but AB𝔄 omit the clause, Neh 3^{8}).—Some Heb. texts read חַרְחָיָה, or even הַרְחָיָה. Uzziah the son of H., a goldsmith, repaired a portion of the wall of Jerus. in the days of Nehemiah.

HARHAS (חַרְחַס, Ἀραάς B, Ἀρδάς B^{b}, Ἀράς A, Ἀδρά Luc.).—Ancestor of Shallum, the husband of Huldah the prophetess (2 K 22^{14}). Called Hasrah חַסְרָה 2 Ch 34^{22}.

HARHUR (חַרְחוּר 'fever'? or 'freeborn').—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2^{51}, Neh 7^{53}), called in 1 Es 5^{31} Asur. See Genealogy.

HARIM (חָרִם, חֵרִם 'consecrated,' cf. Sabæan pr. name חרם).—1. A lay family which appears in the list of the returning exiles, Ezr 2^{32}=Neh 7^{35}; of those who had married foreign wives, Ezr 10^{31}; and of those who signed the covenant, Neh 10^{27} [Heb.^{28}].

2. A priestly family which appears in the same lists, Ezr 2^{39}=Neh 7^{42}, Ezr 10^{21}, Neh 10^{5} [Heb.^{6}]. The name is found also among 'the priests and Levites that went up with Zerubbabel,' Neh 12^{3}, where it is miswritten Rehum (רְחוּם); among the heads of priestly families in the days of Joiakim, Neh 12^{15}; and as the third of the 24 courses, 1 Ch 24^{8}. To which family Malchijah the son of Harim, one of the builders of the wall (Neh 3^{11}), belonged cannot be determined. See Genealogy.

H. A. White.

HARIPH (חָרִיף, חָרִף, cf. חֹרֶף, 'autumn'). A family which returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Neh 7^{24}), and signed the covenant, Neh 10^{19} [Heb.^{20}]. In Ezr 2^{18} the name appears as Jorah; so Lucian in Neh 7^{24} Ἰωρήε. Hareph (חָרֵף) is named as a Calebite in 1 Ch 2^{51}, and one of David's companions in 1 Ch 12[5] is termed a Haruphite (חֲרוּפִי, Kethibh), or Hariphite (חָרִיפִי Kerê). The latter reading, if correct, perhaps points to a connexion with Hariph. See GENEALOGY.

HARLOT (זוֹנָה, אִשָּׁה קְדֵשָׁה, קְדֵשָׁה, LXX and NT πόρνη) is the name used in our English versions to describe different classes of women who come under the ban of morality. It is sometimes applied generally to women, including married women, of profligate life (Pr), but specially it denotes those who systematically gave themselves up to such a course of life, either for gain, or as a form of religious service. The existence of a class roughly corresponding to that which the name suggests to us may be traced throughout the history of Israel, originating as it did out of universally working conditions, and after the Solomonic period developing to the full its shamelessness, its seductive arts, and its blighting influence (Is 23[16], Jer 3[3] 5[7], Ezk 16[25], Pr 7[10] 29[3]). But in OT times the harlot represented more than a moral problem and a moral danger of the utmost gravity. It is not too much to say that she was the concrete embodiment of the most powerful and insidious force menacing the purity and permanence of Mosaism. Like their kindred who took possession of the valley of the Euphrates, like the Greeks who were invaded by Phœnician commerce and culture, the Hebrews in Canaan found themselves in contact with a type of religion which deified the reproductive forces of nature, and paid them homage in the form of licentious rites and orgies. The harlot was thus invested with sanctity as a member of the religious caste, and the question was whether a licentious cult was to establish itself in the soil of Jahwism even as it naturalized itself in Babylon (cf. Herod. i. 199), and in Cythera and Corinth (Strabo, viii. 6). And undoubtedly the Canaanitish leaven deeply infected the popular Hebrew religion. In the story of Tamar's intrigue to secure her rights from the house of her deceased husband (Gn 38), she is spoken of as a קְדֵשָׁה—one of the consecrated class—when she sits at the entrance of a village in the guise of a harlot. Especially does Hosea (4[14]) give us a vivid picture of the extent to which the local sanctuaries, where the worship of Baal and Astarte had been syncretized with that of J", were coloured by the legitimated prostitution of servants of the divinities. In some sanctuaries a still lower depth was reached, and emasculated enthusiasts (קְדֵשִׁים) earned for the shrine 'the wages of a dog' by giving themselves up to that 'which is against nature.' These practices the prophets of the 8th cent. denounced as the height of impiety and the sure provocation of national judgments (Am 2[7], Hos 4[13ff.]). By Asa and Jehoshaphat steps were taken to purge the land of the viler abomination (1 K 15[12] 22[46], cf. 14[24]); and the Deuteronomic code explicitly banished both classes of 'paramours' from Israel, and prohibited the acceptance of their unholy gains as temple-revenue (Dt 23[17. 18], where see Driver's note in loc. with reff.). With idolatry prostitution was made an end of by the Exile. The Levitical legislation recalls the abominations of the Canaanites as the special ground of their rejection and destruction (Lv 20[23]), and appears to have the class of harlots solely in view as created and sustained by moral depravity. The more important of its enactments are that which forbids a priest to take a harlot to wife (Lv 21[7]), and the injunction that the daughter of a priest playing the harlot shall be burnt with fire (v.[9]).

Upon the OT treatment of the subject it may be remarked as startling that there is no express condemnation of sexual immorality which does not involve violation of the marriage-bond. At the most, fornication seems to be condemned in Pr as health- and wealth-destroying folly, while the general tenor of the OT morality is content to proscribe adultery and religious prostitution. In explanation of this, it may be observed that the true ethical attitude towards prostitution was impossible so long as marriage was in the transitional stage mirrored in OT, and that the OT at least unfolded a conception of the divine holiness and its relation to sexual purity which was destined to mature into the higher sexual morality.

In NT the harlot, again, is associated with an important element of teaching. While it was part of the mission of the prophets to refute the horrible idea of the sacredness of her calling, it was a characteristic part of the work of Jesus to rescue her from the Pharisaic tribunal, and bring her within the pale of mercy and redemption (Mt 21[31. 32]). She illustrates at once the compassion of Jesus, His insight into the unexpressed longings and possibilities of degraded human nature, and the regenerative power of sympathy. In the apostolic writings we see some repetition of the conflict between the genius of revealed religion and the lax and antagonistic sexual morality of heathenism. In the Epistles to the Corinthians especially, St. Paul was addressing a community whose licentiousness had become a byword even in the putrefying cities of the classical world; and it is necessary for him to enlighten the Christian conscience as to the incompatibility of union with Christ with its hideous contrast in filthy 'conversation' (1 Co 6[15. 16]). And in various apostolic passages the prohibition of the Decalogue is explicated or extended so as expressly to exclude the sin in question (Gal 6[19ff.]).

From the prophetic period the harlot was not only involved in, but was the symbol of, idolatry. The experience of Hosea seems to have suggested her faithlessness and fickleness as a fit emblem of the dealings of Israel with her true Lord and with other gods (see IDOLATRY).

LITERATURE.—On Prostitution as a religious institution in the ancient world, see Lucian, 'De Dea Syria'; Pausanias, 'Descriptio Græciæ'; Movers, Die Phönizier. On the special subject Selden, 'De uxore Hebraica'; Hamburger's Lexicon; Benzinger, Hebräische Archæologie.

HAR-MAGEDON.—Rev 16[16] 'And he (AV; who? the sixth angel or the Almighty? RV 'they,' the three unclean spirits of v.[17]) gathered them (the kings of the whole world, not 'the spirits of the Demons,' as Hommel explains in the passage to be quoted below) together into the place, which is called in Hebrew Armageddon' (AV, 'Har-Magedon' RV). The reading, as well as the meaning and even the context, of this hapax-legomenon is very uncertain.

(1) The TR spells Ἀρμαγεδδών; Lachmann, Tregelles, Tischendorf, Alford, Ἁρμαγεδών; WH Ἁρ Μαγεδών (the second word spaced out and in quotation type, referring to Zec 12[11] [Heb.]). Several Greek MSS have but Μαγεδών or Μαγεδδών (thus Q). The shorter reading is supported by Tyconius and, now, by the (older) Syriac translation discovered and edited by Gwynn (Dublin, 1897): ܡܓܕܘܢ. The later Syriac translation (commonly printed with the Peshiṭta) has ܐܪܡܓܕܘܢ (not quoted in the Thesaurus Syriacus, col. 390). The shorter form must have arisen at a time when the whole word was considered to be a compound.

(2) The oldest explanation put forward in the Church seems to be that of Hippolytus, unhappily preserved only in Arabic (P. Lagardii, ad Analecta sua Syriaca Appendix, Lipsiæ, 1858, p. 27 n. 18): 'the meaning of this expression is the smooth (soft, trodden) place الموضع الوطي.' Is this = πεδίον ἐκκοπτομένου, the Septuagint rendering of בְּקָעַת מְגִדּוֹן in Zec 12^{11}? (For the Arabic expression comp. وطيّة قدم = βῆμα ποδός, Ac 7^{6}). It is added that Hippolytus understood it of the valley of Jehoshaphat, Jl 4^{2} [Eng. 3^{11}] ^{12} (Hippolytus ed. [Bonwetsch-] Achelis, I. ii. 236).

Origen-Eusebius excluded the Apocalypse from their Bible Dictionary, but in the Onomastica Vaticana 'Αρμαγεδδών is explained: εἰς τὰ ἔμπροσθεν ἐξέγερσις (Onomastica sacra, ed. de Lagarde, p. 187, l. 45), i.e. הַר מְקֻדָּם, עֵר, and Jerome, who saw in it Mt. Tabor, explained likewise (ib. 80, 11): 'Armageddon (cod. H -gedon): consurrectio tecti (? עֵר מְגֻנָּא) sive consurrectio in priora, sed melius mons a latrunculis (cod. H om. mons; הַר מְגֻדּוּד) vel mons globosus' (ה׳ מְגַּר; גַּר = coriandrum).

(3) For a long time the explanation (הַר מְגִדּוֹן) 'the mount (of) Megiddo,' was considered pretty certain; see Westcott-Hort, ii. p. 313, who compare Ἀρ Γαριζείν, Ἀρ Σαφάρ, to which may be added, from the Hexapla, Ἀρ Σιών, Ps 47 (48)[3]. Older scholars had also compared 'Αρσαμώσατα of the Classics, while Westcott-Hort prefer to see in the latter name another example of Αρ = עֵר (עִיר) 'town,' as in עֵר מוֹאָב (Nu 21^{28}, Is 15^{1}; transliterated in the latter place Ἀρ Μωάβ by Theodotion). The latter explanation was put forward long ago by Hiller and adopted by Hitzig, Hilgenfeld, Völter, and others.

A third explanation started from the root חרם (comp. חֶרְמָה Nu 21^{28}; חַרְמוֹן); thus Luther in his marginal gloss 'verdammte Krieger, verfluchte Rüstung . . . ab Herem et gad.' Older explanations need not be quoted here; see Poole, Synopsis Criticorum, ed. Franc. (1712) vol. v. 1829. Makkedah (מַקֵּדָה, LXX Μακηδά), where 'the five kings' were slain (Jos $10^{16.\ 26}$), lies too far away to be thought of.

(4) Upon the whole, to find an allusion here to MEGIDDO (see article) is still the most probable explanation. Megiddo was famous for the defeat and death of Josiah (2 K 23^{29}, 2 Ch 35^{22}; alluded to Zec 12^{11}); but it is not on account of this unhappy event that the place seems to be mentioned, but because of the victory over 'the kings of Canaan' (Jg 5^{19}). It has been objected that Megiddo lies in the plain (ἐν τῷ πεδίῳ M., 2 Ch 35^{22}; ἐπὶ ὕδατι M., Jg 5^{19}; עַל מֵי מְגִדּוֹ), and that a mountain was not a fit battleplace (Bousset, ad loc.). But in the very context of Jg 5 'Mt. Tabor' and 'the high places of the field' are mentioned (Jg $4^{6.\ 8.\ 12}$ 5^{18}).

(5) Hommel ('Inschriftliche Glossen u. Exkurse zur Genesis u. zu den Propheten,' Neue Kirchliche Zeitschrift, 1890, vi. pp. 407, 408) seems to have been the first who saw in Har-Magedon the הַר מוֹעֵד of Is 14^{13} (the mount in the north where the gods meet), supposing that a redactor corrected an original μανέδ or μωέδ into μαγεδών. He might have recalled the fact that in certain cases ע is transliterated by γ. This view was carried out by Gunkel (Schöpfung und Chaos, 1894), who finds here the remnant of an ancient tradition about the battle of the gods on a mountain, and reminds us of the gathering of the fallen angels on Mt. Hermon, Enoch 6^{6}. (To the literature quoted by Bousset add: The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, edited by R. H. Charles, Oxf. 1896, ch. xviii. p. 22). Siegfried (Theol. Lit.-zeitung, 1895, col. 304) also thinks that in Harmagedon the הַר מוֹעֵד of Is 14^{13} and Μαγιδδώ seem to have coalesced. Ewald (Die Johanneischen Schriften, ii. 1862, 294) found by calculation that ארמגדון and רומה הגדולה 'the great Rome,' have the same numerical value—304. The question whether there is in the passage an allusion to Nero and the Parthians must be left to the commentators on the Apocalypse. The solution of the riddle is to be sought for in the apocalyptic literature of the Jews.

HARNEPHER (חֲרְנֶפֶר).—An Asherite, 1 Ch 7^{36}. See GENEALOGY.

HARNESS.—In AV harness always means armour, and to harness means to put on armour, RV gives 'armour' in 1 K 20^{11}, 2 Ch 9^{24}, and 'armed' in Ex 13^{18}; while Amer. RV prefers 'armour' also in 1 K 22^{34}, 2 Ch 18^{33}; both have left Jer 46^{4} untouched: 'Harness the horses.' The meaning is not (as Cheyne and most edd.) yoke the horses to the chariots, but put on their accoutrements. These being chiefly of armour, 'harness' was once a good tr^{n}, but now it is misleading. Cf. 1 Mac 6^{43} 'One of the beasts, armed with royal harness, was higher than all the rest' (RV 'breastplates'). In Apocr. 'harness' occurs also, 1 Mac 3^{3} (RV retains), 6^{41} (RV 'arms'), 2 Mac 3^{25} 5^{3} 15^{28} (RV all 'armour'); and the verb in 1 Mac 4^{7} (RV 'fortified'), 6^{38} (RV 'protected'). Examples of the word are, Nu 32^{20} Tind. 'And Moses sayed unto them, Yf ye will do this thinge, that ye will go all harnessed before the Lorde to warre, and will go all of you in harnesse over Iordane before the Lorde . . . then ye shall returne and be without sinne agenst the Lorde and agenst Israel'; Is 22^{6} Cov. 'I sawe the Elamites take the quyvers to carte and to horse, and that the walles were bare from harnesse'; Knox on Ps 6 (Works, iii. 141) represents David as saying, 'Didest not thow anis inflame my heart with the zeale of thy halie name, that when all Israell wer so effrayit that none durst encounter with that monster Goliath, yit thy Majesties spreit maid me so bold and valiaunt, that without harnes or weaponis (except my sling, staf, and stonis) I durst interpryes singular battell aganis him?' And Tindale on 1 Jn 5^{18} says, 'And as men of war they ever keep watch and prepare themselves unto war, and put on the armour of God, the which is God's word, the shield of faith, the helmet of hope, and harness themselves with the meditation of those things which Christ suffered for us.'

HARNESS.—(1) For shiryan (שִׁרְיָן 1 K 22^{34} ‖ 2 Ch 18^{33}), 'shirt of mail.' RV (Amer.) 'armour.' See BREASTPLATE. (2) For neshek (נֶשֶׁק 2 Ch 9^{24}), 'arms' (defensive or offensive), RV 'armour.' (3) For πανοπλία (2 Mac 15^{28}), 'the complete offensive and defensive equipment of a soldier'; RV 'full armour.'

Harnessed for ḥămushim (חֲמֻשִׁים Ex 13^{18}), RV 'armed.' See ARMS, ARMOUR.

HAROD (הָרֹד).—A spring (עַיִן, not 'well' AV) beside which Gideon and his army encamped prior to their attack upon the Midianites (Jg 7^{1}). It was here that the famous test by the mode of drinking took place. In v.^{3} there is probably a characteristic play upon the word הָרֵא, 'whosoever is fearful and trembling' (חָרֵד). The site of Harod is not quite certain, although it is extremely probable that it should be identified with 'Ain Jalûd [Gilead (?); see GILEAD (MOUNT)], about $1\frac{3}{4}$ miles E.S.E. of Zerin (Jezreel). Robinson describes this as a spring of excellent water, spreading out into a fine limpid pool of 40 to 50 ft. in diameter, which abounds in fish. A stream sufficient to turn a mill issues from it. 'Ain Jalûd was probably also the spring beside which Saul encamped before the battle of Gilboa (1 S 29^{1}). It 'flows out from under a sort of cavern in the wall of conglomerate rock, which here forms the base of Mt. Gilboa' (Robinson). 'Ain Jalûd is mentioned in the days of the Crusades as Tubania (Will. Tyr. xxii. 26). Bohaeddin (Vit. Salad. p. 53) gives the name as 'Ain el-Jalût ('spring of Goliath'). This is no doubt a reminiscence of a Jewish legend (Asher, Benj. of Tudela, ii. 429 f.) that it was here that David slew Goliath.

HARODITE (הַחֲרֹרִי).—A designation applied in 2 S 23[25] to two of David's heroes, Shammah and Elika. The second is wanting in LXX and in the parallel list in 1 Ch 11[27]. In the latter passage, by a common scribal error (ר for ד and ה for ח) the Harodite (הַחֲרוֹרִי) has been transformed into the Harorite (הַהֲרוֹרִי). So Oxf. Heb. Lex., Siegfried-Stade, Driver, Kittel; cf. GENEALOGY, vol. ii. p. 132. 'The Harodite' was probably a native of 'Ain-ḥarod, Jg 7[1]. See preceding article.

HAROEH (הָרֹאֶה 'the seer').—A Judahite, 1 Ch 2[52]. Perhaps the name should be corrected to Reaiah (רָאָיָה). Cf. 1 Ch 4[2], and see GENEALOGY.

HARORITE.—See HARODITE.

HAROSHETH of the Gentiles (חֲרֹשֶׁת הַגּוֹיִם) was the dwelling place of Sisera (Jg 4[2]), from which he advanced against Barak (v.[13]) and to which he fled after his defeat (v.[16]). The descriptive epithet 'of the Gentiles' is obscure; it may have been given to distinguish this place from a neighbouring Israelite Harosheth. H. is generally identified (by Moore rather doubtfully) with el-Ḥarathîyeh, on the right bank of the lower Kishon, at a point which commands the entrance to the Great Plain from the Plain of Acre and the commercial roads that led through it. Buhl objects that Harosheth cannot have been near the Kishon, and that a long distance must have separated it from the battlefield (cf. Jg 4[13. 16]). This objection would have much more force if we could be sure that the story is a unity, but, upon the theory of a Jabin and a Sisera narrative having been combined, the situation of el-Ḥarathîyeh suits the Harosheth, which is uniformly connected with Sisera as Hazor is with Jabin. See further, JABIN, JAEL, SISERA.

LITERATURE.—Thomson (the first to identify with el-Harathîyeh), Land and Book[2], ii. 215 ff.; G. A. Smith, HGHL 393 f.; Baedeker-Socin, Pal.[2] 241; Buhl, GAP 214; SWP vol. i. sh. v.; Conder, Tent-Work, i. 132; Moore, Judges, 107 f., 119, 122.

HARP.—See MUSIC.

HARROW.—1. In modern agriculture the harrow is used both for breaking stiff soil and preparing it for the seed, and for covering in the seed when sown. For the latter purpose the harrow was certainly not used either in Bible times or later by the Jews, who ploughed in the seed (the technical word for which was חָפָה, see Vogelstein, Die Landwirthschaft in Palästina zur Zeit der Mishnah, 1 Theil, 'Der Getreidebau,' 1894, p. 36) as their successors the Syrian fellahin do to this day (PEFSt, 1891, p. 116, ZDPV xii. p. 29).* As to the use of the harrow in preparing the ground for seed, the case is not so clear. On the one hand, we find in three passages of the OT unmistakable reference to some method, in addition to ordinary ploughing, for breaking up the soil preparatory to sowing. 'Doth the ploughman plough continually?' it is asked, 'doth he continually open and break the clods of his ground?' (Is 28[24] RV). The last of these operations (Heb. יְשַׂדֵּד) is usually understood as, and often rendered by, harrowing (e.g. by Cheyne, Delitzsch, etc.). The same word is found in two other passages (Hos 10[11], Job 39[10]), where it certainly denotes some agricultural operation by means of an implement to which an ox or other animal might be harnessed, as in the question, 'Canst thou bind the wild ox with his band in the furrow, or will he harrow (יְשַׂדֵּד) the valleys after thee?' (Job 39[10] RV—the only passage where the verb is so rendered in our EV). On the strength of these passages it has been the custom to regard harrowing as the operation intended, and the harrow as in ordinary use among the Hebrews for the purpose stated. (See AGRICULTURE, vol. i. p. 49[a]).

On the other hand, we must reckon with the following facts:—(a) the harrow is an implement unknown to the ancient Egyptians (Wilkinson, Manners and Customs, etc., ed. Birch, ii. 395) and the early Greeks (Büchsenschütz, Besitz. und Erwerb, etc. 304); (b) the harrow itself is not named either in the OT—see 2 below—or in the Mishna, which is so rich in the technical vocabulary of agriculture (see esp. Vogelstein's exhaustive study above cited, p. 42, n. 33); (c) it is not in ordinary use among the Syrian peasantry to-day (ZDPV xii. 31, and cf. list of modern agricultural implements by Post, PEFSt, 1891, p. 110). In the face of these facts, the use of the harrow by the Hebrews must at least be left an open question. It is not improbable that שָׂדַד may be a technical term for one of the various ploughings which were customary, in later times at least, before the soil was ready to receive the seed (cf. Vogelstein, op. cit. p. 36, n. 68), and may possibly correspond to our cross-ploughing. The Greek translators of Job, it may be noted, understood it of ploughing (ἑλκύσει σου αὔλακας ἐν πεδίῳ, 39[10]), and we know that the Roman authorities much preferred ploughing to harrowing as a means of breaking up the stiff surface (Pliny, Nat. Hist. XVIII. ch. xlix.; Columella, II. iv. 2).

2. Throughout this discussion we have avoided any reference to the two passages in our EV where harrows are expressly mentioned. The captive population of Rabbah 'of the children of Ammon,' David, we read, 'put under saws, and under harrows of iron (חֲרִיצֵי הַבַּרְזֶל), and under axes of iron,' etc. (2 S 12[31], and with slight variations 1 Ch 20[3]). By 'harrows of iron' it has been usual to understand—following the LXX ἐν τοῖς τριβόλοις τοῖς σιδηροῖς—the threshing-board or drag (חָרִיץ Am 1[3], Job 41[22] [Eng.[30]]) of the husbandman, with its under side set with nails and sharp flints (see AGRICULTURE, vol. i. p. 50[b]). It is extremely doubtful, however, if this cruelty can be laid to David's charge. Almost all modern scholars are in favour of a rendering resembling that suggested in the margin of our RV. In this case the word rendered 'harrows,' which etymologically denotes a sharp instrument, may be the 'pick,' and the whole would read: 'he put them (to forced labour) with saws, and with picks, and axes of iron, and made them labour (reading הַעֲבִיר for הַעֲבִיר) at the brick-mould.' (See Driver, Text of Sam. 226 ff.; Condamin, Rev. Bibl., April 1898, p. 253 ff.).

HARSHA (חַרְשָׁא).—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2[52], Neh 7[54]), called in 1 Es 5[32] Charea. See GENEALOGY.

HARSITH (חַרְסִית Kerê, חַרְכוּת Kethîbh).—The name of a gate in Jerusalem (Jer 19[2] RV). RVm has 'the gate of potsherds,' i.e. where they were thrown out (Oxf. Heb. Lex.). AV deriving the word from חֶרֶס 'sun,' has 'the east gate,' AVm 'the sun gate.' LXX has B Θαρσεῖς, א[c.a] Χαρσίθ, AQ Χαρσειθ. This gate led into the Valley of Hinnom. See JERUSALEM.

HART (אַיָּל 'ayyâl, ἔλαφος, cervus).—The Arab. 'iyyal undoubtedly refers to the same animal. It is probably Cervus Dama, L., the true fallow deer, but not that of AV Dt 14^5, 1 K 4^{23}, which is a mistrn of yaḥmûr, and should read roebuck. The fallow deer is found in Amanus, and is said by Tristram to exist also in the wooded region N.W. of Tabor, and by the Litany River. The present writer has not, however, been able to verify this statement. Hasselquist met with it on Mt. Tabor. It may have become extinct there only in recent times. It seems clear from the fact that it appeared daily upon Solomon's table (1 K 4^{23}), and from the freq. allusions to it in OT, that it was once abundant in Pal. and Syria. It is expressly mentioned as allowed for food (Dt $12^{15.\ 22}$ 15^{22} 14^5). Its power of leaping is noted (Is 35^6), esp. that of its fawn (Ca $2^{9.\ 17}$ 8^{14}). Its weakness when hungry is spoken of (La 1^6), as also its longing for water (Ps 42^1). The former passage certainly, and the latter prob., alludes to the chase.

* Roman writers regard harrowing after sowing as bad husbandry (see 'Agriculture' in Smith's Dict. of Antiquities).

The Hind (אַיָּלָה 'ayyâlâh) is also freq. mentioned. Naphtali is compared to a 'hind let loose' (Gn 49^{21}, where, however, the text appears to be corrupt, see Ball's note in Haupt's OT). Her calving is alluded to (Job 39^1, Ps 29^9), and she is spoken of as deserting her young for lack of pasture (Jer 14^5). She is sure-footed (2 S 22^{34}, Ps 18^{33}, Hab 3^{19}). The tune Hind of the Morning (marg. title Ps 22 for Aijeleth hash-Shahar) may illustrate the early habits of the deer tribe in search of water and food. The writer has often seen gazelles, at break of day, feeding in the desert. G. E. Post.

HARUM (הָרֻם, but the vocalization is doubtful). —A Judahite, 1 Ch 4^8. See Genealogy.

HARUMAPH (חָרוּמָף, Ἐρωμάφ, Ἐρωμάθ B. Neh 3^{10}). —Jedaiah, the son of H., assisted in repairing the walls of Jerus. under Nehemiah.

HARUPHITE.—1 Ch 12^5. See Hariph.

HARUZ (חָרוּץ, perhaps 'keen' or 'diligent'; Ἀρούς BA Luc.)—Father of Meshullemeth, mother of Amon king of Judah (2 K 21^{19}).

HARVEST.—See Agriculture and Vintage.

HASADIAH (חַסַדְיָה 'J" is kind').—A son of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch 3^{20}. The Gr. form Asadias occurs in Bar 1^1. See Genealogy.

HASHABIAH (חֲשַׁבְיָה).—1. 2. Two Levites of the sons of Merari, 1 Ch 6^{45} 9^{14}, Neh 11^{15}. 3. One of the sons of Jeduthun, 1 Ch 25^3. 4. A Hebronite, 1 Ch 26^{30}. 5. The 'ruler' of the Levites, 1 Ch 27^{17}. 6. A chief of the Levites in the time of Josiah, 2 Ch 35^9, called in 1 Es 1^9 Sabias. 7. One of the Levites who were induced to return under Ezra, Ezr 8^{19}, called in 1 Es 8^{48} Asebias. 8. One of the twelve priests entrusted with the holy vessels, Ezr 8^{24}, called in 1 Es 8^{54} Assamias. 9. The 'ruler of half the district of Keilah,' who helped to repair the wall, Neh 3^{17}, and sealed the covenant, Neh 10^{11} $12^{24.\ 26}$. 10. A Levite, Neh 11^{22}. 11. A priest, Neh 12^{21}. In all probability these eleven are not all distinct, but we have not sufficient data to enable us to effect the necessary reduction of the list. See Genealogy.

HASHABNAH (חַשַּׁבְנָה for חֲשַׁבְיָה?).—One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10^{25} [Heb.^{26}]).

HASHABNEIAH (חַשַּׁבְנְיָה for חֲשַׁבְיָה?).—1. Father of a builder of the wall (Neh 3^{10}). 2. A Levite, Neh 9^5 = Hashabiah of Ezr $8^{19.\ 24}$, Neh 10^{11} 11^{22} 12^{24}. See Genealogy.

HASHBADDANAH (חַשְׁבַּדָּנָה). — One of the men, probably Levites, who stood on the left hand of Ezra at the reading of the law (Neh 8^4). In 1 Es 9^{44} Nabarias.

HASHEM.—See Gizonite, Jashen.

HASHMANNIM.—See Psalms.

HASHMONAH (חַשְׁמֹנָה).—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites, mentioned only Nu $33^{29.\ 30}$. The LXX reading (Σελμωνά, Ἀσελμωνά, AF) appears to confuse this station with the Zalmonah of v.^{41}.

HASHUBAH (חַשֻּׁבָה 'consideration').—A son of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch 3^{20}. See Genealogy.

HASHUM (חָשֻׁם).—1. The eponym of a family of returning exiles (Ezr 2^{19} 10^{33}, Neh 7^{22} 10^{18}), called in 1 Es 9^{33} Asom. 2. One of those who stood on Ezra's left hand at the reading of the law (Neh 8^4). In 1 Es 9^{44} Lothasubus. See Genealogy.

HASIDÆANS (חֲסִידִים from חָסִיד 'pious,' in the sense of active love to God [Cheyne, Ps. 378], or because piety is supposed to be implied by kindness [Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.]; grecized into Ἀσιδαῖοι) occurs in three passages in the Apocr. 1 Mac 2^{42} (A) speaks of a company Ἀσιδαίων (some important MSS read Ἰουδαίων), and describes them as devoted to the law. 1 Mac $7^{12.\ 13}$ associates them with 'a company of scribes,' who were satisfied that Alcimus should be high priest because of his Aaronic descent. 2 Mac 14^6 confounds them with the Hasmonæans (which see), whom, however, they did not always support (see 1 Mac 7^{10-14}). But, though not mentioned elsewhere by name, their beliefs and practice are shown in such passages as 1 Mac 1^{63} 2^{34}, 2 Mac $6^{18ff.}$ 7^{10-12}, Jth 12^2; Jos. Ant. xiv. iv. 3. They were not a political but a religious party, composing the inner circle of the strictest legalists, and indisposed to interfere in civil government except in defence of Mosaism. They were not the progenitors of the Essenes, from whom they differed on the crucial question of sacrifice, but of the Pharisees, with whose rise their name as that of a party disappears (Wellhausen, Phar. und Sadd. 76 ff.; less correctly, Hamburger, RE ii. 132–137, 1038–1059). The name occurs in OT frequently, but it is not yet proved that it is used in a technical sense, even in Ps 116^{15} $149^{5.\ 9}$. In later Jewish literature the word denotes a rigid observer of the law (Berachoth v. 1; Chagigah ii. 7; Sotah iii. 4; Aboth ii. 10; Niddah 17*a*); but it was not until more recent times that its use strictly as the name of a special sect, rather than as descriptive of the habits of the extreme members of a larger party, was revived. HASMONÆAN, the family name of the Maccabees. It occurs in Jos. [who claimed (Ant. xvi. vii. 1) alliance with the fami.y], under the forms of Ἀσαμωναῖοι and Ἀσσαμωναῖοι, and is derived from the name of an ancestor Ἀσαμωναῖος, who is represented as the great-grandfather of Mattathias (ib. xii. vi. 1). In the Talm. the family appears as בֵּית חַשְׁמוֹנַאי (Middoth, i. 6), and as בֵּית חַ' (Sabb. 21^b; also Targ. Jonathan to 1 S 2^4). The original ancestor חַשְׁבֹּן is not otherwise known; but his name is connected with חֶשְׁמֹן 'fruitfulness' by Füerst, with חָסַם in the sense of 'to temper steel' by Herzfeld, and with חַשְׁמַנִּים 'opulent' (Ps 68^{32} [Eng. ^{31}]) by Ewald and others. The last suggestion is most probable, but is not unlikely to give way before Wellhausen's conjecture (Pharisäer etc. 94) that τοῦ Συμεών of 1 Mac 2^1 is a misrendering of בֶּן חַשְׁמֹן. That would explain the apparent absence of allusion to Hashmon in 1 Mac, and make him the grandfather of Mattathias. The exploits of Judas caused the family to be afterwards generally known as the Maccabees; but this designation does not once occur in old Heb. literature. Hasmonæan or Hasmunæan is found in its stead, and can hardly have been entirely excluded from the Heb. or Aram. original of 1 Mac. R. W. Moss.

HAṠRAH.—See HARHAS.

HASSENAAH (הַסְּנָאָה).—The sons of H. built the fish-gate (Neh 3^{3}). Their name, which is prob. the same as HASSENUAH (wh. see), seems to be derived from some place Senaah (cf. Ezr 2^{35}, Neh 7^{38}, and Berth.-Ryssel, ad loc.).

HASSENUAH (הַסְּנוּאָה).—A family name found in two different connexions in the two lists of Benjamite inhabitants of Jerus., 1 Ch 9^{7}, Neh 11^{9}.

HASSHUB (חַשּׁוּב 'considerate').—1. 2. Two builders of the wall, Neh $3^{11.\ 23}$. 3. One of those who signed the covenant, Neh 10^{23} [Heb.^{24}]. 4. A Levite of the sons of Merari, 1 Ch 9^{14}, Neh 11^{15}.

HASTE.—The verb 'to haste' is used transitively in Ex 5^{13} 'And the taskmasters hasted them, saying, Fulfil your works' (RV 'were urgent'); Is 16^{5} 'And in mercy shall the throne be established; and he shall sit upon it in truth in the tabernacle of David, judging, and seeking judgment, and hasting righteousness' (RV 'swift to do righteousness'); 1 Es 1^{27} 'the Lord is with me hasting me forward'; and 2 Mac 9^{7} 'commanding to haste the journey.' So in Wyc., as Pr 13^{12} 'Substaunce hastid shal be lassid [=lessened]'; and in Shaks., as I Henry IV. III. i. 143, 'I'll haste the writer'; and Romeo, IV. i. 11—

> 'Now, sir, her father counts it dangerous.
> That she doth give her sorrow so much sway,
> And in his wisdom hastes our marriage,
> To stop the inundation of her tears.'

The intrans. sense is more common, as 1 S 20^{38} 'And Jonathan cried after the lad, Make speed, haste, stay not.' Cf. Is 26^{9} Cov. 'My soule lusteth after the all the night longe, and my mynde haisteth frely to the.' And the reflexive use is not infrequent, as Gn 19^{22} 'Haste thee, escape thither.'

HASUPHA (חֲשׁוּפָא Ezr 2^{43}, חֲשִׁפָא Neh 7^{46}, where AV inaccurately gives Hashupha).—The head of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerub., called in 1 Es 5^{29} Asipha. See GENEALOGY.

HAT.—Hats are mentioned once in AV, but it is quite certain that this is a mistranslation. When Shadrach, Meshech, and Abed-nego were about to be cast into the fiery furnace, they were 'bound in their coats, their hosen, and their hats' (RV 'their hosen, their tunics, and their mantles'). The Aram. is כְּרְבָּלְתְהוֹן, from which comes the denom. vb. כְּרְבֵּל (Pual ptcp. מְכֻרְבָּל), which coupled with עָטִיל is used of David in 1 Ch 15^{27} as 'clothed with a robe of fine linen.' The RV 'mantle' in Dn 3^{21} is probably as nearly accurate a tr^{n} of כְּרְבְּלָא as one could suggest, although Marti favours the meaning 'cap' = Assyr. karballattu, a word which, however, Zehnpfund (Beiträge z. Assyriologie, ii. 535) contends itself means 'Kriegs[?]-mantel,' 'war-cloak.' See Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. [כרבל]. J. A. SELBIE.

HATHACH (הֲתָךְ, Ἀχραθαῖος, Est $4^{5.\ 6.\ 9.\ 10}$, AV Hatach).—A eunuch appointed by the king to attend on queen Esther. By his means Esther learnt from Mordecai the details of Haman's plot against the Jews.

HATHATH (חַתַּת 'terror').—A son of Othniel, 1 Ch 4^{13}. See GENEALOGY.

HATIPHA (חֲטִיפָא).—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2^{54}, Neh 7^{56}), called in 1 Es 5^{32} Atipha. See GENEALOGY.

HATITA (חֲטִיטָא, cf. Aram. חֲטַט 'to dig').—Eponym of a guild of porters (Ezr 2^{42}, Neh 7^{45}), called in 1 Es 5^{28} Ateta.

HATRED.—The actual word 'hatred' is seldom found in the Bible. In the OT it represents three different words, two of which (אֵיבָה and מִשְׂטְמָה occurring four times) mean more precisely 'enmity' (as of one nation towards another), and are so rendered by RV (Ezk 25^{15} 35^{5}, Hos $9^{7.\ 8}$), while the other (שִׂנְאָה which occurs thirteen times) denotes the opposite of love (with which it is explicitly contrasted, Ps 109^{5}, Pr 10^{12} 15^{7}, cf. Ps 97^{10}). In all the cases in which they occur, the words have a personal significance, and express human feelings—the absence of sympathy and love and kindly sentiments, or the state of active ill-will, on the part of men towards men. In NT the word is found once only (ἔχθραι, lit. 'enmities,' so RV) in one of the lists of vices given by St. Paul (Gal 5^{20}).

The verbs, however, which have the meaning 'hate' are frequent both in OT and NT in various connexions. In OT שָׂטַן 'oppose,' corresponding to 'enmity,' occurs five times (in three of wh. instances RV renders 'persecute,' Gn 49^{23}, Job 16^{9}, Ps 55^{3}), always of personal animosity against a person. Far more frequent is שָׂנֵא, of which the Eng. 'hate' is the closest equivalent. It may be said to be used both in a good sense and in a bad sense, when the feeling denoted is praiseworthy and when it is not. It occurs about 125 times, and in three cases out of four it is used in a bad sense. In about half the full number of instances the objects of hatred are persons, men or women; twelve times it is God himself who is 'hated' (e.g. Ex 20^{5} ‖ Dt 5^{9}); only some ten times when the word is used in a bad sense is the object not a person but a principle (e.g. Job 34^{17}, Ps 50^{17}, Pr $1^{22.\ 29}$). Of the comparatively few cases in which the word is used in a good sense the allusion is in half the number to the divine hatred of evil and sin, God being represented as personally hating evil persons or things, either directly or through his chosen spokesman (Dt 12^{31} 16^{22}, Ps 5^{5} 11^{5}, Pr 6^{16}, Is 1^{14} 61^{8}, Jer 12^{8} 44^{4}, Am 5^{21} 6^{8}, Hos 9^{15}, Zec 8^{17}, Mal 1^{3} 2^{16}). In the remaining cases it is used of men's dislike of and aversion from things (e.g. Ex 18^{21}, Ps 45^{7} 119^{104}) or persons (Ps 26^{5} 31^{6}) which have an evil character. In a few passages in the later books of the OT there is a special usage similar to that which is found in some cases in the NT (e.g. Lk 14^{26}, Mt 6^{24}) to express as forcibly as possible aversion from or disregard of the interests or claims of one thing relatively to those of another (Pr 13^{24} 29^{24}, Ec $2^{17.\ 18}$).

In NT the reference (the Gr. is μισέω) is in a large majority of instances (two-thirds of the whole) to malicious and unjustifiable feelings on the part of the wicked towards persons who have not deserved evil. In half the remaining instances the word is used of a right feeling of aversion from that which is evil (Ro 7^{15}, He 1^{9}, Jude ^{23}, Rev $2^{6.\ 15}$, 17^{16}); in the others the expression is somewhat hyperbolical, the context denoting relative preference of one thing over another (Mt 6^{24} ‖ Lk 16^{13}, Lk 14^{26}, Jn 3^{20} 12^{25}, Eph 5^{29}).

These passages taken together reveal a clear difference in ethical standpoint between OT and NT, such indeed as is suggested by the saying of Jesus, 'Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies . . .' (Mt $5^{43f.}$). The 'imprecatory' psalms show plainly that there was under the old covenant no sense of incongruity in appealing to God for aid in carrying out the fiercest hatred, in executing vengeance on an enemy. There are cases, no doubt, where the psalmist rises above mere personal animosity, and has in view the enemies of Israel and therefore of Israel's God; but the standard is not always at the height it reaches in the cry, 'Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate thee?' (Ps 139[21]), and 'There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked' (Is 57[21]). See PSALMS.

The teaching of Christ leaves hatred of evil alone admissible. St. John's strong assertion, 'Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer' (1 Jn 3[15]), is a true comment on the spirit of Christian ethics. The dominant principle of brotherly love, the brotherhood of mankind, is to control all the relations of life. Every thought of self, every personal consideration, all sense of personal injury, must be eliminated. 'Love your enemies . . . and pray for them which despitefully use you,' excludes the possibility of personal hatred; sin must never be resented as a personal wrong, with a personal feeling against the offender. To bear malice, to wish for evil towards a fellow-creature, to close our sympathies against him,—this in the teaching of Christ (and the interpretation of St. John) is to be guilty of spiritual murder. The real sin is the inward disposition, the wish, the purpose of evil; the act is only the outward show of it (cf. Mt 15[11. 17-20] 10[28]). On the other hand, hatred of sin and evil in all its forms—evil, because it is evil and opposed to the purpose of God—is a necessary corollary of all the great principles of the Gospel of Love.

HATTIL (חַטִּיל, cf. Arab. ḥatila 'to be quivering').—Eponym of a family of 'the children of Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2[57], Neh 7[59]), called in 1 Es 5[34] Agia. See GENEALOGY.

HATTUSH (חַטּוּשׁ).—1. A priestly family, which appears among those 'that went up with Zerubbabel,' Neh 12[2]; and at the signing of the covenant, Neh 10[4] [Heb.[5]]. 2. A descendant of David, who returned with Ezra from Babylon, Ezr 8[2] (read with 1 Es 8[29] 'of the sons of David, Hattush the son of Shecaniah'); see also 1 Ch 3[22] (but if we accept the LXX reading here, a younger Hattush must be meant). 3. A builder at the wall of Jerus., Neh 3[10]. See GENEALOGY. H. A. WHITE.

HAUNT.—To haunt is in older English simply to frequent, to make one's stay, be familiar with, and conveys no reproach. Thus Jn 3[22] Tind. 'After these thinges cam Jesus and his disciples into the Jewes londe, and ther he haunted with them and baptised' (διέτριβε, AV 'tarried'); 11[54] Tind. 'Jesus therfore . . . went his waye . . . into a cite called Ephraim, and there haunted with his disciples' (διέτριβε, AV 'continued'); Rutherford, Letters (No. 1), 'I trust you will acquaint her with good company, and be diligent to know with whom she loveth to haunt.' So in AV, 1 S 30[31] 'to all the places where David himself and his men were wont to haunt' (אֲשֶׁר־הִתְהַלֶּךְ־שָׁם); Ezk 26[17] 'the renowned city, which wast strong in the sea, she and her inhabitants, which cause their terror to be on all that haunt it!' (לְכָל־יוֹשְׁבֶיהָ, RVm 'on all that inhabited her'); and the subst. in 1 S 23[22] 'Go, I pray you, prepare yet, and know and see his place where his haunt is' (רִגְלוֹ, lit. 'his foot' as AVm and RVm). J. HASTINGS.

HAURAN (Αὐράνος, 2 Mac 4[40]), described as a man 'far gone in years and no less also in madness.' At the head of a large body of armed men he endeavoured to suppress a tumult in Jerusalem provoked by the continued sacrileges of Lysimachus, brother of the apostate high priest Menelaus. Some MSS and the Vulg. support the reading Tyrannus, but the more familiar name is less likely to have been altered by copyists.

HAURAN (חוֹרָן; for various conjectures as to meaning, see Oxf. Heb. Lex.; Αὐρανῖτις; Arab. حوران, or in common speech el-Ḥaurân.—This was the name given, with varying definition of boundaries, to a tract of land E. of the Jordan, N. of Gilead, extending E. to the desert. In Ezk 47[16. 18] the Jordan is made the border-line between Haurân, Damascus, and Gilead on the one hand, and the Land of Israel on the other. Haurân is there the whole district between Damascus and Gilead, from the lip of the Jordan Valley eastward. This practically corresponds with the province under the Turkish governor of Haurân to-day, whose seat is in el-Merkez, and whose jurisdiction includes Jedûr, Jaulân, and part of the hill-country south of the Jarmuk, as well as the region now specially called Haurân.

A series of beautiful cone-like hills, extinct volcanoes all, runs southward from the roots of Gt. Hermon, through Jedûr and Jaulân. Almost parallel with these, along the edge of the desert eastward, stands the great basaltic dyke, known at different times as Mons Asaldamus, Jebel Haurân, and Jebel ed-Druze. Between these two ranges lies a vast hollow, about 45 miles in breadth. In length, from Jebel el-Aswad in the N. to the bank of the Jarmuk in the S., it is nearly 50 miles; while away to the S.E. it runs out into the open desert. If we derive the name from ḥawr, a 'hollow,' with the place-ending ân, it may very well have applied to this gigantic vale.

The natives now say that Haurân consists of three parts, viz. en-Nukrah, el-Lejâ, and el-Jebel. These are clearly defined districts. (1) En-Nukrah, 'the cavity,' lies between the range of ez-Zumleh on the S.W., the slopes of Jaulân to westward, the volcanic fields of el-Lejâ on the N., and Jebel ed-Druze on the E. The wide reaches forming the floor of the hollow are rich, and fairly cultivated. This is the great grain-growing tract E. of Jordan. The elevation of the plain is from 1500 to 2000 ft. above sea-level. (2) El-Lejâ may be roughly described as a triangle, about 24 miles in length, with a base line of about 20 miles in the S., the apex being at Burak in the N. It is composed entirely of cooled lava, which is thrown about in the most grotesque and fantastic forms. The general aspect is dark, stern, forbidding. Soil is scanty, and but indifferently tilled. There are a few springs, but for the most part the inhabitants depend upon rain water, collected in cisterns or natural cavities in the rock. Great tracts to the N.E., owing to lack of water, are left absolutely tenantless during the summer months. The borders, where the lava waves drop to meet the emerald of the surrounding plain, are so distinctly marked that many have supposed this must be the ḥebel 'Argob—'the measured lot of Argob' of Dt 3[4. 13. 14], 1 K 4[13] (but see ARGOB). The handful of peasants in the western parts are completely at the mercy of the Arabs of el-Lejâ', of whom a local proverb asserts that 'greater rascals do not exist.' The Druzes hold the district to the S.E. The name el-Lejâ', 'the asylum,' or 'refuge,' signifies the use to which the place is often put. The present writer has met, in the heart of el-Lejâ, men who had been charged with various offences in Mt. Lebanon and elsewhere, who, as soon as they passed the rocky ramparts round the borders, felt perfectly safe from the officers of the law. (3) El-Jebel is, of course, the great range which bounds the eastward view, of which el-Kuleib, 5730 ft. high, and Salchad, with its mighty fortress crowning the southern heights, are the most outstanding features. The range effectually guards the fertile reaches to westward against the encroachment of the desert sands. The mountain is referred to in the Mishna as 'Mount Haurân,' one of the stations whence flashed the fire-signals announcing the advent of the new year (Rosh hash-Shanah, ii. 4). The name Jebel Haurân is now interchangeable with Jebel ed-Druze. After the terrible massacres of 1860, many Druze families moved eastward, occupied the S.E. district of el-Lejâ', and became masters of the greater part of the mountain. The inaccessible nature of the country gives them a great advantage over any attacking force. Until recent years their submission to the Turkish Government has been hardly more than nominal. With the exception of the clumps of trees around Sheikh Sa'ad, the reputed home of Job, and el-Merkez, the plain is treeless. In el-Lejâ, here and there, are a few stunted shrubs. The mountain is well wooded, and fruitful vineyards cling to many of the slopes.

Materials for the history of Haurân are very scanty, and do not go beyond the 1st cent. B.C. Towards the end of his reign Alexander Jannæus brought the western part of Haurân under his dominion; but eastward, Aretas the Arabian, or rather Nabatæan, held sway. The Nabatæans were driven southward by the Romans B.C. 64, but continued to hold Bozrah and Salchad. Herod the Great, succeeding to the government, did much to hold in check the lawless bands who infested the province, and indulged his taste for temple building. The oldest Greek inscription in these parts was found in a ruined temple at Sî'a, near Kanawât, on the pedestal of a statue erected to him during his lifetime. Under his son Philip a period of great prosperity seems to have been enjoyed. On Philip's death, after an interval of 3 years, Herod Agrippa received the province from Caligula. In an inscription found at Kanawât, he speaks of the inhabitants 'dwelling in caves like wild beasts' (Waddington, 2329*a*). Agrippa died in A.D. 44, and for 9 years the province was administered by the Romans. Then Claudius gave it to Agrippa II., who died A.D. 100, when the region was finally associated with the Roman province of Syria. In A.D. 106 the Nabatæans were at last reduced, and the province of Arabia constituted. The capital of the new province was Bozrah, which city is so closely identified with Haurân that an ancient proverb says, 'the prosperity of Bozrah is the prosperity of Haurân.'

Under the Romans civilization advanced, and, as evidenced by the remains of churches and inscriptions, Christianity made rapid progress. In A.D. 632 the Moslem hordes from Arabia burst over the province like a tornado, and the blight swiftly fell, which lies heavy on the land to-day. The latest notice of a Christian building is an inscription found by the present writer at el-Kufr, which records the foundation of a church in A.D. 720 (see PEFSt, July 1895, Inscrip. No. 150). Of the cities whose dark ruins are so numerous throughout the region, none can be said with certainty to date beyond the Roman period; although several, such as Kanawât and Bozrah, evidently occupy ancient sites. Many houses, built entirely—both walls and roof—of basalt, the heavy doors and window shutters of the same durable material, still easily swinging on their stone hinges, stand to-day almost as complete as when, centuries ago, their last tenants departed. The underground dwellings for which the district is noted doubtless belong to a much more remote antiquity. The crumbling villages that dot the plain and stud the mountain slopes are nearly all built of materials taken from neighbouring ruins. They have yielded a fine harvest of inscriptions, relating chiefly to the earlier centuries of our era. The rude builders, ignorant of the value attaching to these remains, have destroyed much. Thus it comes that 'written stones,' carved capitals, and bits of sculpture, memorials of a great and splendid past, may now so often be found amid surroundings of squalor and decay.

W. EWING.

HAVE.—Although 'have,' both as auxiliary and as finite verb, is used in many archaic expressions in AV, its meaning is nearly always obvious, and its obsolete uses are few. The foll. examples may be given:—

1. To have, as a finite verb, is to possess, as Lk 8[27] 'there met him out of the city a certain man, which had devils long time' (ὃς εἶχε, edd. ἔχων); 2 Co 1[9] 'But we had the sentence of death in ourselves' (ἐσχήκαμεν, RV 'yea, we ourselves have had the answer of death within ourselves').

2. Have, followed by some subst., has the force of the verb corresponding to the subst., as 'have indignation,' Mt 26[8], Mk 14[4] (cf. Lk 15[28] Rhem. 'But he had indignation and would not go in'); 'have compassion,' Lk 15[20], He 10[34]; 'have understanding,' Lk 1[3]; 'have regard,' Ac 8[11]; 'have knowledge,' Ac 17[13]; 'have rejoicing,' Gal 6[4]; 'have trial,' He 11[36]. Cf. Ac 20[3] Rhem. 'he had councel to returne through Macedonia.'

3. Have is sometimes equivalent to 'hold,' as Ja 2[1] 'My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons' (μὴ ἔχετε, RV 'hold not'); Ac 25[26] 'Wherefore I have brought him forth before you . . . that, after examination had, I might have somewhat to write' (τῆς ἀνακρίσεως γενομένης). So 'have in abomination,' Lv 11[11], 1 S 13[4]; 'have in derision,' Ps 119[51], Ezk 23[32], 1 Es 1[51], Wis 5[3]; 'have in honour,' 2 S 6[22]; 'have in remembrance,' Ac 10[31]; 'have in reputation,' Ac 5[34]; 'have in reverence,' Ps 89[7]. Cf. He 13[4] Tind. 'Let wedlocke be had in pryce in all poyntes'; North's Plutarch, p. 876, '[Cicero] scorned and disdained all Pompeys preparations and counsels, the which indeed made him to be had in iealousie and suspition'; Ridley, Brefe Declaration (Moule's ed. p. 163), 'For all the churche of Christ bothe hathe and ever hathe hadde hym [Augustine] for a man of most singular learnyng, witte, and diligence.'

4. Have has sometimes the meaning of 'carry' or 'take,' as 2 Ch 35[23] 'And the king said to his servants, Have me away; for I am sore wounded' (הַעֲבִירוּנִי); 2 K 11[15], 2 Ch 23[14] 'Have her forth without the ranges' (הוֹצִיאוּ אֹתָהּ); 2 S 13[9] 'Have out all men from me' (הוֹצִיאוּ). Cf. Is 53[8] 'He shal be had awaye, his cause not herde, and without eny judgment'; Jn 2[16] Tind. 'Have these thinges hence, and make not my fathers housse an housse of marchaundyse.' So Knox, Hist. 151, 'who being slain, was had to the Queen's presence'; Adams, Works, i. 65, 'Herefore they bequeath so great sums for masses and dirges and trentals to be sung or said for them after they are dead, that their souls may at the last be had to heaven, though first for a while they be reezed in purgatory.'

5. Such phrases may be noticed as, 'Have in one's heart to,' 1 Ch 28[2] (cf. Ph 1[7] 'I have you in my heart'); 'I would have you without carefulness,' 1 Co 7[32]; 'I would not have you ignorant,' 2 Co 1[8]; 'Who will have all men to be saved,' 1 Ti 2[4] (ὃς θέλει, RV 'Who willeth that all men should be saved'). Cf. Jn 21[22] Tind. 'Yf I will have him to tary tyll I come, what is that to the?'

6. As a grammatical point observe 'had' not only for 'would have' (as Gn 43^{10}, Lk 24^{21}), but for 'would' alone, Ps 84^{10} 'I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness.' The Revisers have been taken to task (Moon, Revisers' English, p. 135; Eccles. English, p. 190) for accepting this construction from AV. No doubt 'I would rather' is more grammatical, but 'I had rather' has the best authority and is still in use. Cf. T. Fuller, Holy State, ii. 16, p. 109, 'Some men had as lieve be schoolboyes as Schoolmasters, to be tyed to the school as Cooper's Dictionary and Scapula's Lexicon are chained to the desk therein.' Again, such a form as we find in He 11^{15} 'They might have had opportunity to have returned' is now reckoned ungrammatical. It is common in Shaks., as Hamlet, v. i. 268—

'I hoped thou shouldst have been my Hamlet's wife;
I thought thy bride-bed to have deck'd, sweet maid.'

So Merry Wives, IV. v. 41—

I had other things to have spoken with her.'

See Abbott, Shaks. Gram. § 360. RV has the modern form, 'they would have had opportunity to return.' J. HASTINGS.

HAVEN.—1. חוֹף, properly 'coast,' 'strand,' from [חָפַף] 'enclose,' 'surround.' This word is rendered 'haven' by AV and RV in Gn $49^{13\ bis}$, and by RV in Jg 5^{17} (AV 'shore'). Its only other occurrences are Dt 1^7 [AV '(sea)side,' RV '(sea)shore'], Jos 9^1 [AV 'coasts (of the sea'), RV 'shore (of the sea')], Jer 47^7, Ezk 25^{16} [AV and RV '(sea)shore']. 2. כְּחוֹ Ps 107^{30} (only). 3. λιμήν, Ac $27^{8.\ 12}$.

Havens are seldom mentioned in the Bible, probably for the reason that Palestine proper scarcely possesses any harbours, and the Israelites were not a maritime nation. The harbours in OT times on the Mediterranean coast were in possession of the Phœnicians and the Philistines (see GREAT SEA); and as regards that of Ezion-geber, at the head of the Gulf of 'Akabah (or Ælanitic Gulf), it was only for a short period in possession of the kings of Israel, notably in the reign of Solomon (1 K 9^{26}). The earliest mention of the word 'haven' (Gn 49^{13}) is in connexion with the blessings pronounced by Jacob on the future tribes, where it is said of Zebulun that he 'should dwell at the haven of the sea, and that he should be for an haven of ships, and his border (should reach) unto Zidon.' It is doubtful if, in the distribution of the Promised Land, the tribe of Zebulun actually touched the coast, though it reached as far west as Mount Carmel. From the port of Accho (Acre) the tribe was debarred by the predominating power of the Phœnician Sidonians, who in the time of the Judges 'oppressed Israel' (Jg 10^{12}); but it is a fair supposition that the terms of Jacob's Blessing point to the importance of the Bay of Acre as the future 'Key of Syria,'* and express the desire that it should come into the possession of Zebulun.

Next in importance and sequence of time to Sidon was the seaport of Tyre, situated about 20 miles S. of Sidon, and, like it, having a double harbour to the N. and S. of the promontory, which jutted out from the coast and terminated in a ridge of coralline rock. It was one of several islets lying at some distance from the shore. Only the events connected with the biblical history of Tyre and Sidon can here be referred to.† In the time of Solomon, Tyre had reached a high state of eminence under Hiram, who rendered assistance to Solomon in the building of the temple (1 K 5) and in supplying sailors for the fleet built at Ezion-geber, which traded to Ophir for gold (1 K 9^{26}). (See RED SEA). In NT history these cities are memorable for the visit of our Lord to their neighbourhood (Mt 15^{21}), and the miracle of healing in the case of the daughter of the Syrophœnician woman (Mk 7^{25}). But the glories of Tyre and Sidon have long since departed. In the height of their prosperity these Phœnician cities were centres of cruelty, licentiousness, and idolatry, which sealed their doom. When Alexander captured Tyre, the population of the city appears to have been about 40,000 souls; it is now a miserable fishing village with about a tenth of that number of inhabitants. The prophecies of Ezekiel have been literally fulfilled in the present state of these once flourishing cities (Ezk 26^{12} 27^{32}).

The Fair Havens (wh. see) are of interest in connexion with the voyage of St. Paul to Italy (Ac 27^{12}), and their position has been clearly determined; the name being preserved in the present *Kaloi Limenes. They consist of two contiguous roadsteads on the S. side of the island of Crete (Kandia), about 5 m. E. of Cape Matala (Theodia), and not far from the city of Lasea, of which they were the ports. In this position ships were secure against winds from the N.E., such as 'Euraquilo,' which burst upon the ship carrying the apostle at a later period of his voyage after leaving the island.†

HAVILAH (חֲוִילָה, Εὐειλάτ, Εὐειλά, Hevila).—A son of Cush according to Gn 10^7, 1 Ch 1^9, of Joktan according to Gn 10^{29}, 1 Ch 1^{23}. In Gn $2^{11.\ 12}$ the Pison is said to compass the land of H., where there was gold, bdellium, and 'the shōham-stone,' while in Gn 25^{18} the Ishmaelite tribes are described as extending 'from Havilah unto Shur,' the eastern frontier of Egypt, and in 1 S 15^7 Saul is stated to have smitten the Amalekites or Bedawîn from Havilah (but here Glaser, Skizze, ii. 326, would read Hachilah) to Shur. H. will thus be the 'sandy' desert of N. Arabia extending from the Joktanite district of Ophir on the Persian Gulf to the neighbourhood of Edom. Glaser identifies it with Jemâma in N.E. Arabia, but its western boundary will have been nearer the Shur or 'Fortified Lines' of Egypt. The shōham-stone which came from it was perhaps the Assyrian samtu, which seems to have been the malachite or turquoise. At an early period the Arabian tribes made their way across the Red Sea to the opposite coast of Africa; hence H. is included among the descendants of Cush. The name of the Cushite Havilah is possibly preserved in the classical Aualis, now Zeila' in Somâli-land. A district of Khaulân (Ḥaulân) is mentioned in the inscriptions of S. Arabia; this is either Khaulân in Tihâmah, between Mecca and San'a, or another Khaulân S.E. of San'a. Niebuhr further found a Ḥuwailah on the Persian Gulf. The name, in fact, was widely spread in Arabia, and Yakut states that Ḥawîl was the name of a dialect spoken by the people of Mehri in the east of Hadramaut. The Mehri is the modern representative of the language of the Sabæan inscriptions.

HAVVOTH-JAIR (חַוֹּת יָאִיר, i.e. 'the tent-villages* of Jair').—A group of towns in Gilead, in the territory that was reckoned to the half-tribe of Manasseh. In Dt 3^{14} and Jos 13^{30} (both D^2) the Ḥavvoth-Jair are improperly located in Bashan, and in the latter passage they appear also to be confounded with the sixty fortresses of the Argob from which they are expressly distinguished in 1 K 4^{13}. Unsuccessful attempts have been made by Keil and others to harmonize the statements of D^2 with the testimony of JE (Nu 32^{39-41}, corroborated by Jg 10^4, 1 K 4^{13}, 1 Ch 2^{22}) that the Ḥavvoth-Jair were situated in Gilead. Varying explanations of the origin of the name are offered in OT. While in Nu 32^{41} and Dt 3^{14} Jair is a contemporary of Moses, in Jg 10^4 he is one of the judges. This variety of statement corresponds to the different OT traditions as to the settlement of the territory E. of the Jordan. The oldest narratives of the Hex. know of only two trans-Jordanic tribes, Reuben and Gad. (Compare Nu 32^{1-32} with vv.$^{33.\ 39-42}$). Even in the Song of Deborah (Jg 5^{14}) Machir is still one of the W. tribes, and only at a much later date became the designation of the Manassites in Gilead. This latter district, there is reason to believe, was really conquered from the west, after the occupation of Canaan proper. Hence in Jg 10^4 (which, however, is ethnographical rather than historical) there may be preserved the memory of an expedition led across the Jordan by Jair after the territory originally occupied by Manasseh had proved too small for that tribe. HAWK (נֵץ nēẓ, ἱέραξ, accipiter).—A generic word for birds of the hawk tribe. It probably includes all the species of the genera Accipiter, Falco, Circus, and Pernis, and perhaps Buteo, and excludes those of Milvus and Elanus, which have special names in Hebrew, da'ăh, dayyah, and 'ayyâh (see GLEDE, KITE). The following is a list of the hawks found in Palestine and Syria:—

1. Accipiter nisus, L., the Sparrow Hawk (Arabic bâshiḳ). It is common over the whole country. 2. A. brevipes, Sev., the Levant Sparrow Hawk. It is much rarer than the last. It is recognized by its short thick tarsi. 3. Pernis apivorus, L., the Honey Buzzard. It is one of the resident species, but is rather rare. 4. Falco peregrinus, Tunst., the Peregrine Falcon (Arabic Ṭair-el-ḥurr). It is confined to the coast and western watershed of the mountains. 5. F. lanarius, Schl., the Lanner (Arabic shâhîn and ṣoḳr). This is the most common of the large falcons, and is a permanent resident. It resorts more esp. to the deserts. It is trained by the natives for falconry. 6. F. Sacer, Gmel., the Saker Falcon (Arabic soḳr). It is confined to the upland forests E. of the Jordan. It is esteemed by the Arabs the finest of all the falcons, and the name of Beni-Ṣoḳr, one of the tribes E. of the Dead Sea, is derived from this species. 7. F. subbuteo, L., the Hobby, is a summer visitor to Pal. 8. F. eleonoræ, Gene., the Eleonora Falcon, is also a summer visitor only. Tristram found it only in the Buḳa' (Cœlesyria). 9. F. æsalon, Tunst., the Merlin, is a winter visitor to Palestine. 10. F. vespertinus, L., the Red-legged Hobby, is a rare summer visitor. 11. F. tinnunculus, L., the Kestrel (Arabic bâshiḳ), is the commonest of all the hawks, and is universal throughout Pal. and Syria. 12. F. cenchris, Cuv., the Lesser Kestrel, is a spring and summer visitor, but, on its arrival, consorts with the last. 13. Circus æruginеus, L., the Marsh Harrier (Arab. darî'ah), is common over the marshes and plains. 14. C. cinerаceus, Mont., the Ash-coloured Harrier, is rare, but resident. 15. C. cyaneus, L., the Hen Harrier, is also common. 16. C. Swainsonii, Smith, the Pallid Harrier, is especially found along the coast. The plumage is almost white. 17. Buteo vulgaris, Leach, the Common Buzzard (Arabic 'aḳâb), may be the Glede. 18. B. ferox, Gmel., the Long-legged Buzzard (Arab. shâhin), is the largest of the hawk tribe, equalling in size some of the smaller eagles.

The above list amply justifies the expression 'after his kind' (Lv 11^{16}, Dt 14^{15}). It also justifies the expression in Job 39^{26}, where it is asked, 'Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom, and stretch her wings toward the south?' if by this, as is generally thought, an allusion is intended to the migratory habits of some of the species. Some think, however, that the allusion is simply to the power of flight of all the hawks. No allusion to hunting with falcons is found in the Scriptures. All the birds of this tribe were unclean to the Hebrews.

G. E. POST.

HAY.—The word occurs three times in AV (Pr 27^{25} RV 'hay,' m. 'grass,' Is 15^6 RV 'grass,' 1 Co 3^{12}). In both the OT passages the Heb. is חָצִיר ḥaẓîr, which is rendered by the LXX in the first passage χλωρός, and in the second χόρτος. In 1 Co the orig. is χόρτος. There does not seem to be any good reason for the tr^n hay in any of the above passages. The meaning is equally clear if the word be rendered grass (see GRASS). חָשִׁישׁ ḥăshash has been thought by some to refer to hay. It corresponds to the Arabic ḥăshîsh, which signifies weeds, or green fodder. In Is 33^{11} it is rendered AV, RV 'chaff,' and in Is 5^{24} AV 'chaff,' but RV 'dry grass.' It is customary in Bible lands to cut or pull grass and other fodder plants, and give them to live stock. Women, with large back loads or donkey loads of such fodder, may be seen any morning at the gates, or in the market places of the cities, where they offer it for sale. Large areas are sown in barley, vetch, clover, medick, and other forage plants, to be cut and given to domestic animals in the spring and early summer. It is clear that it was also the custom in Bible days to cut grass for this purpose (Ps 37^2 72^6 $129^{6.\ 7}$, Am 7^1). But it is not customary to dry such cut-grass as we do in making hay, to be stored up as winter fodder, and there is no evidence that the Hebrews had such a custom. In fact it would be out of place, as the winter is the season of green grass here, and the flocks continue to crop the stubble to the end of the harvest season in midsummer, and after that find a scanty but sufficient pasturage until the early rains cause the 'tender grass' to sprout up with marvellous rapidity. Stall-fed animals have cut-straw mixed with their barley, and this seems to contain a considerable amount of nourishment, and to answer the purpose of hay. Stall-fed milch cows are fed mainly on this fodder, and continue fat, and give milk on it. It would therefore be better to render ḥăshash by cut-grass rather than by dry grass or hay.

HAZAEL (חֲזָאֵל, 'whom God beholds.' Ἀζαήλ BA Luc. Assyr. Ḥaza'ilu).—A powerful king of Syria who reigned contemporaneously with Jehoram (last 3 or 4 years), Jehu, and Jehoahaz kings of Israel, and Jehoram, Ahaziah, Athaliah, and Joash of Judah. Hazael is first mentioned 1 K $19^{15.\ 17}$, where Elijah at Horeb receives commission to anoint him king over Syria, that he may execute J"'s vengeance against the Baal worshippers of Israel. At this time he must have been an official at the court of the Syrian king Ben-hadad II., for some time later he was sent to Elisha at Damascus to inquire the issue of his master's sickness. The prophet marked him out as the future king of Syria and oppressor of Israel, and accordingly Hazael seized the earliest opportunity to murder Ben-hadad and usurp the throne (2 K 8^{7-15}). He seems to have been soon engaged in hostilities with the neighbouring kingdom of Israel, meeting the allied forces of Jehoram and Ahaziah of Judah at Ramoth-gilead (2 K $8^{28.29}$ $9^{14.15}$). Hazael gained a series of successes against Jehu, devastating all his country E. of Jordan, from the Arnon in the S. to the land of Bashan in the N. (2 K $10^{32.33}$); and throughout the reign of Jehoahaz, Jehu's successor, he made constant encroachment upon the territory of Israel (2 K 13^{22}). It was not till after Hazael's death that Joash son of Jehoahaz was able successfully to repel the aggressions of Syria under Ben-hadad III. son of Hazael (2 K $13^{24.25}$). A century later the remembrance of Hazael was still fresh in the minds of the men of Israel, and Amos uses the expression 'the house of Hazael' as a parallel to 'the palaces of Ben-hadad' (Am 1^{4}). Hazael further directed his arms against the S. of Palestine, besieging and taking Gath, and then marching against Jerusalem, from which he was only bought off by tribute sent by Joash king of Judah out of the temple treasures (2 K $12^{17.18}$). According to 2 Ch $24^{23.24}$ a battle took place, in which the Syrians with a small army defeated the larger forces of the king of Judah.

* Havvôth is probably connected with the Arab. ḥiwā, 'a collection of tents.' 'It may have originally denoted a group of Bedawin tents, but with the transition to pastoral life it would naturally be applied to more permanent settlements' (Moore, Judges, p. 274).

Hazael figures more than once in the cuneiform inscriptions. Shalmaneser II., who in the early part of his reign had defeated an alliance formed by Dadidri (Ben-hadad II.), Ahab of Israel, and other kings, and again in the 14th year of his reign had a second time worsted Dadidri (COT i. 191 ff.), states that in his 18th year (B.C. 842) he joined battle with Hazael of Damascus, who had assembled a large army and entrenched himself upon the mountain of Sanir in the Anti-Lebanon. The Syrian king was defeated, and lost 16,000 warriors, 1121 chariots, and 470 horsemen, together with his stores. Barely escaping with his life, he shut himself up in Damascus, which was besieged by the enemy, but, apparently, not captured, since Shalmaneser merely states 'his plantations I destroyed.' The same inscription speaks of Jehu as paying tribute to Shalmaneser 'at that time'; and it may thus be plausibly inferred that the aid of Assyria against the Syrians had been solicited by Jehu, as was done by Ahaz of Judah in later times (2 K $16^{7ff.}$). Three years later, in the 21st year of his reign, Shalmaneser again marched against Hazael and took possession of his cities (COT i. 197 f., 200 f.).

HAZAIAH (חֲזָיָה 'J" hath seen').—A descendant of Judah (Neh 11^{5}). See GENEALOGY.

HAZAR-ADDAR (חַצַר־אַדָּר, ἔπαυλις Ἀράδ).—A place on the southern border of Canaan, west of Kadesh-barnea, Nu 34^{4}. It appears to be the same as Hezron (which see) of Jos 15^{3}, which in the latter passage is connected with but separated from Addar (which see).

HAZAR-ENAN (חֲצַר עֵינָן, once Ezk 47^{17} Hazar-enon עֵינוֹן).—A place mentioned in Nu $34^{9.10}$ as the northern boundary of Israel, and in Ezk 47^{17} 48^{1} as one of the ideal boundaries. It was perhaps at the sources of the Orontes. Buhl (GAP 67, 111, 240) and Bertholet (Hesekiel, 244) suggest that it is identical with the well-known Banias, while v. Kasteren would locate it at el-Ḥaḍr farther to the east, on the way from Banias to Damascus, but these sites appear to be too far south.

HAZAR-GADDAH (חֲצַר־גַּדָּה).—An unknown town in the extreme south of Judah (Jos 15^{27}).

HAZARMAVETH (חֲצַרְמָוֶת). — The eponym of a Joktanite clan, Gn 10^{26}=1 Ch 1^{20}, described as a 'son' of Joktan, fifth in order from Shem. The name occurs in Sabæan inscriptions as חצרמות and חצרמת (ZDMG xix. (1865) 239 ff., xxxi. 74 ff.). Its identity with the modern Ḥaḍramaut is certain, and Hazarmaveth is probably also the same as the land of the Χατραμωτῖται, one of the four chief tribes of S. Arabia as described by Strabo (XVI. iv. 2). They were celebrated for their traffic in frankincense. For their history see ARABIA, p. 133[b]. The modern Ḥaḍramaut is not so extensive as the ancient.

HAZAR-SHUAL (חֲצַר שׁוּעָל).—A place in S. Judah (Jos 15^{28}=1 Ch 4^{28}) or Simeon (Jos 19^{3}), repeopled by Jews after the Captivity, Neh 11^{27}. It may be the ruin S'awi on a hill E. of Beersheba. See SWP vol. iii. sh. xxiv.

HAZAR-SUSAH (חֲצַר־סוּסָה, in 1 Ch 4^{31} Hazar-susim חֲצַר־סוּסִים).—A city in Simeon, Jos 19^{5}=1 Ch 4^{31}. The name means 'horse-village,' and is noticed along with Beth-marcaboth, 'place of chariots.' These places were apparently in the southern plain, and were no doubt stations of a cavalry force, probably Egyptian. The sites are unknown. There is a ruin Susin, W. of Beersheba. See SWP vol. iii. sh. xxiv.

C. R. CONDER.

HAZAR-SUSIM.—See HAZAR-SUSAH.

HAZAZON TAMAR (חֲצָצֹן תָּמָר. 'Hazazon of the palm-tree') is mentioned in Gn 14^{7} as inhabited by Amorites, and as destroyed, along with En-mishpat (Kadesh) and the Amalekite country, by Chedorlaomer. In 2 Ch 20^{2} it is identified with En-gedi as the basis for an invading army from Edom (so read instead of Syria). Josephus (Ant. IX. i. 2), speaking of this campaign, says the invaders pitched at En-gedi, where grow the best kind of palm-tree and the opobalsamum.

Most probably the words preserve the older name of En-gedi (which see), and may still survive in the Wady Ḥusaseh, N.W. from 'Ain Jidy (Engedi). See Rob. i. 506; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geogr. 271. Jerome (Quæst. in Gen.) translates the name urbs palmarum, which (cf. Jos. supra) suggests a comparison with that 'city of palm-trees' out of which (Jg 1^{16}) the Kenite clan went up with Judah. In that case it may have been this Kenite settlement on the rocky nest of En-gedi which Balaam saw from the heights of Moab, and to which he referred (Nu 24^{21}). G. A. Smith suggests (Hist. Geogr. p. 269 ff.) that here we must look for the Tamar of 1 K 9^{18} (Kethibh) and Ezk 47^{19} 48^{28}.

It is, however, possible that Hazazon-tamar may be, not En-gedi, but the Tamar of Ezekiel, and that the latter lay S.W. of the Dead Sea. In that case Jg 1^{16} may mean that the Kenites, entering Palestine by the south, joined the invading Judahites on the south of Arad.

A. C. WELCH.

HAZEL (לוּז lúz, καρύον, amygdalus).—This word, tr[d] in AV hazel (Gn 30^{37}), is better rendered RV almond, for (1) the word לוּז is the same in form as the Arab. lauz, which signifies almond; (2) the hazel does not grow in Mesopotamia, where Laban lived, while the almond is universal. The objection that there is another name שָׁקֵד shâḳêd for almond is not decisive, as many plants and animals have two or more names. G. E. Post.

HAZER-HATTICON (חֲצַר הַתִּיכוֹן 'the middle Hazer').—A place named amongst the boundaries of (ideal) Israel, Ezk 47[16]. It is described as 'by the border of Hauran.' If the MT be correct, Hazer-hatticon is quite unknown; but there can be no reasonable doubt that we ought, with Smend, Cornill, Bertholet, etc., to emend to Hazar-enon as in vv.[17. 18] and 48[1]. Wetzstein, indeed, proposes [ZKW (1884) v. 114] to identify Hazer-hatticon with Ḥadar to the north of Jebel Druze, 'at the foot of the eastern corner of Hermon.' See further, Davidson, Ezekiel, p. 352.

HAZERIM (חֲצֵרִים; Ασηδώθ, AF Ασηρώθ).—Mentioned in AV of Dt 2[23] as the locality in which the Avvim (wh. see) dwelt 'as far as Gaza.' There is no doubt that the word is not really a proper name, but that it should be rendered (as it is in RV) by villages. The clause describes how the Avvim dwelt, until they were expelled by the immigrant Caphtorim (or Philistines); they did not dwell in fortified cities, but in villages, or unwalled settlements (Lv 25[31]), consisting, probably, of rudely-built huts of mud or stone, roofed with leaves or grass. Villages are usually mentioned as the dependencies of towns (e.g. Jos 13[23]); but sometimes a particular tribe is characterized as inhabiting them, as Gn 25[16] (Ishmaelites), Is 42[11] (Kedar); and according to this archæological notice, the Avvim, or original occupants of a part of S.W. Palestine, dwelt in them similarly.

S. R. Driver.

HAZEROTH (חֲצֵרוֹת; Ασηρώθ).—A station of the Israelites in the wilderness, mentioned both in Nu 11[35] 12[16] (JE) and in the itinerary 33[17] (P),—in the latter as the second station after leaving Sinai (the first being Ḳibroth-hatta'avah). Burckhardt (Syria, 1822, p. 495) suggested tentatively ('perhaps') that it might be 'Ain el-Ḥuderah, about 40 miles N.E. of Jebel Mûsa, and not quite half-way between Jebel Mûsa and 'Aḳabah; and this identification has been accepted by many subsequent writers, as Robinson, BR[2] i. 151; Ewald, Hist. ii. 191; Stanley, Sin. and Pal. 81 f. (though not very confidently); Palmer, Desert of the Wanderings, 260–262 (cf. 313 f.), etc.; Dillm., however (on Nu 11[35]), hesitates. All things considered, the identification seems fairly probable. The site is most fully described by Palmer (with an illustration).* It lies a little to the left of the main route from Jebel Mûsa to 'Aḳabah, which here, after leaving the Wâdy Sa'al, passes through a sandy plain (in the midst of which is a conspicuous eminence, called Ḥudeibat el-Ḥajjâj, or the Pilgrims' Hill), prior to entering the Wâdy Ghuzâleh. Ascending for about 10 minutes from the camel track in this plain, the traveller reaches a cleft or gorge in the limestone rock, through which he looks down (towards the N.W.) upon the Wâdy Ḥuderah, winding along between fantastic, brilliantly-coloured sandstone cliffs, with a 'forest of mountain peaks and chains' beyond, and 'on their left a broad white wâdy leading up towards the distant mountains of the Tih.' In the middle of the Wâdy Ḥuderah, beneath a lofty cliff, lies the dark green palm-grove of 'Ain Ḥuderah, with the fountain rising in the rock behind. The water from the fountain, which is still used as a watering-place for camels, 'is conducted by an aqueduct, cut in the solid granite, into a reservoir or pool, from which it is let out by a rude sluice to irrigate the gardens which the Arabs still cultivate here. The remains of several well-constructed walls point to a former and perhaps Christian occupation of the place.' A few miles to the N. of 'Ain Ḥuderah there circles round the Wâdy el-'Ain, containing a stream of clear, fresh water, which joins ultimately the Wâdy Ghuzâleh, to the N.E.

* A clearer view of the topography of the district may, however, be obtained from the Ordnance Survey of Sinai (1869), i. 122 f., with the accompanying map of the peninsula.

Keil objects that el-Ḥuderah, being only '18 hours' from Jebel Mûsa, is too near for Hazeroth, as the Israelites were 3 days (Nu 11[33]) in reaching Kibroth-hatta'avah, the station before Hazeroth (11[35]); and thinks that Hazeroth must have been some place on the more direct route to Kadesh (13[26]), such as the station Bir eth-Themed, on the Tîh-plateau (cf. Trumbull, Kadesh-barnea, 78, 314 f.). It would no doubt be a mistake to regard the identification as certain; still it may be questioned whether, under the circumstances, Keil's objections are cogent; and although the more usual route from Sinai to Kadesh may be through the Wâdy Zulaka, on to el-'Ain and Bir eth-Themed (Robinson, i. 148, 198, with the map), yet a route past 'Ain el-Ḥuderah, through the Wâdy Ghuzâleh, and up the Wâdy Wetîr (ib. 153, with the map,—apparently the E. half of the Wâdy el-'Ain of the Ordnance Survey map), does not seem to be so greatly more circuitous as to be pronounced out of the question. Dillm. thinks the evidence insufficient to show where Hazeroth was.

Whether the Hazeroth of Dt 1[2] (LXX Αὐλῶν) be the same place depends upon the answer given to the difficult question, what the topographical notes contained in that verse are intended to mark (see Dizahab). If this verse defines a locality in the Steppes of Moab, Hazeroth will be some place there, otherwise unknown; if it describes—or in its original form described—places passed by the Israelites previously, it may be the Hazeroth of Nu 11[35] etc. Sayce's location of Hazeroth (Early Hist. of Hebrews, 214) as 'near Paran on the borders of Moab' has nothing to recommend it, being inconsistent with the situation presupposed in either Nu or Dt. S. R. Driver.

HAZIEL (חֲזִיאֵל 'vision of El').—A Gershonite Levite in time of Solomon, 1 Ch 23[9]. See Genealogy.

HAZO (חָזוֹ, Αζαῦ).—The eponym of a Nahorite clan, Gn 22[22]. It is no doubt identical with Ḥazû, which along with Bazû (Buz of v.[21]) is mentioned in an inscription of Esarhaddon (see Delitzsch, Paradies, 306 f., also in Zeitsch. f. Keilschriftforsch. (1885) 93 ff.; Schrader, KAT[2] 141, 221 [COT[2] i. 127, 212], and Keilinschriften u. Geschichtsforsch. 399; Tiele, Geschichte, 337; Dillmann on Gn 22[21f.]).

HAZOR (חָצוֹר, חָצֹר).—1. A Canaanite city of Galilee, the chief place of that region, ruled by a dynasty which seems to have had the dynastic name of Jabin, Jos 11[1] 12[19], Jg 4[2. 17]. The great battle with the king of Hazor took place at the Waters of Merom, Jos 11[5ff.] (see art. Jabin). Hazor was fortified by Solomon (1 K 9[15]), and captured by Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15[29]) in B.C. 734. Jonathan the Hasmonæan, after encamping 'at the water of Gennesareth, early in the morning gat him to the plain of Hazor,' 1 Mac 11[67]. Josephus (Ant. v. v. 1) places Hazor near Kedesh, on the plateau looking down on the Hûleh lake, which he regards as being the Waters of Merom. This leads to the supposition that Tell el-Hurrawîyeh, a large ruined site in the required position, is intended. The mountain to the west still bears the name Jebel Ḥadhîreh. This is the only known indication, and, as far as the biblical notices are concerned, it would be equally possible to place Hazor farther south, where, at the foot of the chain of Upper Galilee, is found an important ruined site called Ḥazzur, in a position more appropriate to the use of the chariots which belonged to the king of Hazor. This latter would also suit well the Hazor of 1 Mac 11[67] and Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 7. From Hazor two letters of the Tel el-Amarna collection were written in the 15th cent. B.C. to the king of Egypt. They are much damaged, but they speak of an attack on the place, and ask for aid. In one of them the king's name is given; and though the first syllable is damaged, it may be read I-eba-enu, i.e. 'Jabin.' Hazor is also noticed, with places in Upper and Lower Galilee, by the Mohar (an Egyptian traveller of the 14th cent. B.C.) on his way from the seacoast to the Lake of Tiberias. See SWP vol. i. sh. iv.

LITERATURE.—SWP vol. i. sh. iv.; Robinson, BRP[2] iii. 63, 81, 365, 401 f.; Buhl, GAP 113, 182, 236; Guérin, Galilée, iii. 363 ff.; Baedeker-Socin, Pal.[3] 264; Schürer, HJP I. i. 249; Dillmann on Jos 11[1]; Sayce, HCM 309, 336.

2. A town of Benjamin, Neh 11[33], now the ruin Hazzur close to Gibeon on the south. See SWP vol. iii. sh. xvii.; Oxf. Heb. Lex., Siegfried-Stade, and Buhl (GAP 177) suggest that it may be identical with Baal-hazor of 2 S 13[23]; but see BAAL-HAZOR.

3. In Jos 15[23] a Hazor in the Negeb of Judah is noticed. 4. In Jos 15[25] another Hazor appears to be mentioned, which is identical with Kerioth-hezron (wh. see). 5. An unknown Arabian locality (Jer 49[28]) mentioned along with Kedar as smitten by Nebuchadrezzar. C. R. CONDER.

HAZOR-HADATTAH (חֲצוֹר חֲדַתָּה).—The text (Jos 15[25]) is not beyond suspicion. If it is correct, the name may mean 'new Hazor,' with Aram. ת in חַדַתָּה (Oxf. Heb. Lex.). LXX omits. The place was in the Negeb of Judah, but the site is unknown. It appears to be connected with 'Kerioth-hezron, which is Hazor.' See HEZRON.

C. R. CONDER.

HAZZELELPONI (הַצְּלֶלְפּוֹנִי, AV Hazelelponi).—A female name in the genealogy of Judah, 1 Ch 4[3]. See GENEALOGY.

HE (ה).—The fifth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 5th part, each verse of which begins with this letter. It is transliterated in this Dictionary by h.

HE.—After the Heb. idiom (see Davidson, Syntax, § 106) a personal pronoun is sometimes inserted superfluously as the subject of the verb. Gn 4[4] 'And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock' (וְהֶבֶל הֵבִיא גַּם־הוּא); Dt 1[30] 'The LORD your God which goeth before you, he shall fight for you'; Jos 22[22] 'The LORD God of gods, the LORD God of gods, he knoweth'; Is 9[15] 'The ancient and honourable, he is the head; and the prophet that teacheth lies, he is the tail.' In such cases there is a certain emphasis placed upon the subject, but, as Davidson points out, it is slight, and to translate 'as for the ancient and honourable' is to exaggerate it, though that construction may be permitted in a long sentence like 2 Ch 34[26], 'And as for the king of Judah, who sent you to enquire of the LORD, so shall ye say unto him' (וְאֶל־מֶלֶךְ יְהוּדָה . . . כֹּה תֹאמְרוּ אֲלֵיהֶן; RV 'But unto the king of Judah . . . thus shall ye say to him'). The same idiom is found in Apocr. and NT, as 2 Mac 4[4. 5] 'Onias seeing the danger of this contention . . . he went to the king' (RV omits 'he'); Jn 1[18] 'No man hath seen God at any time; the only-begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him' (ὁ ὢν εἰς . . . ἐκεῖνος). There are many examples of this construction in Heb. that are not transferred into English. On the other hand, the example quoted from 2 Mac * is peculiar to the Eng. version, for this method of emphasizing a subject, or of catching it up again after a long parenthesis, belongs to all composition. An example of each kind may be quoted from Shaks. Com. of Errors, v. i. 229—

> 'There did this perjured goldsmith swear me down,
> That I this day of him received the chain,
> Which, God he knows, I saw not';

Hamlet, I. ii. 22—

> 'Now follows, that you know, young Fortinbras,
> Holding a weak supposal of our worth,
> Or thinking by our late dear brother's death
> Our state to be disjoint and out of frame,
> Colleagued with the dream of his advantage,
> He hath not failed to pester us.'

See also under IT, WHICH.

In Bel [3. 4] there is an interchange between him and it, 'Now the Babylonians had an idol, called Bel, and there were spent upon him every day twelve great measures of fine flour. . . . And the king worshipped it, and went daily to adore it' (Gr. εἴδωλον . . . αὐτὸν . . . αὐτὸν . . . αὐτῷ). Cf. Tindale, Expositions, p. 96 (on Mt 6[16-18]), 'If thou wouldest kill thy body, or when it is tame enough, pain him.' Similar occurrences of a masc. pronoun for a neut., or a neut. for a masc., are found in the earlier versions, and are due usually to a literal regard for the gender of the Greek word. Thus Jn 1[3] Tind. 'All thinges were made by it, and with out it was made nothinge that was made' (so all the VSS before AV except Wyc. and Rhem.); but 15[18] 'Yf the worlde hate you ye knowe that he hated me before he hated you' (so Cran., but Gen. changed to 'it' and was followed by the rest). Cf. Mt 18[9] Rhem. 'And if thine eye scandalize thee, plucke him out, and cast him from thee'; and Wyc. Works, iii. 150, 'Ffor loued thing drawes men to hit, as tho stoon of a damaunt drawes irne unto hym.' In 2 S 12[15. 21] 'it' is applied to Bath-sheba's child, but 'he' and 'him' in vv.[19. 23]. RV retains this as well as the more glaring discrepancy in Bel [3. 4], and adds at least one instance of its own, Mt 14[12] 'And his disciples came and took up the corpse and buried him' (reading αὐτόν for αὐτό, AV 'it'), Mk 6[29] 'And when his disciples heard thereof, they came and took up his corpse, and laid it in a tomb' (retaining αὐτό here).

A clear example of the ancient dative him (='for him') remains in 1 K 13[13] 'And he said unto his sons, Saddle me the ass. So they saddled him the ass.' Other instances are 2 K 10[7] 'they . . . sent him them to Jezreel'; Sir 8[12] 'Lend not unto him that is mightier than thyself; for if thou lendest him, count it but lost'; and with me, 1 K 13[6] 'pray for me, that my hand may be restored me again.' But these instances are scarcely obsolete. In Ps 7[13] we read, 'He hath prepared for him the instruments of death.' Coverdale's tr[n] was 'He hath prepared him the weapens of death.' This became in Psalter of 1539 'He hath prepared hym the instruments of death,' and it remained in 1640, but in 1662 it was changed to 'for him,' because (as Earle shows) 'prepared him' must be 'prepared for himself' (sibi), which is clearly wrong.

Him is occasionally used reflexively: 2 K 13[15] 'And Elisha said unto him, Take bow and arrows. And he took unto him bow and arrows'; Mt 9[22] 'But Jesus turned him about, and when he saw her, he said, Daughter, be of good comfort' (ἐπιστραφείς, edd. στραφείς, RV 'turning'): so with you, Hag 1[6] 'Ye clothe you, but there is none warm'; and with 'them,' 2 K 17[9. 10] 'they built them high places in all their cities.' Examples are frequent in Shaks., as Macbeth, v. iv. 4—

> 'Let every soldier hew him down a bough.'

And himself for he himself, which occurs in Mt 8[17] 'Himself took our infirmities and bare our sick-

* So also He 9[11. 12].

nesses,' may be illustrated by Two Gent. of Verona, III. i. 143—

'Himself would lodge where senseless they are lying.'

HEAD is the translation in OT of רֹאשׁ (in 1 Ch 10^{10} גֻּלְגֹּלֶת 'skull'; in 1 S 19^{16} $26^{7.\ 11.\ 16}$, 1 K 19^{6} כְּרַאֲשֹׁת the place where or the object on which the head is laid; in Aram. portions of Dn רֵאשׁ) and in NT of κεφαλή. The word is used very frequently both in a literal and a metaphorical sense.

(a) Of men (Gn 40^{16}, Lv 8^{12}, Ca 8^{3}, Mt 5^{36}, Mk 6^{24}, Lk 7^{38} etc. etc.); opposed to 'foot' or used along with it in such expressions as 'from head to foot' (Lv 13^{12}, cf. Is 1^{6}); the son of the Shunammite cries, from the effects of sun-stroke, 'My head, my head' (2 K 4^{19}).

(b) Of animals (Gn 3^{15}), the serpent's head to be bruised [? see Dillm. ad loc.] by the seed of the woman, Ex 12^{9} the head of the paschal lamb, Job 40^{31} [Eng. 41^{7}] of the crocodile. A 'dog's head' is an expression of contumely, 2 S 3^{8}.

(c) In a transferred sense, of inanimate objects, e.g. the tower of Babel whose top (רֹאשׁ) was to reach to heaven Gn 11^{4}, Jacob's ladder 28^{12}, and frequently of mountains Ex $17^{9ff.}$ 19^{20} etc. We read of the head of Jacob's bed Gn 47^{31} (cf. He 11^{22} where ἐπὶ τὸ ἄκρον τῆς ῥάβδου αὐτοῦ is borrowed from the LXX, which must have read מִטָּה 'staff' instead of מִטָּה 'bed.'

Similar to this is the usage of 'head' to denote the beginning or source of something, e.g. in Gn 2^{10} the river which issued from the Garden of Eden was parted into four 'heads,' i.e. stream-beginnings (Dillm.), each of which became a river with a separate course (cf. the use of רֹאשׁ in Is 51^{20}, Ezk 16^{25} 21^{21}, where it means the beginning of roads and streets).

(d) Another very common metaphorical sense of 'head' or 'heads' is to denote the principal person or persons in a community (e.g. Ex $6^{14.\ 25}$ 18^{25}, Nu $1^{4.\ 16}$ 7^{2} 10^{4} 13^{3} 17^{3} $25^{4.\ 15}$ 30^{1}, Dt 1^{15} 5^{23} $28^{13.\ 44}$, Jos 22^{21}, 1 Ch 5^{24}, Is $9^{14.\ 15}$ (where 'head' and 'tail' are opposed). Allied to this is the NT reference to the man as head of the woman Eph 5^{23}, and to Christ as head of the Church Eph 4^{15} 5^{23}, Col 1^{18} 2^{19} (where also the idea of the head as a vital part is probably included), and as head over all principalities and powers Col 2^{10}.

'Heads' are used in apocalyptic literature to denote kings or empires (cf. the golden head of the image seen in Nebuchadrezzar's dream, Dn 2^{32}, which represented that king and his dynasty; the four-headed beast of 7^{6}; the beast with seven heads and ten horns of Rev 13^{1}, with one of the heads wounded to death, v.[3], on all of which see DANIEL, REVELATION, and Bruston, Études sur Daniel et l'Apocalypse).

The circumstance that the head is a principal seat of life explains the words of Achish to David, 'I will make thee keeper of mine head' (1 S 28^{2}), i.e. body-guardsman; cf. Ps 140^{7} 'Thou hast covered (סָכַכְתָּה) my head in the day of battle'; Dn 1^{10} 'endanger my head.' The head of an enemy might be cut off and exhibited as a trophy, or as a proof of death, Jg 7^{25}, 1 S $17^{54.\ 57}$ 31^{9}, 2 S 4^{7} $20^{21f.}$, 2 K $10^{6ff.}$. Swearing by the head is mentioned as a Jewish practice in Mt 5^{36}. The character of the head as a vital part accounts also for certain superstitions connected with the head of a sacrificial victim. While in Ex 12^{9} it is expressly enjoined that the head and viscera of the paschal lamb are to be eaten, a different practice was widely followed amongst Orientals. The same taboo attached to the head as to the blood. Among the Egyptians the head * of the victim was thrown into the Nile, while by the Iranians it was dedicated to Haoma, that the immortal part of the animal might return to him. A dried human head or the head of an animal was frequently used by the Semites as a charm (W. R. Smith, RS 359, 362, 449, 456).

* Which was regarded as a special seat of the soul.

Jacob placed his hands upon the heads of Ephraim and Manasseh as a symbol of conveying the blessing to them (Gn $48^{14ff.}$; cf. Gn 49^{26}, Pr 10^{6} 11^{5}). In like manner, evil is spoken of as being requited or returning on one's head (Jg 9^{57}, 2 Ch 6^{23} etc.). The laying of one's hands on the head of a sacrificial victim (Ex 29^{15}, Lv 1^{4} $4^{29.\ 33}$ etc.) is very frequently interpreted as a symbolical transference of sin to the animal; but while this is distinctly recognized in the case of the scape-goat (Lv 16^{21}), it is not so certainly implied for the ordinary burnt-offering (see W. R. Smith, RS 401 f.).

The hoary head is a symbol of old age (Lv 19^{32}, 1 K $2^{6.\ 9}$, Pr 16^{31}, Is 46^{4}, cf. Job 41^{32}); it is to be honoured, Lv 19^{32}; it is pronounced a crown of glory, the reward of uprightness, Pr 16^{31}.

While the general sense of the expression, 'heap coals of fire upon the head' (Pr 25^{22}, Ro 12^{20}) is clear enough (St. Paul paraphrases, 'Overcome evil with good'), its origin is somewhat uncertain (see Wildeboer, Reuss, etc., on Pr; and Meyer, Godet, Sanday-Headlam, etc., on Ro, ad loc.). A good illustration of the working of the principle is supplied by the words of Saul to David, 1 S 24^{17} 26^{21}.

To lift up the head, when spoken of oneself, may mean to recover from disaster (Jg 8^{28}, Zec 1^{21}), or, generally, to succeed or to carry oneself proudly Ps 83^{3} 110^{7} (cf. its use in 24^{7} of gates and see Wellh. ad loc. in Haupt's PB). To 'lift up the head' of another is used of raising to honour (Gn 40^{13} of Pharaoh's chief butler, 2 K 25^{27} of the captive king Jehoiachin, who was taken out of prison by Evil-Merodach). In Gn 40^{19}, with a designed contrast to the treatment of the butler, it is said that Pharaoh will 'lift up the head of the chief baker from off (מֵעָלֶיךָ) him,' the reference being to beheading.

When Elisha was told that 'the LORD will take away thy master from thy head' (2 K $2^{3.\ 5}$), the reference is probably to the custom of pupils sitting at the feet of their teacher (so Siegfried-Stade; cf. Ac 22^{3}).

To wag or shake the head was a sign of contempt or of malicious enjoyment, Ps 64^{8} (RV), Jer 18^{16} (both נוד), La 2^{15} (נוּעַ); cf. Ps 44^{14}, Jer 48^{27} (both מָנוֹד רֹאשׁ 'a shaking of the head'); Mt 27^{39}, Mk 15^{29} (κινοῦντες τὰς κεφαλάς, of the men who derided the suffering Saviour).

The head of one under a vow was not shaven till its completion (Nu $6^{18ff.}$, Ac 18^{18} 21^{24}). See further under NAZIRITE. The Israelites were forbidden to 'round the corners of their heads' (Lv 19^{27}) in token of mourning (cf. Dt 14^{1}, where 'making baldness between the eyes' refers to the custom of shaving the front part of the head; see Driver, ad loc., and on Am 8^{10}, and W. R. Smith, RS 306 f.).

Anointing the head was a common practice amongst the Jews (Ps 23^{5}, Mt 6^{17} 26^{7}, Mk 14^{3}, Lk 7^{46}). See further under ANOINTING.

To cover (חָפָה) the head was a token of mourning [2 S 15^{30} David and his men when fleeing from Absalom, Jer 14^{3}, Est 6^{12} (‖ אָבַל)]. The same was expressed by putting the hand upon the head (2 S 13^{19} Tamar after Amnon's outrage) or putting ashes (אֵפֶר) or earth (אֲדָמָה) upon it (Jos 7^{6}, 1 S 4^{12}, 2 S 1^{2} 13^{19}, La 2^{10}). It is possible that this custom is alluded to in Am 2^{7} 'that pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor,' i.e. who are so avaricious that they are eager to secure even the dust strewn upon their heads by the poor in token of their distress (see full discussion in Driver, ad loc.).

To have the head covered (κατακαλύπτεσθαι) in the Christian assemblies is enjoined upon women by St.

Paul (1 Co 11^5). The contrary rule applies to men (v.^{4}). Much obscurity attaches to v.^{10} 'For this cause ought the woman to have power (ἐξουσίαν, RV '[a sign of] authority,' AVm i.e. 'a covering, in sign that she is under the power of her husband,' RVm 'authority over') on her head because of the angels' (διὰ τοὺς ἀγγέλους). This passage will be fully discussed in art. POWER (see also WH's remarks on the text). It may be noted, meanwhile, that what is emphasized is the presence of angels in the sanctuary, and not the ordinary Jewish notion (Taylor, Sayings of the Fathers^{2}, p. 156) about guardian angels, two of whom were supposed to be always in attendance on every human being.

It is generally supposed that in Est 7^8 there is an allusion to a Persian custom of covering the head or face in token of sentence of death (so Oxf. Heb. Lex., V. Ryssel in Kautzsch's AT, etc.). In support of this interpretation appeal is made to a similar custom among the Romans ('Caput obnubito, infelici arbori suspendito,' Cic. pro Robirio, iv. 13) and the Macedonians ('Capite velato in regiam adducunt,' Quint. Curt. vi. 8. 22). But in the Rev. Biblique Internat. (April 1898, p. 258 ff.) A. Condamin gives reasons for doubting whether either of these passages is relevant. Some evidence from such a quarter as Herodotus would be much more to the point. Moreover, the LXX have evidently followed a different text, or at least have interpreted differently from the MT (וַיֵּצֵנִי הָמָן חָפְנִי) and the Vulg. (operuerunt faciem eius). They give Ἀμὰν δὲ ἀκούσας διετράπη τῷ προσώπῳ (cf. Jos. Ant. XI. vi. 11, 'Ἀμάνου δὲ πρὸς τοῦτο καταπλαγέντος καὶ μηδὲν ἔτι φθέγξασθαι δυνηθέντος). Condamin maintains that the order of the words in MT and the absence of אֵת with פָּנַי plead in favour of this tr^n, 'the face of Haman became troubled' (so Siegfried - Stade, Hamans Gesicht verschleierte = verdüsterte sich). The context also he uses in support of his interpretation. If the MT חפו (either Qal or Pual) is considered insufficient to support the LXX rendering, it would be easy, he points out, to emend to חפרו. It may be added that חָפָה is never used elsewhere of covering the face but always the head (cf. Est 6^{12}, 2 S 15^{30}, Jer 14^3). When the face is spoken of, the verbs employed are כָּסָה (Job 9^{24} 23^{17} 24^{15} etc.) or הִסְתִּיר (Ex 3^6, Job 13^{24} etc.).

With the Hebrews not the head but the heart was the seat of intellect. See HEART.

HEADBAND.—See BAND and DRESS.

HEADSTONE is erroneously printed in mod. edd. of AV as one word; in 1611 it is 'head stone' (as RV), and means simply the topmost stone of the building.

HEADTIRE.—See DRESS and TIRE.

HEADY.—This is the tr^n in 2 Ti 3^4 AV of προπετής, which in Ac 19^{36}, its only remaining occurrence in NT, is tr^d 'rashly' (RV 'rash'). Heady is from Tindale; and has been adopted by all the VSS thereafter, except Rhem. 'stubburne,' and RV which uses its mod. equivalent in this sense, 'headstrong.'* In enumerating 'the heap of inconveniences that spring by intemperate and superfluous eating and drinking, Tindale says (Expositions, p. 93, on Mt 6^{16-18}), 'Our fashions of eating make us slothful, and unlusty to labour and study; unstable, inconstant, and light-mannered; full of wits, after-witted (as we call it), incircumspect, inconsiderate, heady, rash, and hasty to begin unadvisedly, and without casting of perils.' Calvin (in Golding's tr^n) uses the word of Job's passions (on Job 32^{1-3}), 'Seeing then that Job had so heady passions, no doubt but in so dooing hee made himselfe more rightuous than God.' High-mind and Heady are the names of the guns which the inhabitants of Mansoul placed at Ear-gate to keep the King's forces out (Bunyan, Holy War, p. 50). Bp. Hall uses the word as equivalent to hasty (Works, ii. 109, on 'Zacheus'), 'There must be no more hast than good speed in our performances; we may offend as well in our heddye acceleration, as in our delay; Moses ran so fast downe the hill that he stumbled spiritually, and brake the Tables of God.' J. HASTINGS.

* Headstrong occurs in AV, Sir 30^8, of a horse, as tr^n of σκληρός.

HEALTH.—This word has become greatly narrowed in meaning since 1611. Now restricted to the state of the body, it then expressed also the condition of the soul, the relation to God of the whole person. Hence in 'Morning Prayer,' 'We have left undone those things which we ought to have done, and we have done those things which we ought not to have done, and there is no health in us,' which has retained its place since the Pr. Bk. of 1552. But in the Communion Service, 'health' of 1604, 'And as the Son of God did vouchsafe to yield up his soul by death upon the cross for your health,' is found as 'salvation' in 1662. So we find in Wyc., Ac 28^{28} 'Therfore be it knowen to you, for to hethen men this helthe of God is sent'; and in Tind. (as well as in Wyc.), Lk 19^9 'This day is healthe come unto this housse.' Cf. also Erasmus, On the Creed, p. 40, 'The first degre [=step] than unto helthe is Credere deum esse (id est) to believe that there is God.' This is the meaning of 'health' in Ps 42^{11} 43^5 'Who is the health of my countenance' (Wyc. 'the helthe of my chere'). The Heb. is יְשׁוּעָה, which is tr^d 'salvation' in Ps 62^1, Is 56^1 (Wyc. as usual 'helthe,' Cov. 'savynge health'), and elsewhere. In Ps 62^2 the word is used of the person, 'He only is my rock and my salvation' (='saviour,' which is Cheyne's tr^n in Ps 42^{11} 43^5; RVm gives 'help,' which is Coverdale's word). Again in Ps 67^2 'That thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations'; 'saving health' stands for the same Heb. word (Wyc. 'helthe'; 'savynge health' being from Coverdale, who uses the phrase in other places, as Is 51^8 'But my rightuousness shal endure for ever, and my savynge health from generacion to generacion').

But 'health' was often used in a still wider sense, denoting the prosperity or safety of a person or a place. As expressing 'safety' it occurs in Ac 27^{34} 'Wherefore I pray you to take some meat: for this is for your health' (σωτηρία, RV 'safety'). Cf. Ac 27^{-0} Wyc. 'Sothely nether sunne nether sterris apperinge bi mo dayes, and tempest not litil schewinge nygh, now al the hope of oure healthe was don awey.' See MEDICINE.

J. HASTINGS.

HEART, לֵב or לֵבָב, καρδία.—In the AV of the OT other Hebrew expressions for the inward parts of the body are also rendered by 'heart': e.g. קֶרֶב in Ps 39^3, מֵעַי Ps 40^8. 'Heart' has thus the general sense of the midst, the innermost or hidden part of anything, in such instances as the 'heart of the sea,' Ex 15^8; of heaven, Dt 4^{11} (RV and AVm); of a tree, 2 S $18^{14ff.}$; of the earth, Mt 12^{40}.

But its ruling use is (1) for the bodily organ, of the centrality of which as the seat of life the ancients had on the whole a correct view. Since in Bible phrase 'the life is in the blood' (Lv 17^{14}), that organ which forms the centre of its distribution must have the most important place in the whole system. So by an easy transition 'heart' came (2) to signify the seat of man's collective energies, the focus of the personal life.

This secondary or psychical meaning it holds unchanged and undisputed through the whole of the biblical writings. Its prominence as a psychological term in the Scriptures and in other ancient books is no doubt due partly to the fact that the physical heart bulked so much more largely in the view of those times than the head or brain. How rarely are any functions of thought attributed to the latter in the OT (see only Dn 2^{28} $4^{2.\ 7.\ 10}$ $7^{1.\ 15}$ as exceptions). This fact introduces the only difference in the Bible use of 'heart' metaphorically from that of everyday modern speech. As from the fleshly heart goes forth the blood in which is the animal life, so from the heart of the human soul goes forth the entire mental and moral activity. To it also all the actions of the human soul return. 'In corde actiones animæ humanæ ad ipsum redeunt' (Roos). There the soul is at home with itself, becomes conscious of doing and suffering as its own. 'The heart knoweth the bitterness of the soul,' or 'of itself' (Pr 14^{10}).

Heart is therefore the organ of conscience, of self-knowledge, and indeed of all knowledge. For though the reflective function is prominent, we must note that all inner human movements are denoted by this word in Scripture; the rational and intellectual as well as other. This is the main distinction between the biblical and the modern usage of the word. In the OT it by no means signifies mainly or only the emotional or volitional elements in human nature, but pre-eminently the intellectual (hence אֵין לֵב = 'without understanding'). It is only in the later Scriptures that the Greek habit of distinguishing the rational from the emotional finds place.

The following analysis of the OT uses of לֵבָב and לֵב is abridged from that of Oxf. Heb. Lexicon:—

1. Of the inner man in contrast with the outer; opposed to flesh Ps 73^{26}, garments Jl 2^{13}, hands Ps 73^{13}, La 3^{41} (?), eyes Nu 15^{39}, 1 S 16^{7}, ears Ezk 3^{10}, mouth Dt 30^{14}, speech Ps 28^{3} 78^{18}.

2. The inner man, comprehending mind, affections, will; note e.g. the frequent 'with all the heart and with all the soul' (בְּכָל־לֵבָב יִבְכָל־נַפְשֶׁךָ) Dt 4^{29} 6^{5} and oft.; cf. 'what is in the heart' (אֲשֶׁר בִּלְבָב) Dt 8^{2}, 'with the heart' (עִם לֵבָב) Dt 8^{5}.

3. With specific reference to mind, e.g. אַנְשֵׁי לֵבָב 'men of mind' Job $34^{10.\ 34}$, knowledge Dt 8^{5}, 1 K 24^{4}, thinking, reflection, Is 10^{7}, memory 1 S 21^{12}.

4. With specific reference to inclinations, resolutions, determinations of the will, e.g. 'set the mind to' (אֶל־) 1 S 7^{3}, 1 Ch 29^{18}, 'Pharaoh's mind was changed' (יְהֻפַּךְ לֵ פַּ) Ex 14^{5}.

5. With specific reference to conscience, 'my heart (i.e. conscience) shall not reproach me' Job 27^{6}.

6. With specific reference to moral character: God tries the heart 1 Ch 29^{17}; 'uprightness of heart' Dt 9^{5}, heart perfect with (עִם) 1 K 8^{61}; heart as seat of naughtiness 1 S 17^{28} (?), pride Ps 101^{5}; heart circumcised or uncircumcised Dt 10^{16}, Lv 26^{41}, hardened Dt 2^{30}.

7. Heart = the man himself, Dt 7^{17} 8^{17} 9^{4}, Is 14^{13}.

8. As seat of the appetites, Ps 104^{15}.

9. As seat of emotions and passions, e.g. joy Is 30^{29}, trouble 1 K 8^{38}, anger Dt 19^{6}, hate Lv 19^{17}.

10. As seat of courage (for which usually רוּחַ) Dn 11^{25}.

Because it is the focus of the personal life, the workplace for the appropriation and assimilation of every influence, in 'heart,' according to Scripture, lies the moral and religious condition of the man. Only what enters the heart forms a possession of moral worth, only what comes from the heart is a moral production. The Bible places human depravity in the 'heart' because sin is a principle which has its seat in the centre of man's inward life, and thence 'defiles' the whole circuit of his action (Mt $15^{19.\ 20}$). On the other hand, it regards the 'heart' as the sphere of divine influence, the starting-point of all moral renovation: 'The work of the law written in their hearts' (Ro 2^{15}); 'A new heart will I give you' (Ezk 36^{26}); 'Purifying their hearts by faith' (Ac 15^{9}). Once more, the 'heart' as lying deep within contains 'the hidden man' (1 P 3^{4}), the real man. It represents the true character, but conceals it; hence it is contrasted with the 'outward appearance,' and is declared to be the index of character only for Him who 'searches the heart and tries the reins of the children of men' (1 S 16^{7}; Jer 17^{10} 20^{12}).

This scriptural usage—making the heart the source of the moral life—lends firmness and simplicity to its teachings about sin and grace. That man's moral corruption is seated in his heart means that not the substance of human nature or the personality of man is perverted, but his principles of action. That the saving process begins with 'a new heart' means that not another self or personality is substituted, but that new principles of action are introduced. Hence the whole doctrine of sin and grace is biblically grounded in a way to free it from mistake or exaggeration.

HEARTH.—The word 'hearth' is found in seven passages of our AV, in all of which, with one exception (Is 30^{14}), it has been discarded by the Revisers. On the other hand, it has been introduced three times into their text (Lv 6^{9} [Heb.^{2}], Ezk $43^{15.\ 16}$), and once besides in an explanatory note in the margin (Is 29^{1}; for all of these see No. 4 below).

1. The primitive domestic hearth was a mere depression in the earthen floor of the living-room, where the family meal was cooked, and around which, in the cold season, the family gathered for warmth. The Hebrew name for the hearth was perhaps מוֹקֵד môḳēd (Ps 102^{3} [Heb.^{4}] 'my bones are burned as an hearth' AV; but RV has 'as a firebrand,' cf. LXX φρύγιον, with the former rendering in the margin). This word would thus be identical in meaning as well as in form with the Arabic maukid.* The nearly allied יָקוּד (Is 30^{14}), by AV and RV rendered 'hearth,' is more strictly the burning mass, a meaning which many would give to môḳed (see both words in Oxf. Heb. Lex.). The same uncertainty attaches to the form מוֹקְדָה môḳĕdah (Lv 6^{9} [Heb.^{2}] 'the burnt-offering shall be on the hearth' RV; 'on its firewood' RVm), which is probably not an independent word, but the masc. form (môḳēd) with suffix (so Dillm., Strack, etc.). A detailed description of the modern Syrian hearth (maukdi) is given by Landberg (Proverbes et Dictons, pp. 73, 74), with illustration (p. 455). The smoke from the hearth, on which various kinds of fuel, wood, charcoal, dung, etc. (see COAL, FUEL) were burned, escaped as best it might through door or latticed window (אֲרֻבָּה, Hos 13^{3} AV, RV 'chimney'), since chimneys were unknown (see CHIMNEY).

2. In the houses of the wealthier classes, at least, braziers or chafing dishes were in common use. Thus Jehoiakim on a memorable occasion had Jeremiah's roll 'consumed in the fire that was in the brazier' (הָאח Jer $36^{22.\ 23}$ RV; AV in each case 'on the hearth'; LXX ἐπὶ τῆς ἐσχάρας, which is ambiguous) in his 'winter house.' A similar firepan is referred to in Zec 12^{6} ('like a pan of fire' כִּיּוֹר אֵשׁ; so RV, but AV 'like a hearth of fire'). Cf. for NT times Jn 18^{18} 21^{9}.

3. In Gn 18^{6} Sarah is requested to 'make cakes upon the hearth' (AV), for which RV has, more literally, 'make cakes.' The cakes in question, termed עֻגוֹת 'ugôth, were really baked 'upon the hearth' by being covered with the hot ashes, and are therefore accurately rendered by the Vulgate subcinericios panes (LXX ἐγκρυφίας). See BREAD, vol. i. p. 318.

* So Del. in loc., and Siegfried-Stade's Lex. For other possible significations of מוֹקֵד see Bæthgen's note in his Handkommentar, in loc.

4. We have seen (under No. 1 above) that, according to a possible interpretation, the top of the altar of burnt-offering was known as its 'hearth' (Lv 6^{9} [Heb.^{2}] in RV). This is confirmed by the description in Sirach of Simon the high priest standing 'by the hearth of the altar' (ἑστὼς παρ' ἐσχάρᾳ βωμοῦ, Sir 50^{12}). The upper portion of the altar also receives a special name from Ezekiel, viz. 'Arî'ēl (הָאֲרִיאֵל, so Kerê $43^{15.\,16}$), the origin and precise significance of which are uncertain. Most recent scholars are in favour of the meaning adopted by the Revisers, 'altar hearth' (AV wrongly 'altar.'*).

The enigmatical term Ariel (אֲרִיאֵל), by which Isaiah ($29^{1ff.}$) designates Jerusalem, is also, by various modern writers, understood in this sense of 'altar hearth' (cf. RVm 'hearth of God.' See comm. of Duhm and Skinner, in loc.; also ARIEL in vol. i. with reff. there, to which add Cheyne, Isaiah, in Haupt's 'Polychrome Bible').

HEATH (עַרְעָר 'ar'ar, עֲרוֹעֵר 'ărô'ēr, ἀγριομυρίκη, ὄνος ἄγριος, myrica).—This is AV translation of the Hebrew name of a plant growing in the desert, doubtless identical with the 'ar'ar of the Arabs, Juniperus Phœnicea, L., which grows on the W. face of the range of the mountains of Edom, overlooking the 'Arabah. Its branches, clothed with minute scale-like leaves, may well entitle it to the name 'naked tree' (AVm Jer 48^{6}). In this and the only other passage where the word occurs (Jer 17^{6}), RVm has 'a tamarisk tree.' There is another species of Juniper, called by the Arabs 'ar'ar. It is J. oxycedrus, L. This species is not, however, a desert plant. It grows in the middle and subalpine regions of Syria. It is unlikely that this is the plant referred to. One species of heath, Erica verticillata, Forsk., grows on sandstone and chalky rocks, at an altitude of from 300 to 3500 ft., on the W. face of Lebanon and the chains to the northward. This cannot be the plant intended. There are no heaths in the desert.

HEATHEN.—The title 'Nations' in Scripture (Heb. Goiim, Gr. Ethnē), originally covering the nations of the world as a whole, soon comes to designate exclusively the non-Jews, the uncircumcised. Scripture casts its view, and it is a sympathetic view, over the whole human race, before it treats of the forefathers of the Israelites in particular. Though many of the Jews of later times became proudly exclusive in their treatment of those who did not belong to the privileged people, the religion of Scripture gives no warrant for such an attitude on their part; it is fundamentally characterized by the spirit of humanity. The synopsis of the peoples of the earth given in Gn 10, by connecting them all with Noah, presents them as related to each other like kinsmen. Dillmann (Genesis, p. 176) points out how other races too, Egyptians and Phœnicians, Assyrians and Babylonians, even Indians and Persians, had a certain knowledge of the earth and its inhabitants, but usually paid little attention to foreigners, except when influenced by political or commercial reasons, and often despised them as mere barbarians. 'Here in Genesis, on the other hand, all the peoples that were known by repute, most of whom could not have stood in any intimate relation to the countrymen of the writer, are included in his survey. All the divisions of mankind are collected in a genealogical tree, and Israel is held to be only an ordinary branch on the stock of universal humanity.' The same breadth of outlook is indicated in the announcements that God created man in His own image (Gn 1^{27}), that He blessed Noah and his sons, and assigned a penalty for the shedding of man's blood (Gn $9^{1.\,6}$). Even in giving the promise of special favour to Abraham and his seed, God showed Himself gracious to the other inhabitants of the world as well. One race was chosen and disciplined for the ultimate good of the whole. In Abraham all the families of the earth were to be blessed (Gn 12^{3}).

At the same time, we see the severest treatment of the heathen approved of in the OT. Efforts were made to extirpate the Canaanites after the land of Pal. was entered, and the OT represents that it was a great sin to spare them (Ex $23^{27ff.}$, Nu $33^{52ff.}$, Dt $20^{16ff.}$). The disaster that befell the Canaanites is viewed, however, as the consequence of their utter moral corruption, their grievous sin against the light of nature; the reflection stirred by their ruin is comparable to that which is now occasioned by the action of inexorable laws of Providence on demoralized nations of modern times. Israel was commanded to make no marriages with the inhabitants of the land that remained (Jos 23^{12}), and to make no league with them (Jg 2^{2}). The prophets had an arduous struggle to keep Israel's worship of J" separate from that which was contaminated by the idolatrous heathen rites as practised on the high places. Heathenism, with its distinguishing feature of idolatry, remained a congenital faith, even to the people of God, and spiritual monotheism was a new thing which was, for obvious reasons, repugnant to them. The centralization of Jewish worship at the temple, as enjoined in Dt, was mainly due to the purpose of the prophets to isolate the chosen people from all their heathen neighbours. The natural, racial, inherited proclivities of the Israelites could not be extinguished, and the nation could not advance in the knowledge and service of the true God otherwise than by the method of seclusion from the surrounding tribes.

The prophets, however, far from cherishing a spirit of blind hostility towards the heathen, foresee the day when the nations will be gathered into the one family of God's people, having rest and comfort, and enjoying the blessings of the law that goes forth from Jerusalem. The golden age of the world, according to the OT, is in the future, and the heathen will participate in its glory (Is 40–66). The Bk. of Jonah sets forth God's tender regard for the heathen.

Jewish exclusiveness as towards the heathen culminates in the post-exilic age. The Jews being shorn of political influence, became the more confirmed in their devotion to their faith, and hedged it round with an elaborate system of ritual (the Levitical law). The barrier between them and the heathen thus became more impassable than ever.

As the Greeks spread along the shores of the Mediter., and their speech and customs became more prevalent (2 Mac $4^{10ff.}$), they, as the principal representatives, stood for the heathen generally (Ro 10^{12}, 1 Co 10^{32} 12^{13}, Gal 3^{28}; cf. Jn 7^{35}).

The Jewish view of the heathen is marked by conflicting elements, and needs to be superseded. The heathen are at once held in repugnance, and called to the highest honour.

Christianity was, in the first instance, a development and modification of Judaism. As the world had needed preparation for the coming of Christ, so He took up the work which was begun among the Jews and completed it. But the principle of universalism is involved in His doctrine of the kingdom of God as a kingdom of righteousness and love; in His doctrine of God as the Father of individual spirits, who welcomes the returning prodigal on the sole condition that he repents and has faith (Lk 15); or, again, in His announcement that God is a spirit, who must be worshipped in spirit and in truth (Jn 4^{23}). God is the Father of all, and the conditions of acceptance with God are such as all men can and ought to fulfil.

What was implicit in the doctrine of Christ on this matter was made explicit, after a period of conflict with the other apostles, by St. Paul. To the latter there is no distinction between Jews and Gentiles, except that the Jews, as being the better prepared, through the oracles of God entrusted to them, have the privilege of hearing the gospel first (Ro 3^{2}). But the Gentiles, too, have had a measure of training by the law, that which is known through nature and conscience; and if they turn to God and keep the law, their uncircumcision will be counted to them for circumcision (Ro $2^{14.\ 26}$). In all this a continuous plan is seen to be worked out by God, for those who sincerely believe are the true descendants of Abraham, having his faith; and they are the truly circumcised, for true circumcision is of the heart (Ro 2 ff.).

According to the gospel, heathenism proves to be, not a matter of nationality, but of spirit and character. So in the OT the moral aspect of it is frequently emphasized, especially in the Psalms, where heathenism is often synonymous with wickedness. Its essence is set forth by Christ in Mt $6^{31.\ 32}$. To the heathen mind God is a power that needs to be appeased or conciliated for worldly purposes. The world only is sought with desire—protection from disease or misfortune, material prosperity, enjoyment bodily or mental. By the faithful spirit, on the other hand, religion is made the first choice, and the God who is worshipped is seen in His true character, is recognized as the true God; He is reverenced as a righteous Spirit, and loved more than aught else for His fatherly goodness. In this way distinctions of race, name, or profession pass over into such as are moral and spiritual. See FOREIGNER, GENTILE, GER.

HEAVEN.—The word 'heaven' is used in a variety of senses in the OT and NT, but especially in that of the dwelling-place of God, the abode from which Christ came and to which He has returned, and the destination of the perfected saints. The etymological associations of the term are extensive. It is of uncertain root, though it may be connected with the Lat. capere, and the Eng. have and heave. It appears in different forms in many European languages, Sw. hefva, Da. hæve, Go. hafjan, Ic. hefja, hifinn, Ger. heben, OHG heffan, AS hebban, ME heuen; Chaucer, CT, 552; in Robert of Gloucester, however, hebben. (See Skeat, Etymol. Dict.[2]).

In the OT it usually represents שָׁמַיִם, Aram. שְׁמַיִן, which expresses 'heaven' in respect of its height; and in the NT οὐρανός, οὐρανοί, which may be connected with ὄρνυμι=lift, heave (cf. Ger. Luft, Scot. 'the lift'), and the Vedic varuna, from var=tegere (see M. Müller, Oxford Essays, p. 41). In the LXX οὐρανός stands not only for שָׁמַיִם, שְׁמַיָּא, but also for רָקִיעַ, תְּהוֹם, תְּבֵל, חוּצוֹת, שְׁחַק, כְּרוֹם, אֵלוֹהַּ, אֵל. In our AV the word 'heaven' represents in addition to שָׁמַיִם mainly three words of different significations, רָקִיעַ, כְּרוֹם, שְׁחָקִים. But there are also certain words of which it is erroneously made the equivalent. One of these is the term גַּלְגַּל, which expresses the idea of roundness, and is rendered 'heaven' in Ps 77^{18} (AV), as if it meant the 'round orb of the sky,' but which conveys rather the notion of a 'whirl,' and may be best rendered 'whirlwind' (so RV). Another is עֲרָבוֹת, in Ps 68^{4}, in the description of J″ riding 'on the heavens.' But while the term might be taken, as it is by some, in the sense of the large expanse of the sky, it is more accordant with its usual meaning to take it in the sense of 'deserts.' Another is the term עֲרִיפִים, which is rendered 'darkness' by the Syr. and the Vulg., and 'heavens' in the AV in Is 5^{30}; but it means properly 'droppings,' 'clouds,' and expresses probably the idea of the clouds ready to discharge their rains. In Ps $89^{6.\ 37}$, too, the word שְׁחָק is rendered 'heaven,' which properly denotes 'dust,' and may best be rendered the 'clouds' or the 'skies.'

The chief ideas attached to the word 'heaven' in the OT, therefore, are the following. It is used (1) in the largest sense, to signify the one half of the whole system of things, the upper division of the created world, the phrase 'the heavens and the earth' expressing the universe as a whole (Gn 1^{1}). More specifically it is used (2) to denote the firmament (στερέωμα), the sky, the expanse which God made on the second day of His creative work, after the formation of the 'earth' and the institution of 'day' and 'night' (Gn $1^{6.\ 8}$). This 'expanse' is represented as dividing the waters above from the waters beneath. In speaking of it in its different aspects, the OT writers employ a great variety of terms, both literal and boldly metaphorical, which naturally move within the limits of the popular conceptions that prevailed among the Semitic and other ancient peoples on the subject of the system of things, and the place which the earth held in it as its centre and the proper object of God's creative action. The simple ideas which meet us in ancient Greek poetry (cf. Homer, Il. xvii. 425, Od. iii. 2; Pindar, Ol. Od. 10, Nem. vi. 3) and in the oldest literature of the East (e.g. the Vedic hymns, the Babylonian tablets, etc.), are also expressed in the OT. The 'firmament,' or vault of heaven, is described in terms of a strong cover, curtain, or roof provided for the earth (Is 40^{22}, Ps 104^{2}), resting on pillars, on the mountains and the waters of the earth (2 S 22^{8}, Job 26^{11}, Pr 8^{27-29}). Its beauty is described as that of crystal or sapphire (Ex 24^{10}, Job 37^{18}, Ezk 1^{26-28}). It is represented as the region of the fowls, the winds, the clouds (Dn 4^{12} $7^{2.\ 13}$). In it the ancient Hebrews, like the Greeks and Romans (cf. Plutarch, De plac. phil. 2^{14}, Pliny, 2^{39}), conceived God to have placed the fixed stars and the planets (Gn 1^{17}, Is 14^{12} 34^{4}).

It is used also (3) to denote the peculiar abode of Deity, with which the ideas of elevation, majesty, glory, power, holiness, unchangeableness are associated. It is the place to which prayer ascends (2 Ch 30^{27}), which makes J″'s throne (Is 6^{1} 66^{1}), which is His peculiar possession in contrast with the earth which He has given to the sons of men (Ps 115^{16}). It is the 'height' or 'heights' (Job 22^{12}, Ps 148^{1}), supramundane, above the firmament and all created things (Ps $29^{3.\ 10}$ $104^{2.\ 3}$). As the dwelling-place of God it is described in terms of a temple, a sanctuary, a palace, a throne (Ps 11^{4}, Mic 1^{2}, Hab 2^{20} etc.). The ideas of the supramundane abode are taken so naturally from the visible things of the mundane holy place, which was the centre of the Jewish worship of God and the place where He was specially to be found, that it is sometimes difficult to say which of the two was immediately in the writer's thought (e.g. in Is 6; see Riehm, HW, under the word Himmel). It is the place, too, in which God has His court of angels (Job 1^{6} 2^{1}, implicitly). But while it is often thus spoken of as the peculiar habitation of God, it is also described as incapable of containing Him, and the prophets declare His greatness to be such as to surpass all the bounds of space and all idea of residence within the limits even of the heaven of heavens (Is 40^{12} 66^{1}; cf. 1 K 8^{27}).

But it is also used, (4), in the eschatological sense, to express the new constitution of things which shall in the end take the place of the present imperfect order. In many passages the quality of the changeless and enduring is ascribed to 'heaven,' especially in contrast with the mutable earth and the perishable life of man (Jos 11^{21}, Ps $72^{5.\ 7.\ 17}$ 89^{29}, Jer $31^{35.\ 33}$ $33^{25.\ 26}$). But it is also exhibited as an aspect of the changeful and transitory, as contrasted with the changeless being and eternal years of God Himself (Ps $102^{25\text{-}27}$, Is 51^{6}). And the OT looks forward to a day of divine judgment, the issue of which shall be the dissolution of the present order, the renewal of the system of things, and the creation of a glorious condition of which a restored heaven shall form part (Is 65^{17} 66^{22}).

The NT takes over the general OT idea of 'heaven,' but with certain differences and enlargements. It has the same general conception of 'heaven' as a region above earth. As the OT speaks of a ladder reaching to heaven (Gn 28^{12}), of Elijah as going 'up' in a whirlwind to heaven (2 K 2^{11}), of the 'heights' of heaven (Job 11^{8}), etc., so the NT speaks of the angels of God ascending and descending in relation to heaven (Jn 1^{51}), of St. Paul as 'caught up' to the third heaven (2 Co 12^{2}), of St. John as seeing a door opened in heaven and hearing a voice saying, 'Come up hither' (Rev 4^{1}), of the holy city as descending from God out of heaven (Rev 21^{2}), etc. In the NT it is also the name given to the peculiar dwelling-place of God, and Christ's doctrine of God as our 'Father in heaven' adds to the OT conception of its majesty and remoteness and holiness the new ideas of security, grace, and love. The whole conception of heaven as the habitation of Deity is made more definite by its being presented as the scene of the present life and activity of Christ. It is the place from which He came to earth and to which He reascended (Mk 16^{19}, Lk 24^{51}, Ac 1^{11}); the habitation which 'must receive' Him 'until the times of the restitution of all things' (Ac 3^{21}); the scene of His present reign and His present work. In heaven He is in 'the presence of God' (He 9^{24}), and there His glory can be seen (Jn 17^{24}). The scene of Christ's risen life and the work of intercession which He carries on in it are described with special fulness in the Ep. to the Heb., and in terms of the ancient Jewish sanctuary, its conditions, its sanctities, and its services (He $8^{1\ etc.}$ 9^{24}). Heaven is also the abode of the angels (Mt 18^{10} 22^{30}, Rev 3^{5}), and the place from which the Holy Ghost is sent down (1 P 1^{12}).

It is chiefly in its eschatological applications that the word 'heaven' is used in the NT. The idea of a renewal of heaven as well as earth that is associated in the OT with the judgment of the end, is given more distinctly in the NT. In certain large and significant passages the NT speaks of a redemption of the whole creation from the bondage of corruption (Ro 8^{21}), of a gathering together and a reconciliation of things in heaven as well as things on earth (Eph 1^{10}, Col 1^{20}), of a time of the restitution of all things (Ac 3^{21}), of a day when all things shall be made new (Rev 21^{5}), of the formation of a 'new heaven' as well as 'a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness' (2 P $3^{12.\ 13}$, Rev 21^{1}). The NT associates this renewal of the heavens with Christ's Second Coming and the Final Judgment, and connects the hope of a new scene and order for man's life with that of the final perfection of his life. Further, in the NT 'heaven' is in particular the final home of the righteous. It is the place which Christ has gone to prepare for them (Jn 14^{2}), the place from which He is to come with His holy angels (Mt 24^{30}, Mk 13^{26}, Lk 21^{27}, Rev 1^{7}) for the final arbitrament of things, and into which His own shall be received that they may be with Him and see His glory (Mt 5^{12}, Lk 6^{23}, 2 Cor 5^{1}, Eph 6^{9}, He 10^{34} etc.). So it is the sum of all good, and the goal of man's hope (Mt 6^{19}, Lk 6^{23} 10^{20}, Ph 3^{20}, 1 P 1^{4}, He 12^{23}).

There are other questions regarding the 'heaven' of the Bible which are of interest and require consideration. Some relate to the use of the term, others to the ideas of heaven which find expression in the Scriptures. Among these is the question whether the word 'heaven' or 'heavens' occurs either in the OT or in the NT as a metonymy for God. The Jew of later times had so exaggerated a sense of the sanctity of the divine name, that he did not allow himself to utter the most proper designation of God, but had recourse to equivalents. There is abundant evidence to show that by our Lord's time the word 'heaven' or 'heavens' was in frequent use in this way; and it is held by not a few competent scholars that the Jewish formula מַלְכוּת שָׁמַיִם is an instance of this, and that St. Matthew's phrase, 'the kingdom of heaven,' is literally the same as 'the kingdom of God,' which is the expression of the other evangelists and of St. Paul (see Cremer, Bib.-theol. Lex., sub voce βασιλεία; Thayer's Lex., sub voce οὐρανός; Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. 265; Jhrb. f. prot. Theol. 1876, p. 166, etc.; Schürer, HJP, Eng. tr. div. II. vol. ii. p. 171). The instances of this use furnished by the Bible are at the best very scanty, and even the most probable cases are negatived by many. There seems, however, to be at least one sufficiently clear instance in the OT (Dn 4^{26}), and another, though more disputable, in the NT (Lk 15^{18}), where, however, it may be (as it is taken, e.g., by Meyer and others) a personification of the heavenly world 'as injured and offended.'

Another question is whether the conception of a series of heavens is found in the Scriptures. This has been answered in the negative, and the terms which seem to imply the influence of such a conception have been taken for plurals of majesty, or large, rhetorical expressions of the idea of infinity. But the evidence is all in favour of the affirmative answer. The plural form of the Hebrew word points in that direction. Much more decidedly is this the case with such forms as 'the heaven of heavens' (Dt 10^{14}, 1 K 8^{27}, Ps 148^{4}), 'all the heavens' (Eph 4^{10} RV), 'the third heaven' (2 Co 12^{2}). The same may be said of the peculiar phrase 'in the heavenly places,' or 'in the heavenlies' (ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις), which occurs five times in the Ep. to the Eph. ($1^{3.\ 20}$ 2^{6} 3^{10} 6^{12}), and has in each a local sense. To which must be added the idea of Christ as the great High Priest who has 'passed through the heavens' (He 4^{14}), and is 'made higher than the heavens' (He 7^{26}). The affirmative reply is also in harmony with the fact that the idea of a plurality of heavens prevailed among other ancient peoples, and in particular among those that were in contact with the Jewish nation at different periods of its history, such as the Babylonians and the Persians. This conclusion is further confirmed by the large place which is given to this idea in the Rabbinical literature, and in the apocalyptic and other pseudepigraphic books, both Jewish and Christian,—especially the Slavonic Enoch, the apocalyptic parts of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, 4 Ezra, the Ascension of Isaiah, the Apocalypses of Moses, Ezra, John, Isaac, Jacob.

With this is connected the further question whether the plurality that is recognized is one of three heavens or of seven. It has been thought by some that only the idea of a series of three heavens is found in Scripture. It has been pronounced by some (Estius, Le Clerc, Bengel) to be the doctrine of the Bible that there are only three heavens. Origen (Con. Cels. vi. p. 289) denied that St. Paul had the idea of seven heavens, and the idea of a threefold heaven obtained a considerable place in the Church (Suicer, Thes. ii. p. 520, etc.). But the evidence which bears out the existence of the idea of a plurality of heavens also favours the idea of a sevenfold series of heavens. Among the Babylonians a sevenfold division of heavens seems to have prevailed. They had the conception of seven world-zones; they surrounded their cities, Erech and Ecbatana, with seven walls; they thought of hell as divided into seven parts by seven walls. And though no explicit reference to it appears to have been discovered as yet among the inscriptions, it is reasonable to suppose that their heaven was also divided into seven sections (Jensen, Kosm. der Babyl. pp. 232–252; Sayce, Hib. Lect. pp. 221–227). In the Zoroastrian books, but not in the earliest, we find the idea of a succession of seven heavens, which were traversed by Sosioch in seven days, Zarathrustra himself occupying a golden throne in the seventh. The Jews were familiar, too, with the planets, of which four are mentioned by name in the OT (2 K 17^{30}, Am 5^{26}, Is 14^{12} 46^{1} 65^{11}). The same conception of seven heavens appears to have been almost universal among the Rabbis, only R. Juda being mentioned as diverging from the general doctrine, and teaching the existence of but two heavens. The pseudepigraphic writings, and very definitely the Slavonic Enoch and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, give the same enumeration of the heavens, and describe them at length. It is hazardous to infer, as Meyer does, from the notice of Paradise in 2 Co 12^{4} that St. Paul thought of it as higher than the third heaven and belonging to a fourth heaven; for in the pseudepigraphic literature Paradise is repeatedly represented as being in the third heaven. But, in view of the evidence, the most reasonable conclusion is that the conception of the heavens which pervades the OT and the NT (not excepting the Pauline writings, though St. Paul mentions only the third heaven and Paradise) is that of a series of seven heavens.

This idea of a plurality of heavens as it appears in the Biblical writings, however, is free from the extravagances and puerilities which we find associated with it in the extra-canonical literature. In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, e.g., curious details are given of each of the several heavens. The first is full of darkness and gloom; the second, of fire, ice, and snow. The third contains the hosts that are to execute judgment on the spirits of deceit and of Beliar. In the fourth are thrones and authorities; in the fifth and the sixth are angels with different offices. In the seventh dwells the Great Glory. In the Slavonic Enoch there is a still more elaborate description. In the first heaven, it is there said, are 'a very great sea,' and 'the elders and the rulers of the stars,' and treasuries of snow, ice, clouds, and dew. In the second are the prisoners reserved for eternal judgment. In the third are found the Garden of Eden, and the tree of life and an olive tree ever distilling oil. In the fourth are seen the course of the sun and moon, the angels, and the phœnixes and the chalkidri that wait upon the sun. In the fifth are the watchers, troubled and silent, on account of their fallen brethren. In the sixth are seven bands of angels, very bright and glorious, students of the courses of sun, moon, and stars, also the angels over the souls of men, with seven phœnixes, seven cherubim, and seven six-winged creatures. In the seventh are the heavenly hosts, the ten great orders of angels, and the Lord Himself on His lofty throne. In the Rabbinical books we find similar trivialities. In the Beresh. rabba, c. 6, the Bammidbar rabba, c. 17, and the Chagiga, xii. 6, e.g., the differences between the several heavens are given in extreme and fanciful detail. The first or lowest heaven is called Vilon (וִילוֹן, Lat. velum), and is empty. The second is called Rakia, and contains the sun, moon, and stars. The third is called Shechakim, and contains the mills that grind the manna for the righteous. The fourth is called Zebul, and in it are the heavenly Jerusalem, the temple, the altar, and Michael. The fifth is named Maon, in which are the 'hosts of angels, praising God by night, but keeping silent by day that God may hear the praises of Israel.' The sixth is named Machon, and it holds the treasuries of the snow, hail, rain, and dew. The seventh is known as Aravoth, the seat of judgment and righteousness, with the treasuries of life, peace, and blessing. In it, too, are the souls of the righteous dead, the spirits and souls of men yet to be born, and the dew with which the dead shall be awaked. And in it are the Seraphim, Ophannim, Chayyoth, and other orders of angels (cf. Dante, Par. c. 27), and God Himself on His eternal throne. The Ascension of Isaiah gives another incongruous description of the series of heavens.

Similar speculations, and, if possible, even more tasteless and absurd, appear to have been indulged in by certain heretical leaders and their sects. Irenæus (Cont. Hær. bk. i. c. v. 2) and Tertullian (Adv. Valent. 20) speak of the fancies of the Valentinians on the subject. From Irenæus (Adv. Hær. bk. i. c. xxx. 4, 5), Origen (Con. Cels. vi. 31), and Epiph. (Hær. xxvi. 10), we learn also that the Ophites held the doctrine of a Hebdomad of heavens ruled by seven potentates. Others, e.g. the Gnostic Marcus (Iren. Adv. Hær. bk. i. c. xvii. 1), reckoned eight heavens, and Basilides (August. De Hær. i. 4) held there were 365. Nor are the Christian apocalypses, such as the Apoc. Mosis, the Apoc. Esdræ, the Apoc. Johannis, less given to such speculations. The belief in a series of seven heavens, with some of the curious theories which prevailed so extensively on the subject, penetrated indeed into the Christian Church, and was more or less favoured by some of the leading Fathers. Clement of Alexandria, e.g., mentions it in terms which suggest that he did not question its validity (Strom. iv. 25). Origen refers to it in much the same way, explaining, however, that there was no authoritative doctrine on the subject (De princ. ii. 11). Augustine has an uncertain theory of his own, implying three heavens (De Gen. ad lit. xii. 5, 27). Even near the end of the 4th cent. these notions held such a place in Christian thought, that Philastrius pronounced it a heresy to deny the plurality of the heavens, though the question of the particular number, whether two, three, or seven, was left open (De Hær. bk. 94). At last, however, the reaction came, and Chrysostom declared the whole conception of a series of heavens to be a human fancy, and contrary to Scripture. Repudiated by the Church, it was adopted by Mohammedanism. It is affirmed in the Koran (e.g. c. 22, 41), and in later Mohammedan writings it appears in the crudest possible forms.

The ideas of 'heaven' and the 'heavens' which are expressed in Scripture are of a different order. Neither in the OT nor in the NT have we anything like those far-fetched ineptitudes. It is the more remarkable that it should be so, in view of the fact that these things prevailed so long and so widely, and had so great a hold, not only of ethnic faith, but also of Jewish and Christian thought. Later Christian theology has relapsed from time to time into such theorizings, distinguishing between the heaven of clouds, the heaven of stars, and the empyrean; between the visible heaven or firmament, the spiritual heaven, the abode of saints and angels, and the intellectual heaven, which is the scene of the immediate vision of God (Elucidar. c. 3); between the cœlum sidereum, the cœlum crystallinum, and the cœlum empyreum (John of Dam., Thomas Aquin., etc.); or between the regio nubifera, the regio astrifera, and the regio angelifera (Grotius). But such strained refinements have no place in the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. In all their statements the Biblical books have the notes of simplicity and restraint. In many things they practise a reverent reserve.

There is at the same time a progress in the ideas of heaven which appear in them. These become more definite, more spiritual, and more sharply contrasted both in purity and in elevation with the conceptions found elsewhere. It was not alien to the common Jewish understanding, as it is seen in the curious literature of Judaism, to associate the presence of evil and trouble with one or other of the divisions of heaven. In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs the second heaven is the habitation of the spirits of the lawless who are in confinement and punishment. In the Slavonic Enoch the second heaven contains the apostate angels who had transgressed with their prince, and were in reserve there against the judgment. In the third heaven, according to the same book, Enoch saw not only the Garden of Eden, but in its northern region a place of punishment, which had 'fire on all sides and on all cold and ice,' prepared for those who dishonoured God on earth and committed deeds of evil. And in the fifth heaven he saw the many hosts of the Watchers (ἐγρήγοροι), with their countenances withered and melancholy and their lips always silent, by reason of their sadness for their brethren, who rebelled in lust of empire and were imprisoned in the darkness of the second heaven. Such ideas were not altogether strange to the dramatic imagination of the OT, as is seen in the representation of the lying spirit that stood before the Lord (1 K 22^{21}), and in the appearance of Satan along with the angels in the presence of God (Job $1^{6.7}$ $2^{1.2.7}$). In the NT the nearest approach to such conceptions is the Pauline designation of the 'heavenly places,' the superterrestrial regions, as the sphere in which 'the spiritual hosts of wickedness' dwell and work (Eph 6^{12}). But in all its positive elements the Bible view of heaven is far removed from these things; and the vision which the NT Apocalypse gives of war in heaven between Michael with his angels and the dragon with his, ends in the overthrow of the latter, and the casting of the conquered ones 'out into the earth.'

Moreover, the ideas of heaven as the dwelling-place of God and the final abode and recompense of the righteous, move on in the course of the revelation of truth which is made in the Scriptures to larger and loftier things. In the OT heaven as the dwelling-place of God is presented chiefly in relation to the divine majesty and remoteness. In the NT it appears in the new and higher aspect of the Father's house, the place that has received the risen Christ, the scene of the activity of the great High Priest and the Advocate with the Father (He 4^{14}, 1 Jn 2^{1}). In the OT it is scarcely known as the future inheritance of the righteous. The eye of the OT looked mainly on the present, and the consummation which it expected was one that was to take place on earth. It had glimpses of things beyond, and at last rose to a clearer and more definite vision of an after life. But the completion of life which it looked to was something to be realized in this world, and the heaven which made its hope was a heaven to be found mainly in the joy of a near fellowship with God here and now. In the NT the heaven which is to be our final home and the goal of our hope is a heaven that is above this world and beyond time, not only superterrestrial, but supramundane, the transcendent heaven which is brought to light in the gospel.

The nature of this heaven, its conditions, and the things in which its blessedness consists, are nowhere given in definite or dogmatic statement. They are presented to faith and to the spiritual imagination by many suggestive expressions and by a great variety of figurative phrases. Heaven itself is described as a kingdom, one 'prepared from the foundation of the world,' the 'Father's kingdom,' the 'kingdom of God,' an 'eternal' or 'everlasting kingdom' (Mt 25^{34} 26^{29}, Lk 22^{16}, 2 P 1^{11}, Jude ^{21}); an inheritance, one of which we have the 'earnest' here, the 'inheritance of the saints in light,' an 'eternal inheritance,' an 'inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away' (Eph 1^{14}, Col 1^{12}, He 9^{15}, 1 P 1^{4}); a 'house of many mansions' (Jn 14^{1}); a place prepared by Christ (Jn $14^{2.3}$); a 'better country,' a 'city prepared' (He 11^{16}). Once at least it is described as Paradise (Lk 23^{43})—a term probably of Median origin, selected by the LXX as the rendering for the Garden of Eden, and used in Jewish literature to express the idea of a home of innocence and peace, with reference sometimes to the Eden of the past, sometimes to an Eden of the future, sometimes to an earthly Eden, sometimes to a heavenly (see article on PARADISE). Its life is set forth as an existence like that of the angels (Mk 12^{25}, Lk 20^{35}), an 'eternal life' (Jude ^{21}), a 'life that is life indeed' (1 Ti 6^{19}), a 'rest' (He 4^{1} etc., Rev 14^{13}), a life of worship, praise, service (Rev 5^{9} etc., 22^{4}). Its happiness is expressed by a rich and varied imagery, as reward, a 'great reward,' a 'full reward,' royalty, an everlasting reign, an everlasting existence, a partaking of the tree of life and the hidden manna, a new name, the dignity of a pillar in the temple of God, a place on the throne, praise, honour, glory, that which is within the veil, the presence of God's glory, a prize, a crown, the 'crown of life,' a 'crown of righteousness,' the promise, a manifestation, a salvation from wrath, the adoption, the vision of God, the being like Christ, the seeing of Him as He is, joy, 'exceeding joy,' 'the joy of the Lord' (Mt 5^{12}, 1 Co $3^{8.14}$, Col 3^{24}, 2 Jn ^{8}, Rev 22^{12}, 2 Ti 2^{12}, Rev 22^{5}, He 10^{34}, Rev $2^{7.17}$ $3^{12.21}$, 1 P 1^{7}, He 6^{19}, Jude ^{24}, Ph 3^{14}, 2 Ti 4^{7}, 1 Co 9^{25}, 2 Ti 4^{18}, Ja 1^{12}, 1 P 5^{4}, Rev 2^{10}, He 9^{15}, Ro 8^{19} 5^{9}, 2 Ti 2^{10}, Ro 8^{23}, Rev 22^{4}, 1 Jn 3^{2}, Jude ^{24}, Mt 25^{21}).

Theology has sought to answer many questions relating to heaven which Scripture suggests, but which it does not itself follow to their conclusions. It has occupied itself with the question as to how the spirituality and omnipresence of the Divine Being can be reconciled with the predication of heaven as His peculiar dwelling-place. It has also discussed the question whether heaven is to be regarded as a place or only as a condition. These are questions which are beyond the range of our present faculties and experience. Scripture freely speaks, on the one hand, of God as everywhere present and as manifesting Himself in different ways in all parts of His creation, and, on the other hand, as specially present in heaven and manifesting His glory in a peculiar sense there. And we can only say that it is with Him, though in a higher sense, as it is with the sun 'which shines everywhere, yet especially displays its full splendour in the firmament' (Oosterzee, Chr. Dog. p. 258). Neither can we disconnect the idea of locality absolutely from our conception of heaven. It belongs to the condition of our present mental life and experience to think of heaven more or less in terms of locality, even when we think of God who is spirit, much more when we think of the future home of beings like ourselves.

Theology also has engaged itself greatly (in some eras, however, much more than in others) with the question of the nature of the existence in heaven, the heavenly activities, the felicities of heaven. Sometimes it has committed itself to rude, material, sensuous conceptions; sometimes it has defined heaven as essentially a condition of passivity, contemplation, or quiescence. But for the most part, and in the case of its greatest names, it has avoided these extremes. Even Justin Martyr (Adv. Hær. 57), Irenæus (Apol. i. 8), and the Fathers who accepted the millenarian doctrine, thought of the immediate communion with God as the essence of the blessedness of heaven. Origen affirmed the progress of life in heaven, and dwelt largely on the intellectual conditions of heaven, regarding its chief joy as found in the satisfaction of the desire of knowledge (De prin. II. xi. 2). Greg. Naz. (Orat. xvi. 9), Greg. Nyss. (Orat. Cat. c. 40) and others, placed its felicity chiefly in the increase of knowledge and in intercourse with all the saints. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xxi. 29, 30), agreeing with all others that the enjoyment of God is the substance of the bliss of heaven, added specially to that the recovery of man's true liberty. While the mystics of all ages have inclined to reduce the various Scriptural representations of heaven to metaphors of subjective states, the schoolmen generally construed them as implying locality, and speculated on the region, its divisions, and its employments. Extreme realistic views of heaven have been advocated by theosophic theologians in all times. And in the system of Emmanuel Swedenborg, with its principle of correspondence, in virtue of which the spiritual world is the outbirth of the invisible mental world and the natural world that of the spiritual world, we have a curious doctrine of the constitution of heaven as the subject of a revelation, and find the existence of three distinct heavens, consisting of three orders of angels, affirmed.

The Scriptures themselves are silent on many things on which theology has dilated. They give us a large, general view of heaven as the final home of God's servants; of its rewards as having degrees corresponding to the character and the service; of its blessedness as found in freedom from all sin, pain, sorrow, in the manifestation of the eternal love and glory, in the realization of hope, the possession of all good, the presence of Christ, the immediate vision and fellowship of God. It leaves much to the sanctified imagination, and makes its final teaching this—'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him' (1 Co 2^9).

HEAVE-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE.

HEAVINESS.—Besides the literal sense of ponderous, heavy is used in two fig. meanings: 1. Burdensome, as Nu 11^{14} 'I am not able to bear all this people alone, because it is too heavy for me'; 1 Es 5^{72} 'But the heathen of the land lying heavy upon the inhabitants of Judea, . . . hindered their building' (ἐπικοιμώμενα [Fritzsche conjec. ἐπικείμενα] τοῖς ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ); Wis 17^{21} 'Over them only was spread an heavy night' (βαρεῖα); 2 Mac 5^{23} 'Menelaus, who worse than all the rest bare an heavy hand over the citizens' (ὑπερήρετο τοῖς πολίταις, RV 'exalted himself against his fellow-citizens'). Cf. T. Lever, Sermons (Arber, p. 64), 'And their landlords which shuld defend them, be most heavye maisters unto them.' 2. Sorrowful, as 1 K 20^{43} 'And the king of Israel went to his house heavy and displeased' (סַר); 1 Es 8^{71} 'And as soon as I had heard these things, I rent my clothes, and the holy garment, and pulled off the hair from off my head and beard, and sat me down sad and very heavy' (σύννους καὶ περίλυπος, RV 'sad and full of heaviness'); 2 Es 12^{43} 'Be of good comfort, O Israel; and be not heavy, thou house of Jacob' (noli tristari; RV 'be not sorrowful'); Mk 14^{33} 'And he taketh with him Peter and James and John, and began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy' (ἀδημονεῖν, RV 'sore troubled'). So Lk 18^{23} Tind. 'When he heard that, he was hevy; for he was very ryche'; Is 1^5 Cov. 'The whole heade is sick, and the herte is very hevy'; Hall, Works, ii. 144 (on 'Jairus and his daughter'), 'What a confusion there is in worldly sorrow? The mother shreekes, the servants cry out; the people make lamentation, the minstrelles howle, and strike dolefully; so as the eare might question whether the ditty or the instrument were more heavie'; Erasmus, The Commune Crede, Eng. tr., fol. 73*b*, 'And that Christ suffered in soule also, even his owne selfe doth witnesse, sayenge, My soule is hevy even unto the deathe.'

The adv. heavily means 'with difficulty' in Ex 14^{25} 'And took off their chariot wheels that they drave them heavily' (בְּכֹבֶד, lit. 'with heaviness,' the only example of the Heb. word). The meaning is rare in Eng.; cf. Mt 13^{15} Rhem. 'For the hart of this people is waxed grosse, and with their eares they have heavily heard, and their eies they have shut.' Heavily occurs also once in the sense of grievously, oppressively, Is 47^6 'upon the ancient hast thou very heavily laid thy yoke'; and once as sorrowfully, Ps 35^{14} 'I bowed down heavily, as one that mourneth for his mother' (RV 'I bowed down mourning'; see Abbott, Original Texts, 1891, p. 214).

Heaviness occurs often, but always with the meaning of grief. Thus Pr 10^1 'A wise son maketh a glad father: but a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother'; 12^{25} 'Heaviness in the heart of man maketh it stoop: but a good word maketh it glad'; Is 61^3 'To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness'; 1 Es 8^{71} 'I sat still full of heaviness until the evening sacrifice' (περίλυπος); 2 Es 10^8 'And now, seeing we all mourn and are sad, for we are all in heaviness, art thou grieved for one son?' ('quoniam omnes contristati sumus,' RV 'seeing we are all in sorrow'); Sir 22^{21} 'She that liveth dishonestly is her father's heaviness' (εἰς λύπην γεννήσαντος, RV 'the grief of him that begat her'); 38^{18} 'of heaviness cometh death, and the heaviness of the heart breaketh strength' (both λύπη, RV both 'sorrow'); Ro 9^2 and 2 Co 2^1 (both λύπη, RV both 'sorrow'); 1 P 1^6 'Ye are in heaviness' (λυπηθέντες, RV 'Ye have been put to grief'); Ph 2^{26} 'For he longed after you all, and was full of heaviness' (ἀδημονῶν, RV 'was sore troubled'). In their Preface the AV translators say of the Scriptures, 'If we be ignorant, they will instruct us; if out of the way, they will bring us home; if out of order, they will reforme us; if in heaviness, comfort us; if dull, quicken us; if colde, inflame us.' The older versions have the word very often, as Jn 16^6 Wyc. 'sorwe, or heuynesse, hath fulfillid youre herte'; Ps 30^5 Cov. 'hevynesse maye well endure for a night, but joye commeth in the mornynge' (Cran. 'hevynesse maye endure for a night,' and so Pr. Bk.). Cf. Erasmus, The Commune Crede, fol. 31*b*, 'Agayn of the defaulte and wante of fayth springeth superstition, sorcerie, idolatry, and covetousness cosen to it, ambition, blasphemy, hevynes, desperation, pride, fear of death, desyre of vengeaunce, fynally what so ever vices or synnes do raygne in the whole worlde.'

J. HASTINGS.

HEBER (חֶבֶר 'association' or 'spell,' from חבר to 'unite,' especially by spells: possibly connected with Habiri, Journal of Bibl. Lit. xi. 118, xii. 61).—1. A man of Asher and son of Beriah (Gn 46^{17}, Nu 26^{45}, 1 Ch $7^{31.\ 32}$). He founded what appears from the last passage to have been the principal clan in his tribe. The gentilic name Heberites occurs in Nu 26^{45}. 2. The Kenite, according to Jg 4^{17} 5^{24}, husband of Jael. He separated himself (Jg 4^{11}) from his Bedâwin caste of Kenites or nomad smiths, whose wanderings were confined chiefly to the south of Judah, and settled for a time near Kedesh, on the plain to the west of the Sea of Galilee (Conder, Tent-Work, ii. 132; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. 369, note 1). According to the narrative of Jg, Sisera in his flight after defeat by Barak was invited by Jael to take refuge in her husband's encampment, and was there killed by her in his sleep. But Jg 5^{24b} is shown by the metre to be probably a gloss from 4^{17}, which again appears to relate to a different locality from that of 4^{11}. On the whole it is not unlikely that two traditions are blended, and that in the original stories the unnamed wife of Heber dealt with Jabin in a similar way to that of Jael with Sisera. 3. A man of Judah, son (1 Ch 4^{18}) of Mered by his Jewish, as distinguished from his Egyp., wife. Beyond his genealogy, nothing is recorded of him except that he was the 'father' or founder of Soco. 4. A Benjamite and member of the family of Elpaal (1 Ch 8^{17}), which appears to have been of pure Heb. blood on both sides, as contrasted with its kindred of partially Moabite descent (1 Ch $8^{8.\ 11}$).

HEBREW, 'ibri (עִבְרִי, עִבְרִים), —Ebrew (Shaks. 1 Hen. IV. II. iv. 198; AV 1611 Dt 15 heading): Ebreus (Wycl. 2 Co 11^{22}): through Norm. Hebreu, Hebræus, Ἑβραῖος, Aram. 'ibrai, det. forms, 'ibrā'ah, 'ibrāyah (עִבְרָי, עִבְרָיָה, עִבְרָאָה, Dalm. Jüd.-Pal. Aram. Gramm. p. 155). The Greeks were thus evidently first acquainted with the word through Aramaic-speaking peoples. If, as may be presumed, this was by way of N. Syria and Asia Minor, it throws no light on the date at which they came personally in touch with the Hebrews. As, however, Ἑβραῖος occurs only in later Greek (LXX, Pausanias; v. infra), it is possible that it was formed at a time when Aramaic was becoming the prevailing language of the Hebrews themselves, i.e. c. 300 B.C.

I. USAGE OF THE WORD.—(A) Old Test.—Not in P nor, save in Jer $34^{9.\ 14}$ (quot. from Dt 15^{12}), in documents certainly later than 7th cent. B.C., presumably because it has no theological or theocratic connotation but is purely secular, and 'Jew' (wh. see) took its place from the 7th cent. onwards. It is apparently the oldest designation of the chosen people (whether in its primitive use confined to them or not, see II. ii.) in contrast to those of another race. We thus find it used: i. by others—Gn $39^{14.\ 17}$ [J^2] 41^{12} [E], Ex 2^6 [E], Egyptians; 1 S $4^{6.\ 9}$ [E^1] 13^{19} [J^2] 14^{11} [J^1] * 29^3 [J^1], Philistines. ii. By Jews in addressing others—Gn 40^{15} [E], Egyptians; Ex 3^{18} 7^{16} 9^1 [all J], words that Moses was commanded by God to use to Pharaoh; 5^3 [J], words so used by him; Jon 1^9, by Jonah to the sailors who were presumably Phœnicians. iii. With a contrast to others expressed or clearly implied—Gn 14^{13} ['Exilic Midrash'??], Canaanites and Chedorlaomer's army; 43^{32} [J^2], Ex $1^{15.\ 16.\ 19}$ [E] $2^{7.\ 11.\ 13}$ [E], Egyptians; 1 S $13^{3.\ 7}$ * [J^1], Philistines; 14^{21} [J^1], Philistines and, apparently, the bulk of Israel that were already with Saul; Ex 21^2 ['Bk. of the Covenant'], Dt 15^{12}, Jer $34^{9.\ 14}$ 'a Hebrew slave' is contrasted with one of any other nationality.

(B) Apocrypha.—The word does not occur often, but the usage is similar, as far as it goes. i. Used by others, Jth 12^{11} (Holofernes, an 'Assyrian'), 14^{18} (Bagoas, an 'Assyrian').† ii. By Jews in addressing others, Jth 10^{12} ('Assyrians'), 2 Mac 7^{31} (Syrians). iii. With a contrast to others expressed or clearly implied, 2 Mac 11^{13} (Syrians) ‡ 15^{37} (Syrians). iv. The Prologue of Sir is slightly different, for it is there used distinctly of the Hebrew language in contrast to Greek, the discovery of the original of Sir showing that Hebrew, not Aramaic, was intended.

(C) New Testament.—The phenomena here are more difficult. 'Hebrews' are contrasted with 'Hellenists' (Ac 6^1),§ i.e. those Jews who favoured Hellenism and practised Greek customs, and therefore, either by preference or by residence abroad, usually spoke the Greek language. Hebrews would therefore be those who more truly answered to the old idea of the people, the more conservative members who prided themselves on maintaining the old customs, and rejected as far as possible the insidious influence of Hellenism (2 Co 11^{22}, Ph 3^5, though St. Paul was a Jew of the Dispersion). In this way it is intelligible how 'Hebrew,' when used of language, may mean either Aramaic (Jn 5^2 $19^{13.\ 17.\ 20}$ 20^{16} Ἑβραϊστί, and probably Ac 21^{40} 22^2 26^{14} τῇ Ἑβραΐδι διαλέκτῳ) or Hebrew proper (Rev 9^{11} 16^{16} Ἑβραϊστί).‖ In other words, the evidence now available tends to show that the use of 'Hebrew' does not refer fundamentally to the language,¶ but rather to the historic position and worth of the nation. It is not a linguistic but a national word. Hence Josephus can remark that the Heb. say for 'red' ἄδωμα (Ant. II. i. 1) and for Pentecost ἀσαρθά (Ant. III. x. 6), i.e. pure Aram. (עֲצַרְתָּא, אֲדוֹמָא).††

II. ORIGINAL MEANING OF THE WORD.—Quot homines tot sententiæ, for a word that goes back to such primitive times readily lends itself to guesses on the part of those unacquainted with Hebrew, or acquainted with it only in its biblical form.

i. The derivation from Abram (אַבְרָם) ‡‡ is of course impossible, for א and ע do not readily interchange,§§ and the loss of the final ם would be inexplicable. At most, the similarity of sound between the

* Klostermann and Budde read 'a great multitude' (עַם רַב).

† Contrast the use of 'Israel' in Jth, when God's mercies are spoken of, or when there is no thought of members of another nation, e.g. $15^{8ff.}$. 'Jews' is apparently not found in Jth.

‡ Notice the allusion to victories of the Hebrews of old.

†† In the time of Eusebius, when the distinction between 'Hebrew' and 'Hellenist' was hardly regarded by a Gentile Christian, even Philo can be called a Hebrew by birth (τὸ γένος ἀνέκαθεν Ἑβραῖος ὤν, HE II. iv. 3). For other examples of Ἑβραῖος, Hebræus, being used in the widest national sense, see Plut. Sympos. iv. qu. 6. 1; Pausanias, i. 5, § 5, v. 5, § 2, and 7, § 4, vi. 24, § 8, x. 12, § 9; Appian, civ. 2. 71; Porphyry, *vit. §§ עבר is represented by אבר in recent Assyrian lexicons, but this is because there is no differential sign for either ע ס א at the beginning of a syllable.

'Hebrews' and their most famous ancestor may have assisted in limiting the term to them.

ii. Eber (עֵבֶר Gn $10^{21.\ 24.\ 25}$ 11^{14-17}, 1 Ch $1^{18.\ 19.\ 25}$) * is a much more plausible explanation. Assuming him to be a real person, it would be a patronymic, used in two forms, (a) Hebrew (עֶבְרִי), (b) bĕnē 'Eber (Gn 10^{21}) ;† cf. bĕnē Lot (Ps 83^{9}), and bĕnē Israel.‡

iii. From עבר as verb or preposition, designating the Hebrews as those who have come across, or who belong properly to the land across, some well-known boundary. Euseb. (Præp. Evang. vii. 8, xi. 6) prefers to any other a spiritual interpretation, that the Hebrews were those who had passed over from the worship of false gods and the pleasures of the flesh to the service of the God of all and the life of true wisdom and piety. But this is homiletical, not scientific. Three natural boundaries have been suggested.

(a) The Red Sea. 'Why was Moses to say to Pharaoh, The LORD God of the Hebrews hath met with us? Because they had crossed over the Red Sea' (Exod. R. § 3 middle, by a Rabbin. conceit).

(b) The Jordan. So Wellhausen (Isr. u. Jüd. Gesch. p. 7, 1894), who thinks it was given to them by their neighbours in Western Palestine after they had crossed over. He thinks, however, that in old usage the term was so extended as to include the Edomites, with whom the Hebrews were originally united. Thus 'Hebrews' would mean those who dwelt עֵבֶר הַיַּרְדֵּן, cf. Gn 50^{10} and often (so Stade, Lehrb. § 1*b*; Kautzsch [doubtfully], Heb. Gram. § 2*b*).

(c) Euphrates. (1) In the sense that the Hebrews came from the east of Euphrates to the west, i.e. when Abraham crossed it from Haran on the way to Canaan. So Origen (in Field's Hex. on Gn. xiv. 13) περάτης (LXX) καλεῖται ὁ Ἀβραὰμ, ἐπειδὴ ἀπὸ τῆς Χαλδαίων χώρας διαπεράσας τὴν Μεσοποταμίαν, ἦλθεν εἰς τὰ μέρη τῶν Χαναναίων. This was also the reference of Augustine's word, transfluvialis (Quæst. Gen. § 29), and presumably of Aquila's περαίτης, which Field thinks was formed by him from πέραν rather than περάω (περάτης) [to definitely correspond to the Hebrew (הָעִבְרִי not עִבְרִי)].§ 'Hebrew' will thus, according to this derivation, be from עֵבֶר in the same meaning that it has in mē'ēber lannāhār (1 K 14^{15}), and perhaps in the phrase 'ebrē nāhār (Is 7^{20})‖ (so Dillm. on Gn 11^{12}).

(2) In the sense that the Hebrews went from west to east, the standpoint of the speaker being, that is to say, east of Euphrates. So Hommel in the Appendix to his Ancient Hebrew Tradition: illustrated by the Monuments, 1897 (contrast his earlier opinion, p. 258), after comparing Glaser's investigations of Minæan inscriptions with cuneiform documents. He supposes that Ebir nâri (=Eber hannā-hār of the Bible, 'Ibr naharân Minæan) was originally the region between Borsippa and Ur, i.e. on the west of the lower Euphrates, including the adjoining Country of the Sea to the southward. This is the region, therefore, indicated in Jos 24^{2} as the home of Abraham and the Western Semitic tribes who trace their origin to him. It was 'across the River' to the Babylonians among whom Abraham or his forefathers came, and he was called 'Ibri, as belonging to that land 'Eber, the term travelling with him and his descendants. In this way we can understand that (a) Ebîr nâri is used of the country west of Euphrates (and even of Palestine in an inscription of c. 1100 B.C.); (β) the biblical Eber han-nāhār in, perhaps, all other places than 1 K 14^{15} means the same: (γ) 'Ebər-in Nu 24^{24} need not mean either the Hebrews (so most commentators) or those non-Assyrian peoples who lived east of Euphrates (Dillm.), but a district in the north-west of Arabia.*

Upon the evidence before us this explanation appears to some the most satisfactory.† [See, however, Margoliouth's criticism of Hommel in Expos. Times, Aug. 1897, p. 500*b*. Even Sayce (EHH p. 8), after mentioning Hommel's theory, says, 'The origin and first use of the name (Hebrew) are still a matter of doubt']. But we should like further evidence of the use of such a word as 'Ibri in the inscriptions. Have we this?

III. EVIDENCE OF THE MONUMENTS AND INSCRIPTIONS.—Have we any mention in these of the Hebrews by name? Two identifications have been proposed.

i. 'Apri or 'Epri of the Egyptian monuments has been said to be merely an Egyptian transliteration of 'Ibri. This identification has been almost given up, but Hommel (loc. cit. p. 259) is disposed to regard it not unfavourably, comparing for the change of labial the Egyptian hurp taken from the Canaanite hereb, 'sword,' and pointing out that, although 800 'Epriu (Egypt. plur. of 'Epri) drawn from the foreign residents of 'An in the east of Goshen were employed under Ramses IV. long after the Exodus, yet it is possible that some of the Israelites remained behind and mingled with other foreigners. But the identification is, to say the least, very precarious.

ii. The Khabiri, or Abiri (for Assyriologists transliterate the word in both ways) of the Tel el-Amarna tablets. They are described in the letters of the king of Jerusalem to his suzerain, the Pharaoh, c. 1400 B.C. (Hommel), as attacking districts and towns in what we now know as the Negeb, the Maritime Plain, and Judah, and, perhaps, as even laying siege to Jerusalem itself. The king urgently applies for reinforcements, saying, 'If troops can be sent before the end of the year, then the territory of my lord the king may yet be retained; but if no troops arrive it will assuredly be lost.' The difference in the form of the word (Khabiri or Abiri and 'Ibri) matters little, for 'the

* Augustine (see note ‡‡ p. 325) prefers it in Retract. ii. § 16, De Civ. xvi. § 3; cf. Euseb. Præp. Evang. vii. 6.

† Shem is here called אֲבִי כָּל־בְּנֵי עֵבֶר J², unless with Ball (Haupt's OT) כָּל־בְּנֵי is to be considered as an interpolation by P.

‡ Sayce (Expos. Times, Mar. 1897, p. 258) suggests that 'Eber= Bab. Ebar, 'a priest.' If so, and if 'Hebrews' be derived from it, the paronomasia in 1 S 137 (common text) is due to a faulty philology.

§ Fürst (Lex. s.v. עִבְרִי) thinks that 'Hebrew' was limited to the Israelites by 'ēber hannāhār gradually changing into 'ēber hayyardēn (Jordan). So to Jews ἡ περαία was naturally Eastern Palestine (Jos. often, e.g. Ant. XIII. ii. 3, cf. πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, Mk 10^{1}) and περαίτης an inhabitant of that province (Jos. BJ II. xx. 4).

‖ Nisibis in Mesopotamia is described as being ἐν τῇ περαίᾳ τῇ πρὸς τῷ Τίγρητι ποταμῷ (Steph. Byz. s.v. Νίσιβις).

* So also the Asshur of this verse may represent the Minæan A'shûr, which seems to be a district to the S.E. of Gaza. It would then appear to be an earlier form of Shur (Gn 20^{1}). It should also be noticed that this wide use of 'Eber explains how among the bĕnē 'Eber are found both a western branch in S. Arabia of Joktan and other tribes (Gn 10^{25-30}) (J), as well as an eastern branch round the lower Euphrates in Peleg, the direct ancestor of Nahor and Abraham, with subdivisions arising in Isaac and Ishmael. 'Hebrews' is not, apparently, so used. We may suppose that, even if present in the original documents, the Hebrew editors and copyists preferred some less ambiguous term.

† Akin to this explanation is that which derives 'Hebrews' from the Arabic 'eber in the sense of a 'tract along the banks of a river (as the place for passing over), and κατ' ἐξοχήν, that of the Euphrates, the whole tract of land stretching from the east bank of the Euphrates to the Tigris, and from the west bank to the Arabian Desert (berrîjet el-'arab), from which, according to the Turkish Kâmûs and Lex. Geographicum, ii. 232, 233, is derived 'Ibri or 'Ibrâni, the name of the Jewish people, as having come from the land stretching from the bank of the Euphrates to the Tigris' (Delitzsch on Is 7^{20}). W. R. Smith (Enc. Brit.^{9} s.v. 'Hebrews') mentions this conjecture, which makes Hebrews to be 'dwellers in a land of rivers,' adding, 'this goes well with Peleg (watercourse), as in Arabia we have the district Falag, so named because it is furrowed by waters' (Sprenger, Geogr. Arab. p. 234). In Doughty (Arabia Deserta, ii. 38) Fálaj is rendered 'the splitting of the mountain'; but the two derivations are not contradictory if, as it seems, Fálaj is a mountainous district with many torrents.

Canaanite 'Ayin, with which guttural the word 'Ibri commences, is elsewhere in the texts represented by the cuneiform Kh, and there are analogous instances of the abbreviation of an earlier form like 'Abiri into a later form such as 'Ibri.'* But the identification is at present quite uncertain: (a) the king appears to be describing an attack from the west side of Jordan, whereas the Hebrews came from the east side; (b) the names of persons do not agree with those mentioned in Joshua; (c) the date is much earlier than that which is now usually given to the Exodus, 1322 (Lepsius), or even 1200 (Petrie). But (a) the first difficulty may be fairly met by saying that the letters do not necessitate an attack from the west only, that the OT account is very brief, the conquest of even southern Palestine possibly extending over many years, and that much of the south-west country may have been taken before the king of Jerusalem felt in much danger.† (b) The second difficulty is not conclusive, as persons appear to have been known under different names. (c) The third depends wholly on the accuracy of the date given to the Exodus. If this is accepted, the Khabiri can be identical with the Hebrews only by some of the Hebrews having returned to Palestine before the Exodus; but though this may be consistent with raids having been made, or small detachments having separated themselves, the letters imply the approach of a large body. Hence, either Khabiri has a purely accidental resemblance to 'Ibri,‡ or the date of the Exodus must be placed much earlier.§ We cannot as yet say which is right.

i. AIM AND CENTRAL IDEA.—This Epistle is one of the most important writings in the NT. It contains a distinct type of Christian thought, and in that respect may be classed with the Synoptic Gospels, the Pauline Epistles, and the Gospel of John, which also contain, each, a distinctive conception of the good that came to the world through Jesus Christ. It is in aim and method an apologetic writing, intended to help certain Christians, who had no true insight into the nature and worth of the Christian religion, to reach a better understanding of its excellence, and so to fortify them against temptations to apostasy. But the apologetic argument rests on a very definite theological position. The author has a very clear idea of the nature, and a very high estimate of the value, of Christianity. He attaches to it the value of the perfect and therefore the final religion, and he assigns to it this value because he regards it as the religion of free, unrestricted access to God. This is the central dogmatic thought of the Epistle, as indicated in 7^{19}, where Christianity is by implication set forth as the religion of the better hope through which we draw nigh unto God. No religion, in the writer's judgment, can be satisfactory which does not establish intimate relations between God and man. Herein, for him, lies the great inferiority of Leviticalism in comparison with Christianity. He conceives of Leviticalism as a religion which kept men at an awful distance, and the veil between the holy and the most holy place is in his view the symbol of that radical defect. It is self-evident to him that a religious system which shuts God up in a dark inaccessible shrine cannot be the perfect form of religion. It must eventually give way to a better. Christianity is that better religion. It knows of no veil, and no inaccessible holy place. Christ is not only a High Priest, but a forerunner, πρόδρομος: where He goes, though it be into the very presence of God, all believers in Him may follow.

ii. METHOD.—This is the radical contrast between Christianity and Leviticalism. This central contrast, however, is suggestive of many others, and the method adopted by the writer in the prosecution of his apologetic aim is to exhibit in detail the points in which the religion of the NT is superior to that described in the books of Moses. His idea of Christianity is that it is the best possible religion; but what he sets himself to prove is that it is better than the Levitical religion. It is not difficult, however, to read between the lines, and to see behind the apologetic better the dogmatic best.

The comparison of the two religions runs through the whole theoretic part of the Epistle from 1^{1} to 10^{18}. It begins at the circumference and ends at the centre. The central truth is the priestly performance of Christ by which we are brought into filial relations with God. But the comparison begins with the agents of revelation, and proceeds from that starting-point to compare the agents of redemption. Under each of these two categories two sets of agents are ascribed to the old religion: prophets and angels under the head of revelation, and Moses and Aaron under the head of redemption. Thus there are four separate comparisons to be made—(1) between Christ and prophets, (2) between Christ and angels, (3) between Christ and Moses, (4) between Christ and Aaron. The first is made in 1^{1-3}, the second in 1^{4-14}, the third in 3^{1-6}, and the fourth in 8^{1}–9^{28}.

(1) Christ and Prophets.—The contrast is least emphatic in reference to the prophets, as they might be looked on as belonging in spirit to the new dispensation rather than to the old Levitical one. But there is a latent antithesis here also, traceable in the words carefully selected to describe prophetic revelation,—πολυμερῶς, πολυτρόπως. These adverbs convey the idea that the ancient revelation was fragmentary (in many parts) and tropical (in many modes); and it is implied, though not expressly stated, that the revelation made by Christ was free from both defects—complete and real, and therefore final. All this is in effect said by

* Hommel, loc. cit. pp. 156, 231.

† Or may there have been a temporary and partial attack from the south early in the wanderings, such as Nu 21^{1-3} perhaps indicates? Jg 1^{16-21} may possibly refer to the same time.

‡ So Hommel, who identifies the Khabiri with those after whom Hebron was called (Jg 1^{10}). He thinks it is properly identical with Kheber in Gn 46^{17}, and represents part of the tribe of Asher who came into Palestine before the other Hebrews (loc. cit. p. 236).

§ Professor Orr (Expositor, March 1897) argues strenuously for the first years of Amenhotep II., B.C. 1449–1423.

 Copyright, 1899, by Charles Scribner's Sons

the phrase ἐν υἱῷ, used to describe the agent of the Christian revelation. In the end of the days God spake to men by one having the standing of a son. A son knows all that is in a Father's mind; when He has spoken there is nothing more to be said.

(2) Christ and Angels.—We are apt to think that the second comparison, that between Christ and angels, might have been dispensed with. But the author was writing for the benefit of Jews (this, in the meantime, may be assumed; it is the impression one naturally first takes from the book), and angels held a prominent place in contemporary Jewish religious thought. To them was assigned the function of executors of God's will in the natural world, and also that of intermediaries between J″ and Israel in the lawgiving. The law was a word spoken by angels (2^2, cf. Ac 7^{53}, Gal 3^{19}). Therefore, whatever the writer's own thoughts might be as to the position of angels in the universe and in the history of revelation, he was under the necessity of deferring to current opinion and speaking of them as rivals to Christ. Therefore his second thesis is: Christ better than angels, his proof consisting of a mosaic of OT texts which bring out a threefold contrast: Christ to angels as son to servants, as king to subjects, as creator to creatures. The conclusion is that the essential function of angels is to serve. They are ministering spirits—all of them, even the highest archangel—to God, to Christ, even to Christians—'sent forth for service to those who are about to inherit salvation' (1^{14}).

(3) Christ and Moses.—For Moses the writer had a much deeper respect than for angels, whose rôle he probably conceived to be greatly inflated in Jewish theology. Moses was a great historic reality, whose functions in behalf of Israel at the creative epoch of her history he was not tempted to disparage. But even Moses occupied a place of subordination compared to Jesus, and he does not hesitate to point the fact out, contriving, however, to do so in a manner that could not wound Jewish susceptibilities. He knows how to praise Moses while yet giving him the second place. Faithful in all God's house, on God's own testimony, yet faithful only as a servant. But Christ was faithful as a son.

(4) Christ and Aaron.—While the comparison between Christ and Moses is despatched in a few sentences, that between Christ and Aaron runs through two chapters. This is not due to the writer having a higher esteem for Aaron than for Moses. The reverse was the fact. While for his mind Moses was probably one of the world's greatest men, and the Exodus one of the great heroic achievements of human history, the character and functions of the first high priest of Israel seem to have inspired him with only moderate respect. All that elaborate ritual on the great Day of Atonement, in which the high priest played the principal part, seemed to him much ado about nothing. For the blood of bulls and of goats could not take away sin. How poor that Levitical sacrificial system compared with the one sacrifice of Christ, who by an eternal spirit offered Himself to God! But why, then, make the comparison, and at such length? Because he is writing for people who think Aaron a very august figure, and his sacerdotal service one of very great importance; and because his apologetic method requires him to use Aaron as a type whereby to convey to ill-instructed Hebrew Christians some rudimentary ideas as to the nature of Christ's sacerdotal functions.

(5) Christ and Melchizedek.—One other OT personage is brought upon the stage in the course of the argument—Melchizedek. He is introduced, however, not for the purpose of contrast, but to aid in the embodiment of the writer's lofty conception of Christ's priestly function. His thesis here is not, Christ greater than Melchizedek, but, Christ like Melchizedek. His use of this historic figure also serves an apologetic purpose, but in a different way. He had a difficulty to meet in connexion with the doctrine that Christ was a priest. Jesus did not belong to the tribe of Levi. That was an insurmountable obstacle to the recognition of Him as a priest for law-ridden minds. How, then, does the writer deal with it? In effect thus: 'I know quite well that Jesus could not be a priest on earth, i.e. one of the only class of priests you Jews are acquainted with, because He did not belong to the tribe whence the priests are taken. But the Heb. oracles know of another priesthood besides the Levitical, whereof they make honourable mention—that of Melchizedek, priest of the Most High God. It was a more ancient priesthood than that of Aaron. Do you reply: yes, ancient enough, but rude, suitable only for primitive times, and, of course, superseded by a regularly established sacerdotal class, like that of Aaron and his family? I say, not so, for in a psalm later than the institution of the Levitical priesthood, and recognized by you all as Messianic, the Melchizedek priesthood is referred to as if it were the ideally perfect type. "A priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek." The Christ is to be a priest after this ideal type. And He is appointed by an oath of God which implies that it is an appointment of unique importance. And God declares that He will not repent of the appointment, which teaches by implication that God has repented of another kind of priesthood, and that it will pass away, and that the new priesthood will be of such excellence that it will never need to pass away.' We have here an apologetic use of the ancient priesthood of the king of Salem, analogous to that made by the Apostle Paul of the promise given to Abraham long before the era of the lawgiving.

iii. THEOLOGICAL IMPORT.—This rapid sketch may suffice to give some idea of the drift of this Epistle on its apologetic side. But our main concern is with its positive theological significance, to which we now turn.

It is important for a true appreciation of the theological ideas of the Epistle to keep steadily before us its central conception of Christianity as the perfect and final religion, both perfect and final because it brings men really nigh to God. All religions aim at this, Leviticalism included. Nevertheless, it had a veil dividing the tabernacle into two compartments, and a most holy place into which no man might go save the high priest, and he only once a year, and then only with due precautions. Christianity is the one religion that has really solved the problem. In the language of the Epistle it perfects the worshipper as pertaining to the conscience (9^9), or purges his conscience from dead works to serve the living God. It really takes away sin (10^1), so that believers in Jesus can draw near with true heart and full assurance of faith to the very presence of God (10^{22}). There can never be any reason for superseding such a religion. Therefore Christianity is eternal. The epithet 'eternal' is applied many times to the Christian religion and all that belongs to it. We read of an 'eternal salvation' (5^9), an 'eternal redemption' (9^{12}), an 'eternal spirit' (9^{14}), an 'eternal inheritance' (9^{15}), and an 'eternal covenant' (13^{20}). It is clear from such iteration that the thought of the perennial, because perfect, absolute character of Christianity is not incidental and subordinate, but fundamental in the author's system. It dominates his mind and affects his manner of viewing everything belonging to the Christian faith. As it is absolute, perfect, the ideal realized, so are all the personalities and functions connected with it. The Christian revelation is the ideal realized in that department. It is God's final, because full complete word to men, to which nothing needs to be added. The Person by whom God spoke that last word is perfect in Himself, and in His functions as Revealer and Redeemer. His sacrifice is perfect, and possesses eternal validity and value.

(1) Christology.—This general statement prepares us to find in the Epistle a very exalted conception of Christ. The first thought about Him to which we are introduced, in the very first sentence, is that He stands to God in the relation of Son (ἐν υἱῷ). It is observable that, in all the four comparisons already referred to, the superiority of Jesus Christ is made to rest on the foundation of His Sonship. That is why He is greater than the prophets as the agent of revelation. The Sonship of itself guarantees a perfect, therefore final, revelation. The reason is that Sonship involves likeness and intimacy. To know the Son is to know the Father, and the Son knows all that is in the Father's mind. In like manner the superiority of Christ to angels is made to rest on His Sonship. The Son is begotten; angels, with all other creatures, are made; the Son as the heir of His Father is destined to sit on a throne and be an object of homage to the universe, angels not excepted. Therefore His word, as the Revealer, claims more attention than that spoken by angels, with whatever solemn accompaniments, on Sinai. So also Sonship raises Christ above Moses, however great his character, and however epoch-making his function as the Leader of the Exodus and the organizer of a horde of slaves into a nation. Moses was the greatest in God's house, yet only greatest among servants; Christ is not only greater, but belongs to another category, that of Son. Finally, Sonship is the ground of Christ's incomparable superiority to Aaron. Aaron, though an important personage within the Levitical system, was after all but a sacerdotal drudge, ever performing ceremonies which had no real value: 'daily ministering and offering oftentime the same sacrifices which can never take away sin' (10[11]). But our great High Priest is Jesus the Son of God (4[14]), who, as a Son, learned obedience through suffering (5[8]), and who after His Passion, voluntarily endured, was, as the Son, 'consecrated for evermore' (7[28]).

These contrasts compel a lofty conception of Christ's Person as the Son of God. Sonship taken in a diluted sense will not bear the argumentative stress laid on it. Sonship must be taken in a unique sense, not in a sense common to Christ with men and angels, or even in a sense applicable only to the great epoch-making characters of history, the heroes of the human race. Why should Sonship make Christ greater than the prophets as agents of revelation, unless it be of such a character as to involve absolute likeness of nature and perfectly intimate fellowship? We know what the author of the Fourth Gospel means when he says, 'No man hath seen God at any time: the only-begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him.' The author of our Epistle must mean something similar when he makes Sonship the ground of Christ's ability to speak the final satisfying word of God to men. And he shows that he does, and that he desires his readers to put the greatest fulness of meaning into the expression ἐν υἱῷ by the comment he immediately goes on to make, wherein he gives, at the outset, a statement of his Christological position. In this statement he represents the Son as made by God the heir of all things, an attribute arising naturally out of the relation of Sonship, especially as the Son is the first-begotten (πρωτότοκος, 1[6]). Further, the Heir of all is represented as the Maker of all—by Him God made the ages (τοὺς αἰῶνας) or worlds. This implies pre-existence, or rather, seeing no reference has yet been made to an earthly state, ancient existence. It takes us back to the 'beginning' spoken of in Gn 1[1] and in Jn 1[1], to the primitive era of world-making. It gives to the Son the position assigned to the Logos in the system of Philo, that of God's agent in the universe, the statement being supplemented and completed by the added clause in 1[3]: 'bearing all things by the word of his power.' The Son thus appears acting for God in the creation and preservation of the world. To all intents and purposes this means that the Son is a Divine Being, the active Deity of the universe. The presumption is that He is an Eternal Being, a parte ante as He is a parte post, a Son from eternity as well as for evermore (7[28]), though the function of world-making implies strictly only antecedence to the things made.*

The eternal being of the Son is more clearly implied in the phrase following, wherein the Son is called the radiance of the glory and the exact image of the essence of God (ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ). There might be a time when God was without a world, but there never was a time when God was without glory. It is the nature of that glory to manifest itself; like the sun it must shine, and the shining is eternal as the glory. The Son of God is the shining of His glory, and therefore eternal as the glory. Probably, however, the aim of the writer in using these remarkable expressions is not so much to declare the eternal being of the Son, as to indicate His supreme qualification for the function of fully revealing God. Who so fit to make God known as one who is related to Him as the sun's rays to the sun, and who resembles Him as the image impressed on wax resembles the seal? His word will be as the bright light of day, than which nothing can be brighter, and he may say of Himself, 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father.' The precise theological significance of these phrases cannot easily be determined; or rather, one should say, it is doubtful if they possess any such significance. They do not absolutely exclude Sabellianism or Arianism. The Sabellians laid stress on the term ἀπαύγασμα, as suggesting the idea of a model manifestation rather than of a distinct personality. The Arians, on the other hand, emphasized the term χαρακτήρ, as implying a position of subordination and dependence for the Son in relation to the Father. The orthodox, on their side, maintained that, by the combination of the two, both errors were excluded—the former phrase implying identity of nature, so excluding Arianism; the latter implying independent personality, so excluding Sabellianism.

The final clause of the Christological statement represents the Son as taking His seat 'on the right hand of the Majesty on high.' It is the place which befits one whose position and functions in the universe are such as previously described. The dignity answers to His nature as the Son, and to His vocation as the maker and sustainer of worlds. The language is grand and solemn, and is intended to convey the impression that the Son's place is the highest possible beside that of God. It may indeed be said that to place the Son beside God is not to make Him God.† Formally the distinction may be valid, but it cannot prevent the inference to Deity being drawn. He who sitteth at the right hand of God is God for all who believe in His exaltation. This exaltation, though only what corresponds to the nature of the exalted One, is a new event in His history. It takes place after He has performed a signal service for men, referred to in the words 'when he had purged our sins.' It is from this phrase only, so far as the person is concerned, that we learn that the 'Son' ever had a place in the history of this earth. He might have done all that is ascribed to Him, even spoken the final word of God, without being man. His word, like the law, might be that of an angel, spoken from heaven. But purging sin is a sacerdotal act, a function nowhere ascribed to angels, but only to men. That the purification was performed by one in the likeness of men would be very evident if the words 'by himself' (δι' ἑαυτοῦ) were part of the text. But that great thought, unfamiliar to the first readers though commonplace to us, would not be introduced by so skilful a writer till it had been carefully prepared for. The 'Son,' then, was man when He performed for us men a priest's part, how, remains to be seen, and it was after He had done this that He took His place at the right hand of Divine Majesty.

(a) Incarnation.—The 'Son' became man. This momentous event is alluded to in various places and in diverse forms of language; now in terms borrowed from the Psalter as being made a little lower than the angels (2^9), now as becoming partaker of blood and flesh (2^{14}), and at another time by the very general expression 'in the days of his flesh' (5^7). Under what precise conditions the Son entered humanity, whether, e.g., by ordinary generation or otherwise, is nowhere indicated. The term 'children' applied to men in 2^{14}, and the expression 'likewise' (παραπλησίως) applied to the Son's becoming a participant in human nature, may justify the inference that the author conceives of Him as being born, and passing from childhood to manhood. This would scarcely be worth remarking, were it not that in the prologue of the Fourth Gospel these details are left doubtful. There the Logos simply becomes flesh, and dwells for a season among men.

(b) Earthly Life of Jesus.—What knowledge our author had of the earthly history of the Son, whether, e.g., he was acquainted with the evangelic tradition as embodied, say, in the Gospel of St. Mark, does not clearly appear. He certainly knew more than, after a cursory perusal of the Epistle, we might think. He knew of the temptations of Jesus (2^{18} 4^{15}), of the scope that His earthly experience afforded for the exercise of faith (12^2), of His agony in the garden (5^7), of the opposition He endured at the hands of the evil, or ignorant, prejudiced men (12^3), of His gentle bearing towards the erring (5^2), of His work as a preacher of the good tidings (2^3), of His being surrounded by a band of companions who afterwards became a source of valuable and trustworthy information concerning the words of the Master (2^3). Of course, one who knew so much had the means of knowing more. In his description of the agony he seems to indicate knowledge of particulars not reported in the Gospels, when he represents Jesus as offering up prayers 'with strong crying and tears,' though it has been suggested that he borrowed this part of the picture from Ps $22^{14.\,24}$.*

(c) The State of Humiliation.—Be this as it may, one thing is certain, the writer has a magnificent conception of the moral significance of the earthly life of the Son as a whole; of the historic career of Him whose human name 'Jesus' he for the first time introduces in 2^9. He perceives clearly the pathos of that life, the humiliation and the glory in the humiliation. It may be, as has been said, that it is the exalted Jesus he has constantly in his eye, but he never forgets that the exalted One passed heroically through a severe curriculum of temptation and suffering, which awakens in his mind, as he contemplates it, admiration and love. There is no trace in his pages of the tendency, very perceptible in the Gospel of St. Luke, to tone down those elements in Christ's experience which might be thought out of keeping with the image of the exalted Lord as it presented itself to the eye of faith. [Compare St. Luke's report of the agony in the garden (leaving out the unauthentic verses, $22^{43.\,44}$) with the brief but strong statement on the same subject in this Epistle]. He was not without temptation to follow this policy, arising out of the state of feeling prevailing in the community of believers for whose benefit he wrote. Their conceptions of the Christian religion seem to have been crude, ignorant, and superficial all along the line. They did not yet understand even the first principles of Christian belief (5^{12}). The best clue to the nature of their deficiencies in Christian knowledge is to note the things emphasized and reiterated by their instructor. One of these things is the humiliation of Christ. That, therefore, was one of their stumbling-blocks. If the Son was so great as you say, how could He be tempted, and suffer death, and death in such an ignominious form? Such was one of their perplexities. One writing to a community in this state of mind was tempted to throw a veil over the indignities of the Saviour's life; to pass over in silence this, to understate that. But there is neither silence nor understatement. 'In all points tempted like as we are' (4^{15}); 'prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears' (5^7); 'though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered' (5^8); 'endured the cross, despising the shame' (12^2); 'endured such contradiction of sinners against himself' (12^3). This depicting in dark colours of the tragic humiliating side of Christ's earthly experience means much. It means, for one thing, that the writer sees in that aspect nothing to hide or be ashamed of; rather something to rejoice in and to be thankful for. He beholds glory in the humiliation, honour in the shame, contemporary honour, not merely honour following and compensating, in a state of exaltation. It means, further, that he does not despair of getting his readers to see this also. At least he is determined to try, because he knows that, until they see it, their faith is unintelligent, and their Christian standing very insecure.

Its Rationale.—The main contribution towards this object is to be found in ch. 2^{5-18}. The leading purpose of this very important section, crammed full with deep weighty thoughts, is to set forth the rationale of the earthly humiliation of Christ. And the drift of it is: a glory in the humiliation. On this theme three possible positions may be taken up—(1) the glory of the Son and the humiliation of Jesus incompatible, the position of unbelief; (2) the humiliation a temporary veiling of the glory compensated for by subsequent resumption of glory, the common position of average Christian belief; (3) the humiliation itself glorious when seen in the light of its aim and result, the position of enlightened faith. The writer of our Epistle occupies this highest position, his readers not being far from the lowest. He holds the humiliation itself to be glorious, and worthy of God the first cause and last end of all, profitable to Christ Himself, and full of benefit to us. It became God, he teaches, to subject His Son Jesus to suffering (2^{10}). It profited Jesus by perfecting Him for His office as Captain of Salvation, developing in His character the virtues of patience and sympathy, which are necessary to efficient captaincy ($2^{10.\ 17.\ 18}$). It is beneficial to us, for we have in Jesus one of whose interest we can be assured, and to whom we can always come with confidence that He will grant us seasonable succour (4^{16}). Such, in brief, is our author's splendid theodicy, his demonstration of the moral fitness of Christ's tragic experience. In the light of it we can have no doubt as to what he means when in ch. 2^{9} he speaks of Jesus as 'crowned with glory and honour, that he, by the grace of God, should taste death for every man.' He means just what he plainly says, that God showed His favour to His Son in appointing Him to an office in connexion with which He should have to taste death for men, and that, in the very act of tasting death as Captain of Salvation, the Son was crowned with glory and honour. These things are true; they are also relevant to the situation. No one has really mastered the problem presented in the antinomy between glory and humiliation till he has got insight into their truth, and thorough mastery was what the writer possessed and aimed at for his readers. There is no difficulty in understanding his words. The difficulty felt by most interpreters arises from their unwillingness to credit him with clear insight into the moral order of the world. Such insight they appear to think beyond the reach of any writer in the first Christian century, even though inspired.

(d) Christ's Priesthood.—Passing from the subject of Christ's person to His priestly function, the subject may be introduced with the remark that the writer takes advantage of any means that offers itself of making intelligible to his readers the suffering experience of Christ. He is glad to be able to show them from any point of view that it behoved Jesus to die. Sometimes his lines of thought are remote enough from any recognized theories of atonement, as when he bases the thesis that Jesus had to die once only on the analogy of general human experience ($9^{27.\ 28}$). The reason which he assigns in the same context for Christ's dying once, viz. that a testator must die before his will can come into effect, is also peculiar, inasmuch, as it is enough that a testator die anyhow, it is nowise necessary that his death should be of a sacrificial character. One wonders at the introduction of so elementary and inferior a view close upon the grand conception contained in 9^{14}; and all the more when it is observed that in order to get a chance of introducing it he has to take advantage of the double meaning of διαθήκη, as signifying at once an alliance or covenant and a testament. In the case of a covenant there is no necessity for the death of either party, therefore after the word has been used in the sense of a covenant in 9^{15} it is employed in the other sense without any apology. The reason for this must be found in the ignorance of the first readers. They had, it must be supposed, no understanding of the rationale of Christ's death from any point of view, and therefore their instructor felt that it was a point gained if he could assign any reason for that death level to their understanding. It is essential to our understanding of the Epistle that this state of ignorance in the first readers be constantly borne in mind. If we come to it, as some interpreters do, with the assumption that the whole doctrine of the atonement was familiar to the persons addressed, and that in all that the writer says on the subject of Christ's priestly work he is simply repeating commonplaces, we incapacitate ourselves for attaining any true insight into its meaning. The truth is, he is writing to persons who do not know the alphabet of the subject, and the problem for him is to get into their dull minds by any means the idea: Jesus, though the Christ, the Son of God, must die. For this purpose several lines of thought are pressed into the service: Jesus must die, as all men die, once; He must die, as a testator dies before his heirs enter into possession of his inheritance; He must die for His own advantage as the Captain of Salvation, because He could not be a good fit captain unless He were perfected by suffering; He must die as a priest, not indeed as a priest after the type of Aaron, who offered animals as sacrificial victims, but as a priest of a higher order, that of Melchizedek.

(a) The Melchizedek Type.—The excursus about Melchizedek in ch. 7 is of essential importance to the author's doctrine of Christ's priesthood. It were an entire mistake to regard it as a discussion on a curious topic in theology on which the writer happened to have some pet ideas. In that case the complaint he makes of the dulness of those to whom he writes is altogether unjustifiable. A man may be a good Christian, and yet remain ignorant, or even incapable of understanding an abstruse theologoumenon on the Melchizedek priesthood. The question at issue is really the fundamental one: was Christ in any sense a priest? The writer's conviction is that the priesthood of Christ is not understood in its reality and worth, unless it be seen to be of the Melchizedek type.

In ch. 5^{10} the author indicates the programme of his discussion on the priesthood of Christ in these words: an High Priest, after the order of Melchizedek. His plan is to employ two types of priesthood to indicate its nature—the order of Aaron, and the order of Melchizedek. His purpose is not, as some have imagined, to teach that Christ occupied in succession two priestly offices, one like that of Aaron, another like that of Melchizedek, the former on earth, the latter in heaven. His intention is rather to utilize the Aaronic priesthood to set forth the nature of Christ's priestly functions, and the Melchizedek priesthood to set forth their ideal worth and eternal validity. The two aspects are taken up in the inverse order to that in which they are named in the programme: first, a priest after the order of Melchizedek (ch. 7); second, a high priest after the order of Aaron (chs. 8. 9).

Every order or species has its characteristic notes or marks; therefore the first thing to be done is to determine the marks of the Melchizedek 'order.' To this task the writer addresses himself in ch. 7^{1-3}, which contains a summary of the facts about Melchizedek as stated in Gn 14^{18-20}, with a commentary pointing out their religious significance, and extracting from the facts the desired marks of the type. To make the facts serve his purpose the writer finds it necessary to attach importance, not merely to what is said of Melchizedek, but to what is not said,—to the silences as well as to the utterances of history; also to give ideal meaning to the names occurring in the story. This method of interpretation may seem vicious. We may call it allegorical, or allege that it is borrowed from Philo; the important thing to note is that it is his method. By this way he reaches what he is in quest of—the notes of the type. These are, in all, five. Taking them in the order in which they are referred to in the commentary, they are these: the Melchizedek type of priesthood is, first, a royal priesthood (king of righteousness); second, a righteous priesthood (king of righteousness); third, a priesthood promotive of peace, or exercised in the country of peace (king of Salem=king of peace); fourth, a personal, not an inherited dignity (without father, without mother, i.e. so far as the record is concerned); fifth, it is an eternal priesthood (without beginning of days or end of life—so far as the record is concerned). The first four may be conceived as standing to the fifth in the relation of cause to effect. Because the priesthood in question possesses these characteristics, it is eternal.

Observe, now, what the writer is really doing in making this ingenious commentary on the brief narrative in Genesis. He is trying to fix the characters of an ideal priesthood. He is solving the problem, What is the highest conceivable type or kind of priesthood? He might have adopted the method of philosophic speculation for the purpose, instead of the method of interpreting an OT text. The question may be asked, Does the latter method fully serve the purpose—give us all the essential features of the ideal? To answer it, one must have in one's mind a conception of the ideal. Now, without hesitation one would say that these things at least must enter into the idea of a priesthood of the highest order. The priest must be really, not ritually, holy; he must not be a mere sacerdotal drudge, but one whose priestly ministry is a course of gracious condescension—a royal priest; he must be one who, by his personal worth and official acts, can establish a reign of righteousness, peace, and perfect fellowship between man and God; finally, he must be one who ever liveth, whose priesthood does not pass from him to another, as a guarantee for the maintenance of peace.

But what about sacrifice, the most essential feature, one would say, in the vocation of a priest? We observe that in the close of the Melchizedek excursus, in a description of the ideal priest, which seems intended to supplement and complete the definition of the Melchizedek type, it is said that the ideal priest does not need to repeat sacrifice (7^{27}). But there is a previous question: does he offer sacrifice at all, and what is his sacrifice? By the method of laying stress on the silences, one would say that in the Melchizedek type there is no sacrifice at all, no mention being made of such in the history. If this were so, then it would seem to follow that precisely the most vital feature in the priestly office of Christ—the sacrificial offering of Himself—lay outside the type, as something sui generis, having nothing analogous to it either in the priesthood of Melchizedek or in that of Aaron. That would be a serious flaw in the writer's apologetic argument, too serious for him to have overlooked it. We must look more closely to see whether self-sacrifice be not immanent in the other characteristics of the ideal priest. We start from the statement that the ideal priest needs not to repeat sacrifice, like the high priests of Israel (7^{27}). Why so? Because of the other characteristics, especially that pointed at by the epithets holy, harmless, undefiled, which unfold the contents of the idea of righteousness. Because the ideal priest is holy (ὅσιος) in relation to God, benevolent (ἄκακος) towards men, and free from any fault that might disqualify for priestly functions (ἀμίαντος), therefore he needs not to repeat sacrifice. But for the same reason he must offer one sacrifice, himself. One who answers to the description king of righteousness, one who realizes in his character the ethical ideal, cannot escape the sacrifice of himself in this world. That is not said, but surely it must have been in the writer's mind. It was self-evident to him that one who had all the other characteristics of the Melchizedek type must have this one also, that he was ready to lay down his life for righteousness, equally so that he would be called on to do this, living as a holy one in an unholy world.

The self-sacrifice of the ideal priest, the priest after the Melchizedek type, can be reached by another line of deduction, viz. from the royal character of the type. The ideal priest is not a legal drudge, but a king who graciously condescends. Carry out the idea of condescension to its utmost limit and it will yield the result of a life laid down for others: this is the ne plus ultra of condescension and voluntary sacerdotal service, and the requirements of the ideal cannot be satisfied with anything short of it. 'The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for the many.' 'Who loved me, and gave himself for me.'

It is obvious that in these thoughts we pass out of the region of the ritual into the ethical, and are dealing with a kind of sacrifice of entirely different character and of incomparably greater value than those pertaining to sacrifices of Levitical victims. But to this there will be occasion to refer at a later stage. Meantime it remains to indicate the use made of the Aaronic priesthood in the exposition of the priestly office of Christ.

(β) The Aaronic Type.—The chief use is that of a foil. The burden of the section, chs. 8^{1}–9^{28}, is: the priestly ministry of Christ immeasurably superior to that of Aaron. The rubic of the whole passage is: the more excellent ministry. But as comparison can be made only between things having a certain resemblance, eulogy runs along the line of parallelism. Superiority is established on a basis of similitude. The points of resemblance are very general. Common to both is sacrifice, a sanctuary where sacrifice is offered, and a grand representative ceremonial in which the two systems culminate. The first point is briefly noticed in 8^{3}. Every high priest is appointed to offer sacrifice, therefore this man (Jesus) must also have something to offer. The vague statement is meant to provoke thought in dull Heb. readers. 'This man, if He be a priest, must have something to offer. What can it be? He has indicated what it is already—HIMSELF' (7^{27}), but he knows they have not grasped it, and he provokes them to reflection: 'What can it be? Not bulls and goats, of course; what then?' The second topic, the two sanctuaries, is handled at greater length ($9^{1\text{-}5.\ 11}$). The construction and furniture of the Levitical tabernacle are minutely described, not, however, in an antiquarian spirit, but with a definite apologetic aim. The salient points in the description are the division of the sanctuary into two compartments separated by a veil, and the peculiar manner in which the location of the altar of incense (θυμιατήριον) is indicated. Of course it is the altar of incense that is meant; there should never have been any doubt about that. And it is represented as belonging to (not physically within) the Holy of Holies. The phrase is: the Holy of Holies having the golden altar of incense. The meaning is: that altar, though standing without the veil, being required for daily service, belonged of right, in spirit and function, to the inner shrine. And this antinomy—without in fact, within by right—is meant to startle into thought the sluggish minds of Hebrew Christians. 'Whence this puzzle as to the whereabouts and relations of the altar of incense? See ye not, it is all due to the existence of that veil, the emblem of a rude, imperfect, transient religion?' In comparison with the earthly tabernacle, the one in which Christ officiates is described as 'the greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands' (9^{11}), and not belonging to the visible creation, not constructed out of material things, like the precious cloths, woods, and metals of the old tabernacle, which, however precious, were, like all material things, destined to wax old and vanish away.

The ceremonial selected for comparison is that of the great Day of Atonement. In that stately ceremonial the Levitical ritual culminated and was seen at its best. In it also, and in it alone, the Holy of Holies came into use. It was the one service in the year in which Israel's representative man came into the immediate presence of God. It also lent itself to comparison at this vital point, the high priest's entrance into the inner shrine being comparable to the entrance of Jesus into heaven. The latter event is therefore naturally expressed in terms of the former, giving rise at points in the description to obscurities, such as the representation of Christ entering through His own blood into the holy place (9^{12}).

All through, the unexpressed refrain 'more excellent' is audible, but it arrests the ear specially in connexion with the closing comparison between the effects of the two priestly functions—that of Aaron on the great Day of Atonement, and that of Christ when after His death on the Cross He entered into heaven. The effect of the one was to cancel the errors, or ignorances (ἀγνοημάτων, 9^{7}), of the people throughout the bygone year, to wipe out all the offences against Levitical law committed in a twelvemonth, so that they might make a fresh start. The effect of the other was to obtain an 'eternal redemption' (αἰωνίαν λύτρωσιν). Comparison here becomes futile: it is a comparison of the finite to the infinite.

(e) Theory of Redemption.—For modern readers the great thoughts of the Epistle to the Hebrews are obscured by being expressed so largely in terms of Levitical ritual. The apologetic, which was meant to elucidate, now serves to some extent as a veil to hide the true meaning. It is therefore desirable to make the most of those passages in which the writer, so to speak, shakes himself clear of his apologetic trammels, and expresses his ideas in terms of universal validity. There are two sentences in which he does this in reference to the significance of Christ's death. These are 2^{11} 9^{14}, the former containing the great axiom: the sanctifier and the sanctified are all of one; the latter, the sublime thesis that Jesus offered Himself a sacrifice through an eternal spirit. The earlier text enunciates the principle of redemption, the later explains the infinite efficacy of redemption achieved. The principle is: solidarity between sanctifier and sanctified; the two one in all possible respects, the more respects the better, the one radical difference of holy and unholy always excepted; the more points of contact the greater the sanctifying power. The rationale of infinite value is 'through an eternal spirit.' In the interpretation of this profoundly suggestive expression, theologians are unhappily not at one. To the present writer it has ever been associated with certain broad thoughts that help him to understand the value of Christ's self-offering as compared with Levitical victims. In the first place it suggests that Christ's offering was an affair of spirit, not merely of blood-shedding. It expressed a mind on the part of the victim. Of course that mind had certain ethical characteristics. Jesus offered Himself. So the mind embodied in His sacrifice was free, loving, holy; a mind of supreme moral value in the sight both of God and of enlightened men. None of these epithets, however, is used to qualify the spirit in which Jesus offered Himself to God. The epithet chosen is 'eternal.' It is selected because it serves to raise the sacrifice of Christ above the limits of time. Spirit is in its nature eternal, and the sacrifice of Christ as a spiritual transaction has an efficacy and value for all time, for the time that went before the Christian era, as well as for the time coming after. It is not a mere historical event which had no influence before it took place, and whose influence, after it happened, was destined to wane with the lapse of ages. It is an eternal fact having absolute value with God from everlasting to everlasting. But the ethical and the eternal aspects go together, the one conditioning the other. It is because the spirit in which Christ offered Himself was ethically perfect—free, loving, holy—that it has eternal value. In this remarkable phrase, combining these two aspects, the spiritual insight of the writer reaches its highest water-mark. Nothing better, more penetrating, more felicitous, on the subject of our Lord's death and its significance is to be found in Scripture.

(f) Christ's Priesthood in Heaven.—Before leaving the theme of the priesthood, we may notice briefly a question that has troubled interpreters. The priestly ministry of Christ is located in heaven, yet the sacrifice the Priest presents there appears to be none other than that offering of Himself which He made once for all; an event, so far at least as the initial stage of it, the blood-shedding, is concerned, happening on earth and within this visible world. The key to the solution lies in this, that for the writer heaven is the locus of realities, while earth is the locus of shadows. In heaven is the true tabernacle, the tabernacle which realizes the ideal of a sanctuary (8^{2} τῆς σκηνῆς τῆς ἀληθινῆς); there are the 'patterns' or types of which the vulgar realities of earth are but imperfect copies. For our author the 'true' and the 'heavenly' are synonyms. Whatever is true is heavenly, belongs to the upper world of realities, and whatever belongs to this upper world is true and real. If, therefore, Christ's self-sacrifice be a true sacrifice, it belongs to the heavenly world, no matter where or when it takes place. And Christ's sacrifice is, for the author, a true sacrifice, because it is an affair of spirit. Flesh and blood, whether of man or beast, are of the earth earthy, and belong to the realm of shadows. Even the blood of Christ viewed materially can find no place in heaven. Hence it is vain to attempt solving the above-stated problem by distinguishing between the first stage of the sacrifice —the death, or blood-shedding—and the second, the sprinkling of the shed blood on the mercy-seat within the sanctuary, relegating the former to earth as something lying outside the sphere of Christ's proper priestly activity, and to locate the latter in heaven as the point at which the priestly ministry begins. Christ's sacrifice finds entrance into heaven when blood is transmuted into spirit. In other words, the shedding of Christ's blood is a true sacrifice, as distinct from the shedding of the blood of bulls and goats, which was only a shadow of sacrifice, because it is the manifestation of a mind or spirit. And because it is that it belongs to heaven, though it takes place on earth. The magic phrase 'through an eternal spirit' lifts us above distinctions of time and place, and makes it possible for us to regard Christ's offering of Himself, in all its stages, as a transaction within the celestial sanctuary.

This conception of heaven as the place of realities, as distinct from earth as the place of shadows, is the philosophic presupposition of the system of positive Christian thought contained in our Epistle. It reminds us of Plato and of Philo. Whether our author was acquainted with the writings of either the Gentile or the Jewish philosopher is a question on which opinion differs, and on which a few remarks will be offered at a later stage. The important matter is, not to ascertain where he got this speculative conception, but to note carefully the fact that it was in his mind, and to keep it before our own minds in interpreting his words. At no point in the Epistle is it more necessary to do so than at that remarkable sentence in which the writer expresses his final deepest thought concerning the nature and worth of Christ's sacrifice.

(g) Salvation.—From the doctrine of Christ's priestly office to the conception of salvation contained in our Epistle, the transition is easy. The author describes the 'great salvation' variously, but always in terms suggested by the primitive history of man as contained in the early chapters of Genesis. He first represents it as consisting in lordship in the world to come, founding on a quotation from the 8th Psalm, which is a poetic echo of the statement regarding man's place in the world in Gn 1^{26} (ch. 2^{5-8}). Next he conceives it as deliverance from the power of death exercised by the devil, with obvious allusion to the history of the Fall in Gn 3, wherein death is set forth as the penalty of sin (ch. $2^{14.\ 15}$). Finally, he exhibits it as the full final realization of the divine idea and promise of rest, to which he applies the felicitous thought-suggesting name Sabbatism (σαββατισμός), so making the final bliss of redeemed man consist in entering into the rest which God Himself enjoyed when He had finished the work of creation (ch. 4^{9}, cf. Gn 2^{2}). Taken together, the three conceptions suggest the thought of Paradise restored, the divine ideal of man and the world and their mutual relations realized in perpetuity, man made veritably the lord of creation, delivered from the fear of death, no longer subject to servile tasks, but occupied only in work compatible with perfect repose. From all the three points of view, salvation is a thing in the future. It is an apocalyptic vision. Fruition lies in the Beyond. Dominion, deathlessness, and Sabbatism belong to the world to come, and are objects of hope for those who bear the Christian name.

But salvation is not altogether in the future; it is a present good as well. Christians, as such, are conceived of as 'sanctified' (ἁγιαζόμενοι) and even 'perfected.' These words, however, do not bear quite the same meaning as that which we, familiar with the Pauline theology, are apt to attach to them. In the Epistles of St. Paul sanctification is ethical, and means making the Christian holy in heart and life. In the Epistle to the Hebrews this ethical sense appears (though the point has been disputed) occasionally to be traced, as in ch. $12^{10.\ 14}$, but more commonly the term is used in a theocratic sense, to express the idea of being put in right covenant relations with God, as in the text: 'By one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified' (10^{14}). The sanctified in this theocratic sense are equivalent to St. Paul's 'justified.' In ch. 2^{11} the word ἁγιαζόμενοι should probably be taken in both senses. The statement the verse contains is of the nature of an axiom, to the effect that whatever parties stand to each other in the relation of sanctifier to sanctified are ipso facto 'of one,' have one interest, form a brotherhood bound together by community of nature, experience, and privilege. The principle holds good, whether we understand the sanctifying function theocratically or ethically. If the function of the sanctifier be to place the sanctified, i.e. those to be sanctified, in right relations with God, then the more points of contact the better. There must be unity in God's sight, so that what He does is done in the name of those He seeks to sanctify, and avails for their benefit. He must be one with them in death, as it is by His death that He makes propitiation for their sins. He must possess, in common with them, humanity, for otherwise He could not die. Finally, He must be one with them in experience of trial and temptation, because thereby is evinced the sympathy that wins trust, and unless the priest is trusted it is in vain that He transacts. On the other hand, if the sanctifier's function be to make his clients ethically holy, then, again, the more points of contact between Him and them the better. In that case, the sanctifying power lies in the example of the sanctifier: in His character, His history as a man. He makes men holy by reproducing in His own life the ideal of human character, and bringing that ideal to bear on their minds by living a truly godly life under conditions similar to those under which they are placed. In short, His power to sanctify ethically depends on likeness in nature, position, and experience.

The word τελειόω is sometimes also used in our Epistle to denote the establishment of right relations between man and God, that is to say, as equivalent to 'justify' in the Pauline vocabulary. So in the text: 'By one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.' Perfecting here means giving the worshipper a satisfactory assurance that his sins are forgiven. What the word means in any given case depends entirely on the connexion of thought. In general, it signifies to reach the end, and the specific sense depends on the nature of the end in view. Thus perfecting as applied to Christ in 2^{10} signifies to make Him a fully-equipped Captain of salvation. Applied to the fathers, who died in faith, not having received the promises in 11^{40}, it means getting at length what they had lived and longed for when the company of the saved is complete.

Condition of Salvation.—What is the condition of salvation in our Epistle? We know what it is in St. Paul's theology. We are justified by faith. Faith is a great word in the Epistle to the Hebrews also, but its use there is not quite the same as in the Pauline letters. In the apostle's system faith has two functions. It accepts as a gift the 'righteousness of God,' and it works through love as a sanctifying power. Of the former function there is no clear trace in Hebrews. Instead of faith we find obedience in the text: 'He became the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him' (5^{9}). We come nearer to the Pauline conception of justifying faith in 10^{22}, where the writer exhorts his readers to draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, where faith means confident expectation of welcome for Christ's sake. The function of faith as a force making for personal righteousness or noble conduct is very prominently set forth in ch. 11, where, in a series of well-chosen instances, it is exhibited as a power helping men to make their lives sublime. But the secret of its power is peculiarly conceived in Hebrews. In St. Paul's system faith derives its power from its personal object, the Lord Jesus Christ. It unites us to Him, and from Him flows a transforming influence. In Hebrews the secret of faith's power is its psychological character as a faculty of the human mind, whereby it can make the future as if it were present, and the unseen as if it were visible. So viewed, faith as a principle making for heroism is not confined to the Christian world. It is as wide as humanity, and can turn out heroes and heroines in every land. Hence even a Rahab finds a place in the roll of those who obtained a good report through faith.

(2) Fatherhood of God.—The doctrine of the Fatherhood of God and the sonship of men, central in our Lord's teaching, and prominent also in the Pauline letters, is not very conspicuously taught in our Epistle. It makes a formal appearance chiefly in the hortatory section. There God is called 'the Father of spirits' (12^{9}), and it is taught that His supreme aim in all His dealings with His children is to make them partakers of His holiness (12^{10}). The phrase 'Father of spirits' seems to imply a paternal relation of God to men as such, coextensive with the human family, or, rather, inclusive of the human family, embracing it in a larger category, the world of spirits, including men living in the flesh but having a spirit, the spirits of just men made perfect, and angels. In the theoretical part of the Epistle the Fatherhood of God is referred to, or implied, mainly in reference to the Sonship of Christ. But while this is so, it must be ascribed to the exigencies of the apologetic argument controlling the train of thought rather than to the peculiarity of the writer's theological system, that the doctrine of the Fatherhood is so comparatively in the background. No man could be insensible to the importance of that doctrine who had such a vivid sense of the distinction and glory of Christianity as the religion of free access to an intimate fellowship with God. This central conception covers the whole ground. A religion of unrestricted access is a religion of sonship. Its spirit is filial, not legal; its watchword trust, not fear. It brings its votaries to Mount Zion, not to Mount Sinai. At another point the doctrine of sonship is immanent in the Epistle, though not formally named. This is where faithful Christians are called the comrades of Christ. 'We have become fellows of Christ if we hold fast the beginning of our confidence stedfast unto the end' (3^{14}). So we render the passage, taking μέτοχοι in the sense it bears in 1^{9}. The faithful the fellows of Christ, God's Son—such is the writer's idea, implying also, of course, that they are sons in the same house and family of God. This is just what was to be looked for from one who grasped the significance of the great principle, Sanctifier and sanctified all of one. It is but the other side of that great truth. The one side is Christ's oneness with those He undertakes to sanctify, and His readiness to accept all the conditions necessary to His complete identification with them. The other side is the unity of the sanctified with Christ, complete equality with Him in privilege. They are sons, therefore, as indeed they are called in 2^{10}, and therefore Christ's brethren. He was not ashamed to call them brethren even when they were in an unsanctified state (2^{11}); how much less will He be ashamed to call them brethren when they have experienced His sanctifying power! Therefore we need have no hesitation in taking μέτοχοι in the fullest sense of comradeship. In doing so we only assume that the author understands his own system of thought, and it may be added that he is in sympathy with the teaching of our Lord and with the conception of the relation between Christ and His people that pervades the entire NT. For the religion of the NT is throughout filial, and God, whether often or seldom so named, is always Father. The dialects for the purposes of theological reflection are various, but the central religious intuition is one.

iv. RELATION TO PHILO.—Such in brief outline is the theological import of the Epistle. We have avoided preliminary discussion of the questions belonging to the head of Introduction, because we did not wish to give any countenance to the idea that a right understanding of the Epistle depends on the previous settlement of doubtful questions respecting its author, its first readers, its date, its theological affinities, etc. We do not believe anything of the kind. It has been said, e.g., that no one can understand the Epistle who does not regard it as the writing of one belonging to the School of Philo and thoroughly conversant with his philosophy. We are inclined to think, on the contrary, that to be too sure of this, and to lay great stress on the supposed fact, is the direct way to misunderstanding. It is possible to understand the main drift of the Epistle while remaining in suspense as to the connexion with Philo. It is best to commence the study of the work tolerably uncommitted on the point. It is quite proper, as we go along, to keep our eyes open to all traces of affinity with Philo, so that on arriving at the end of the book we may have, not only a distinct idea of its theological drift, but also a more or less probable opinion on the subordinate question as to the connexion of its author with the Alexandrine school of religious philosophy. But that question, however interesting, is not vital.

That there are affinities of thought and style is not to be questioned, and, indeed, has already been indicated in a passing way. The author's mode of conceiving heaven as the place of realities and the earth as the place of shadows is an instance in point. That peculiarity is a fact patent to any attentive reader altogether apart from the question to what source it is to be traced. We might notice it though we had never heard of Plato or Philo. The only effect of the hypothesis that the writer was a disciple of the Jewish philosopher is somewhat to sharpen our attention and lead us to attach more importance to it than we otherwise would, perhaps more than it deserves. But there need be no jealousy as to having our attention directed to phenomena of this kind. No question of religious importance is involved, and the multiplication of instances of affinity in word and thought between Hebrews and the writings of Philo serves the purpose, at least, of increasing our acquaintance with the literary characteristics of our Epistle.

Among the verbal affinities with Philo the following may be specified. Philo, like our author, uses the prophets for the OT. Ἀπαύγασμα and χαρακτήρ find a place in his vocabulary, θυμιατήριον is used by him (not in LXX) for the altar of incense. Among the functions he ascribes to the Logos is that of cutter (τομεύς), even as our author describes the word of God as more cutting (τομώτερος) than any two-edged sword. The unusual words τραχηλίζω (4^{13}) and μετριοπαθέω (5^{2}) both occur in Philo. Less remarkable is the coincident use by the two writers of the epithets τεχνίτης and δημιουργός in reference to God (11^{10}). Among the thought affinities may be reckoned the distinction between τὰ φαινόμενα (11^{3})=Philo's ὁ ὁρατὸς κόσμος, the visible world, and the non-visible things (μὴ ἐκ φαινομένων, 11^{3})=Philo's κόσμος νοητός, the world of ideas; the conception of heaven as the country or home (πατρίς, 11^{14}) of the soul; the application to Christ of attributes ascribed in Philo to the Logos, such as πρωπότοκος (1^{6}) answering to πρεσβύτερος υἱός or πρωτόγονος in Philo; θεός (1^{9}), ἀρχιερεύς. To these instances thoroughgoing advocates of dependence on Philo would add the whole Melchizedek excursus, but without good reason. At this point our author drew his inspiration, not from Philo, but from the Heb. prophet who wrote the 110th Psalm. Philo does not quote or refer to the text about Melchizedek in that psalm, and there is nothing in all his writings to show that he followed the psalmist, or set the example to our author, in ascribing to the priest of Salem an ideal significance. Bleek states, with strict truth, that in Philo the significance of Melchizedek is always treated in an incidental manner.* As to the attribute of cutting, ascribed to the word of God in Hebrews, and to the Logos in Philo, the resemblance is in word rather than in thought. Our author is not thinking of the personal Logos in the passage in question, and the function he ascribes to the Word is ethical, exercised in the spirit of man, whereas the function Philo had in view was that of dividing the material of which the world is made into genera and species. On the whole, if, as is not improbable, the writer was more or less familiar with the ideas and philosophic dialect to which the Alexandrian school of Jewish philosophy gave wide currency in the first Christian century, there is no evidence in his work of abject discipleship, but at most of a very free independent use of words and ideas hailing from that quarter, just so far as they would serve his purpose.

v. RELATION TO ST. PAUL.—A similar relation of independence towards the Apostle Paul must be claimed for the Epistle. That the apostle was not the author of it is now so generally admitted that it is hardly worth while discussing the question. The diversity in the use of important theological terms such as ἁγιάζω and πίστις, the broad contrast in style, the marked individuality of the two authors in respect of religious temperament, all shut one up to this conclusion. As to the difference of style, it is a matter of detail, with reference to which a decided impression can be made only by a large accumulation of instances, but the following statement gives a sufficient idea of it. 'St. Paul was not free from Hebraism, and derives force from the simplicity of his language; the author (of Hebrews) expresses himself in idiomatic and polished Greek, and delights in the pomp of stately phrases and full-sounding derivatives. They differ in the elementary framework of their sentences by employment of different constructions and different connecting particles. Dialectical subtlety, impetuous bursts of natural eloquence, mighty thoughts struggling for expression in disjointed sentences, are the characteristic features of St. Paul's style. Rhetorical skill, studied antithesis, even flow of faultless grammar, and measured march of rhythmical periods, combine to stamp upon the Epistle a distinct and unique character of its own.'* Behind this difference of style lies an even more marked difference in religious temperament and experience. St. Paul is a man of great moral intensity; the author of Hebrews has about him an air of philosophic repose. We feel in every page of the Pauline Epistles that the man who wrote them has passed through a great religious crisis. In reading Hebrews we have no such feeling. Instead of a tragic experience there has been a smooth quiet studious life, whose passage into Christian faith has resembled the dawn of day rather than the sudden flash of light from heaven which smote Saul of Tarsus to the earth on the way to Damascus. A significant index of this equable flow is the entire absence from our Epistle of the well-known Pauline antitheses: law and grace, faith and works, flesh and spirit. There are antitheses here also, but they are less pronounced,—shadow and substance, type and antitype,—pointing at, not radical contrariety, but different stages in the religious development of mankind.

The writer of Hebrews was not only not St. Paul, but not even a disciple of St. Paul. To a great extent the proof of the one thesis is at the same time the proof of the other. That he was acquainted with the Pauline literature has been confidently asserted, but cannot be clearly shown.† There are doubtless things that remind us of Pauline texts, e.g. the description of the law as 'the word spoken by angels' (2^2), which recalls a similar thought in Gal 3^{19}, and the idea of the heavenly Jerusalem (12^{22} 13^{14}) found in the same Epistle (4^{25}). But these may be mere coincidences in the use of conceptions belonging to the common stock of contemporary religious thought. Acquaintance with Philo's writings can be alleged with much greater show of reason.

But while not a follower of St. Paul, our author is in thorough sympathy with all the leading positions of Paulinism. Without doubt he stands on the ground of universalism. No express text, indeed, can be cited in support of this assertion. From beginning to end there is not a single allusion to Gentile Christians, or the slightest indication that the writer is aware of the existence of such people. He seems to have in view throughout, God's ancient people, and to have for his sole aim to enable Hebrew Christians to remain steadfast in the faith amid circumstances of trial. He takes no advantage of opportunities for indicating the universal destination of the gospel; not even in 2^{16}, where it would have been so natural to have said, He (Jesus) took not hold of (in order to save) angels, but He took hold of mankind; instead of which he says, He took hold of the seed of Abraham. Nevertheless, the Epistle breathes throughout the spirit of universalism. The whole scheme of thought, though excogitated for the benefit of Hebrews, is capable of universal application, and implies that Christianity is the concern of all mankind. The remark holds true especially of the Christology. The cosmic relations in which the Son is set in the proem indicate that the word spoken by God through Him is a revelation for the whole world. It is only in universalist writings, such as the Epistles of St. Paul and the Gospel of St. John, that a cosmic Christology is to be looked for. Not less universalist in tendency is the view of the sacrifice of Christ presented in ch. 9^{14}. The doctrine takes its colour from Levitical institutions, but in its core it is not Jewish but human. The phrase by an eternal spirit lifts the whole subject above the distinctions, not only of time and space, as already pointed out, but also of race and nationality. It has the same ring as the great epoch-making text in St. John's Gospel: 'The hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. . . . The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth' ($4^{21.\,23}$).

Our author is in thorough sympathy with St. Paul's conception of Christianity as a spiritual religion. He sees not less clearly than the apostle the utter worthlessness of rites and ceremonies, except as a shadow of good things to come. He makes no allusion to circumcision, but doubtless he would have been in full sympathy with the Pauline polemic against those who attached religious value to that rite. His own controversy is with those who attach overweening importance to Levitical ceremonial; but it is not less thoroughgoing than the apostle's, and it rests upon the same principles and postulates.

Once more, our author is at one with St. Paul in his conception of Christianity as a religion of free grace. His own conception of it as the religion of unrestricted access to God is an exact equivalent. It is the same truth set in a different antithesis. St. Paul opposed grace to legal works, our author opposes the privilege of free access to the distance at which Levitical regulations kept worshippers from God. The counsel 'Draw near' presupposes a gracious Father to be approached, from whom all spiritual good may be confidently expected: pardon of sin, seasonable succour in all times of temptation. In Hebrews as in Rom. and Gal. salvation is a free gift.

vi. WAS THE AUTHOR JEW OR GENTILE?—Whether the author of our Epistle was a born Jew or a Gentile cannot be decided. The style and the rhetorical structure of the writing make for the latter alternative, the familiarity with Jewish institutions for the former. Both might be combined in a Jew of Alexandrian Hellenistic culture like Apollos, with whom, since Luther threw out the suggestion, there has been a disposition to identify the author, though the hypothesis has no support in ancient tradition. The question of nationality is of subordinate importance. The only question of vital interest in connexion with the theological import of the Epistle is whether the author represented the standpoint of Jewish Christianity with its limited sympathies and its contracted religious ideas. A tendency to take this view of his position has been more or less apparent in some recent contributions to the exegetical literature of the subject. In so far as it is adopted, it makes the understanding of the book hopeless. We cannot too firmly grasp the fact that in his essential ideas the writer soars high above all Jewish-Christian narrowness. In his method of interpreting Scripture, in his modes of argument, and even in some of his subordinate conceptions, he may be a man of his time and people; but in his great central thought of Christianity as the religion of free access and of spiritual reality, he belongs to all time and to all peoples. Whether he came before St. Paul or after him in point of time, he is of the same spiritual brotherhood. He has seen with open face the true nature and the grandeur of the Christian faith.

vii. JEW OR GENTILE READERS?—In asserting the universal outlook of our author, we were obliged to admit that on the face of his work he seems to concern himself only with Jewish readers. Till recent times no doubt has been entertained that the inscription To the Hebrews, though not original, correctly indicated its destination. But of late there has been a tendency, supported by weighty names, to set this tradition aside, and to hold that the first readers must have been Gentiles, not Jews. Among those who share this opinion are Schürer, Weizsäcker, Pfleiderer, and, above all, von Soden. Among the grounds on which this hypothesis is made to rest are such as these: the fundamentals enumerated in $6^{1.2}$ are such as were suitable for catechumens of pagan antecedents; the expression 'the living God' (9^{14}) suggests an antithesis between the true God and pagan idols, and the moral exhortations, addressed to the readers, possess special appropriateness only when conceived as meant for Gentile Christians. The numerous phrases which seem to imply readers of Heb. extraction are explained so as to harmonize with the hypothesis, by the assumption that, at the time when the Epistle was written, the Gentile Church had served itself heir to the title and privileges of the elect people. To the question, what need for so elaborate a plea for Christianity versus Leviticalism in an Epistle written for Gentile Christians? the answer given is: The type of Gentile Christianity the author had to deal with was an eclectic syncretistic system, into which an amateur attachment to Levitical institutions entered as an element, and became so strong as to endanger the Christian faith with which it was associated, especially in a time of persecution.*

That an amount of ingenuity has been expended in support of this hypothesis, sufficient to make it appear plausible, is frankly admitted. But that the case has been proved we are far from thinking. We sympathize with Ménégoz when he says: 'What strikes us, in this Epistle throughout, is a Jewish "flavour of the soil," and an absence of all allusion to pagan worship so complete that we have difficulty in comprehending how anyone can discover in it the least indication of its being meant for readers of pagan antecedents. We do not say there were no pagan Christians in the community, there may have been for aught we know, but in the texts we see no trace of them.'† Ostensibly the first readers are Hebrews, and Hebrews alone; that is generally acknowledged. The onus probandi lies on those who affirm that they were not really such, and it requires a very elaborate display of exegetical ingenuity to explain away the apparent Jewish costume and physiognomy. If the readers were indeed Gentiles, they were Gentiles so completely disguised in Jewish dress, and wearing a mask with so pronounced Jewish features, that the true nationality has been successfully hidden for nineteen centuries, and even now, after learned critics have done their best to show us the Gentile behind the Jew, we shake our heads in honest insurmountable doubt, and feel constrained to agree with Westcott when he pronounces the argument of von Soden 'an ingenious paradox.'‡ viii. LOCATION OF FIRST READERS.—Where the Heb. community, to which the Epistle was addressed, was located, is a much debated question of inferior moment to that just disposed of. Palestine, Alexandria, Rome are the rival hypotheses, and weighty authorities can be cited for each of them. § It is not necessary here to go into details on the subject, as the topic has no vital bearing on the theology of the Epistle. If we attach weight to the inscription To the Hebrews as indicating, not merely Jewish nationality, but a section of the Jewish people distinguished by the epithet 'Hebrew,' it points to Palestine or Syria as the locality of the first readers. 'Hebrews' means Jews speaking Hebrew. But as the Epistle was written in Greek, these 'Hebrews' must have been bilinguals acquainted with Greek as well as their mother-tongue. Such bilingual Jews would be found more readily in a Syrian city like Antioch than in Jerusalem. Other things point in the same direction, e.g. the statement in 2^3 that the persons addressed had heard the gospel, not from the lips of the apostles, but at second hand. This would apply to the Syrian Churches, which were founded by the scattered members of the Jerusalem Church after the death of Stephen.*

ix. DATE.—The date of the Epistle has more than curious interest. The solemn earnest tone of the hortatory parts speaks to a great crisis, such as that of the destruction of Jerus. and of the Jewish state, impending. All seems to say: a judgment-day is approaching (10^{25}). The Epistle is a supreme effort to avert apostasy at a time of extreme peril. A general overturn is at hand, when all things that can be shaken—cities, walls, temples, hoary religions—will be shaken to make room for the kingdom that cannot be shaken ($12^{26.27}$). There is therefore a high degree of probability in the suggestion that the Epistle was written when the war, which issued so disastrously for the Jewish people, was raging and drawing near to its awful crisis. 'The fatal year A.D. 70 had arrived, and the Roman armies had gathered round Jerus.; if the daily sacrifice had not already ceased, the siege had at all events begun; for until Jerus. was "compassed with armies" no Hebrew Christian would have ventured to address to his Heb. brethren so unsparing a condemnation of the national religion.'† The last statement in this quotation may be doubtful, for the prophetic men of Scripture always had the courage to utter their convictions at the proper time, but the selection of the period most suitable to the message delivered is otherwise appropriate. And the date called for by the solemnity of the message is borne out by minute hints occasionally dropped, e.g. by the allusion to the 40 years during which the people of Israel saw God's works (3^9). The mere circumstance that the writer connects the 40 years with the seeing of God's works, rather than with the trying of God's patience, as in the psalm quoted from, is significant. He does it intentionally, and as one aware of the original connexion, as is evident from 3^{17}, where he returns to the original connexion. What is his intention? To suggest a parallel between the case of Israel in the wilderness and the Heb. Church to this effect: 'Your fathers saw God's wonderful works, which ought to have kept them true to Him, for 40 years, yet they perished through unbelief. You have seen the wonders of God's grace in the Christian Church for the same period of time; see that ye perish not likewise on Israel's judgment-day.' Reckoning the 40 years from the beginning of the Church, corresponding to the Exodus, the period would take us down to the fateful year 70 or thereby.

That the Epistle was not written at a later date has been argued from the fact that throughout the writer seems to speak of the Levitical ritual as if it were still in force. This, however, it is now generally admitted, is not conclusive, as the author appears to write of that ritual from an ideal point of view. It may have been a thing of the past as an actual fact, yet present for his mind as an object of thought. The possibility of this must be admitted in view of the fact that it is not the temple but the old tabernacle the writer has in view as the scene of Levitical worship (see $9^{2.6.7}$).

x. AUTHOR.—The Epistle is anonymous, and the author has remained unknown. Apollos, as described in Ac 18^{24-28}, is the kind of man wanted—a Hellenistic Jew of Alexandrian culture, acquainted both with the OT Scriptures (in the Gr. version) and with contemporary philosophy. With this we must be content. Other conjectures thrown out from time to time have comparatively little to commend them. The most interesting, and one of the most ancient, is that which ascribed to Luke the Evangelist a share in the production of the work, at least to the extent of translating into good Greek a supposed Heb. original from the hand of the Apostle Paul. Clement of Alexandria entertained this opinion, and through Eusebius (HE iii. 38) it became the prevailing view that the Epistle was, in thought, the work of St. Paul, and in a Gr. version the literary work of St. Luke or Clement of Rome. A number of resemblances between the style of St. Luke in the Gospel and in Ac and that of our Epistle have been pointed out, so as to lend at least plausibility to the hypothesis that the evangelist is responsible for the Epistle in its Gr. dress. But if Luke might have been the translator (on the improbable hypothesis of a Heb. original), he certainly could not have been the author. The striking contrast between his account of the agony in the garden and that given in the Epistle is sufficient to settle that question.

We must be content to remain in ignorance as to the writer of this remarkable work. Nor should we find this difficult. Some of the greatest books of the Bible, such as Job and the second part of Isaiah, are anonymous writings. It is meet that this one should belong to the number, for it bears witness in its opening sentence to One who speaks God's final word to men. In presence of the Son, what does it matter who points the way to Him? The witness-bearer does not desire to be known. He bids us listen to Jesus and then retires into the background. We need have no anxiety about finding for his work an apostolic author who shall guarantee its inspiration and canonicity. The book speaks for itself. It is worthy to be in the NT. It rendered an indispensable service as an aid to faith in a transition time when an old world was passing away and a new world was coming into being.

A. B. BRUCE.

HEBRON (חֶבְרוֹן 'association').—1. The third son of Kohath, known to us only from P (Ex 6^{18}, Nu 3^{19}) and the Chronicler (1 Ch $6^{2.18}$ 15^{9} $23^{12.19}$). Nothing further is known of him personally, but there are a few scattered notices of his descendants. The Hebronites are mentioned with the three other Kohathite families at the census taken in the wilderness of Sinai (Nu 3^{27}), and appear again at the later census in the plains of Moab (26^{58}). In 1 Ch 15^{9} it is said that 'of the sons of H., Eliel the chief, and his brethren fourscore,' were amongst the Levites assembled by David when he brought the ark from the house of Obed-edom into Jerus., and in 1 Ch 23^{19} that when David numbered the Levites there were reckoned four sons of H., Jeriah, Amariah, Jahaziel, and Jekameam (cf. 24^{23}), while 1 Ch 26 mentions some members of the Hebronite family as holding certain offices under David ($26^{23.30.31}$). 2. A son of Mareshah and father of Korah, and Tappuah, and Rekem, and Shema (1 Ch 2^{42-3}). It is possible that in these vv. the names are those of localities rather than individuals.

HEBRON (חֶבְרוֹן 'association,' Χεβρών, Arab. el-Khalîl).—A very ancient city in the southern part of Canaan, built 'seven years before Zoan in Egypt,' Nu 13^{22} (JE). Josephus (Ant. I. viii. 3) also states that it was seven years older than Tanis (Zoan) in Egypt, and also (BJ IV. ix. 7) that it was the oldest city in Palestine, older even than Memphis in Egypt, and that its age in his time was 2300 years; thus making it a rival of Damascus, which he states (Ant. I. vi. 4) was founded by Uz, the grandson of Shem.

Hebron included Mamre, Gn 13^{18} (J). Abram, when he moved his tents after separating from Lot, 'came and dwelt by the terebinths of Mamre, which are in Hebron': these trees were in possession of Mamre the Amorite, brother of Eshcol and Aner, with whom Abraham was confederate (Gn 14^{13}). When Sarah 'died in Kiriath-arba' ('the same is Hebron,' Gn 23^{2}), Abraham entreated the children of Heth for a burying-place for her, and bought the field of Ephron containing the cave 'which was in Machpelah which was before Mamre' ('the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan'), Gn 23^{17}. 'Now the name of Hebron beforetime was Kiriath-arba ('the city of Arba'), the greatest man among the Anakim,' 'the father of Anak' (Jos 14^{15} 15^{13}, Jg 1^{1}). As Machpelah was before or over-against Hebron (Mamre), it would appear that though close together they were distinct places.

The first mention of the giants who occupied Hebron is made in the account of the spies (Nu 13^{22}) sent by Moses into the land of Canaan, when the sons (Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai) of Anak were at Hebron. It would thus appear that at the time of Abraham there were both Amorites and children of Heth at Hebron, and also that the children of Anak were connected with the place, as they were there in the time of Moses, and the city itself was originally called after Arba the father of Anak (but see Moore, Judges, p. 23; and Hommel, Anc. Heb. Trad. p. 234, who make Kiriath-arba= Tetrapolis). There is no record as to whether the Anakim were Canaanites in common with the Amorites and children of Heth; but it would appear that they were not Rephaim, Zuzim, or Emim who dwelt east of the Jordan, and who are mentioned as being as tall and powerful as the Anakim, and not as the same tribe (Gn 14^{5} 15^{20}, Dt $2^{11.21}$). It has been pointed out [cf. Wellhausen, Comp. d. Hexat. p. 341 (1889)] that Amorite is the general name of the primitive population of Canaan, and that these names are descriptive titles, and not the names of distinct tribes (Gn 14^{13} 23^{5}, Jg 1^{10}), but they were probably originally distinct (see Driver, Deut. 11 f.).

The Jewish writers take Kiriath-arba to mean the city of four, which they refer to four saints,—Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Adam,—in which Jerome also concurs. Sir John Maundeville (in A.D. 1322) states that at the time of his visit the Saracens called Hebron Karicarba, while the Jews called it Arbothe; and he also refers to Adam being buried there.

Hebron became after the entry into the Promised Land a city of Judah, situated (Jos 15^{54}) in the hill-country (Jos 20^{7} 21^{11}), and is stated by Eusebius (Onom. s.v. Αρκώ) to be 22 miles south of Jerusalem and 20 miles north of Beersheba. It is now called el-Khalil ('The Friend') by the Mohammedans.

Hebron played an important part in the early history of the Hebrews until Jerusalem became the capital of Palestine. Abraham, after waxing rich and separating from Lot, came and dwelt by the terebinths of Mamre, which are in Hebron, and built an altar there unto the Lord (Gn 13^{18}). From here he went to the rescue of Lot, and brought him back after defeating Chedorlaomer and the kings that were with him; here his name was changed from Abram to Abraham, and it was here that he entertained the angels unawares (Gn $14^{13ff.}$ 17^{5} 18^{2}). Here Isaac was born, and Sarah died and was buried in the cave of the field of Machpelah, bought by Abraham as a burial-place. Here also Isaac and Jacob lived part of their lives (Gn 35^{27} 37^{14}); from here Jacob sent Joseph to seek his brethren, when he was taken into Egypt, and from here Jacob and his sons followed after (Gn 35^{14} 46^{1}). Here the three patriarchs and their wives, except Rachel, were buried (Gn $49^{30.\ 31}$ 50^{13}). Here the spies sent by Moses saw the Nephilim or giants, the sons of Anak (Nu 13^{22}).

Hebron was taken by Joshua and given as an inheritance to Caleb, who drove out the three sons of Anak (Jos 14^{12} 15^{14}). It was made one of the six cities of refuge (Jos 20^{7}, Jos. Ant. v. i. 24, ii. 3), and given with its suburbs to Kohathite Levites; but the fields of the city and the villages thereof were given to Caleb (Jos 21^{11}). One of the exploits of Samson was to bring the gates of the city of Gaza and place them on the top of the mountain that is before Hebron (Jg 16^{3}). Hebron was one of the cities to which David sent a portion of the spoils after smiting the Amalekites; here he was anointed king over the house of Judah; and here he remained king of Judah seven and a half years, and six sons were born to him (2 S 2. 3).

Here Abner was treacherously slain by Joab at the gate, and was buried; and here the sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, after their hands and their feet had been cut off, were hanged 'beside the pool' (2 S 3^{27} 4^{12}). Here came all the elders of Israel, and anointed David king over Israel (2 S 5^{3}). Here it was that Absalom came to be declared king (2 S $15^{7ff.}$). At this time there was a spot here for worshipping the Lord, probably the altar said to have been erected by Abraham to the Lord by the terebinths of Mamre (Gn 13^{18} 15^{17}). (But see Jerome, Quæst. Hebr. on 2 S 15^{17}).

According to Josephus (Ant. VIII. ii. 1), king Solomon went to Hebron to sacrifice to the Lord 'upon the brazen altar that was built by Moses'; and here the Lord appeared to Solomon, who prayed for a sound mind and good judgment; but it is stated in the Bible (1 K 3^{4}) that this took place at the great high place at Gibeon.

Rehoboam fortified Hebron (2 Ch 11^{10}), and it was occupied after the Captivity, when it was called by its old name Kiriath-arba (Neh 11^{25}). Judas Maccabæus captured it from the Edomites, and 'pulled down the strongholds thereof, and burned the towers thereof.' It had thus at that time ceased to be a city of Judah (1 Mac 5^{65}; Ant. XII. viii. 6).

At the time that Vespasian was making preparations for the final siege of Jerusalem, Simeon bar-Gioras made a sudden raid into Edom and took Hebron without bloodshed; but it was shortly afterwards recaptured by Cerealis, one of the commanders of Vespasian's army, and was burnt down (BJ IV. ix. 7, 9). Josephus states that at this time the monuments of the posterity of Abraham were to be seen at Hebron, 'the fabric of which monuments is of the most excellent marble, and wrought after the most elegant manner. There is also shown at a distance of six furlongs from the city a very large turpentine tree, which has continued since the creation of the world.'

In the 4th cent. the sepulchres of the patriarchs were still shown at Hebron, built of marble and of elegant workmanship. The church described by Eusebius at the terebinths appears to have been the Great Basilica of Constantine, remains of which are still to be seen (Onomast. art. 'Arboch') to the north of Hebron. The Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) describes the monument of Abraham as a quadrangle built of stones of admirable beauty. Antoninus Martyr (Itin. 30) describes a quadrangle with an interior court, open to the sky, into which Jews and Christians entered from different sides, burning incense as they advanced. In the 6th cent. Arculf visited Hebron when it was occupied by the Saracens, and he describes the sepulchre as small and mean, situated about a stadium from Mamre on the east, and surrounded by a low wall. Willibald in the 8th cent. passed here, and mentions the sepulchres in the castle Aframia; and Sæwulf, 1103, speaks of the monuments to the patriarchs being surrounded by a very strong castle. In 1167 Hebron was erected into a bishopric under the Latins. William of Tyre says that there never was a Greek bishop before this, but only a prior. Benjamin of Tudela, who visited Hebron in 1163, states that the ancient city was standing on a hill in ruins; while the modern city stood in the valley in the field of Machpelah. He also describes the iron door leading to the caves.

Hebron (el-Khalil, 'the friend') is one of the four sacred cities of the Moslems, and the shrines of the patriarchs are very jealously guarded by them. The town is built without walls, and contains about 18,000 Moslems and 1200 to 1500 Jews. It is situated in a shallow valley surrounded by rocky hills, from which spring no fewer than 25 sources of water. Luxuriant vineyards still clothe the hills and vales, and produce some of the best grapes in Palestine, and groves of olive and fruit trees abound. The town is divided into four quarters; the houses are built of stone, with partially flat and partially domed roofs, on account of the scarcity of large timber for rafters. The valley in which the town is built runs from north to south; the main quarter lies on the eastern slope, with the Harâm or sacred area conspicuously rising above it. Two other quarters are to be seen in the north and west slopes, and one to the south. The streets opening on to the main roads have gates. At the northern end of the main quarter is a pool of ancient construction, 85 ft. by 55 ft., and low down in the valley southward is a larger one, also of high antiquity, over 130 ft. square and 28 ft. deep, the traditional spot where the murderers of Ishbosheth were hanged.

There are a large number of traditional sites about Hebron. In 'Ain Keshkaleh may be found the name Eshcol, although this identification is philologically difficult. At 'Ain Judeideh, west of the Harâm, is a vault where Adam and Eve are said to have mourned for Abel; and above are the Deir el-Arabîn, said to be the tombs of Jesse and Ruth; and the Kabr Hebrûn, said by the Hebron Jews to be the tomb of Abner. At the foot of this hill is the Ager Damascenus, from which was obtained the red earth of which Adam was made.

About two miles to the west of the Harâm is a venerable oak (Sindiân), one of the finest in Palestine. It measures 22½ ft. around the lower part. It is probably the tree described as a terebinth by Sir John Maundeville, Belon, and others. Since the 12th cent. it has been pointed out to Christians as 'Abraham's Oak,' under which Abraham pitched his tent. About two miles to the north, near the road to Jerusalem, is the Râmat el-Khalîl, called by the Jews of Hebron the house of Abraham. Here are the foundations of an immense building—200 ft. by 165 ft.—of large squared stones, of which two courses only remain, regarded by the Jews as the place of Abraham's tent and the terebinth at Mamre. Guérin (Judée, iii. 214) suggests that this enclosure was built round the tree under which the patriarch was supposed to have pitched his tent. Jerome speaks of a fair having been held annually on this spot. It seems probable that from 1st to 12th cent. this was the traditional site of Mamre. It is suggested (SWP iii. 323) that this building may have been the market mentioned by Sozomen (Hist. ii. 4) as the place where Hadrian sold Jewish captives for slaves (A.D. 165), close to which Constantine afterwards built his basilica at the terebinth of Mamre, the foundations of which are still to be distinguished (Conder, Palestine, 85).

It is quite clear that, if the present traditional sepulchres of the patriarchs are genuine, the present site of the city which stands around the Harâm cannot coincide with the site of the ancient city of Abraham's time, which was over-against the sepulchre; and this idea appears to have been present to the minds of the early Christian writers, who mention a site on the north-west of the modern city as the original Hebron.

The Harâm or 'sacred area' is a quadrangle 197 ft. by 110 ft. externally. The masonry of the wall is identical with that of the Wailing Place at Jerusalem, and is therefore probably not later than Herodian. The height of the ancient wall still standing is about 40 ft., and above this rise walls of modern construction, with lofty minarets at N.W. and S.E. corners. Within the enclosure is a mosque, probably the remains of the church built in the 11th cent. when the bishopric was established, and the monuments to the patriarchs are within. The tombs themselves are, however, below in the rocky cavern, and the iron door which is said to lead to them was shown to the present writer at the bottom of the flight of steps on the outside wall in 1867 (see account by Benjamin of Tudela, Early Travels in Palestine, p. 86; PEF Mem. iii. 333; Cte. Riant, Archives de l'Orient Latin, ii. 411, and art. MACHPELAH; Onomast. arts. 'Arboch' and 'Drys'; Antonini Mart. Itin. 30, Early Travels). C. WARREN.

HEDGE is used in AV to translate words of two different Heb. stems. One of these (gâdar, גָּדַר) refers to stone walls, though, perhaps, in some instances, to a stone wall crowned with thorns. In AV its derivatives are often tr. by the word 'wall.' In RV they are prevailingly, though not always, tr. by the word 'fence.' The other stem (sûk or sâkak, שׂוּךְ or שָׂכַךְ) refers to a thorn hedge. The Gr. φραγμός, tr. 'hedge' in Mt 21^{33}, Mk 12^{1}, Lk 14^{23}, denotes a fence of any kind, whether hedge, or wall, or palings. The purpose of the hedge, as the term is used in the Bible, is either to protect that which is enclosed in it (e.g. Job 1^{10}), or to restrain and hinder (e.g. Job 3^{23}, Hos 2^{6}). See FENCE.

HEED.—Heed is either 'carefulness,' as Is 21^{7} 'And he hearkened diligently with much heed' (וְהִקְשִׁיב הַקְשֵׁב רַב־קָשֶׁב; LXX ἀκρόασαι ἀκρόασιν πολλήν; Vulg. 'et contemplatus est diligenter multo intuitu,' whence AV through Gen. 'And he hearkened and toke diligent hede'; Orelli, 'And has listened with most eager listening'); or simply attention, as Ac 3^{5} 'And he gave heed unto them, expecting to receive something of them' (ἐπεῖχεν αὐτοῖς). The phrase is always (except Is 21^{7} above) 'take heed' or (less often) 'give heed,' and the only noticeable occurrence is Sir 6^{13} 'Separate thyself from thine enemies, and take heed of thy friends' (πρόσεχε). This tr^{n} is from Wyc. and Dou. after Vulg. 'ab amicis tuis attende,' the other VSS having 'beware of,' which RV adopts. The meaning of AV is probably 'pay attention to' suspiciously, as in North's Plutarch (Cicero, p. 879), 'After that time, Cicero and he were alwaies at iarre, but yet coldly enough, one of them taking heed of another.' But Shaks. uses the phrase in the sense of 'pay attention to' without suspicion, as Jul. Cæs. I. ii. 276, 'Three or four wenches, where I stood, cried "Alas, good soul!"—and forgave him with all their hearts; but there's no heed to be taken of them: if Cæsar had stabbed their mothers they would have done no less'; and Coverdale uses it in the sense of 'take care of,' Hos 13^{5} 'I toke diligent hede of the in the wildernesse that drye londe.'

J. HASTINGS.

HEGAI or HEGE (הֵגַי Est $2^{8.15}$, חֵגָא 2^{3}, Γαΐ).—A eunuch of Ahasuerus, and keeper of the women, to whom the maidens were entrusted before they were brought in to the king. The name is probably Persian; cf. Ἡγίας, who is named in Ctesias (Pers. c. 24) as a courtier of Xerxes (so Roediger, Thes. Add.). H. A. WHITE.

HEGEMONIDES (Ἡγεμονίδης, 2 Mac 13^{24}).—An officer left in command (στρατηγός) of the district from Ptolemais to the Gerrenians (which see), by Lysias, when he was forced to return to Syria to oppose the chancellor Philip (B.C. 162). AV translates 'made him (Maccabæus) principal governor,' but no parallel for such a use of ἡγεμονίδης is to be found. Syr. recognizes the proper name, but Vulg. reads Ducem et principem. H. A. WHITE.

HEIFER (in all the passages cited below, the Heb. term. is עֶגְלָה except Nu $19^{2ff.}$, Am 4^{1}, Hos 4^{16}, where it is פָּרָה. In the only NT occurrence, He 9^{13}, the Greek is δάμαλις).—The heifer is repeatedly mentioned in the Bible, in connexion both with agriculture and with ritual services.

That it was customary to use heifers for ploughing is evident from the saying of Samson, 'If ye had not plowed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle,' Jg 14^{18}. Ploughing and harrowing are both specified in Hos 10^{11}, and from this passage as well as from Jer 50^{11} we gather that heifers were employed to tread out the corn.

A heifer of three years old was one of the animals divided by Abraham upon the occasion of his solemn covenant with J″, Gn 15^{9} (J). A heifer was the animal offered by Samuel at Bethlehem, 1 S 16^{2}. When a murder had been committed, the author of which could not be traced, a special atoning ceremony was prescribed, Dt $21^{3ff.}$. The elders of the nearest city had to take a heifer which had never been used for work away to a barren spot where there was a wady with running water, and there break its neck. Thereafter they washed their hands over the carcase, solemnly testified their innocence of the murder, and prayed that J″ would forgive His people for the crime that had been committed in their midst (see notes of Driver and Dillm. ad loc., also W. R. Smith, RS^{1} 351). For the ritual prescribed in Nu $19^{2ff.}$ and referred to in He 9^{13}, see RED HEIFER. In Nu 19^{17} AV reads, 'They shall take of the ashes of the burnt heifer of purification for sin,' which gives the sense (if not the exact tr^{n}) of מֵעֲפַר שְׂרֵפַת חַטָּאת better than RV, 'They shall take of the ashes of the burning of the sin-offering' (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. חַטָּאת). The reference is to v.^{9}.

The word 'heifer' is several times used in similes. Egypt is compared to a heifer in Jer 46^{20}, so is Chaldæa in 50^{11}, the points of resemblance being probably beauty, strength, and wantonness

(cf. Am 4^{1} 'kine of Bashan' applied to the ladies of Samaria). Israel is compared in Hos 4^{16} to a stubborn heifer that will not accustom itself to the yoke (Nowack), and in Hos 10^{11} to a heifer which has hitherto had the easy task of treading out corn, but is now to have the harder work of ploughing and harrowing.

For 'heifer of three years old' of Is 15^{5}, Jer 48^{34} (AV and RVm) see EGLATH-SHELISHIYAH.

HEIR.—i. TERMS. יָרַשׁ yārash, and נָחַל nāḥal, LXX κληρονομέω, κατακληρονομέω, etc., Vulg. heres sum, etc., 'inherit'; ptcp. יוֹרֵשׁ yôrēsh, LXX κληρονόμος, etc., Vulg. heres, etc., 'heir'; יְרֻשָּׁה yĕrushshāh, יְרֵשָׁה yĕrēshāh, מוֹרָשָׁה môrāshāh, נַחֲלָה naḥălāh, LXX κληρονομία, κλῆρος, etc., Vulg. hereditas, etc., 'inheritance'; יָרַשׁ, נָחַל, and their derivatives are also commonly used in the more general sense of 'possess,' 'acquire'; and figuratively of the relation between God and His people, e.g. J″ is the naḥălāh of Levi, Dt 10^{9}, and Jacob is the naḥălāh of J″, Dt 32^{9}; בְּכוֹר bĕkhôr, LXX πρωτότοκος, Vulg. primogenitus, 'firstborn'; בְּכוֹרָה bĕkhôrāh, LXX τὰ πρωτοτόκια, πρωτοτοκεῖα, Vulg. primogenita (neut. pl.), 'birthright,' 'right of the firstborn'; גֹּאֵל gō'ĕl, LXX ἀγχιστεύς, ἀγχιστεύων, λυτρωτής, συγγενής, Vulg. cognatus, propinquus, ultor, 'next-of-kin'; גָּאַל, gā'al, LXX ἀγχιστεύω, λυτρόω, etc., Vulg. propinquitatis jure retinere, eruere, redimere, etc., 'act as next-of-kin'; גְּאֻלָּה, gĕ'ullāh, LXX ἀγχιστεία, λύτρον, λύτρωσις, etc., Vulg. propinquitas, etc. On bĕkhôr, gō'ĕl, and derivatives, see further below.

ii. INHERITANCE. The fact that the terms for heir, etc., for the most part meant originally, and continued to mean, possess, etc., indicates a certain lack of emphasis on the difference between inheritance and other ways of acquiring and holding property. Land, the most important kind of property, belonged to the family and the clan rather than to individuals, as is shown by the Jubilee and other land laws. All land was, as it were, entailed. Other property too—cattle, slaves, and, in some instances, wives—was inherited. The heir succeeded to the headship of the family, which included the control of the family property. Moreover, the heir succeeded as a right, according to law and custom; he took possession of what had become his. Wills were unknown in ancient Israel, though sometimes (cf. below) a father would interfere with the natural course of things to benefit a favourite son. The phrase 'set thy house in order,' צַו לְבֵיתֶךָ, shows that a dying man would sometimes arrange the disposition of his property, and the future status of the members of his family; but probably in accordance with recognized custom, if not with binding law. The blessing of the dying father would usually confirm the firstborn in his right, but might also, as in the blessings of Isaac and Jacob, transfer it to someone else.

iii. RIGHT OF THE FIRSTBORN, BIRTHRIGHT. The prevailing custom, which is everywhere taken for granted, was that the eldest son succeeded his father as head of the family, and took the largest share of the property. Thus we have the special terms bĕkhôr, bĕkhôrāh, for 'firstborn,' 'right of the firstborn.' The genealogies, Gn 5, etc., mention the firstborn, and him only. 1 Ch 5^{1} speaks of Reuben having an original right of pre-eminence, which he lost by misconduct. In 2 Ch 21^{3} Jehoram succeeds Jehoshaphat, 'because he was the bĕkhôr.' Probably the eldest son, if an adult, succeeded to the high priesthood; but the exceptions were numerous, both in the royal and sacerdotal dynasties. According to Ex 13^{2}, JE, the firstborn of every mother was sacred to J″. In Dt 21^{17} the bĕkhôrāh is a 'double portion,' פִּי שְׁנַיִם. The difference of status between the mothers of a man's children, often only loosely defined, was a fruitful source of discord as to the bĕkhôrāh. Reuben, the son of an inferior wife, is reckoned as Jacob's bĕkhôr; he is deposed for misconduct, not on account of his mother's status. On the other hand, Sarah claims that, because Ishmael is the son of a concubine, he shall not even share the inheritance with Isaac, Gn 21^{10}. Evidently, the prior right of the son of the wife over that of the concubine depended upon the feeling of the father towards mother and son, and probably also on the influence of the mother's family.

iv. CASES WHERE THE FIRSTBORN WAS PASSED OVER FOR OTHERS—JUNIOR RIGHT. The exceptions to the rule of the succession of the eldest son are numerous and striking. The line of divine election among the patriarchs usually passes through younger sons, Abraham apparently, Isaac, Jacob. According to 1 Ch $5^{1.2}$, the bĕkhôrāh was transferred from Reuben to Joseph. In Gn 49 Jacob puts Ephraim before his elder brother Manasseh. According to Ex 7^{7} (P), Moses was the junior of Aaron. David was the youngest son of Jesse; and Solomon, one of the youngest, at any rate, among the many sons of David. We may take the circumstances of the succession of Solomon as typical. The father would often secure the succession for a favourite son by appointing him his successor, or even by associating him with himself in his lifetime. Such arrangements have always been common, especially in the East. The favourite wife would often be the one last married, and the favourite son the youngest. Apart from 2 Ch 21^{3}, it is never stated that the eldest son succeeded his father as a right. Great men with large harems and numerous families would follow the example of the kings. The transference of the bĕkhôrāh from Reuben to Joseph, and from Esau to Jacob, shows that such a change might be made for sufficient cause, and therefore, of course, on any plausible pretext: a case is mentioned in 1 Ch 26^{10}. A further proof of the occasional transference of the bĕkhôrāh at the will of the father is the prohibition of the practice in Dt 21^{15-17}.

The frequent succession of youngest sons suggests that the very widespread custom of 'Junior Right' or succession by the youngest existed in pre-monarchical Israel, and survived in some measure in later times. J. Jacobs (Studies in Biblical Archæology, p. 47), partly following Sir H. Maine, says: 'The custom would naturally arise during the later stages of the pastoral period, when the elder sons would in the ordinary course of events have set up for themselves by the time of the father's death. The youngest would in these circumstances naturally step into the father's shoes, and acquire the patria potestas, and with it the right of sacrificing to the family gods by the paternal hearth.' On the other hand, when the heir was a minor, the inheritance was probably often seized by adult kinsmen. Witness the constant complaints of the wrongs done to orphans.

v. WHO INHERITED WHEN THERE WERE NO SONS. In Nu 27^{5-10} (P), in connexion with the daughters of Zelophehad, the following provision is made for this and similar cases: 'If a man die and have no son, ye shall cause his inheritance to pass unto his daughter. If he have no daughter, ye shall give his inheritance unto his brethren. If he have no brethren, ye shall give his inheritance unto his father's brethren. If his father have no brethren, ye shall give his inheritance unto his kinsman, שְׁאֵר, who is next to him in his clan, מִשְׁפַּחְתּוֹ.' In Nu 36^{6} it is further provided that heiresses must marry in their own clan. Though the law itself is late, the provisions are obvious and probably ancient, except perhaps the preference given to daughters. A member of another clan marrying an heiress joined her clan, Ezr 2^{61}, Neh 7^{63}, cf. BERIAH. Jeremiah's acquisi tion of his uncle's field, Jer 32^{7}, is an example of the rights of a kinsman in the family property.

Jacob's action in reckoning Ephraim and Manasseh as his sons is doubtless typical of cases of adoption. Similarly, women would sometimes, as in the case of Sarah, Rachel, and Leah, reckon children born to their husbands by their slaves as their own; but, as we have seen, the rights of such children were uncertain. In 1 Ch $2^{34.35}$ a genealogy is traced through the issue of a Jewess and an Egyptian. Abraham, Gn 15^{3}, expects that his slave will be his heir, cf. Pr 30^{23}, where, however, the translation is not certain. The last two cases would also be typical.

The succession is as a rule confined to the father's kin on account of the family sacra. W. R. Smith (Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, p. 95) points out that women could not inherit in early Arabia (cf. Benzinger, p. 355), and that there could be no question of a widow inheriting because she was a part of a man's property, and went with the rest of the estate to the heir. This principle is illustrated in Israel by the law of the levirate marriage, the case of Ruth, the incident in 2 S 16^{15-23}, and the incident of Adonijah and Abishag —to succeed to the king's widow implied succeeding to the throne. By the law of the levirate marriage (Dt 25^{5-10}; cf. Gn 38, Ru 4) the firstborn son of a man's widow by his brother, or gō'ēl, became his heir; (cf. GOEL, MARRIAGE, and see Driver on Dt $25^{5ff.}$).

vi. PROVISION FOR CHILDREN OTHER THAN THE CHIEF HEIR. The principle that the land belongs to the family, involves the providing for the rest of the family by the head who controls the family property. Probably, in early times the maintenance of younger children was provided for according to this principle by customs no longer traceable. Abraham, however, sends his younger children away with gifts (Gn 25^{6} [JE]); according to 2 Ch 11^{23} Rehoboam dispersed his sons among the walled towns of Judah and Benjamin, made ample provision for them, and gave them wives, in order to secure the throne for a favourite son, Abijah. Sons would often be got rid of in this fashion to secure an undisputed succession for a favourite. Other typical cases are those of Ishmael and Jephthah, who were sent away without any share of the inheritance. Daughters would almost always be married; unmarried daughters would be kept and have husbands found for them by their brothers, and where there were sons there would be no question of their sharing the inheritance. Job 42^{15} specially mentions that Job's daughters shared with their brothers, doubtless because this was exceptional.

Dt 21^{16} speaks of the father 'causing the son to inherit that which he hath,' which seems to imply some power on the part of the father to determine the inheritance of his property (Dillm., Driver, i.l.; cf. ii.). But this is strictly limited by the context, and it must have been similarly limited by ancient custom. The law, probably, is partly a protest against the violation of such, and partly a provision for new conditions. There is nothing in the history to suggest the subdivision of the family land at each successive generation. Benzinger (p. 354) is doubtful whether any such subdivision took place. It seems very unlikely. Unless, therefore, the above Deut. laws are confined to personal property they are probably late, perhaps were never effective.

The New Testament. No question of the laws or customs of inheritance arises in connexion with the NT. Christ is the (firstborn) son and heir in the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen (Mk 12^{7} etc., and in He 1^{2}); Christians are heirs of God's promises, etc. (Ro 8^{17}, Gal 3^{29} $4^{1.7}$, He 6^{17}, Ja 2^{5} etc.). The figure of inheritance is also used in reference to Abraham, and to the Israelites, etc. Διαθήκη is often translated 'testament' by AV, especially in reference to the institution of the Lord's Supper (Lk 22^{20} etc., 1 Co 11^{25}), but it should be 'covenant,' except perhaps in He $9^{16.17}$, where the rendering 'testament' is defended by many scholars (see commentaries, i.l.). RV has 'covenant' throughout, often with 'testament' in the margin, except that in He $9^{16.17}$ 'testament' is placed in the text, and the margin states that the Greek word means either 'covenant' or 'testament.' In Lk 12^{13} we read that 'one said unto him, Master, bid my brother divide the inheritance with me.' See also INHERITANCE.

HELAH (חֶלָאָה 'rust'?).—One of the wives of Ashhur the 'father' of Tekoa, 1 Ch $4^{5.7}$. See GENEALOGY.

HELAM (חֵילָם, in 2 S 10^{17} with ה locale חֶלְאָמָה and the Massoretic note יתיר א. Budde, however, maintains that חֶלְאָם is the correct form).—The Aramæans from beyond the river,* whom Hadarezer summoned to his aid, came to Helam (2 S 10^{16}) and were there met and defeated by David (v.$^{17f.}$). As far as the form of the word is concerned, חֵילָם in v.^{16} might mean 'their army' (so Aq. ἐν δυνάμει αὐτῶν, followed by Thenius). There can, however, be little doubt that the LXX (Αἰλάμ), Pesh. and Targ. are right in taking it as a proper name (so Ewald, Hist. iii. 155 n. 2; Bertheau, Wellh., Driver, Budde, Kittel). Cornill, upon the ground of the LXX Ἡλιάμ, introduces Helam also in Ezk 47^{16} (cf. also Bertholet, ad loc.). In this case it must have lain on the border between Damascus and Hamath. J. A. SELBIE.

HELBAH (חֶלְבָּה).—A town of Asher, Jg 1^{31}. Its identity is quite uncertain. (For various attempts to fix its site, see Moore, ad loc.).

HELBON (חֶלְבּוֹן).—A place from which wine was brought to Tyre, Ezk 27^{18}. It is the modern Halbûn on the east slope of Antilebanon, about 13 miles N. of Damascus. The region around, on Hermon and the Antilebanon, is remarkable for its vineyards to the present day. The wine of Helbon is mentioned also in the cuneiform texts, and the Persian kings are said to have preferred it to any other. It has sometimes been wrongly supposed that Helbon is to be identified with Aleppo.

HELDAI (חֶלְדַּי; B Χολδεά, A Χολδαί).—1. The captain of the military guard appointed for the twelfth monthly course of the temple service (1 Ch 27^{15}). He is probably to be identified with 'Heleb the son of Baanah the Netophathite,' one of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23^{29}; A Ἀλάφ, B omits). In the parallel list (1 Ch 11^{30}; B Χθάοδ, A Χοάδδ and Ἐλάδ) the name is more correctly given as Heled. The form Heldai is supported by Zec 6^{10} (see below), and should probably be restored in the other two passages.

2. According to Zec 6^{10}, one of a small band who brought gifts of gold and silver from Babylon to those of the exiles who had returned under

* The Euphrates, not the Orontes as Hitzig maintains. See Wellh. Sam. 179 f.

Zerubbabel. From these gifts Zechariah was bidden to make a crown for Joshua the high priest, which was to be placed in the temple as a memorial of Heldai and his companions. In v.[14] Helem (חֵלֶם) is clearly an error for Heldai; the Peshiṭta in both places reads Holdai or Huldai (ܚܘܠܕܝ). J. F. Stenning.

HELEB (חֶלֶב 2 S 23[29]).—See Heldai 1.

HELED (חֶלֶד 1 Ch 11[30]).—See Heldai 1.

HELEK (חֶלֶק 'portion'). — Son of Gilead the Manassite, Nu 26[30], Jos 17[2] P. Patronymic, Helekites, Nu 26[30].

HELEM.—1. (חֶלֶם) A man of Asher, 1 Ch 7[35]. 'The name must be altered to חוֹתָם (v.[32]) to fit the context; otherwise we should have חֵלֶם in v.[32] instead of חוֹתָם' (Kittel in SBOT). 2. (חֵלֶם) An exile who was sent from Babylon with gifts of gold and silver for the sanctuary at Jerusalem, Zec 6[14]. He is called in v.[10] Heldai (חֶלְדַּי). LXX has τοῖς ὑπομένουσιν, not treating this and other nouns in the same passage as proper names.

HELEPH (חֶלֶף). — A town on the border of Naphtali, Jos 19[33]. Although mentioned in the Talmud (Megillah i. 1, see Neubauer, Géog. d. Talm. 224), Heleph has not been identified.

HELEZ (חֶלֶץ 'vigour'; B Σέλλης, A Ἔλλης, Luc. Χάλλης).—1. One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23[26]). He is described as 'the Paltite,' i.e. a native of Beth-pelet in the Negeb of Judah (cf. Jos 15[27], Neh 11[26]). But in the two parallel lists (1 Ch 11[27] and 27[10]) both the Hebrew text and the LXX (ὁ Φελωνεί; ὁ ἐκ Φαλλούς) read 'the Pelonite,' a variant which is supported by cod. A at 2 S 23[26] (ὁ Φελλωνεί; B reads ὁ Κελωθεί); the former reading is further inconsistent with 1 Ch 27[10], where Helez is expressly designated as 'of the children of Ephraim.' From the latter passage we learn that he was in command of the military guard appointed for the seventh monthly course of the temple service. See Pelonite.

2. A Judahite, 1 Ch 2[39]. J. F. Stenning.

HELI (Ἡλεί = Heb. עֵלִי). — 1. The father of Joseph, in the genealogy of Jesus, Lk 3[23]. 2. An ancestor of Ezra, 2 Es 1[2]. Omitted in parallel passages, 1 Es 8[2], Ezr 7[2. 3]. See Genealogy.

HELIODORUS (Ἡλιόδωρος).—The chancellor (ὁ ἐπὶ τῶν πραγμάτων) of Seleucus IV. Philopator. At the instigation of Apollonius (which see), he was sent by the king to plunder the private treasures kept in the temple at Jerus.; but he was prevented from carrying out his design by a great apparition (ἐπιφανία),—a horse with a terrible rider struck him to the ground, while two young men scourged him severely. H. was carried out of the temple by his guards speechless and prostrate, but was restored at the intercession of the high priest Onias (2 Mac 3[7ff.]). Some have supposed that the discomfiture of H. was due to a device of Onias (cf. v.[32], so Rawlinson in Speaker's Comm.). Jos., who seems to have been unacquainted with 2 Mac, makes no mention of the mission of H.; but in 4 Mac 4 a similar story is related of Apollonius. In B.C. 175 H. murdered Seleucus, and attempted to seize the Syrian crown; but he was driven out by Eumenes of Pergamus and his brother Attalus, and Antiochus Epiphanes, brother of Seleucus, ascended the throne (App. Syr. 45; Liv. xli. 24). There is commonly supposed to be a reference to H. in Dn 11[20], but the interpretation of the passage is doubtful (cf. Bevan in loc.). Further, H. is frequently reckoned as one of the ten or the three kings of Dn 7[7f.]. H. A. White.

HELKAI (חֶלְקַי, perh. shortened for חִלְקִיָּה).—A priest (Neh 12[15]). See Genealogy.

HELKATH (חֶלְקַת and חֶלְקַת 'portion,' 'possession').—A Levitical city belonging to the tribe of Asher, Jos 19[25] 21[31]. The site is uncertain. The same place, owing perhaps to a textual error, appears in 1 Ch 6[75] [Heb.[60]] as Hukok.

HELKATH-HAZZURIM.—The name given to the spot at Gibeon where the fatal combat took place between the twelve champions chosen on either side from the men of Abner and Joab, 2 S 2[16]. The name חֶלְקַת הַצֻּרִים means 'the field of sword edges.' This is accepted by Driver (Text of Sam. ad loc.), who compares Ps 89[44] [Eng.[43]] צוּר חַרְבּוֹ 'the edge of his sword.' Others prefer to follow the LXX μερὶς τῶν ἐπιβούλων and read חֶלְקַת הָאֹרְבִים 'the field of the liers in wait' (so Ewald, Hist. iii. 114; Wellh. Sam. ad loc.; Budde, SBOT, ad loc.). Thenius reads חֶלְקַת הַצָּרִים 'the field of the adversaries.' J. A. Selbie.

HELKIAS (Χελκίας, Gr. form of Heb. חִלְקִיָּה, Hilkiah; in AV of Apocr. reproduced as Chelcias, Helkias, and Helchiah; RV uniformly Helkias). —1. The high priest Hilkiah in Josiah's reign. He is mentioned in 1 Es 1[8] = 2 Ch 35[8] as a governor of the temple, subscribing handsomely to Josiah's great Passover; in 1 Es 8[1] (cf. Ezr 7[1]) as the great-grandfather of Ezra; and in Bar 1[7] as father of Joakim, who was governor of the temple in the reign of Zedekiah. 2. A distant ancestor of Baruch (Bar 1[1]). 3. The father of Susanna (Sus vv. [2-29]). J. T. Marshall.

HELL.—The term used in Old English to designate the world of the dead generally, with all the sad and painful associations of the dark region into which the living disappear. In modern English it has the specific sense of the place and condition of penalty destined for the finally impenitent among the dead. With this it expresses also the abode of evil spirits. It is cognate or connected with the German hehlen = hide, hüllen = cover, A.S. helan, Lat. celare, etc. It appears in much the same form in many of the European languages: Ger. hölle, Sw. helvete, Go. halja, Da. helvede, Du. hel, Ice. hel, O.H.G. hella, A.S. hel, helle, M.E. helle (cf. Chaucer, CT 1202). The Teutonic base, hal = hide, akin to kal, kar (in the older form), is supposed by Skeat to be a 'development from a root skar, of which the meaning was to cover.' Etymologically, therefore, the term denotes the covered, hidden, unseen place.

In our AV the word 'hell' is unfortunately used as the rendering of three distinct words with different ideas. It represents (1) the שְׁאוֹל of the Heb. OT, and the ᾅδης of the LXX and the NT, which have the general sense of the 'realm of the dead.' In this employment of the word the AV translators were justified so far by the sense which it had in their day, and by the fact that it was applied to the world of the departed generally in the Creeds, in Spenser, in Chaucer, in mediæval miracle and mystery plays, and in Old English religious poetry. It is not the only word which the translators of 1611 used as an equivalent for שְׁאוֹל and ᾅδης. At times they used 'the pit' (Nu 16[30. 33]), and in a number of cases 'the grave' (Gn 37[35], 1 S 2[6], Job 7[9] 14[13], Ps 30[3] 49[14. 15] etc.). But 'hell' is their most usual rendering in the OT (Dt 32[22], 2 S 22[6], Ps 16[10] 18[5] 116[3] 139[8], Pr 5[5] 7[27] 9[18] etc.), and the rendering to which they adhered in all the NT passages, however different in their shades of meaning, in which they found some form of ᾅδης (Mt 11[23] 16[18], Lk 12[5] 16[23], Ac 2[27. 31], 1 Co 15[55], Rev 1[18] 6[8] 20[13. 14]). It is now an entirely misleading rendering, especially in the NT passages. The English Revisers, therefore, have substituted 'Hades' for 'hell' in the NT. In the OT they allow the word 'hell' to remain in the text of Is 14, and give Sheol in the margin. In the poetical books they usually give Sheol in the text; while in the historical books they place Sheol in the margin, and allow the renderings 'the grave' and 'the pit' to stand in the text. In the American Revision the word 'hell' is entirely discarded in this connexion (as are also the terms 'the grave,' 'the pit'), and with a wise consistency Sheol is substituted all through the text of the OT, as Hades is in the text of the NT. (See also article on HADES).

The word 'hell' is used (2) as equivalent to τάρταρος in the verbal form ταρταρώσας in 2 P 2[4] (cf. Jude [6]). In that passage it is retained by the RV, though it might be better rendered 'cast them down to Tartarus.' The particular case in view there is that of the punishment of fallen angels, and the word is applied to the intermediate scene and condition of penalty in which those offenders are detained, held in chains of darkness, in reserve for the final judgment. In this one instance the NT adopts the heathen term for 'hell'—the word which in Plato (Phæd. 113 E) designates the place into which the incurably corrupt are hurled with a view to their endless imprisonment; and which in Homer (Iliad, viii. 13, etc.) is the name given to the murky abyss, lying as deep beneath Hades as earth is beneath the sun, in which the sins of insurgent and defeated immortals, Kronos, Iapetos, and the Titans, are punished.

In the paragraph in question, together with the corresponding passage in the Ep. of Jude (v.[6]), attaches itself to ideas on the subject of the punishment of angels, which have a considerable place in the literature of Judaism, especially the apocalyptic writings. These ideas assumed strange and amorphous forms, unlike anything in the NT, as regards both the place and the nature of the penalty. The Book of Jubilees and the Apocalypse of Baruch, e.g., both speak of the fallen angels as 'tormented in chains,' and the former represents them as bound in the depths of the earth until the day of the great judgment (Bk. of Jub 5[243] 7[248] 22[21] 24[27] etc., Apoc. of Bar 56[10-13]). The Book of Enoch dilates at greatest length on these things. Enoch is described as receiving a commission to announce the impending judgment of the fallen angels. Their leader, Azâzel, is doomed to be covered with darkness until the great day of judgment. The prison in which they are confined until the day of decision consigns them to the final retribution, is seen by Enoch. It is described as different from the abyss of fire, in the extremest depth of earth, into which they are in the end to be cast, and in certain parts of the book this preliminary place of punishment is represented, as was the case also with the Tartaros of the Greeks, as in the void at the end of heaven and earth (Bk. of Enoch 10[6] 13[21] 18[11] 21[7] 54[6] 90[24]).

The word 'hell' is used (3), and more properly, as the equivalent of γέεννα, the designation of the place and state of the just retribution reserved for the finally impenitent after the judgment. This word γέεννα (less correctly, in view of its derivation from the Aramaic, γέεννα), Gehenna, occurs twelve times in the NT, and for the most part only in the Synoptists. It is not found in the Johannine writings, nor in the Bk. of Acts, nor in any of the Epistles except once in one of the Catholic Epp. (Ja 3[6]). But in the Synoptical Gospels it is found eleven times, and in a variety of phrases—'in danger of the Gehenna of fire' (Mt 5[22]), 'to be cast into Gehenna' (Mt 5[29. 30] 18[9], Mk 9[45. 47]), to 'destroy . . . in Gehenna' (Mt 10[28]), 'the child of Gehenna' (Mt 23[15]), the 'damnation' or 'judgment of Gehenna' (Mt 23[33]), to 'go into Gehenna' (Mk 9[43]), to 'cast into Gehenna' (Lk 12[5]). It is found, therefore, in each of the three Synoptists. In all the instances of its use in the Gospels it is given as a word from Christ's own lips, and in one case we have the parallel narrative of Mt and Mk (Mt 18[9], Mk 9[45]). It belongs to the tradition common to the first two evangelists, and there is every reason to believe that it forms part of the primitive report of Christ's words. Hence the importance of defining with all due care its precise sense, point, and connotation.

This term Gehenna, γέεννα, which is the solemn NT designation of hell, represents the Aram. גֵּיהִנָּם and the Heb. גֵּיא הִנֹּם 'the valley of Hinnom' (Neh 11[30]), more fully גֵּי בֶן־הִנֹּם 'the valley of the son of Hinnom' (Jos 15[8] 18[16], 2 Ch 28[3], Jer 7[32]), and גֵּי בְּנֵי הִנֹּם 'the valley of the children of Hinnom' (2 K 23[10], acc. to the Kethîb). It is taken by some to mean the 'valley of howling' or 'the valley of lamentation,' גֵּיהִנָּם being supposed to come from an obsolete הָנַן (Arab. hanna, 'cry' or 'wail'). But far more probably the Hinnom is a personal name. The place so named after one unknown was a deep narrow gorge in the vicinity of Jerusalem, understood to be on the south side, forming a continuation of the valley of Gihon and separating the hill of Zion from the 'hill of Evil Counsel.' It is usually identified with the modern Wady er-Rebâbi, though this is contested by some (see Conder in Encyc. Brit. xiii. 640). It is repeatedly mentioned in the OT. The border of Judah is described as going up 'by the valley of the son of Hinnom unto the south side of the Jebusite . . . and to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward'; while the border of Benjamin is said to have 'come down to the end of the mountain that lieth before the valley of the son of Hinnom' and to have 'descended to the valley of Hinnom to the side of Jebusi on the south' (Jos 15[8] 18[16]; cf. Neh 11[30]). It is described as 'by the entry of the East gate' (Jer 19[2]), and as having the valley of Tophet or Topheth in it (2 K 23[10], Jer 7[31] 19[6]). Jerome speaks of it as having been of old a pleasant place, and as having again in his own time the attraction of gardens. But under Ahaz, Manasseh, and Amon it was made the scene of the gross and cruel rites of heathen worship, idolatrous Jews passing their children through the fire there to Molech (2 Ch 28[3] 33[6], Jer 7[31]). Hence king Josiah, when he put down the idolatrous priests who had burned incense to Baal under the apostate kings of Judah, also 'defiled Topheth, which is in the valley of the children of Hinnom, that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech' (2 K 23[5. 10]). It was also declared by Jeremiah that the place should be 'no more called Tophet, nor The valley of the son of Hinnom, but The valley of Slaughter' (Jer 19[6]). After its pollution by the pious son of Amon it became an object of horror to the Jews, and is said to have been made a receptacle for bones, the bodies of beasts and criminals, refuse and all unclean things (so Kimchi). The terrible associations of the place, the recollections of the horrors perpetrated in it and the defilement inflicted on it, the fires said to have been kept burning in it in order to consume the foul and corrupt objects that were thrown into it, made it a natural and unmistakable symbol of dire evil, torment, wasting penalty, absolute ruin. So it came to designate the place of future punishment, and the Talmudic theology spoke of the door of hell as being in the valley of Hinnom (Barclay, City of the Great King, p. 90).

It has not this sense in the OT. The nearest approach to it is in such a passage as that in which the prophet makes the demand, 'Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?' (Is 33^{14}). But the place is not mentioned there, and the fires in question are not those of a retribution after death, but those of the divine wrath and righteousness which now and on earth search all sinners, those in Sion no less than those in Assyria. The terrible description of judgment with which the Second Isaiah closes his great prophecy of grace might seem even more in point (Is 66^{24}). It is possible that the horrors of the valley of Hinnom suggested the awful figures in which the prophet there declares of the returning Israelites, that they shall 'look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed' against Jehovah, 'for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh' (RV). But apart from the fact that here again the place is not named, and from the question whether the passage may not be of too early a date (as Dillmann supposes) for such a colouring, the vengeance which is intimated is not one that is to be looked for in the other world, but one which overtakes the transgressors in this world in the form of miserable overthrow and uttermost dishonour. It assumed this sense, however, in the period between the close of OT prophecy and the Christian era. By the time when Christ taught and the apostles preached, the word Gehenna had a well-understood meaning. We can follow the history of the term, and see how it came to have that sense. The history shows us also the variations in the application of the word, and the different ideas which were connected with it.

The OT itself offered the point of issue for the process of development. As its view of the future became enlarged, and the old notion of a Sheol which was without moral distinctions, and dealt out to all the dead the same joyless inane existence, began to give place to the loftier and more definite conception of a future embracing a resurrection, the foundations of the doctrine of a heaven and a hell were laid. The idea of a final judgment, which went with that of a resurrection (Dn 12^{2}), led naturally to the twofold expectation of a special place of reward for the righteous, and a special place of punishment for the unrighteous in a world beyond the grave. The Jewish literature shows us how this belief shaped itself. It makes it plain, too, that Gehenna, as the definite place of future retribution, was originally understood to be something distinct from Sheol or Hades, though other ideas were attached to it now and again or in particular schools. The apocalyptic writings are of special importance in this matter, and the Bk. of Enoch above all others. It is perhaps in it that we have the first definite occurrence of the word as the designation of the place of just retribution destined for the wicked after the final judgment. In Enoch, however, as in the apocalyptic writings in general, there is much that is fantastic, and the statements which meet us in different parts of the book are by no means uniform. In certain sections, which are probably more deeply affected by Hellenic ways of thinking, Hades appears as a preliminary scene of reward and punishment, and is represented as lying in the remotest tract beyond the ocean. In it the souls of dead men wait the final condition, and have a foretaste of that condition. This moralised Hades is described as having in it intermediate abodes of four distinct kinds for four different orders of men: one for the righteous who died of oppression, and another for the rest of the righteous dead; one for sinners who were not judged by injustice or persecution on earth, and another for those who paid part of the penalty of their offences in their lifetime here (Bk. of Enoch 5. 22. 103^{7} etc.). More usually these preliminary scenes of weal and woe were spoken of as only two —one for the good, called also Paradise and the Garden of Eden; and one for the evil, separated from the other by a wall or gulf, and called, at least in the later Jewish books, by the name Gehinnom, Gehenna. In the Slavonic Enoch, again, or The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, the second of the seven heavens is the prison-house of the apostate angels who wait the eternal judgment, and the northern region of the third heaven is the place of punishment prepared for those who did not honour God (chs. 7 and 10). In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs the place in which the spirits of the lawless are confined with a view to their punishment is the second heaven (Test. of Levi, ch. 3). In the literature of Alexandrian Judaism, on the other hand, in which we have the doctrine of an incorporeal immortality, and the idea that the souls of the pious dead are received at once by God into heaven, Hades is the place of punishment for the wicked dead, and is again practically identified with Gehenna (Wis $3^{10\text{-}14}$ $4^{10\text{-}19}$ 5^{1} etc.; cf. Joseph. De Bell. Jud. II. viii. 11, 14). There is evidence enough, therefore, that opinion varied at different periods and in different sections of Judaism. In the theology of the Talmud and Midrash, Gehinnom, Gehenna meant the scene of penalty, while in certain phases of Jewish belief it appears to have been regarded at once as a place of punishment for the heathen and as a place of purgatorial detention for imperfect Israelites. But with all this there is reason to say that its original sense was that of the final place of retribution, that it was distinguished from Hades and from every form of an intermediate state, and that it had this meaning with the Jewish people generally (however it might be with the speculations of the schools) in Christ's time. The apocalyptic writings, which speak of a separation of the just from the unjust between death and the resurrection, also speak of a final punishment after the judgment, and describe the place of that retribution in terms which point to Gehenna. Enoch seems to identify it with the local Ge-Hinnom. He comes to the middle of earth, and sees a happy region of hills and valleys. But between the holy hills he sees an accursed valley where 'shall be gathered together all those who speak with their mouths unseemly words against God, and speak impudently of his majesty' (Bk. of Enoch $27^{2,3}$). Elsewhere in the same apocalypse this place of final retribution is described as 'in the midst of the earth' and 'full of fire' ($90^{24\text{-}26}$). And in express terms the Fourth Book of Ezra speaks of the 'gulf of torments' and the 'furnace of Gehenna' that shall be revealed ($6^{1\text{-}14}$ 7^{36}, Churton). 'Hell,' therefore, as expressed by γεέννα in the NT, is not the penal side of Hades (so, e.g., Grimm s Wilkii Clavis, etc.), but the final retributive scene and condition (see Meyer on Mt 5^{22}).

It has further to be asked whether the term 'hell,' Gehenna, in the NT expresses the idea of a penal condition that is permanent. What the common belief of the Jews was on the subject of the nature and the duration of the final retribution at the time to which the NT writings belong, is a disputed question, and one by no means easy to answer. The literature, however, that is most pertinent to the question does not favour the idea that the doctrine of an ultimate restoration of all souls was the prevalent doctrine among the Jews of that period. It leaves us a choice between two views, annihilation and everlasting punishment, and the conclusion to which it points is that the latter was the belief of the great mass of the people. The apocryphal books speak in the most unambiguous terms of the lot of the wicked dead as final and enduring. In the Bk. of Judith, for example, the vengeance of the day of judgment is described as 'fire and worms' in the flesh of those who rise up against Israel, which 'they shall feel and weep for ever' (16[17]). In one of the Bks. of Maccabees the lot of the tyrant is declared to be 'eternal torture by fire,' and 'interminable torments' (4 Mac 9[8, 9] 10[10]). Another of these books speaks of the 'furnace of hell,' and of the despisers of the Most High as doomed to be 'henceforth in torments, always in pain and anguish of seven kinds' (4 Ezr 7[36, 79, 80]). As a general rule, the pseudepigraphic writings are equally explicit. They speak of the penalty of the wicked as an 'everlasting curse'; of the last day as a 'day of judgment and punishment and affliction upon the revilers to eternity'; of the 'abyss of fire' in which the impious shall be 'locked up for all eternity'; of a 'just judgment, in eternity for ever' (Bk. of Enoch 5[5, 6] 22[4-11] 10[11-14] 27[2, 3]; cf. Apoc. Bar 44[15] etc.). The testimony of Josephus, too, with all necessary abatements, is to the effect that both Pharisees and Essenes believed in everlasting punishment (BJ II. viii. 11, 14; Ant. XVIII. i. 3). On the other hand, the final retribution of the impenitent is in not a few cases expressed in terms of a destruction, a perdition, and the like (Ps. Sol 3[13] 9[9] 12[8] 13[10] 15[13], Bk. En 99[11] etc.); from which it is inferred that the penalty in question was regarded as an ultimate extinction of being. Such expressions have to be read, however, in the light of the general Jewish conception of Sheol. So read they may convey the idea that there is no deliverance for the wicked from Sheol, but do not necessarily mean that the doom in question was absolute extinction of existence. They are also to be measured by other statements of a more definite and unmistakable kind, with which they are accompanied, and by the contrasts in which they are placed with descriptions of the lot of the righteous as an enduring one. In the Rabbinical books there is a wider variety of opinion. Gehenna appears there at times as a purgatory, and statements are found which indicate that at least at certain periods there were those who favoured the doctrine of annihilation, and those who inclined to the hope of a final universal restoration. But these were rather the dogmas or speculations of the schools than the belief of the people, and they belong to a later period. Even in the case of the great Rabbis who spoke of a limited punishment, exception was made of certain classes of sinners. The school of Hillel, e.g., taught that sinners of the heathen and others were punished in Gehinnom for a space of twelve months, and afterwards were consumed. But the Minim (the Christians), the Epicureans, those who deny the divine origin of the Torah and the truth of the resurrection, and those who sin like Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, were said to 'go down to Gehinnom,' and to be 'punished there to ages of ages.' The same is the statement made, but at greater length and in still more explicit terms, in the Rosh Hashshanah, in a passage which is described as the 'classical passage of the Talmud' on the subject (Plumptre, The Spirits in Prison, p. 52). The most probable conclusion appears to be this—that, while there were variations in belief from time to time, especially in the direction of annihilation, and divergent speculations in the Rabbinical schools, the idea generally connected with the term Gehenna, 'hell,' in our Lord's time was that of an irreversible doom for the wholly wicked, and that in His teaching as well as in that of His apostles the word was used in its popular and prevalent sense (see Schürer, HJP II. ii. 183; Edersheim's Jesus the Messiah, ii. pp. 440, 791; Meyer, Comm. on Mt 5[22]; Holtzmann, Hand-Com. on Mt 5[22], Mk 3[29] 9[48]).

Other terms are also used in the NT to express the penalty and the condition indicated by the word Gehenna, 'hell.' In the evangelical records of Christ's own discourses such terms are found employed as 'eternal fire'; 'unquenchable fire'; the place where 'their worm dieth not, and their fire is not quenched'; the 'prison' from which there is no coming out until 'the last farthing' is paid; 'eternal punishment' as contrasted with 'eternal life'; exclusion from the kingdom; banishment from Christ; 'weeping and wailing, and gnashing of teeth'; the 'outer darkness,' etc. (Mt 18[8, 9], Mk 9[43-49], Mt 5[25, 26], Lk 12[58, 59], Mt 25[46] 7[21-23] 13[42] 25[30]). Elsewhere the final destiny of the unrighteous is described as 'the mist of darkness for ever' (2 P 2[17]); the 'blackness of darkness for ever' (Jude [13]); the 'fierceness of fire' and 'perdition' (He 10[27, 39]); 'great tribulation,' 'burning with fire,' being 'without,' the 'second death,' being cast into the 'lake of fire,' the 'lake that burneth with brimstone and fire' (Rev 2[22, 23] 18[8, 9] 22[15] 2[11] 20[6, 14] 21[8] 20[10] 19[20]); the 'wrath to come,' 'wrath and indignation, tribulation and anguish,' 'death,' 'punishment,' 'destruction,' 'eternal destruction from the face of the Lord' (Ro 2[5], 2 Th 1[9], Ro 2[8] 6[21], Ph 3[19], 2 Th 1[9]). Beyond these terms of large suggestion, which are as remarkable for their variety as for their figurative force, the NT does not carry us. Theologians have gone further, and have ventured on many definitions of things left undefined in the Scriptures. They have distinguished between two forms of the future penalty, the pœna sensus and the pœna damni. They have spoken sometimes of the 'fire' of Gehenna as a material fire (cf. Petavius, De Angel. iii. 5), and sometimes as a figurative (Origen, De Prin. ii. 4). They have indulged in fruitless questions regarding the locality of hell, the Limbus or 'fringe' of hell, and much else. The NT is silent on many things on which imagination and speculation have both spent themselves largely and to little profit. It speaks much less of the retribution of the impenitent than of the reward of the righteous. In what it does say of the former it gives no satisfaction to curious inquiry. It limits itself to intimations which address themselves to character and conduct, and which convey the impression of the untold moral issues that depend upon the present life.

HELLENISM.—See GREECE.

HELM.—The helm is now the handle which moves the rudder, but it was formerly used loosely for the whole steering apparatus. Hence in Ja 3[4] it is given as tr[n] of πηδάλιον, a rudder. It was Tind. who introduced 'helm' here, and he was followed by all the VSS except Gen., which has 'rudder,' and Rhem., which has 'sterne.' RV follows Geneva. The only other occurrence of π. in NT is Ac 27[40], where Tind. and all after him give 'rudder.' Wyclif's word in both passages is 'governayle.' See SHIP.

HELMET (קוֹבַע ḳôbha' or כּוֹבַע kôbha'—Greek περικεφαλαία) was probably made of skin as a rule, since helmets of bronze (Goliath's 1 S 17[5], and Saul's ib. v.[38]) are mentioned as something special. The form of an ancient helmet is shown in the illustration of Assyrian soldiers given under BATTERING-RAM. The helmets worn by the Romans were made either of leather (the galea) or of metal (the cassis). The helmet included plates to protect the cheeks, a band for the forehead, and a collar-like projection to protect the back of the neck. Such a helmet, when closed, showed little besides the eyes, nose, and mouth. (See illustrations in Lindenschmit, Tables ix. x. and xxii.).

Isaiah (59[17]) describes the Lord as arming Himself for His people with righteousness as a coat of mail, and with salvation as a helmet. It is clear from the parallelism existing between the two halves of the verse (righteousness = vengeance, salvation = zeal) that the passage means that God arises with punishment for the enemy and with deliverance for His people. The 'helmet of salvation' is the helmet of the Lord's deliverance. St. Paul applies the phrase (Eph 6[17]) differently; on the Christian's head rests (1 Th 5[8]) a helmet of the hope of salvation. W. E. BARNES.

HELON (חֵלֹן 'valorous').—Father of Eliab, the prince of Zebulun at the first census, Nu 1[9] 2[7] 7[24. 29] 10[16] (P).

HELP.—As a verb 'help' is used in AV in some archaic phrases: (1) Help forward, Zec 1[15] 'I was but a little displeased and they helped forward the affliction,' i.e. aggravated. Golding uses the phrase in a good sense in Calvin's Isaiah (on 40[3]), 'what an excellent consolation is this, to heare that God useth the service of Infidels, yea and when his Church hath need, to make all creatures put to their hands for the helping forward of our salvation.' Milton uses the verb without 'forward' in the same sense as in Zec, PL vi. 656—

> 'Their armour helped their harm, crush'd in and bruised
> Into their substance pent.'

(2) Help to = furnish with, 1 Mac 8[13] 'Whom they would help to a kingdom, those reign' (οἷς δ' ἂν βούλωνται βοηθεῖν καὶ βασιλεύειν, βασιλεύσουσιν [א βασιλεύουσιν], RV 'Whomsoever they will to succour and to make kings, these do they make kings'). Cf. Piers Plowman, p. 27—

> 'Trywe charite
> That most helpe the men to hevene.'

(3) Help up, Ec 4[10] 'Woe to him that is alone when he falleth: for he hath not another to help him up' (RV 'lift him up'). So Is 49[8] Cov. 'I wil make the a pledge for the people, so that thou shalt helpe up the earth agayne'; and Shaks. Timon, I. i. 107—

> ''Tis not enough to help the feeble up,
> But to support him after.'

Help, both as vb. and subst., has often a fuller meaning than 'assistance,' it often means 'deliverance,' almost as much as 'salvation.' See esp. Ps 60[11] = 108[12] 'Give us help from trouble: for vain is the help of man' (תְּשׁוּעָה . . . עָזְרָה, where the second word is usually tr[d] 'salvation,' as AVm, RVm; LXX βοήθεια . . . σωτηρία; Vulg. 'auxilium . . . salus'). Cf. Jer 8[20] Tav. 'The harvest is gone, the sommer hath an ende, and we are not healped'; Ps 22[5] Cov. 'They called upon the, and were helped: they put their trust in the, and were not confounded' (so Pr. Bk. 'They called upon thee, and were holpen').

In Gn 2[18. 20] Eve is described as 'an help meet for' Adam. The Heb. is the usual word for 'help' (עֵזֶר), but the meaning is not, as vulgarly supposed 'a help to Adam,' one that will give herself to serve Adam. This mistake has caused the word 'helpmate' to be used of the wife (sometimes evidently under the impression that that is the term in Gn), as even Abp. Sharp, Works, IV. Ser. xii. 'God made man first, and out of him created woman; and declared withal, that he therefore created her that she might be a help-mate for the man.' The meaning is a helper (the word is of course concrete as in Ps 70[5]) that will assist him in the work given him to do, carrying it on in the same spirit, as Vulg. 'adjutorium simile sibi.' The meaning is well illustrated by Southey, Wesley, ii. 188, 'It had therefore been much impressed upon his [Whitefield's] heart that he should marry, in order to have a help meet for him in the work whereunto he was called.' Tindale's tr[n] is (2[18]) 'I will make hym an helper to beare him company.' Cf. To 8[6] 'Let us make unto him an aid like unto himself' (βοηθὸν ὅμοιον αὐτῷ, exactly as LXX of Gn 2[20], RV 'a helper like unto him'). Pennant, however (Brit. Zool. 'The Hog'), uses the word 'helpmate' in this sense: 'In Minorca the ass and the hog are common helpmates, and are yoked together in order to turn up the land.'

The plu. form 'helps' occurs thrice: (1) 2 Mac 8[19] 'Moreover he recounted unto them what helps their forefathers had found' (ἀντιλήμψεις, RV 'the help given from time to time in the days of their ancestors'). (2) Ac 27[17] 'they used helps, undergirding the ship' (βοηθείαις ἐχρῶντο). Page and Walpole's note is good: 'Cables passed round the hull and tightly secured on deck to prevent the timbers from starting, especially amidships, where in ancient ships with one large mast the strain was very great. The technical English word is frapping, but the process is rarely employed now.' See Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul[2], 105, and art. SHIP. (3) 1 Co 12[28] 'And God hath set some in the church, first apostles . . . helps, governments, diversities of tongues' (TR ἀντιλήψεις, edd. ἀντιλήμψεις, AV 1611, 'helpes in governments'). See next article.

In AV 1611 and in most edd. still, the past ptcp. is 'holpen' in Ps 83[8] 86[17], Is 31[3], Dn 11[34], Lk 1[54]; RV retains the form, but Amer. RV prefers 'helped' in all but the last. The past tense is always 'helped'; and 'helped' occurs as past ptcp. in 1 Ch 5[20], 2 Ch 26[15], Ps 28[7], Is 49[8]. J. HASTINGS.

HELPS (ἀντιλήμψεις, opitulationes).—In LXX (in Pss [for several Heb. words], 1 Es, Sir, 2, 3 Mac) ἀντίλημψις implies 'succour,' as of stronger to weaker, not the 'help' of an assistant to superior, e.g. Sir 11[12] προσδεόμενος ἀ., 3 Mac ἀ. ἐξ οὐράνου, cf. Jos. BJ IV. v. 1. Similarly in papyri of the age of the Ptolemies ἀ. = βοήθεια, as in the phrase τυχεῖν ἀντιλήμψεως (cf. 2 Mac 15[7], 3 Mac 2[33]); while ἀντιλήμπτωρ is a style of the king with whom is asylum (καταφυγή, cf. 2 S 22[3]). In NT it occurs only in 1 Co 12[28], along with κυβερνήσεις, to which LXX usage attaches the meaning 'wise counsels' (תַּחְבֻּלוֹת Pr 1[5] 11[14] 24[6] [Job 37[12] Symm., Pr 20[18] Theod.]: so κυβερνᾶν, Pr 12[5], Wis 10[4] 14[6], Sus 1[6]; Hesych. paraphrases by προνοητικαὶ ἐπιστῆμαι καὶ φρονήσεις. Gloss. on Pr 1[5] ἐπιστήμη τῶν πραττομένων). The list of God-given gifts to the Church enumerates 'first apostles, second prophets, third teachers, next powers, next charisms of healings, succours, counsels, kinds of tongues'; while in the interrogative recapitulation, which follows in vv.[29. 30], 'succours' and 'counsels' fall out, probably as being less charismatic than the rest and more widely diffused among the brethren. This is confirmed by the analogous list of charismata in Ro 12[6-8], where the moral also is the same, viz. the duty of the many members to use their functional gifts for the common organic well-being. It is indeed hard to find in the latter list any single synonyms for 'succours' and 'counsels': rather they may well cover several things — the one, personal service (διακονία, cf. Phœbe as διάκονος, 16[1]), charity (ὁ μεταδιδούς) or acts of mercy (ὁ ἐλεῶν); the other, instruction (διδασκαλία) and exhortation *

* ὁ προϊστάμενος is ambiguous, as (1) Phœbe is called προστάτις πολλῶν, i.e. patroness (a patrona in relation to clientes, as it were), which probably has reference to beneficence rather than rule; (2) προστασίαι (καταπονουμένων) is a recognized equivalent for ἀ. (see Suicer, s.v.). This must be remembered even in 1 Th 5[12].

(παράκλησις). But in any case the various activities are so intermingled as to exclude special reference to any officials. We are still at the stage when functions in the ecclesia, not functionaries, are everything (cf. 1 P $4^{10.11}$). In a somewhat later list (Eph 4^{11}) it is otherwise; and we get 'shepherds and teachers' in place of 'succours and counsels.' But meantime these gifts explain and are explained by Gal $6^{1.2}$, where 'the spiritual' help their weaker brethren to recover their footing, 'bearing one another's burdens'; and by 1 Th 5^{14}, where the brethren in general are to 'put in mind the unruly, comfort the faint-hearted, uphold the weak' (ἀντέχεσθαι τῶν ἀσθενῶν, the very words by which Theophyl. defines ἀντίλημψις). From this passage we further learn that it is unsafe to refer ἀ. and κυβ. to distinct offices, even when more or less regular officials are in question. In 1 Co itself we find only one class of regular workers (16^{15-18}), members of the household of Stephanas, who have 'devoted themselves unto ministry to the saints,' and to whose wise counsels the brethren are exhorted to yield subordination. In them, we can hardly doubt, the gifts of 'succour' and 'counsel' dwelt in eminent degree; and we may infer the like of those named in 1 Th 5^{12}, where κοπιᾶν, προϊστάναι, νουθετεῖν may be coextensive with ἀ. and κυβ. Finally, Ac 20^{35} comes in to clinch these conclusions. Speaking to Ephesian elders, whom he describes as guardians of the flock (^{28}), St. Paul bids them toil (κοπιᾶν) to succour the weak (ἀντιλαμβάνεσθαι, cf. Lk 1^{54}, also συναντ. Ro 8^{26}), being mindful of their Lord's golden word. Just above he has spoken of the need of wise counsel on their part. So that, once again, we get ἀ. and κυβ. combined in an undifferentiated official class, here called 'elders.' The 'succour' in question, in keeping with linguistic usage, is that later on rendered by 'bishops' rather than 'deacons.' But so far there is no evidence of any such formal distinction, which meets us first in Ph 1^{1}—where indeed there is as yet no trace of subordination of the one class to the other (cf. their parallel position in 1 Ti 3^{1-13}, Teaching 15^{1}). In 1 Co 12^{28}, on the other hand, the 'succours' and 'counsels' not only occur on the same level, as it were, but what was later thought the humbler function actually comes first (there is nothing to suggest Meyer's 'climactic juxtaposition'). This makes the two terms most significant for primitive Christianity and its ministerial conceptions. Ἀντ., then, means 'anything that could be done for poor or weak or outcast brethren, either by rich or powerful or influential brethren or by the devotion of those who stood on no such eminence'; while κυβ. denotes guidance by 'men who by wise counsels did for the community what the steersman or pilot does for the ship' (Hort).

HELVE.—Dt 19^{5} 'As when a man goeth into the wood with his neighbour to hew wood, and his hand fetcheth a stroke with the axe to cut down the tree, and the head slippeth from the helve, and lighteth upon his neighbour, that he die; he shall flee unto one of those cities, and live.' This idiomatic tr^{n} is almost word for word from Tindale, including the word 'helve' for the handle of the axe. But that word is as old as the Wyclifite version of 1388, 'and the yrun slidith fro the helve' (the 1382 ed. has 'haft'). The word, though still in use locally, does not seem to occur in the Eng. VSS except in this place (where Dou. has 'handle,' translating directly the Vulg. manubrium), nor is it found in Shaks. or Milton. It is preserved in the proverb 'to throw the helve after the hatchet,' i.e. give up everything, as Howell, Forreine Travell, § 9, 'If shee should reduce the Spaniard to that desperate passe in the Netherlands, as to make him throw the helve after the hatchet, it would much alter the case.'

The Heb. is עֵץ 'wood' or 'tree,' the same word as has been tr^{d} 'wood' and 'tree' already in the same verse; hence RVm suggests that the axe is supposed to glance off the tree it is working on, which is probably correct. The LXX is τὸ ξύλον, 'the tree'; and the words tr^{d} 'haft' (Jg 3^{22}) and 'handle' (Ca 5^{5}) differ from this word.

HEM.—See Dress, Fringes.

HEMAM (הֵימָם).—The eponym of a Horite clan, Gn 36^{22}, called in 1 Ch 1^{39} Homam (הוֹמָם). LXX has in both passages Αἰμάν. Kittel (in SBOT, 1 Ch 1^{39}) declares in favour of the reading Hemam, which answers to the Lucianic Ἡμάν. Dillmann (on Gn 36^{22}) points out that Knobel's comparison of Hemam with Ḥumaimeh, a town south of Petra, is against the phonology.

HEMAN (הֵימָן 'faithful'). This name occurs in three connexions. One man is probably referred to. 1. 1 K 4^{31} one of the four sages whom Solomon excelled in wisdom. Ethan, being specially termed the Ezrahite, appears to be by that distinguished from the other three, sons of Mahol. 2. However, one of the titles of Ps 88 ascribes its authorship to Heman the Ezrahite. If this be reliable, he might be Ethan's brother, and Mahol father only of Calcol and Darda (Keil). It can scarcely be doubted that the Chronicler (1 Ch 2^{6}) interprets Ezrahite as Zerahite, when he makes all four sages sons of Zerah, son of Judah (so Grotius). Delitzsch maintains the identity of the Heman of 1 K 4^{31} with the author of Ps 88. He also conjectures that this Heman has dramatized his own experiences in the Book of Job, 'a Chokma-work of the Solomonic age.' 3. 1 Ch 6^{33} $15^{17.19}$ $16^{41.42}$ 25^{1-6}, 2 Ch 5^{12} 35^{15} (1 Es 1^{15} Zacharias). A Kohathite Levite, one of the three precentors of David's temple choir. There are two suspicious features in the Chronicler's account of his family: (a) He is made the grandson of the prophet Samuel (1 Ch 6^{33}). But Samuel was an Ephraimite (1 S 1^{1}). Is not this the Chronicler's characteristic explanation of Samuel's constant offering of sacrifice? (b) In 1 Ch 25^{4} Ewald and Wellhausen (W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} p. 143, n.^{1}) have shown that the last six names of Heman's 'sons' are merely the words of an anthem: '(1) I have given great (2) and lofty help (3) to him that sat in distress; (4) I have spoken (5) a superabundance of (6) prophecies.' W. R. Smith (OTJC^{2} p. 204) maintains, moreover, that the three guilds of singers did not exist until the time of Alexander the Great (Neh 11^{17} 12^{24}). If this be true, the notices of Heman in Chronicles are unhistorical. Ewald (HI iii. p. 278 n.^{2}) conjectures that the Levitical schools of music adopted the Judahites Ethan and Heman into their family. Keil, on the other hand, says that the Levites Ethan and Heman are called Ezrahites because incorporated into the Judæan family of Zerah (cf. Jg 17^{7}, 1 S 1^{1}). The title 'seer' (ḥôzeh), applied to Heman (1 Ch 25^{5}), as also to Asaph and Jeduthun, may refer merely to musical skill. Cf. the use of 'prophecy,' 1 Ch 25^{1-3}.

HEMDAN.—See Hamran.

HEMLOCK.—A word occurring in AV in two places (Hos 10^{4}, Am 6^{12}). In the former RVm has rôsh (see Gall (2) רֹאשׁ). The Heb. equivalent of the latter is לַעֲנָה laʿănâh, which is everywhere else rendered by AV wormwood. RV so renders it in this passage. Neither word refers to the poison hemlock, Conium maculatum, L., much less to the hemlock tree, Abies. G. E. Post.

HEN.—See Cock.

HEN (חֵן).—In Zec 6^{14} 'Hen the son of Zephaniah' is mentioned amongst those whose memory was to be perpetuated by the crowns laid up in the temple (so AV, RV). Wellhausen (Kl. Proph., ad loc.) substitutes for Hen the name Joshua [Josiah] found in v.^{10}, and in like manner corrects Helem of v.^{14} into Heldai of v.^{10}. The LXX does not treat the word as a proper name, reading εἰς χάριτα υἱοῦ Σοφονίου. This is followed by Ewald, Hitzig, Keil, Orelli, Marti (in Kautzsch's AT), who gives 'Freundlichkeit,' and RVm 'for the kindness of the son of Zephaniah.' J. A. Selbie.

HENA (הֲנַע 2 K 18^{34} [wanting in the parallel passage, Is 36^{19}], 19^{13} = Is 37^{13}).—According to some a city in Syria, but probably to be taken rather as a divine name. In that case it should be identified with the Arabic star name al-hanʿa; and ʿIwwâ (better ʿAwwâ), coupled with it, will be identical with the star name al-ʿawwâʾu (cf. Hommel, 'Henaʿ and 'Awwa' in Expos. Times, April 1898). F. Hommel.

HENADAD (חֲנָדָד 'favour of Hadad').—A Levite chief (Ezr 3^{9}, Neh $3^{18.\ 24}$ 10^{9}). See Genealogy.

HENNA.—See Camphire.

HEPHER (חֵפֶר, 'digging').—1. Son of Gilead the Manassite, and father of Zelophehad, Nu 26^{32} 27^{1}, Jos $17^{2f.}$ P. Patronymic, Hepherites, Nu 26^{32}. 2. One of the tribe of Judah, 1 Ch 4^{6}. 3. A Mecherathite, one of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{36}.

HEPHER (חֵפֶר).—A Canaanite royal city, named immediately before Aphek, Jos 12^{17}. The site is uncertain. The land of Hepher (אֶרֶץ ח׳) is mentioned in 1 K 4^{10} along with Socoh.

HEPHZI-BAH (חֶפְצִי־בָהּ 'she in whom is my delight.' So in Phœnician חפצבעל 'the delight of Baal'). —1. The mother of Manasseh, king of Judah (2 K 21^{1}). 2. Symbolic name of the Zion of Messianic times (Is 62^{4}).

HERALD (Aram. קָרוֹז, emphat. קָרוֹזָא; see Kautzsch, Gram. § 64, 4).—The word so translated occurs only once, in Dn 3^{4}. If = Gr. κήρυξ (but see Bevan, 107 n.) it will be one of those words in the Bk. of Daniel that prove its author to have lived 'after the dissemination of Greek influences in Asia' (Driver, LOT^{6} 502); such words are קיתרס (κίθαρις), and the names of other musical instruments, mentioned in connexion with the herald's proclamation on this occasion. No distinct mention is made in the annals of Hebrew warfare of the herald in his function of summoning conflicting parties to conference, or of demanding the submission of beleaguered places. Goliath utters his own challenge (1 S $17^{8f.}$). When Sennacherib invaded Judah, his demands were made known by the Tartan, the Rab-saris, and the Rab-shakeh, apparently prominent military and civil personages (2 K $18^{17f.}$). The official referred to in Daniel may, however, have performed such duties in Babylonian military operations, as on this occasion he is employed to make known the monarch's will at a high religious observance. Κήρυξ is applied by St. Paul to himself (1 Ti 2^{7}, 2 Ti 1^{11}) as a preacher of the divine revelation in Jesus Christ, on both occasions in conjunction with ἀπόστολος. Noah is called (2 P 2^{5}) 'a herald of righteousness.' See Preaching. G. Walker.

HERB.—See Grass.

HERCULES (Ἡρακλῆς) is mentioned by this name only in 2 Mac $4^{19.\ 20}$, where Jason, the brother of the high priest Onias III., who had secured by bribery his own appointment in the latter's place, and the head of the Hellenizing party in Jerus. (B.C. 174), sent 300 silver drachmas (about £12, 10s.) to Tyre as an offering in honour of H., the tutelary deity of that city. We know from the precedent of Alexander the Great (Quint. Curt. iv. 7) that it was customary for kings to send offerings to H. at Tyre ('quem praecipue Tyrii colerent'). The same deity is mentioned by Silius Italicus (iii. 14 ff.) as being worshipped at Gades, an old Phœn. colony. He was otherwise known as Mel-Carthus or Melek-Ḳartha = 'Lord of the city.' In a Phœn. inscription (CIS I. i. 122) he is called Adonēnu Melḳarth Baʿal Tzure = 'Our Lord Melḳarth, Baal of Tyre.' Jos. (Ant. VIII. v. 3; c. Ap. I. i. 18) also mentions H. and Astarte together, as Baal and Ashtoreth are often joined. The worship of the Tyrian Baal became widely prevalent in Israel on the marriage of Ahab with the Phœn. princess Jezebel (1 K $16^{31.\ 33}$), and in Judah during the reign of Ahaziah and the usurpation of his mother Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab (2 K 8^{27} 11^{18}).

H. was worshipped at Tyre from very early times, and his temple in that place was, according to Herod. ii. 44, as old as the city itself, 2300 years before his own time. As a personification of the sun he afforded an example of nature-worship so common among the Phœn., Egyp., and other nations of antiquity. The Greeks may have borrowed their deities from strangers, and, substituting individuals for abstract qualities or for the forces of nature, claimed for them an indigenous origin. Hercules (Ἡρακλῆς = 'renown of Hera') was with them the heroic embodiment of strength, a demi-god powerful enough to restore even the dead to life (Eur. Alcestis, 1136). The connexion between the sun and strength can be easily traced. C. H. Prichard.

HERD.—Three words in Heb. are tr^{d} 'herd.' 1. בָּקָר bâḳâr, βοῦς. This word is generic for oxen. It is not like ṣôn, applicable to two or more species. Wherever it is used, therefore, it might without loss, and with sensible advantage, be translated oxen. 2. עֶדֶר ʿêdher, βουκόλια. This word occurs once (Jl 1^{18}) in the construct state with bâḳâr, and the expression is tr^{d} 'herds of cattle.' It would have been better to translate herds of oxen. In the same verse ʿêdher ṣôn is tr^{d} 'flocks of sheep,' being prob. intended to include goats as well. See Flock, Sheep. 3. מִקְנֶה miḳneh. This word is usually rendered 'cattle.' See Cattle. In construction with bâḳâr (Gn 47^{17}) it is tr^{d} 'cattle of the herds,' AV, RVm; while RV text renders the two words by one, 'herds.' The construct expression מִקְנֵה הַבְּהֵמָה (v.^{18}) is rendered 'herds of cattle,' AV, RV.

The NT word for herd is ἀγέλη, but it is used only for swine (Mt 8^{30} etc.). G. E. Post.

HEREDITY.—The law that like begets like, and that therefore children inherit the qualities and the responsibilities of their ancestors, is not scientifically stated in the Bible, but, in so far as it is matter of common experience, it is implied.

The simplest form in which it presents itself to observation is in the case of similarity of physical and moral features. Thus it is remarked by Raguel (To 7^{2}) 'how like' Tobias is to his father Tobit. And, again, it is said of a good son, 'His father dieth, and is as though he had not died; for he hath left one behind him like himself' (Sir 30^{4}). That the father's character is often repeated in his son is too common a phenomenon to escape notice. It is said, e.g., of Abijam (1 K 15^{3}), of Nadab (1 K 15^{26}), and of Ahaziah (1 K 22^{52}), that they walked in the evil ways of their fathers; and of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22^{43}) and Amaziah (2 K 14^{3}), that they followed their fathers' good example. This does not, indeed, constitute a universal rule. Good fathers often have bad sons, as we see in the case of Eli, and bad fathers have good sons; and even where the evil taint is reproduced, it is apparent in different individuals in different degrees. But with a people so quick to discern the ties of kindred, so imbued with a sense of national solidarity as were the Hebrews, the law of heredity was expected to fulfil itself. 'Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?' (Job 14^{4}) was a question with the answer, 'Not one.' They were accustomed to trace the characteristics of a tribe or a family in the person and career of its founder. Thus Esau is the true ancestor of the wild Edomite peoples, as Jacob is of the chosen race; and the enmity between the brothers Esau and Jacob reproduces itself in the thought of Obadiah in the jealous hate of Edom for Israel.

But not only do children inherit qualities of body and mind from their fathers; they inherit, as well, responsibility. This is the perpetual burden of the Pentateuch. The sins of the fathers are visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generation (Ex 20^{5}, cf. Is 14^{21}); the divine punishments follow the family of the sinner (Lv 20^{5}). And as with sin, so with righteousness; its consequences are equally inherited, and the inheritance is more permanent than that of evil, for the LORD shows mercy unto them that fear Him 'unto a thousand generations.' Israel is beloved 'for the fathers' sake'; and the tenure of the inheritance of blessing is more lasting than the curse which follows sin.

The sense of responsibility seems, indeed, in the OT to attach itself to the family and the nation quite as much as to the individual. The sense of individuality was less felt in early ages than it is in modern life, where it has been strongly emphasized. But at the same time the ultimate responsibility of the individual to God is not overlooked in the OT. The Hebrews of the Captivity put forward as excuse for their miserable condition the sad proverb, 'The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge'; but Ezekiel (ch. 18) warns them against its misinterpretation. Men do, indeed, suffer through their fathers' sins, but the soul is ultimately responsible to God for its own sin alone. 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die' (Ezk 18^{20}). See FALL.

We here come upon the great moral difficulty, felt by the Hebrews as by us, though not so keenly, as to the reconciliation of the two principles of the transmission of qualities from father to son, and of personal responsibility. On the one hand, it may be said that 'the dead rule the living'; each man is not only an individual, but a member of a series, or rather of an organism, in which each part is dependent on and affects every other. This, if pressed without qualification, results in the doctrine of traducianism, according to which a man's soul is the product of that of his parents—a doctrine which it is difficult to state so as to save the freedom of the will. On the other hand, we must conceive of each individual as in direct personal relations of responsibility with God; he is therefore not merely the product of the past history of his race, and a factor in the evolution of its future, but a fresh beginning with a soul which is, in part, a new creation (creationism). J. H. BERNARD.

HEREAFTER.—Where the witches (in Shaks. Macbeth, I. iii. 50) cry

> 'All hail, Macbeth, that shall be king hereafter,' they clearly mean 'at some time to come.' This is the present meaning of the word, and it is found a few times in AV, esp. Jn 13^{7}, Rev 1^{19} 4^{1} 9^{12}, where the Gr. is μετὰ ταῦτα, 'after these things.' But where (in the same play, I. iv. 38) Duncan says,

> 'We will establish our estate upon
> Our eldest, Malcolm; whom we name hereafter
> The prince of Cumberland,'

he as clearly means 'from this time forward,' 'henceforth.' This is the most frequent meaning of the word in AV, and it demands attention because the mod. meaning of the word is apt to make one miss the sense of the passage. In Mk 11^{14} 'No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever' (μηκέτι, RV 'henceforth') there is no danger of mistake; but in Mk 26^{64} 'Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven,' it is not evident from the English version that the meaning is 'from now,' 'henceforth' (ἀπ' ἄρτι, RV 'Henceforth'). But that is the meaning also in Jn 1^{51} 'Hereafter ye shall see the heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of man' (where, however, edd. omit ἀπ' ἄρτι of TR, whence RV 'Ye shall see,' etc.); and in Lk 22^{69} 'Hereafter shall the Son of man sit on the right hand of the power of God' (ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν, RV 'henceforth'), and even in Jn 14^{30} 'Hereafter I will not talk much with you' (οὐκ ἔτι, edd. οὐκέτι, RV 'no more'). In 1 Ti 1^{16} 'for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting' (πρὸς ὑποτύπωσιν τῶν μελλόντων πιστεύειν), and in the OT passages (Is 41^{23}, Ezk 20^{39}, Dn $2^{29.45}$), the meaning is more indefinite, 'at any time after this' (observe that the לְאָחוֹר of Is 41^{23} is in 42^{23} tr^{d} 'for the time to come'). In Gal 6^{17} the Wyclifite version of 1388 is 'And heraftir no man be hevy to me,' while the version of 1380 gives 'Fro hennis forth no man be hevy to me.'

Hereafter is one of a number of so-called pronoun-adverbs, of which 'here' is the first part, always with the meaning of 'this.' The others found in AV are—Hereby. In the Eng. language even of the beginning of the 17th cent. 'hereby' had sometimes a local meaning, as in Shaks. As You Like It, IV. i. 9—

> 'Where is the bush
> That we must stand and play the murderer in?
> Hereby, upon the edge of yonder coppice.'

But in AV it is always instrumental, 'by this means,' as 1 Jn 2^{3} 'And hereby do we know that we do know him, if we keep his commandments' (ἐν τούτῳ, a very common expression in this Epistle, and generally tr^{d} 'hereby').

Herein, lit. 'in this'; in NT always instrumental and always the tr^{n} of ἐν τούτῳ; in OT it occurs Gn 34^{22} 'Only herein will the men consent unto us for to dwell with us . . . if every male among us be circumcised' (בְּזֹאת, RV 'on this condition'); and 2 Ch 16^{9} 'Herein thou hast done foolishly' (עַל-זֹאת).

Hereof. Observe 1 Mac 16^{22} 'Hereof when he heard, he was sore astonished' (καὶ ἀκούσας, RV 'And when he heard'); Mt 9^{26} 'And the fame hereof went abroad into all that land' (ἡ φήμη αὕτη, AVm and RVm 'this fame'); He 5^{3} 'And by reason hereof he ought, as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins' (TR διὰ ταύτην, edd. δι' αὐτήν, RV 'by reason thereof'). Cf. T. Fuller, Holy Warre, iii. 5, p. 117, 'But hereof hereafter.'

Heretofore = hitherto, as tr^{n} of תְּמוֹל שִׁלְשֹׁם (Ex 4^{10} $5^{7.8.14}$, Jos 3^{4}, Ru 2^{11}), or אֶתְמוֹל שִׁלְשֹׁם (1 S 4^{7}), lit. 'yesterday three days,' a primitive method of referring to past time. See TIME. In NT, 2 Co 13^{2} 'I write to them which heretofore have sinned' (τοῖς προημαρτηκόσιν).

Hereunto: Ec 2^{25} 'For who else can eat, or who else can hasten hereunto, more than I?' (חוּשׁ, RV 'have enjoyment,' RVm 'hasten thereto'; LXX πίεται; Vulg. 'deliciis affluet'; Gen. 'colde haste to outward things' (taking חוּץ so), with marg. note to 'outward things,' meaning to pleasures); 1 P 2^{21} 'For even hereunto were ye called' (εἰς τοῦτο).

Herewith, only Ezk 16^{29}, Mal 3^{10}, both as tr^{n} of בְּזֹאת 'with this.' RV adds Lv 16^{3} (same Heb., AV 'thus'). J. HASTINGS.

HERES (הַרְחֶרֶס).—1. A mountain named along with Aijalon and Shaalbim as one of the localities from which the Danites failed to expel the Amorites, Jg $1^{34f.}$. As the word ḥereṣ = shemesh, 'the sun,' it is very probable* that the Heres here referred to may be Beth-shemesh (1 K 4^{9}, 2 Ch 28^{18}) or Ir-shemesh (Jos 19^{41}), on the boundary between Judah and Dan. This is the modern 'Ain Shems to the S. of Wady Zurar, opposite Zur'ah (Zoar). The LXX (A) has ἐν τῷ ὄρει τοῦ Μυρσινῶνος, which implies a reading, הַרְהֲרֶם = 'mountain of the myrtle grove.'

LITERATURE.—Robinson, BRP ii. 224f.; Guérin, Judée, ii. 18–22; Moore on Jg 1^{35}; Oxf. Heb. Lex. and Siegfried-Stade, s. חֶרֶס.

2. In Jg 8^{13} (RV) 'the ascent of Heres' (מַעֲלֵה הֶחָרֶס) is mentioned as the spot from which Gideon returned after the defeat of Zebah and Zalmunna. Both the topography and the text of the narrative are doubtful. RV has the support of LXX A, ἀπὸ ἀναβάσεως Ἀρες. B reads ἀπὸ ἐπάνωθεν [τῆς παρατάξεως] † Ἄρες. Aq. and Symm. read הֶהָרִים 'the mountains,' and this is adopted by Siegfried-Stade. AV takes ḥereṣ as an appellative and tr. 'before the sun was up'; Targ. Rashi 'before the sun set.' Both these last renderings are pronounced by Moore to be impossible (see his note).

The same word ḥereṣ appears in the proper name Timnath-heres (wh. see), Jg 2^{9}; but by an intentional metathesis, to avoid anything that savoured of idolatry, Timnath-ḥereṣ = 'portion of the sun,' appears to have been changed into Timnath-serah, Jos 19^{50} 24^{30}.

For עִיר הַהֶרֶס of Is 19^{18} see IR-HA-HERES.

HERESH (חָרֵשׁ).—A Levite, 1 Ch 9^{15}. See GENEALOGY.

HERESY (αἵρεσις, hæresis, secta; in LXX only for 'free choice,' cf. βούλησις, Hesych.).—Αἵρ. in the common sense of 'heresy' never occurs in NT. Here its dominant meaning is 'sect' or 'party' (τὸ αἱρεῖσθαι τὸ ἴδιον καὶ τούτῳ ἑξακολουθεῖν, Ath. Quæst. 38 de Parab.). In later classical usage it is the usual word for a philosophic school or sect, as selected by its adherents (see Diog. Laert. i. 19 f., etc., e.g. αἵρ. λέγομεν τὴν λόγῳ τινι ἀκολουθοῦσαν); in Philo it often stands for προαίρεσις = religio; and in NT its use is of a religious party (as in Jos.), with a more or less deprecatory suggestion, as of the self-willed or sectarian spirit. So always in Ac, whether of the Sad. (5^{17}), the Phar. (15^{5} 26^{5} κατὰ τὴν ἀκριβεστάτην αἵρ. τῆς ἡμετέρας θρησκείας ἔζησα Φ.), or the Christians, as seen from outside (24^{5} πρωτοστάτην τῆς τῶν Ναζωραίων αἱρ.; 24^{14} κατὰ τὴν ὁδὸν ἣν λέγουσιν αἵρ.—an excellent instance; 28^{22}, the Christian sect πανταχοῦ ἀντιλέγεται). In the Pauline Epistles the like clearly prevails. In Gal 5^{20} it occurs in a list of ἔργα τῆς σαρκός, as a manifestation of the unchastened self-assertive or egoistic principle (cf. 1 Co $3^{3.4}$); its immediate neighbours bring 'caballings' (ἐριθεῖαι) and divisions (διχοστασίαι), while itself denotes partisanship (cf. Ro 16^{17}). This was a special vice of the Greek temper; so that we are not surprised to find St. Paul saying in 1 Co 11^{19} that αἱρ. are part of God's providential discipline whereby sterling characters may be brought to light. This principle is given as the ground of his own attitude to the news that dissensions or 'schisms' (σχίσματα) exist in the Christian body at Corinth. It is probable, then, that αἱρ. are here practically synonymous with σχ., the latter term being fixed by the context to practical negations of sympathy and fellowship, especially as between rich and poor (taking outward effect at the Feast of Love itself). Coteries were formed, and the corporate unity vanished (αἱρ. ἐνταῦθα οὐ ταύτας λέγει τὰς δογμάτων ἀλλὰ τὰς τῶν σχ., Chrys. Hom. ad loc.; so Theodoret, Theophyl. etc., ap. Suicer. To a later mode of thought belongs Aug.'s definition, hæresis autem schisma inveteratum). So far we have no reason to connect αἵρ. (or even σχίσματα, pace 1 Co 1^{10}, where alienation in sentiment, arising out of intellectual contentions (ἔριδες) of secondary import, is in question, cf. 12^{25}, Jn 7^{43} 9^{16} 10^{19}) with serious doctrinal divergences in the Church, but rather with breaches in the harmony of love. It means a factious division, or the spirit that underlies it. And this is probably the shade of meaning attaching to the adjective αἱρετικός, 'factious,' or self-willed, in Tit 3^{10} (cf. Ro 16^{17}). A twofold development, however, is found in the use in 2 P 2^{1}, where αἱρ. ἀπωλείας are spoken of as being illicitly introduced. Here the qualifying gen. (='leading to ruin,' cf. Ph 3^{19}) and the verb alike suggest the new sense of falsely chosen or erroneous tenets. Already the emphasis is moving from persons and their temper to mental products,—from the sphere of sympathetic love to that of objective truth. But one change more remains to be made ere the biblical use passes wholly into the patristic and ecclesiastical. For the nature of the erroneous doctrine is here directly immoral (cf. Jude ^{4}); and so αἵρ. preserves part of the ethical connotation which is essential to its NT usage. The earliest case of its meaning pure theological error is also its earliest occurrence outside the NT, viz. Ign. ad Trall. 6, ἀλλοτρίας δὲ βοτάνης (=Docetism) ἀπέχεσθε, ἥτις ἐστὶν αἱρεσις, cf. ad Eph. 6. And in proportion as the conception of 'faith,' and the standard for testing it, became intellectual, the original sense of αἵρ., as a light and irresponsible exercise of native egoism in defiance of the claims of love, receded into the background (cf. Tert. De præsc. hær. 6, 'Quarum opera sunt adulteræ doctrinæ, hæreses dictæ Græca voce ex interpretatione electionis, qua quis sive ad instituendas sive ad suscipiendas eas utitur'). Finally, neither σχ. nor αἵρ. in the NT ever denotes a party that has withdrawn from the religious communion amid which it arose. In Judaism the coexistence of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes was not deprecated. In the more intimate unity of each Christian ecclesia 'rents' or 'factions' were felt to impair directly the vital functions of the local body in its κοινωνία of love, and so assumed a moral significance. Separate Christian communions, and the applicability to them of the terms σχ. and αἱρ., were problems of the future.

HERETH (חֶרֶת).—A forest (יַעַר) which was one of the hiding-places of David, 1 S 22^{5}. The LXX, reading עִיר instead of יַעַר, has ἐν πόλει Σαρείκ (B) . . . Ἀριαθ (A). The reference may be to the wooded mountain E. of Adullam, where the village of Kharâs now stands. See SWP vol. iii. sh. xxi.

except in 1 P 5[3] 'the charge allotted to you' for AV 'God's heritage,'* Gr. οἱ κλῆροι) as a synonym for 'inheritance,' which has now displaced it except in biblical language and Scots law. See HEIR, INHERITANCE.

HERMAS (Ἑρμᾶς), one of those saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16[14]. The name is common amongst slaves (although not quite so much as Hermes). It was in its origin an abbreviated form of various names such as Hermagoras, Hermodorus, Hermogenes. He is commemorated in the Roman Calendar on May 9. According to the Menologium Basilianum, Nov. 4, he became Bishop of Philippopolis in Thrace.

The name Hermas is also well known as that of the author, or at any rate the professed author, of the Pastor or Shepherd, a well-known allegorical work, belonging to an early period of Christian literature, which for a time made some claims to be inserted in the NEW TESTAMENT CANON (which see). This book need only be referred to here, because from time to time its author has been identified with the Hermes mentioned in Ro 16[14]. Origen, in his commentary on this passage, writes: 'I think that this Hermas is the author of the book called the Pastor, which appears to me a very useful writing (scriptum is not technical), and, I think, divinely inspired.' Origen's statement is a pure conjecture, based apparently only on the identity of name. His opinion was followed by others, but was never widespread, as the book became less and less popular; in later times it has been held by Cotelier, Cave, Pearson, and others. There is little to be said for it. The name was about as common as John is with us, and gives no clue at all; the date of the book may be doubtful, but its tone is certainly not that of the 1st cent.; the author never claims in any way to be a contemporary of the apostles, and very definite historical evidence places him a little before the middle of the 2nd cent. This is not the place to pursue the subject further, but for the benefit of those unacquainted with the book it may be stated that it consists of a series of Visions, Parables or Similitudes, and Mandates or Commands, conveying for the most part moral teaching, and has been called —not perhaps very happily—the Pilgrim's Progress of the Early Church. A further account may be found in Dict. Chr. Biog., and a text and translation in Lightfoot's Apostolic Fathers.

A. C. HEADLAM.

HERMES (Ἑρμῆς).—The name of a Christian, quoted with some others in Ro 16[14]. It is one of the commonest of all slave names. The Greek Menaea and Menologium make him Bishop of Salona in Dalmatia, and one of the Seventy disciples. He was commemorated April 8.

A. C. HEADLAM.

HERMOGENES (Ἑρμογένης) is mentioned by St. Paul (2 Ti 1[15]) as having, along with Phygelus and others in Asia, and in contrast to Onesiphorus, been ashamed of his chain. It is impossible now to say what form the denial took, or what led to it. Most likely it was caused by fear lest friendship with the imprisoned apostle might involve him in the same fate. Early traditions, of no historical value, however, associated him with magicians. Nothing is known of H. except what is stated by St. Paul, that he was of those in Asia who turned away. It is not easy to decide what is meant by those 'in Asia.' It has been variously held to mean, all Asiatics then in Rome, the Ephesians who had accompanied St. Paul to Rome, public opinion in Asia Minor, and the Asiatic sentiment in Rome. See PHYGELUS.

W. MUIR.

HERMON (חֶרְמוֹן, 'sacred [mountain]'; cf. Sab. מחרם 'temple,' Arab. ḥaram, 'sacred enclosure,' and ḥormah, 'asylum').—The great outlier of Anti-lebanon, at the springs of Jordan. See PALESTINE. It was called Sirion by the Zidonians, and Senir by the Amorites (Dt 3[9]). The first of these names is used poetically in Ps 29[6]. Senir occurs also in Ezk 27[5], Ca 4[8], 1 Ch 5[23]. Perhaps it may be inferred from the latter two passages (where it is used along with Hermon) that Senir originally denoted a particular part of the mountain-range (so Driver, Buhl, etc.). The name appears in the cuneiform texts as Sanîru (Schrader, KAT[2] 159 [COT[2] 146]), and the Anti-lebanon N. of Damascus between Baalbek and Emesa is still called Sanîr by the Arabs. Sayce (RP[2] vi. 41, HCM 341) traces a knowledge of the name Senir also to the Egyptians. In Dt 4[48] another name, Sion (שִׂיאֹן), is given to Hermon. It is held by some that Sion is here a textual error for Sirion (שִׂרְיֹן, the reading of Syr.), but this is doubtful (see Driver, ad loc.). 'Mount Hermon' (הַר חֶרְמוֹן) is used in Dt 3[8], Jos 11[17] 12[1. 5] 13[5. 11], 1 Ch 5[23], 'Hermon' alone in Jos 11[3], Ps 89[12] 133[3], Ca 4[8]. The circumstance that the mountain has three peaks accounts for the plur. form חֶרְמֹנִים 'the Hermons' (RV; not 'the Hermonites,' AV) in Ps 42[6].

Hermon was held by Hivites (Jos 11[3]); it was the northern limit of conquest (12[1. 5] 13[5. 11]). Its sacred character appears from Ps 89[12] (where it is coupled with Tabor), and from the name Mount Baal-hermon (Jg 3[3]), 'the mountain of the Baal of Hermon.' Cf. 1 Ch 5[23]. The dew of Hermon is noted as falling on Zion (Ps 133[3]), and its wild character is noticed in Ca 4[8]. The fir trees of Senir are mentioned in Ezk 27[5].

Mount Hermon is the most conspicuous feature in the scenery of Palestine, rising 9200 ft. above the Mediterranean in a dome-like summit, usually covered with snow till late in summer. There are three low peaks on the top, with a connecting plateau. Lower down, the sides are covered with vineyards round the Druze villages. On the sandstones to the west there are still pines and firs, but the upper part is quite barren, and covered with snow-worn gravel between the cliffs. This mountain is the only place where the Syrian bear is known to exist. The view from the top is magnificent, including the Lebanon and the plain round Damascus. Towards the west Tyre and Carmel are seen, on the south the mountains of Upper Galilee and the plains of Lower Galilee. The Hûleh lake and the Sea of Galilee lie beneath as on a map. This view is, however, obscured in summer by the sudden formation of clouds on the summit.

Hermon was perhaps the 'high mountain' of Mt 17[1], Mk 9[2] ('the mountain' of Lk 9[28]) near Cæsarea Philippi, which was the scene of the Transfiguration and of the cloud which covered the disciples. In the Roman period it was a sacred centre, and small temples were built on the slopes on every side, while the highest point was encircled with a masonry wall, and seems to have supported an altar. Close by is a rock-cut chamber on the plateau. In the 4th cent. A.D. (see Onomast. s. 'Aermon') there was still a temple at which the people of Paneas and Lebanon worshipped, on the summit of Hermon. In the 10th cent. it became the centre of the Druze religion, and to it Sheikh ed-Derâzi, the founder of the latter creed, retired from Egypt. At Hasbeya, on its western slopes, the sacred books of the sect were found by the French in 1860. Hermon is called Jebel esh-Sheikh, or 'mountain of the chief,' for this reason, being the residence of the religious Sheikh of the Druzes. The translation sometimes suggested, 'chief of mountains,' is grammatically impossible. Hermon was visited by the present writer in 1873 (when the height and geographical position were determined) and in 1882.

* In Job 31[2], on the other hand, 'heritage' of RV takes the place of 'inheritance' in AV; the Heb. is the usual word נַחֲלָה.

i. INDEX OF HEROD FAMILY.—In this index every member of the family mentioned in Josephus is recorded. The numbers refer to the genealogical table. The names that occur in NT are printed in clarendon capitals.

AGRIPPA I. (49), son of Aristobulus, grandson of Herod, king of Judæa; m. Cypros, dtr. of Phasael. Ant. XVIII. v. 4, XIX. ix. 1; BJ II. xi. 6; Ac 12.

AGRIPPA II. (66), son of Agrippa I. Ant. XVIII. v. 4, XIX. ix. 1; BJ II. xi. 6; Ac 25. 26.

Agrippa (64), son of Aristobulus and Salome. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Agrippa (73), son of Felix and Drusilla. Ant. XX. vii. 2.

Agrippinos (78), dtr. of Mariamne, dtr. of Agrippa I. and Demetrius. Ant. XX. vii. 3.

Alexander (23), son of Herod by Mariamne I.; m. Glaphyra, dtr. of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia; put to death by his father in B.C. 7. Ant. XVIII. v. 4, XVI. i. 2, XVI. xi. 6.

Alexander (42), son of Phasael and Salampsio. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Alexander (51), son of Alexander, grandson of Herod. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Alexander (80), son of Tigranes (61). Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Alexandra (43), dtr. of Phasael and Salampsio. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Alexas (19), 3rd husband of Salome, Herod's sister. Ant. XVII. i. 1.

Alexis Selcias (54), son of Alexas (19); it is not stated whether by Salome or not. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Antipas or Antipater (1), governor of Idumæa, grandfather of Herod. Ant. XIV. i. 3.

ANTIPAS (27), son of Herod and Malthace; tetrarch of Galilee, m. (1) dtr. of Aretas, (2) Herodias. BJ I. XXVIII. 4; Ant. XVII. i. 3, XVIII. v. 4; Mt 14[1-6], Mk 6[14] 13[31] 23[7-15], Lk 3[1. 19] 8[7. 9].

Antipater (2), minister of Hyrcanus, father of Herod. Ant. XIV. i. 3, XIV. vii. 3.

Antipater (21), eldest son of Herod by Doris; m. a daughter of Antigonus, the last of the Hasmonæans; put to death by his father B.C. 4. BJ I. XXVIII. 4; Ant. XIV. xii. 1, XVII. v. 2.

Antipater (36), son of Salome, Herod's sister; m. Cypros, dtr. of Herod and Mariamne. His father's name is not mentioned. Ant. XVII. ix. 5, XVIII. v. 4.

Antipater (40), son of Phasael and Salampsio. There seems to be some confusion between this Antipater and the son of Salome (36). Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

ARCHELAUS (28), son of Herod by Malthace, ethnarch of Judæa; m. (1) Mariamne, (2) Glaphyra, his brother Alexander's widow. Ant. XVII. i. 3; Mt 2[22].

Archelaus (76), son of Chelcias, 1st husband of Mariamne, dtr. of Agrippa. Ant. XIX. ix. 1.

Aristobulus (22), son of Herod by Mariamne I.; m. Bernice, dtr. of Salome and Costobar; put to death by Herod B.C. 7. Ant. XVI. i. 2, XVII. i. 2, XVIII. v. 4.

ARISTOBULUS (47), son of Aristobulus (22), grandson of Herod; m. Jotape, dtr. of Sampsigeramus, king of Emesa. Ant. XVIII. v. 4. See under ARISTOBULUS for the supposed ref. to him Ro 16[10].

Aristobulus (57), son of Herod of Chalcis, great-grandson of Herod, king of Armenia Minor; m. Salome, dtr. of Herodias. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Aristobulus (65), son of Aristobulus (57) and Salome. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Azizus (71), king of Emesa, husband of Drusilla. Ant. XX. vii. 1.

Bernice (37), dtr. of Salome and Costobar; m. Aristobulus, son of Mariamne I., mother of Agrippa I. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

BERNICE (68), dtr. of Agrippa I.; m. (1) Herod of Chalcis, (2) Polemon of Cilicia; favourite of Titus. Ant. XVIII. v. 4, XIX. ix. 1; BJ II. xi. 6; Ant. XX. vii. 3; Ac 25[13. 23] 26[30].

Bernice (79), dtr. of Mariamne (69) and Archelaus (76). Ant. XX. vii. 1.

Bernicianus (58), son of Herod of Chalcis and Bernice. Ant. XX. v. 2.

Cleopatra (14), a woman of Jerusalem, wife of Herod, mother of Philip the tetrarch. BJ I. XXVIII. 4; Ant. XVII. i. 3.

Costobar (18), governor of Idumæa, 2nd husband of Salome, Herod's sister, whom she divorced. Ant. XV. vii. 9.

Cypros (3), an Arabian of noble family, wife of Antipater, mother of Herod. Ant. XIV. vii. 3.

Cypros (25), dtr. of Herod by Mariamne I.; m. Antipater (36), son of Salome. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Cypros (45), dtr. of Phasael, wife of Agrippa I., mother of Agrippa II. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Cypros (53), dtr. of Cypros (25) and Antipater (36), granddaughter of Herod; m. Alexas Selcias. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Cypros (62), dtr. of Cypros (53) and Alexas. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Demetrius (77), Alabarch of Alexandria, 2nd husband of Mariamne, dtr. of Agrippa. Ant. XX. vii. 3.

iv. ORIGIN OF THE DYNASTY OF THE HERODS.

—The dynasty of the Herods rose into prominence during the confusion which resulted from the decay of the Hasmonæan dynasty, the transference of Syria and Palestine to the sway of the Romans, and the civil wars which marked the decay of the Republic. Their ancestor was Antipater or Antipas, a man of wealth and capacity whom Alexander Jannæus had made governor of Idumæa. So much is clear, but of the origin of the family there are very contradictory accounts. Nicolaus of Damascus said, according to Josephus (Ant. XIV. i. 3), that he was of the stock of the Jews who first came back from Babylon. This appears to have been a fiction invented for the benefit of Herod. Josephus evidently looked upon him as an Idumæan; as such he was considered half a Jew. But Pharisaic and perhaps Christian hatred was not satisfied with this. He is stated by Justin to have been a native of Ashkelon (Dial. c. 52), and therefore of the hated Philistine race; while Julius Africanus (ap. Eus. HE I. vii. 11) improves the story by telling us that some Idumæan robbers had attacked Ashkelon and carried away the father of Antipater, who was the son of one of the temple slaves; the priest of the temple was not able to ransom him, and so he was brought up as an Idumæan; this story Africanus had from the kinsmen of the Saviour. Whatever was the origin of the family, its ability is undoubted. Antipater's son, who bore the same name as himself, first appears in history on the death of Alexandra, the Maccabæan queen, in 69. Her eldest son, Hyrcanus II., a man of a peaceful and quiet disposition, allowed himself to be set aside by his younger brother, Aristobulus II., a man of very different character. Antipater, who had been building up for himself a strong position in Idumæa by allying himself with the Arabs at Petra and the Philistine cities, saw his opportunity; under Aristobulus he would be nobody, under Hyrcanus he would rule the country. He attached himself to Hyrcanus, persuaded him not to submit to his younger brother, and, so far as we know, remained absolutely faithful to him the whole of his life, quite content to have the reality of power, and too wise or too loyal to endanger his position by arousing dynastic hatred. At first he attempted to restore Hyrcanus with the assistance of Aretas, king of the Nabatæan Arabs, —(his wife Cypros belonged to one of the noblest families of that country),—but before the war was concluded a new power appeared on the scene. In 66 Pompey had defeated Mithridates, and was now pursuing his first march through Asia. On his approach all the rival parties of every state and country attempted to gain him to their side. Aristobulus, Antipater on behalf of Hyrcanus, and the Pharisaic party who wished to restore the theocracy, rivalled one another in bribes, complaints, and promises. Pompey was, as always, deliberate, and it soon became apparent that Aristobulus was too proud to submit, too faithless to be an ally, and too powerless to restrain the people from rebellion. When the Romans approached Jerusalem, the party of Hyrcanus delivered the city over without a blow; the war party with Aristobulus retired to the temple fortress. A siege followed, in which the defenders exhibited the fanatical courage which the Jews always have shown when their cause is hopeless, and observed the law so strictly that they refused to destroy their enemies' works on the Sabbath day. The city was taken by assault in the autumn of 63, about the fast of the Atonement, and the priests continued to offer the sacrifices in the midst of the battle and were cut down at the altar. Pompey violated the Holy of Holies, but did not plunder the wealth of the temple. Aristobulus and his family were carried captive, and the priest-king of the Jews had to adorn a Roman triumph. The kingdom was reduced in size, the Greek towns were freed, but the hierarchy was untouched. Hyrcanus was made high priest without the title of king, and Antipater became the most important person in the country. This was the first instance in which Antipater showed the marvellous power his family possessed of securing the support of every successive Roman of distinction. Historians generally ascribe it to their capacity for bribing, and this they undoubtedly possessed. Moreover, they had the wisdom to know that bribes must be large. But that was not enough. They were distinguished by being always faithful to the Romans, always competent, and always agreeable. To attach themselves to each successive Roman who became powerful, to spare nothing in his support, and to add to the services they had rendered an agreeable private friendship, was the secret of their success.

The next twenty years gave many proofs of this. Antipater helped Scaurus in an expedition against Aretas, and persuaded Aretas to submit. He made the acquaintance and even the friendship of Mark Antony. He assisted Gabinius in a war with Archelaus with corn and weapons and money, and Gabinius settled the affairs of Jerusalem as Antipater wished (Ant. XIV. vi. 4). When Cæsar was in Egypt after the battle of Pharsalia, Antipater saved him when he was in great danger. Cæsar, in return for this and many other services, confirmed Hyrcanus in the high priesthood, and made Antipater a Roman citizen. Afterwards he made Hyrcanus ethnarch, Antipater procurator, and allowed the walls of Jerusalem to be rebuilt, while he conferred privileges on the Jewish race everywhere. When Cassius, after the death of Cæsar, came to Syria to collect money and show how hateful the cause of the Republic could be, Antipater and his sons had the wisdom to provide him with all he required, thus saving their cities from slavery. Antipater was murdered in the year B.C. 43 by a certain Malichos. 'He was distinguished,' says Josephus, 'for piety and justice and love of his country.' His eldest son Phasael had been made governor of Jerusalem, his second son Herod governor of Galilee. The latter had already shown the energy and the brilliant military capacity for which he was afterwards distinguished. When Antony came to Syria after the battle of Philippi, Herod exhibited all the address of his father by securing his friendship; he and his brother were made tetrarchs, and many members of the Pharisaic party, who persisted in bringing accusations against them, were put to death.

During all these twenty years of Antipater's rule, the younger branch of the Hasmonæan family, Aristobulus and his sons, had persisted in disturbing the country. They had clearly a considerable body of supporters, and it seems almost as if the Romans had allowed them to exist in order to prevent the country from becoming too strong. In the year 40 a Parthian invasion gave Antigonus, the last survivor of the family, his opportunity. He succeeded in getting possession of the persons of Hyrcanus and Phasael; the former he mutilated, the latter put himself to death; Herod only just escaped with his female relations to the fortress of Masada, and Antigonus had a troubled reign of three years. But Herod was not to be daunted; he fled to Rome, explained how Antigonus had allied himself with the Parthians, and much to his own surprise—for he had only hoped that the younger Aristobulus, his own brother-in-law, might become ruler—was made king of Judæa by Antony, Octavius, and the senate. It took him, however, three years to win the kingdom that had been given him, and it was only in the autumn of 37 that he succeeded in taking Jerusalem, and brought the Hasmonæan dynasty to an end.

v. REIGN OF HEROD THE GREAT, B.C. 37–4.—'C'était, en somme, une fort belle bête, un lion à qui on ne tient compte que de sa large encolure, et de son épaisse crinière, sans lui demander le sens moral.' So writes Renan; yet the character of Herod is not so easy to sum up, for to be a successful tyrant a certain minimum of morality is required, and that Herod, at any rate until the end of his life, possessed. Nor can we be certain of our information. His reign was a deliberate violation of all the religious instincts of the people, and the friends of the Hasmonæans and the Pharisees were equally interested in putting the worst construction on his acts. Josephus himself prided himself on his priestly family and connexions, yet he is not altogether unfair; much of his information came from Nicolaus of Damascus, who had written an apologetic account of his royal patron, and he suggests that many of the crimes of Herod were the necessity of his position. Physically, Herod was magnificent in his beauty and strength, and these qualities were not more conspicuous than his skill in war. He was clever, able, but unscrupulous and ambitious. He was munificent to his friends, capable of being magnanimous even to his enemies, e.g. to Shemaia, but absolutely unscrupulous when necessity seemed to demand it. How far he attempted to gain the kingdom we cannot say: when he received it he accepted the position without hesitation, and allowed nothing to check his ambition. Yet he was a good ruler up to a certain point, and knew well how to manage the Jews. He suppressed insurrection with absolute severity, yet he never indulged in religious persecution. He was munificent to the people: when famine came, he stripped his palace of gold and silver to buy corn. Whatever his feelings towards the Jews, he was always a good friend to them, and used his influence with Augustus to obtain privileges for them in various parts of the world. Although he was probably absolutely irreligious, he respected the Jewish religion so far as to demand that Sylläus, the Arabian, who wished to marry Herod's sister, Salome, should adopt the Jewish customs (Ant. XVI. vii. 6), refrain from any images or statues in the buildings he put up within Jewish territory, and put no effigy on his coins. He had the strong lusts and passions of an Oriental; the position of a tyrant and usurper surrounded him with plots, suspicions, and intrigues. As he grew older his cruelty and suspiciousness increased, and the misery of his old age seemed to be a judgment on the crimes of his life. There has been some discussion whether he deserved the title of Great. The fact that his life and works left no permanent results, that his house was built on the sand, may make us hesitate to give it him. But, taken in his person and in his career, he was one of the most conspicuous and interesting figures of his time. If he was not great, he had almost all the qualities which might have made him so.

The reign of Herod is divided by most historians into three periods. The first from 37–25, the period during which he consolidated his power. The second from 25–13, the period of his greatest prosperity. The third from 13 to his death B.C. 4, the period of family feuds.

(1) Consolidation of Herod's power, 37–25.—When Herod and the Romans captured the city, he did his best to restrain the butchery of the people and the plunder of the temple, and his vengeance on his enemies was possibly not greater than the necessities of the position demanded. He obtained from Antony the death of Antigonus, put to death forty-five of the principal men of his party, and replenished his coffers from their property; but Pollio and Sameas (Abtalion and Shemaia), the two leading Pharisees, he treated with great respect, and seems to have succeeded in making all but the most extreme section of the party acquiesce in his rule, as a judgment of God which had to be borne.

Shortly before the siege of Jerusalem, Herod had married Mariamne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus, to whom he was violently attached. He had hoped by this alliance with the old dynasty to strengthen his position, but he only succeeded in introducing dissension into his own family. Mariamne and her mother, Alexandra, who seems to have been a violent and unscrupulous woman, treated Herod's sister, Salome, and his mother, Cypros, with the most absolute contempt as low-born foreigners. Salome retaliated by raising Herod's jealousy, and accusing Alexandra and her family of disloyalty and conspiracy. As far as Alexandra is concerned the accusations were undoubtedly true, in other cases they were more doubtful. At any rate, first Aristobulus, the younger brother of Mariamne, who had been made high priest, and whose only crime was that he was too popular, was put to death; then the aged Hyrcanus, who had returned from Babylon at Herod's invitation, and had always been absolutely subservient to his Idumæan subjects; then Mariamne, his wife, of whom he was passionately fond, and whose death caused him infinite misery; last of all, Alexandra herself, the cause of all the misery, who during Herod's illness began secretly to rebel against him, and during all this time had been engaged in constant intrigues. The last victims to Herod's suspicions and severity were Costobar, governor of Idumæa, for a time Salome's husband, and some other mysterious persons, the sons of Babas, who seem to have been adherents of the Hasmonæan party. By the year 25 every possible rival had been removed; Salome's spite had been gratified; and Herod's position had been secured by the sacrifice of his passion or affection.

During the same time he was employed in consolidating his position with the Romans. He retained the friendship of Antony in spite of the opposition of Cleopatra, who wished to be queen of Jerusalem. Like Augustus, he had the wisdom to resist the temptation of her charms, and he also refrained from putting her to death. He fitted up a force in order to assist Antony at Actium, but had the good fortune to be employed at the time in an expedition against the Arabs. As soon as the victory of Augustus was certain, he went at once to him in accordance with the traditions of his family; he said frankly that he had been a good friend to Antony, and had done everything to help him, and he promised to be an equally good friend to him. Augustus accepted his friendship, and confirmed him in his kingdom. Herod on every opportunity was as good as his word. He rendered Augustus very material assistance, received various extensions to his kingdom, and the friendship of Augustus, Agrippa, and Herod became proverbial. From this time Herod's position was assured.

(2) Period of Herod's prosperity, B.C. 25–13.—Herod was now able to govern as he wished. He was rich, prosperous, and secure, and he devoted himself to the Hellenizing of his countrymen and the gratification of his taste for magnificence in building. In B.C. 25 he celebrated at Jerusalem the quinquennial games in honour of Augustus, and built there a theatre, amphitheatre, and a hippodrome. Throughout Palestine a number of new cities were founded, the most important of which was Cæsarea on the seacoast. Here and in other Greek cities he built temples to Augustus. He turned Samaria, which he renamed Sebaste, into a magnificent city; nor did he confine his buildings to his own dominions, his benefits reached as far as Rhodes and Athens. But his greatest work was the reconstruction of the temple. This he began in the year B.C. 20. The more sacred portions were completed in eight years; the building was not finished until the year A.D. 63, a few years before its final destruction. It was only a partially completed building in the time of our Lord, and existed only eight years after it was finally finished. To the other works must be added palaces, fortresses, parks, and pleasure grounds; and to the other signs of Hellenizing tendency, the Greek writers and teachers whom Herod attracted to his court, the principal of whom was Nicolaus of Damascus, his secretary and biographer.

(3) Period of domestic troubles, B.C. 13–4.—It is probable that we are inclined to exaggerate the troubles of Herod's last years, or rather to look at them from the point of view of the last three or four years of his life. Herod was considered a second Solomon, as the great Jewish king, and the rebuilder of the temple; he was, like him, also as a polygamist. The Jews were allowed more than one wife, but it was hardly the fashion at this time to take advantage of the licence to any great extent. Herod had ten altogether—nine at one time. He had eight sons and six daughters. The family troubles arose through the dissensions between the sons of Mariamne, the Hasmonæan, on the one side, Salome his sister and Antipater his eldest son on the other. Alexander and Aristobulus had been brought up at Rome; when they returned, their beauty, their popular qualities, and their legitimate descent attracted the attention of the people, and they became the centre for numerous intrigues and an object which fanaticism could put before itself. We need not follow the course of the intrigues. They nearly involved Herod in difficulties with the Roman government. They led Augustus to say that it was better to be Herod's pig than his son. Eventually, the two sons of Mariamne were strangled at Samaria (B.C. 7), and Antipater, after being imprisoned for some time, was executed, as the last act of his father's life, for a too premature act of self-assertion. Meanwhile, Herod was afflicted with a painful and loathsome disease. Fanaticism began to break out. The pupils of the Rabbis, Judas son of Sariphæus and Matthias son of Margaloth, were incited to destroy the symbol of idolatry, the golden eagle which adorned the gable of the temple, and the leaders were burnt alive. Herod's cruelty increased with his sufferings. He is said to have assembled all the leading people of Jerusalem in the hippodrome, that on his death they might be put to death, and there might be real grief at his funeral. He died five days after he had caused Antipater to be put to death, after great sufferings.

(4) Herod and the murder of the Innocents.—Herod comes into connexion with the gospel narrative, in two ways. Both St. Matthew (2^1) and St. Luke (2^1) agree in stating that it was during his reign our Lord was born. There is no reason to doubt that statement, only it has become quite clear that it could not also be during a taxing under Quirinius (see CHRONOLOGY OF NT, i. 404 f.). St. Matthew also gives us an account of the visit of the wise men, of their interview with Herod, and of the subsequent murder of the infants under two years old at Bethlehem. We have no other account of the event, which could not have been conspicuous in Herod's life; and all that it is necessary to say is that it was exactly consistent with his character, especially during the later years of his life. Reference is especially made to Ant. XVI. xi. 7, XVII. ii. 4—events which can have nothing to do with the massacre at Bethlehem, but show conclusively the temper of the king. Macrobius (5th cent.) says, Augustus, cum audisset inter pueros quos in Syria Herodes, rex Judæorum, intra bimatum jussit interfici filium quoque eius occisum, ait: Melius est Herodis porcum esse quam filium (Macrob. Saturn. ii. 4), a statement which is so confused as to be quite valueless.

vi. The SUCCESSORS OF HEROD.—Herod had made three wills. By the first he nominated Antipater his successor; if he died before his father, Herod, son of the second Mariamne (see HEROD, below), was to succeed; by the second, Antipas was declared his successor; by the third, Archelaus was to be king, and Antipas and Philip were to have tetrarchies. After suppressing some disturbances on his father's death, Archelaus went to Rome to claim his inheritance, to the same place went Antipas to attempt to obtain what had been left him under the second will, and a little later came Philip, not for his own sake, but to support the claims of Archelaus. Other deputations came asking to be freed from the rule of the Herods altogether. While Augustus delayed to give his decision, disturbances broke out throughout all Palestine, which were with difficulty suppressed. Ultimately, Augustus practically confirmed Herod's will. Archelaus was to govern Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa, but only with the title of ethnarch, not of king; Antipas, Galilee and Peræa; Philip, Trachonitis and Ituræa. When Archelaus came home he removed the high priest Joazar, son of Boethius, who had taken part in the rebellion. There can be little doubt that this expedition of Archelaus to obtain the kingdom suggested the parable in Lk 19^{11} etc. of the nobleman who went to a far country to receive a kingdom.

(1) ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαος) was the elder of the two sons of Herod by Malthace, a Samaritan woman (Ant. XVII. i. 3). He was brought up at Rome with his own brother Antipas, at a private house. He had been accused by Antipater of disloyalty, and so had been at first kept out of any inheritance. His visit to Rome has been narrated above. After he had acquired the kingdom, there is little related of him. He outraged Jewish sentiment by marrying Glaphyra, widow of his brother Alexander, although she had had children by him, and had another husband (Juba of Mauritania) living, and his own wife was alive. He built a palace at Jericho, and a village in his own honour of the name of Archelais. He was the worst of all Herod's sons that survived, and, after nine years of his rule, the people of Judæa and Samaria could no longer endure his cruelty and tyranny. They complained to Augustus, who summoned Archelaus to Rome, and, after hearing the case, banished him to Vienne. From this time to the year A.D. 41 Palestine was under Roman procurators.

Archelaus is mentioned once in the NT, in Mt 2^{22}.

(2) ANTIPAS or HEROD ANTIPAS (Ἀντίπας), called in NT 'Herod the tetrarch.' He was the son of Herod by Malthace, and in the second of his father's wills had been designated sole heir. Ultimately, he received only Galilee and Peræa, a district which brought him in a yearly revenue of 200 talents. The two portions were divided from one another by the confederation of Greek cities called Decapolis. He seems to have had the ability to govern his country, a decidedly difficult one, and, like his father, he was distinguished for his love of building. He built as his capital Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee.

His first wife was a daughter of Aretas, king of the Nabatæans, but once on a visit to Rome he visited the house of his brother Herod (Philip), son of the younger Mariamne. This Herod had married Herodias, his niece, daughter of Aristobulus, and had by her a daughter, Salome. With Herodias Antipas fell violently in love, and determined to divorce his wife and marry her. This the daughter of Aretas became aware of, and fled to her father for protection.

About this time the territory of Antipas was the scene of the preaching of John the Baptist and of our Lord. It is needless to repeat the story which is told us in the Gospels of John the Baptist, of Herodias, of John's rebuke, imprisonment, and ultimate death (Mt $14^{1ff.}$, Mk $6^{14ff.}$, Lk 3^{19}). According to Josephus, the reason Herod gave for imprisoning him was the fear that he might create a revolt or disturbance among the people. The execution took place at the fortress of Machærus, beyond the Jordan (Ant. XVIII. v. 2).

We have more than one reference to Antipas during our Lord's ministry, apart from his relations to John the Baptist. When he heard of the fame of Jesus, his conscience smote him, and he was frightened, thinking that John the Baptist had risen from the dead (Mt 14^{1}, Mk 6^{14}, Lk 9^{7}). Jesus therefore went to Bethsaida Julias in the territory of Philip. Later, apparently when going through Peræa (Lk 13^{31}), a rumour is spread that Antipas desires to kill Him, and Jesus speaks of him as 'that fox,' alluding to his well-known character for craft. He wanted to drive out of his country a teacher who might cause some disturbance, and yet to be free from the guilt of condemning a second prophet (Lk 13^{31}). At that time, according to St. Mark (8^{15}), He had condemned the leaven of Herod. St. Luke (23^{7-15}) relates also an examination of our Lord before Antipas (who had wished to see Him for some time); the result of this was the reconciliation of Pilate and Herod. This was presumably only an informal examination, and not part of the regular trial. It is referred to again in Ac 4^{27}, and is prominent in the Gospel of Peter. It may be noticed that St. Luke appears to have had special means of information about the Herod dynasty, and that his information is apparently accurate. He does not, like St. Mark, incorrectly call Antipas king (Lk 8^{3}, Ac 13^{1}).

The marriage with Herodias was the cause of Antipas' fall. First a war broke out between him and Aretas (A.D. 36), although nine years later apparently than the flight of Herod's first wife. Antipas suffered a severe defeat, which some considered, according to Josephus, to be a punishment for what he had done to John the Baptist (Ant. XVIII. v. 2). Again later, Herodias persuaded her husband to go to Jerusalem and demand the title of king from Caius, being jealous of what the latter had done for Agrippa. The result of the application was that Agrippa brought charges against him which caused his banishment (Ant. VIII. vii. 2). His place of banishment was Lugdunum in Gaul (Ant. XVIII. vii. 2), but Spain, according to BJ II. ix. 6, was the place where Antipas died. It has been suggested that this was Lugdunum Convenarum at the foot of the Pyrenees, and not the better-known place of that name. (See Smith's DB[1] I. ii. 1347).

(3) PHILIP (Φίλιππος) was the son of Herod the Great by Cleopatra, a woman of Jerusalem (Ant. XVII. i. 3). He had been educated at Rome, like the remainder of Herod's sons. The territory to which he succeeded on the death of his father and by the decision of Augustus (see above), consisted, according to Josephus, of Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, Gaulanitis, and Paneas (Ant. XVII. viii. 1, xi. 4, XVIII. iv. 6; BJ II. vi. 3), according to St. Luke (3^{1}) the country of Ituræa and Trachonitis, Φιλίππου δὲ . . . τετραρχοῦντος τῆς Ἰτουραίας καὶ Τραχωνίτιδος χώρας. (On the meaning of this passage see ITURÆA). Speaking generally, it implied the district to the N. and E. of the Sea of Galilee. Its revenues were computed at 100 talents, and his title was that of tetrarch. He ruled for 38 years from his accession in B.C. 4 until his death in A.D. 34, without any startling event and without reproach. He was distinguished from the other sons of Herod by the absence of ambition, of cruelty, and of lust. He was only once married, to Salome the daughter of Herodias, and had no children. His character is summed up by Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 6. 'He was moderate and peaceful in his rule, and spent his whole life in his country. He went out with only a small retinue, always taking with him the throne on which he might sit and judge. Whenever he met any one who had need of him, he made no delay, but set down the throne wherever he might be and heard the case.'

His name is chiefly remembered by the city of CÆSAREA PHILIPPI, which he founded on the site of Paneas at the head waters of the Jordan. It was called Cæsarea in honour of the emperor, and received the name of Philippi to distinguish it from the more important city on the seacoast. He also rebuilt BETHSAIDA, situated on the left bank of the Jordan where it flows into the Lake of Gennesareth, and called it Julias. It was to this city, in all probability, that our Lord retired to escape the attention of Herod Antipas (Lk 9^{10}). He also showed his loyalty to the emperors by placing the busts of Augustus and Tiberius on his coins, a course which was possible mainly owing to the non-Jewish character of the population.

On his death his territory was joined to the province of Syria, but its taxes were collected separately. Caligula immediately on his accession gave it to Agrippa.

(4) HEROD, called PHILIP, was the son of Herod by Mariamne, daughter of Simon the high priest. Her father was a priest, of too low class to be allied with him, but too important to be despised. Herod was wise enough not to use his authority to her detriment, but did not scruple to make her father high priest (Ant. XV. ix. 3). Herod had been named in his father's first will, but, owing to the treachery of his mother, was left out in subsequent wills (BJ I. XXX. 7), and lived and died a private person, apparently in Rome (Ant. XVIII. v. 1). His claim to distinction is that he was the first husband of Herodias. Apparently, he also bore the name of Philip (Mt 14^{3}, Mk 6^{17}).

In Mk 6^{17} all MSS read τὴν γυναῖκα Φιλίππου τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ αὐτοῦ. In Mt 14^{3} Φιλίππου is omitted by D, the Vulgate, and some Old Latin MSS. In Lk 3^{19} it is omitted by ℵ B D, the Vulg., Old Latin, and was probably not part of the original text.

The discrepancy may be explained either (1) by assuming that Philip was the other name of Herod. This is all the more probable, as in the passage of Josephus (Ant. XVIII. v. 4) Herod Antipas is also called simply Herod. Against this is the fact that St. Luke, who generally has by far the most accurate information concerning the Herods, does not give the name; (2) by supposing that there is a confusion between the first husband and the son-in-law of Herodias, for her daughter Salome married Philip the tetrarch.

(5) AGRIPPA I. was born about the year 10 B.C., being 54 years old at the time of his death in A.D. 44 (Ant. XIX. viii. 2). He was the son of Aristobulus, son of Herod the Great by Mariamne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus. His mother was Bernice, daughter of Salome, Herod's sister, and of Costobar (Ant. XVIII. v. 4). Not long after his birth his father was put to death by Herod, and he himself with his mother sent to Rome, where he was brought up. His mother was a friend of Antonia, widow of the elder Drusus, and he himself enjoyed the friendship of the younger Drusus. This imperial friendship appears to have been of doubtful advantage. He was magnanimous, reckless, and extravagant, spent large sums in bribing the imperial freedmen, got hopelessly into debt, and, on the death of Drusus, lost the imperial favour. He had to leave Rome, and during the next fourteen years of his life was subject to many strange vicissitudes. At one time he had even meditated suicide. When Tiberius died (March 16, A.D. 37) he was in prison, but the accession of Caligula, which he had looked forward to so indiscreetly as to lose his liberty, at length brought the change of his fortunes. The new emperor immediately gave him the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias, the title of king, and a golden chain equal in weight to the iron chain with which he had been bound (Ant. XVIII. vi. 10), while the senate added the honorary title of prefect. In 38 he visited his new possessions, but in 39 he was back in Rome. He was responsible for the banishment of Herod Antipas in 39, and received his tetrarchy in addition to the other two. More creditable to him was the wisdom and boldness with which he persuaded Caius not to erect a statue of himself in the temple at Jerusalem. The death of Caligula (41) and the accession of Claudius gave him an opportunity of winning the goodwill of the latter; and he received Judæa and Samaria in addition to his other possessions, and ruled therefore over all the territory of his grandfather.

It is from this date that his three years of actual rule began. Its leading feature, and one which harmonizes with the narrative in the Acts, was his friendliness to the Jews and his regard for Jewish customs. He began his reign by offering all the fitting sacrifices in the temple, omitting nothing that the law enjoined; by paying the cost of many who wished to fulfil their Nazirite vows; and by dedicating in the temple the golden chain which he had received from Caius. His determination to uphold the privileges of his people was speedily shown. Some young men in the town of Dora had erected a statue of the emperor in the Jewish synagogue in that place. This angered Agrippa, for it meant the overthrow of the laws of the country, and he used his influence to persuade Petronius the governor of Syria to interfere, which he did, not only ordering the removal of the statue, but punishing those who had erected it. For his loyalty to Judaism both Josephus (Ant. XIX. vii. 3) and the Pharisees (Schürer, I. i. p. 444) are loud in his praise. His conduct is contrasted with that of Herod the Great, who showed all his benevolence towards the Gentile cities. He constantly lived in Jerusalem, and preferred it. He kept the laws of his country in purity. He lived a life of the strictest holiness, and allowed no day to pass without offering the sacrifice. So the Mishna tells us how he in person used to offer the first-fruits; and a story is told that at the Feast of Tabernacles, as he read the words, Dt 17^{15} 'Thou mayest not set a stranger over thee which is not thy brother,' he burst into tears. And the people cried out, 'Be not disturbed—thou art our brother! thou art our brother!' He also used his political influence—which was considerable—to spread Judaism. When he betrothed his daughter Drusilla to Epiphanes, son of Antiochus, king of Commagene, he made him undertake to be circumcised.

Quite in accordance with this character is the narrative in Ac 12. He began a persecution of the Church. He slew James the brother of John with the sword, and, finding that this was pleasing to the Jews, proceeded to take Peter also. These events happened during the Passover. Another side of his Judaizing policy is shown by the attempts which he made—both frustrated by the interference of the governor of Syria, Marsus—to strengthen his kingdom. He enlarged the walls of Jerusalem, and while at Tiberias received no less than five vassal princes—Antiochus of Commagene, Sampsigeramus of Emesa, Cotys of Armenia Minor, Polemon of Pontus, and Herod of Chalcis, his own brother. That he was foolish enough to meditate any treason is improbable; he was too fond of peace, and knew too well what was the power of Rome; if he had any object beyond that of increasing his own magnificence, it was probably the extension of Jewish influence among them.

Of his death, which happened in A.D. 44, after the beginning of the month Nisan (see CHRONOLOGY, vol. i. p. 416), we have two independent accounts. According to Josephus (Ant. XIX. viii. 2), during the third year of his reign over all Judæa he came to Cæsarea. There he presided at games in honour of Cæsar, surrounded by all the leading men of the province. On the second day he put on a robe of silver of wonderful make. When the first rays of the sun struck it, it produced a wonderful effect. Immediately there were cries addressing him as a god, 'Be propitious; if up to now we feared thee as a man, henceforth we confess that thou art more than mortal.' The king did not rebuke them. Shortly afterwards, looking up, he saw an owl sitting over his head on a cord. He knew that the bird, which had formerly been a messenger of good, was now a messenger of evil, ἄγγελόν τε τοῦτον εὐθὺς ἐνόησεν κακῶν εἶναι, τὸν καί ποτε τῶν ἀγαθῶν γενόμενον. He was immediately seized with severe pains, and died after five days. The allusion to the owl is to an omen which had portended his good fortune when he was a prisoner in Rome (Ant. XVIII. vi. 7).

According to the Acts, Herod, after the release of Peter, i.e. after the Passover, went down to Cæsarea. He was angry with the people of Tyre and Sidon, and a deputation from them came before him asking for peace. Herod, on a day arranged, put on his royal robe, and sitting on his throne made an address to them. The people cried, It is the voice of a god, and not of a man. And immediately an angel of the Lord struck him, because he gave not God the glory; and he was eaten of worms, and died.

It is quite clear that there is a substantial agreement between these passages as to the main incident, but a difference which is quite incompatible with any literary obligation on the part of the author of the Acts.

Agrippa had married Cypros, daughter of Phasael, who was son of Phasael, Herod's brother. Her mother was Salampsio, daughter of Herod by Mariamne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus. He had two sons, AGRIPPA (see below) and Drusus, who died young, and three daughters, BERNICE, Mariamne, and DRUSILLA.

(6) AGRIPPA II., or, as he describes himself on coins, Marcus Julius Agrippa, was the son of Agrippa I. and Cypros. He was only 17 years old at the death of his father in 44, and Claudius was persuaded not to give him his father's kingdom owing to his youth. Agrippa then arrived at Rome, and used his influence on behalf of the Jews (Ant. XX. vi. 3). On the death of his uncle, Herod of Chalcis, he received the tetrarchy of the latter and the oversight of the temple (Ant. XX. v. 2; BJ II. xii.). In the year 53 he gave up Chalcis and received the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias. Later, Nero added various cities in Galilee and Peræa (Ant. XX. vii. 1, viii. 4). Of his relations to his sister Bernice the worst reports were current. Like all the Herods, he tried to combine Judaism and Hellenism. He improved his capital city, Cæsarea Philippi, and called it Neronias; he adorned Berytus with many statues and buildings; his coins bore effigies of the emperors. But Rabbinical tradition records his interest in Jewish questions; he attempted to extend Judaism among the surrounding kings, and under him the temple was finished (Ant. XX. ix. 6).

In Ac 25. 26 we have an account of the speech of St. Paul before Agrippa, Bernice, and Festus. St. Paul's compliment, that Agrippa was 'expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews,' was well deserved, and the somewhat enigmatic 'Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian' may be interpreted according to our conception of Agrippa's character.

Agrippa did what he could to check the growing storm (BJ II. xv. 1), and during all the war was on the side of the Romans. He took part in the festivities which succeeded the victory (BJ VII. ii. 1), and received a considerable increase of territory. Of his later life we only know that Josephus corresponded with him and received from him information for his history (Jos. Vita, 65). He died about the year 100 A.D., the last of the Herods.

vii. WOMEN OF THE FAMILY.—(1) HERODIAS (Ἡρωδιάς, WH Ἡρῳδιάς) was daughter of Aristobulus, son of Herod by Mariamne, daughter of Hyrcanus. Her mother was Bernice, daughter of Salome, Herod's sister. She was thus sister of Herod of Chalcis, of Agrippa I., and of the younger Aristobulus (Ant. XVIII. v. 4). According to Josephus, she married first of all Herod, son of Herod the Great by Mariamne, daughter of Simon the high priest, and by him had a daughter of the name of SALOME. According to Ac 6^{17}, and probably Mt 14^{3}, her first husband's name was PHILIP (wh. see). Prompted apparently by ambition, she left him and married his brother Antipas. It was this marriage that drew upon them the rebuke of John the Baptist, and caused the tragedy that followed (Mt 14^{3-11}, Mk 6^{14-18}); and it was Herodias' ambition which caused Antipas his final ruin. 'She said life was unbearable for them if Agrippa, who came to her husband in such extreme poverty, now returned a king, while he himself, the son of a king, was contented with a private life' (Ant. XVIII. vii. 1). Her pride made her faithful to her husband in misfortune. Josephus represents her as saying to Caius, when he told her that it was only her brother who prevented her from sharing the calamity of her husband, 'You indeed, O emperor! say this in a magnificent manner, and as becomes you; but the love which I have for my husband hinders me from partaking of the favour of your gift; for it is not right that I, who have been a partner in his prosperity, should forsake him in his misfortunes.'

(2) SALOME was the name of the daughter of Herod (Philip) and Herodias who danced before Herod Antipas as mentioned Mt 14^{3-6} and Mk 6^{17-22} (but cf. reading of WH in v.^{22}). She married (1) Herod Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis, by whom she had no children, and (2) Aristobulus, son of Herod of Chalcis, by whom she had three children—Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus (Ant. XVIII. v. 4).

(3) BERNICE or BERENICE (Βερνίκη) was the eldest daughter of Agrippa I. She was born about the year 28, being 16 years old at the time of her father's death in 44 (Ant. XIX. ix. 1). She was betrothed first to Marcus, son of Alexander the alabarch, but seems never to have been married to him (Ant. XIX. v. 1, but there is some doubt as to the reading); then about the year 41, being then 13 years old, she was married by her father to her uncle Herod, for whom he obtained from Claudius the kingdom of Chalcis. By him she had two sons, Bernicianus and Hyrcanus (BJ II. xi. 6). Herod of Chalcis died in 48. Bernice then lived at her brother's house, and the worst rumours were afloat concerning their relationship—rumours which reached as far as Rome (cf. Juv. Sat. vi. 156–160: '. . . adamas notissimus et Beronices in digito factus pretiosior; hunc dedit olim Barbarus incestæ, dedit hunc Agrippa sorori, observant ubi festa mero pede sabbata reges, et vetus indulget senibus clementia porcis. . . .'). In order to allay these suspicions she induced Polemon, king of Cilicia, who was attracted by her wealth, to be circumcised and to marry her. But she soon left him, δι' ἀκολασίαν Josephus tells us, and returned to her brother (Ant. XX. vii. 3). About the year 58 we find her with Agrippa visiting Festus to greet him on his appointment, and so, like her younger and equally notorious sister, Drusilla, listening to St. Paul. It may be noticed that great emphasis is laid on her presence. She was one who could always attract attention to herself (Ac $25^{13.\ 23}$ 26^{30}). The next that we hear of her is in the spring of 66. She was in Jerusalem performing a Nazirite vow. Horrified by the massacre which Florus had ordered, she attempted to stop it, first sending her attendants to Florus, ultimately appearing herself (so it was said) barefooted before him. The only result seems to have been that the soldiers murdered their victims before her face and attempted to kill her. But, after her palace was burnt by the Jewish populace, she became an ardent supporter of the Roman cause and the Flavian dynasty (BJ II. xv. 1, xvii. 6). Already in 68 there seem to have been intimate relations between her and Titus (Tac. Hist. ii. 2); in 75 she came to Rome with her brother, and the intimacy was renewed. She lived in the Palatine with him, behaved as his wife (πάντα ἤδη ὡς καὶ γυνὴ αὐτοῦ οὖσα ἐποίει, Dio Cass. lxvi. 15), and was said to have been promised marriage (insignem reginæ Bernices amorem cui etiam nuptias pollicitus ferebatur, Suet. Tit. 7). But the unpopularity of the connexion persuaded Titus that he must give her up, and when she returned to Rome after the death of Vespasian he took no notice of her ('Berenicen statim ab urbe dimisit invitus invitam,' Suet. loc. cit.; Dio Cass. lxvi. 18; and Au. Vict. Epit. 10); but even her fidelity to her royal lover was not free from suspicion, and a reputed paramour was murdered by the orders of Titus. After this period she vanishes from history. The only other memorial of her is an inscription found at Athens (CIG 361; C. I. Att. III. i. 556)—

Ἡ βουλὴ ἡ ἐξ Ἀρείου πάγου καὶ ἡ βουλὴ τῶν χ' καὶ ὁ δῆμος Ἰουλίαν Βερενείκην βασίλισσαν μεγάλην, Ἰουλίου Ἀγρίππα βασιλέως θυγατέρα καὶ μεγάλων βασιλέων εὐεργετῶν τῆς πόλεως ἔκγονον. . . .

A simple narrative of Bernice's life is really more eloquent than any comment. She was the last member of the family who played any prominent part in history.

(4) DRUSILLA (Δρουσίλλα) was the youngest of the three daughters of Agrippa I. She was born about the year 38, being 6 years old at the time of her father's death, in 44 (Ant. XIX. ix. 1); but she had already been betrothed by her father to Epiphanes, son of Antiochus, king of Commagene. He, however, refused to fulfil his promise to be circumcised, and the marriage never took place. Her brother at the completion of the 12th year of Claudius (53) received from the emperor the northern part of Palestine, and then gave Drusilla, now about 14 years old, in marriage to Azizus, king of Emesa, who was willing to be circumcised. The marriage was neither happy nor of long continuance. Felix, procurator of Palestine, a freedman who had the distinction of being the husband of three queens (Suet. Claudius, 28), was so overcome by her beauty that he attempted to gain her for his wife. He sent, to effect this purpose, a man of the name of Simon, a Cyprian by birth, who had the reputation of being a 'magician.' She, unhappy in her marriage and wishing to escape her sister Bernice's jealousy, deserted her husband and transgressed the Jewish law so far as to consent to marry a Gentile. This marriage cannot have taken place earlier than 53 or later than 54, for in the first year of Nero (54–55) Azizus died, and we are particularly told that she left her husband. Drusilla had one son by Felix, called Agrippa, who perished in an eruption of Mt. Vesuvius in the reign of Titus, it is added σὺν τῇ γυναικί, which is interpreted by some to refer to his mother, by others to a wife of his own.

In Ac 24^{24} we are told how Felix with Drusilla his own wife (τῇ ἰδίᾳ γυναικί, RV), a Jewess, heard St. Paul speak of faith in Christ, and how, when he spake of righteousness, and self-restraint, and judgment to come, Felix trembled.

viii. CHARACTER OF THE HEROD DYNASTY.—In conclusion, it will be convenient to sum up some characteristics of the dynasty of the Herods.

(1) In the first place, we may take them as typical representatives of the Reges Socii under the empire. Of no other of the provinces have we the same detailed information as of the Jews in Josephus, and we are able to see the system of what we should call 'Protected states' at work. The kings and other rulers were absolutely dependent on the imperial power; they had no right of making war, their wills were only valid when confirmed by the emperor; they were expected to provide auxiliary troops when necessary. How clearly the Herods realized the limitations of their power is shown by the skilful manner in which they conciliated the Romans. Within their own territory they were supreme, but even here they were liable to accusations from their subjects. The value of the system in governing Orientals, whose character was so difficult for Romans to understand, may be realized by the contrast afforded to the government of the procurators. If Agrippa had lived there would perhaps have been no Jewish war.

(2) In relation to Judaism the first and most obvious characteristic of their rule is the Hellenizing influence that it represented. However distasteful to a large number of the people, however alien to their religious spirit, there is no doubt that the influence was considerable. It produced the inevitable reaction which was one of the causes of the final war, but it modified the ideas of those even who resented it. For Judaism to play its part in the world, it was necessary for it to have some contact with the spirit of Hellenism; and that the Herods gave it.

(3) The peculiar character and influence of Antipater and his descendants undoubtedly made Judaism a much more conspicuous factor in the Græco-Roman world than it would have been otherwise. We know how Cæsar recognized the Jews as one of the three divisions of people; we know how from him they obtained recognition of their privileges in a marked way, and this was to a considerable extent due to the Herods. Moreover, the social influence of the Herods seems to have been a considerable factor in extending Judaism among the other kings of the East.

(4) And how far were the Herodian monarchy and aspirations a natural product of Judaism? They were not absolutely inconsistent with its history, they were in keeping with its higher aspirations. From the days of Solomon temporal sovereignty had always been a dream of many of the people. It achieved its most prominent success in Herod, and the very success made the religious conscience of the people reject it. Ultimately, Christianity and Rabbinism became the two real products of Jewish history. 'The leaven of Herod' was felt to be unsound.

LITERATURE.—Our authorities may practically be reduced to two. Josephus has narrated to us the history of the whole Herod family with great fulness, and to supplement him we have only isolated references in other writings. A history from Rabbinical sources is given by Derenbourg, Essai sur l'histoire et la géographie de la Palestine. Modern authorities may practically be confined to Schürer, Geschichte des Jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christ (there is an English translation), who gives full references to all authorities ancient and modern. The best monographs are by Keim, in Schenkel's Bibel-lexicon. Accounts of the Herods are given by Stanley and Milman, and there is a popular work by Farrar. The articles in Smith's DB by Westcott are good.

A. C. HEADLAM.

HERODIANS (Ἡρωδιανοί, WH -ρῳδ-).—The Herodians are mentioned twice in the Gospels (Mk 3^6 in Galilee; Mt 22^{16} = Mk 12^{13} in Jerus.), along with the Pharisees, as adversaries of Jesus. Some of the later Church Fathers (e.g. Tertullian) regarded them as a religious party, who held Herod to be the Messiah; but this is altogether improbable. They were apparently a political party, most probably the adherents of the dynasty of Herod. At the death of Herod (B.C. 4), his kingdom was divided among his sons, Idumæa, Judæa, and Samaritis being allotted to Archelaus. When Archelaus was deposed (A.D. 6 or 7), a Roman procurator was put in his place, and thenceforward Judæa continued under procurators, with the exception of a brief interval, during which Herod Agrippa I. united under his sway all the dominions of his grandfather. It was doubtless the constant desire of the family of Herod to restore the kingdom of their father; and the Herodians would seem to have been the party of those who favoured their pretensions. They were neither the adherents, in particular, of Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, nor exactly the friends of Rome; but those among the Jews who, in more or less veiled opposition to the Roman procuratorship, as well as to the idea of a pure theocracy, desired the restoration of the national kingdom under one or other of the sons of Herod. Their alliance with the Pharisees in opposition to our Lord was not due to religious or political sympathy, but to the recognition by both parties that Jesus was their greatest common foe. The question regarding the tribute paid to Cæsar (Mt 22^{17}, Mk 12^{14}) was skilfully calculated to draw from Him an answer that would either lead to His being accused of sedition against Rome (Lk 20^{20}), or discredit Him among the people. In order to get rid of Jesus, the Pharisees, who combined even with the Sadducees, would not scruple to enter into a temporary alliance with the Herodians, however much they were opposed to their religious and political sentiments. (See Keim, Jesus of Nazara, iii. 157 ff., and in Schenkel's Bibellex. iii. 65 ff.)

D. EATON.

HERODIAS.—See HEROD, pp. 353, 360[b].

HERODION (Ἡρωδίων, WH -ρῳδ-).—A Christian mentioned Ro 16^{11}, apparently a Jew (συγγενής), and perhaps a freedman of the Herods. See ARISTOBULUS, vol. i. p. 148[a].

HERON (אֲנָפָה 'ănâphâh, χαραδριός, charadrion).—This word designates an unclean bird (Lv 11^{19}, Dt 14^{18}), not otherwise mentioned in the Bible, but sufficiently well known to be taken as a type of a class. The LXX rendering simply means a swamp bird. The fact of the occurrence of this name immediately after חֲסִידָה stork, and followed by the expression 'after her kind,' gives the only clue we have to the bird intended. Of the birds suggested by various authorities, as the eagle, parrot, and swallow, none would go in a group with the stork. The heron, on the other hand, belongs to the same group, and, unlike the stork, of which only one species is found in the Holy Land, has no fewer than six species of the genus Ardea alone. The most common of these is A. cinerea, L., the Grey Heron (Arab. dŭnkeleh and ghŭrnûk). Less common is A. purpurea, L., the Purple Heron; A. alba, L., the White Egret; A. garzetta, L., the Lesser Egret; A. bubulcus, Audouin, the Buff-backed Heron or White Ibis (Arab. Abu-Bekr); A. ralloides, Scop., the Squacco Heron. There are also three other genera 'after their kind,' Ardetta minuta, L., the Little Bittern; Nycticorax griseus, L., the Night Heron; and Botaurus stellaris, L., the Bittern. In the absence of a better we may retain the rendering of EV 'heron.' RVm (Lv 11^{19}) gives 'ibis.'

G. E. POST.

HESHBON (חֶשְׁבּוֹן, LXX Ἐσεβών, Ἐσβών, Jos 21^{39} B) ('device' or 'reckoning'; note play on the word in Jer 48^2 'in H. they have devised . . .').—The chief city of Sihon king of the Amorites, captured by the Israelites on their way to the Jordan. The defeat of Sihon is related Nu $21^{21\text{-}26}$ (E), Dt $2^{24\text{-}37}$, referred to briefly Dt 1^4 3^6 4^{46} 29^7, Jos 9^{10} $12^{2.5}$ $13^{21.27}$, Neh 9^{22}, more fully in Jephthah's message to the king of the Ammonites, Jg $11^{19\text{-}22}$. In these passages Sihon is spoken of as 'king of' or 'dwelling in' Heshbon. In the distribution of the land H. is assigned to Reuben by Moses, Nu $32^{3.27}$ (E), and Joshua, Jos $13^{10.17.21}$. The inheritance of Gad extended from H. to Ramath-mizpeh, Jos 13^{26} (P); and in the list of Levitical cities (Jos 21^{39} (P), 1 Ch 6^{31}) H. is reckoned as belonging to Gad.

In the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah (Is 15^4 $16^{8.9}$, Jer $48^{2.34.45}$ 49^3) H. and cities in its neighbourhood are mentioned as cities of Moab. For these passages, and the reference to H. in the song quoted Nu $21^{27f.}$, see MOAB and SIHON. The Jews are again in possession of H. in the time of Alexander Jannæus (Jos. Ant. XIII. xv. 4, where H. is described as in the country of Moab), and the surrounding district is called in Herod's time Essebonitis (Ant. XV. viii. 5) and Sebonitis (BJ II. xviii. 1). Whether in the account of places taken by Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac $5^{26.36}$, Jos. Ant. XII. viii. 3) H. is mentioned, is doubtful [see notes on passage in 1 Mac (Camb. Bible for Schools) and the various readings in Niese's Josephus].

In the Onomasticon H. (Ἐσβοῦς) is described as 'urbs insignis' in the mountains, 20 miles (Roman) from the Jordan. The name occurs as the seat of a bishopric in the acts of the Council of Chalcedon. St. Sylvia of Aquitania describes Esebon as visible from Mt. Nebo, which is confi med by modern travellers, and adds that it is now called Exebon —an interesting piece of evidence as to the pronunciation of the name in her time (Palestine Pilgrims Text Society, vol. i. 28). In the life of Saladin in the same series (vol. xiii. p. 97) occurs the modern name Hesbān, and Abulfeda mentions it as inhabited (Geography, Arabic text, edited by Schiers, p. 129, and translated by Lestrange, Pal. under the Moslems, p. 456). The site is now covered with extensive ruins, chiefly Roman, and by the side of the plateau on which these are situated runs a stream issuing from a cave, at which the tribes in the neighbourhood obtain water for themselves and their cattle. From the stream a steep winding mountain-path leads upwards to the city, and at the top of the ascent passes through a sort of passage cut through the rocks, about 3 or 4 yards wide. Buhl (Palästina, p. 123) remarks that in a branch of Wâdy Hesbān, N.W. of the city, are traces of ancient pools and conduits. It requires some imagination on the part of travellers to identify the one large ruined reservoir noted by them with 'the pools of Heshbon by the gate of Bath-rabbim' (Ca 7^4); but the position of the stream outside the present ruins, and the descriptions given above, fully illustrate the passage. Further information may be obtained from Reland's Palestina, containing reff. to Talmud, Ptolemy, Pliny, etc.; Conder, Heth and Moab, p. 125 ff.; PEFSt, 1882, 1888.

A. T. CHAPMAN.

HESHMON (חֶשְׁמוֹן).—An unknown town in the extreme south of Judah, Jos 15^{27}.

ḤETH (letter).—See CHETH.

HETH (חֵת, etym. and meaning unknown).—According to J (Gn 10^{15} = 1 Ch 1^{13}), a son of Canaan. P (mistakenly, as Budde, Stade, Ed. Meyer, etc., think) locates Bĕnê-Heth at Mamre in the time of Abraham, who purchased from Ephron the Hittite the cave of Machpelah, Gn $23^{3ff.}$ 25^{10} 49^{32}. The wives of Esau are described in Gn 27^{46} as 'daughters of Heth,' a designation which is identified in the same verse with 'daughters of the land' and in $28^{1.\ 8}$ with 'daughters of Canaan.' 'It appears that (בְּנֵי) חֵת had their proper seat in the north (where also they were encountered by Assyrians from time of Tiglath-pileser I. and by Egyptians from time of Tahutmes III., cf. also Jg 3^{3}, Jos 11^{3}), but that individual Hittites were known in Israel (cf. besides 1 S 26^{6}, 2 S 11^{3} etc., 1 K 9^{20}); that the Hittites were regarded (by J E D) as one of the peoples of Canaan, and that the name even came to be used in a more general sense for Canaanites. Only in P do they appear as having a definite settlement in the south' (Oxf. Heb. Lex.). Sayce's argument for the presence of Hittites in Hebron is disproved by Gray (see Expositor, May 1898, p. 340 f.). J. A. SELBIE.

HETHLON (חֶתְלֹן).—An otherwise unknown city, named in Ezk 47^{15} 48^{1} as situated on the ideal northern boundary of Israel, in the neighbourhood of Hamath and Zedad (cf. Nu 34^{8}). Provided the text is not corrupt, Hethlon is probably (so Furrer, ZDPV viii. 27) the modern Ḥeitela N.E. of Tripoli. The LXX has in Ezk 47^{15} περισχιζούσης and in 48^{1} περισχίζοντος. It may be mentioned that v. Kasteren proposes to identify Hethlon with the modern 'Adlûn N. of the mouth of the Ḳasimiyeh, which he takes to have been the ideal northern boundary of Israel. Bertholet (Hesekiel, ad loc.) and Buhl (GAP 66 f.) are inclined to favour v. Kasteren's identification. F. HOMMEL.

HEWER OF WOOD.—The Gibeonites, for their fraud practised upon Joshua, were condemned to become 'hewers of wood (חֹטְבֵי עֵצִים) and drawers of water' for the congregation (Jos $9^{21.\ 27}$) and for the house of God (9^{23}) or altar of J″ (9^{27}). The phrase occurs also in Dt 29^{11}, where it is applied to strangers serving individual Israelites. Perhaps a more accurate translation, and one that better brings out the menial nature of the occupation, is 'gatherers of firewood' (see Driver on Dt 29^{11}); though the word for 'hewers' is used alone in 2 Ch 2^{10} of those that hew timber for building. See DRAWER OF WATER.

HEXATEUCH.*—The name Hexateuch is now generally given by critics to the first 6 books of OT on the analogy of the Pentateuch, the name long given to the first 5. The object of the change of name is to show that the 6 rather than the 5 form a complete literary whole, and may be looked upon as one book in 6 parts. It is not intended by the title either to exclude the possibility that the Hexateuch, like the rest of OT, was subject to constant revision, or to imply that the sources out of which it was compiled are necessarily to be found only in these books. A century ago it was a matter of common belief that the Pentateuch was written by Moses; but this belief never rested on anything but tradition, and will not bear examination. It will be shown that, in fact, these books are the result of complicated literary processes extending over a long period. As the Mosaic authorship will be thus disproved at the very outset, it requires no separate discussion.

* In this article the following abbreviations are used:—J = Jahwistic document, E = Elohistic document, JE = J and E combined, D = Deuteronomic Code, JED = JE and D combined, P = Priestly document, P^{h} = the Code of Holiness, P^{s} = the main work of P, J^{s}, E^{s}, etc. = the schools of J, E, etc., R = Reviser, at whatever period.

i. THE COMPOSITE CHARACTER OF THE HEXATEUCH.—This is proved by (a) the many unnecessary repetitions. Thus the creation of beasts and birds is related in Gn 1^{21-25} and again in 2^{19}, of man in 1^{27} and in 2^{7}. The corruption of man and his threatened punishment are described in 6^{1-7}, and repeated almost immediately afterwards in 6^{11-13} [see FLOOD]. Abraham's departure from his native land is told in 11^{31} and in 12^{1-4a}. The latter cannot have originally referred to his departure from Haran, which was not his native land (see 12^{1}). The statement of the destruction of the 'cities of the Plain' and Lot's escape in 19^{29} is clearly unnecessary after the detailed account of the events just given. The charge given to Jacob to flee to his uncle Laban is twice related, in 27^{42-45} and in 28^{1-7}. So in Joseph's early history is the passing of the trading caravans, and his being taken down into Egypt, cf. 37^{25-27} 39^{1} with $37^{28a.\ 33}$. The giving of names to certain sacred spots is in many cases twice recorded, e.g. Beersheba 21^{22-34} 26^{26-33}, Bethel 28^{10-22} 35^{9-15}. We have even three accounts of the laughter which occasioned the naming of Isaac 17^{17} 18^{12} $21^{6.\ 7}$. In the other books we find similar, though less frequent, repetitions. The name J″ is twice revealed to Moses Ex 3^{13-15} 6^{2-9}. The naming of Meribah and the events which gave rise to it are twice related Ex 17^{1-7}, Nu 20^{1-13}. Of the incidents of the manna and the quails, each occurs twice Ex 16, Nu 11. The frequent repetition of similar laws throughout the legislative portion of Hex. is obvious to the most casual reader. We have striking examples in the laws for the burnt-offering Lv 1. 22^{17-33}, the thank-offerings Lv 3. 7^{11-21}. In Joshua we find in 12^{1-6} 13^{8-12} two descriptions of the territory given to the trans-Jordanic tribes, quite distinct from the more detailed account of the portions assigned to the separate tribes in 13^{15-31}. The way in which Caleb obtained his portion is fully narrated in 14^{6-15}, and stated again as though a fresh fact in 15^{13}, and enlarged upon in 15^{14-19}. The lot for the children of Joseph is shortly described in 16^{1-3}, and then given again in rather greater detail, but with some repetitions, in vv.$^{4-9}$. It should be also borne in mind that the number of repetitions, of which in any case this is by no means a complete list, is largely increased if we regard as such what in their present form appear as similar incidents occurring on different occasions. Thus there can be little doubt that the three deceptions on the part of a patriarch's wife narrated in Gn 12^{10-20} 20^{1-18} 26^{1-11} are mere variants of the same story. The same is true of the expulsions of Hagar in Gn 16. 21^{9-21}.

(b) Frequent discrepancies and inconsistencies.—The Creation story beginning with Gn 2^{4b} differs from that of 1^{1}–2^{4a} in almost every particular, but most notably in the order of creation, the manner in which man is created, and in the creation of one single woman after that of a single man. The Flood according to $7^{12.\ 17}$ $8^{6.\ 10.\ 12}$ lasted 54 days, according to 7^{24} 8^{3} at least 150. [For other discrepancies see FLOOD]. Abraham's incredulity with reference to the possibility of Isaac's birth is mentioned in 17^{17} without comment, as though quite a natural thing. Precisely the same incredulity on Sarah's part is severely reprimanded in 18^{12-15}, and a different occasion and explanation of Sarah's laughter is given in $21^{6.\ 7}$. The youth of Sarah implied in 12^{10-20} 20^{1-8} is inconsistent with Sarah's age as stated in 17^{17}; and it is strange that Abraham, so old that his begetting of Isaac is regarded as an unheard of miracle in 17^{17} 18^{11}, should after Sarah's death have married a second wife, and had several children 25^{1-6}. The caravan which bought Joseph consisted according to 37^{25-27} 39^{1} of Ishmaelites, according to $37^{28.\ 36}$ of Midianites. Often totally different explanations are given of the same name, as of Issachar, which in $30^{15.\ 16}$ is connected with the hire for the love-apples given by Leah to Rachel, in 30^{18} with the hire given by God to Leah for giving her handmaid to her husband. In 30^{20a} Zebulun is so named because God had given Leah a good dowry (זבד), in v.^{20b} to express the hope that Jacob would dwell (זבל) with her. Joseph is so called in 30^{23} because God had taken away (אסף) Rachel's reproach, in ver.^{24} in the hope that J″ would add (יסף) another son. In 32^{2} Mahanaim is so called because of the companies of angels which Jacob met there, in 32^{7-10} there is a significant mention of the two companies of people, flocks, etc., that were with Jacob. In the early history of Exodus we find a certain number of incidents which imply that the Israelites were living among the Egyptians, as the story of the midwives 1^{15-22}, and especially the events of the Passover night, when the houses of the Israelites had to be marked $12^{7.\ 13}$, and the Israelitish women were able to ask for jewels of their Egyptian neighbours $12^{35.\ 36}$. In many other passages the Israelites are described as living in Goshen, a country quite separate from the rest of Egypt, and distinguished by immunity from plagues (see esp. Gn 46^{34}, Ex 8^{22} 9^{26}). The law requiring that altars should be made of earth or unhewn stones, Ex 20^{24}, is inconsistent with the directions given so soon after for the altar of acacia wood overlaid with brass in 27^{1-8}; and the permission to erect such altars as the first in every place where J″ should record His name, implying a large number of sanctuaries, does not accord with the frequent directions in Dt that offerings should be made only in the place which J″ should choose, Dt 12^{4-11} etc. Many other inconsistencies of the same kind will be noticed in the course of this article. [See EXODUS, LEVITICUS].

(c) Want of continuity and order in the narrative.—A history of Noah should have begun, not at Gn 6^{9}, but certainly before 6^{8}, and most probably before 5^{29}. A history of Noah's sons Gn 10^{1} should have included 9^{18-27}. In Gn 20^{1} 'Abraham journeyed from thence,' should naturally have followed some statement mentioning the place where he was, instead of a chapter dealing with the history of Lot. Ch. 35^{9} implies that Jacob had just returned from Paddan-aram, and precludes the events of ch. 34. At any rate, it is out of place after the revelation in 35^{1}. In 37^{2b} 'Joseph being seventeen years,' etc., in the present text follows what is evidently the beginning of a history, or more probably a genealogy, of Jacob. Ex 7^{8-13} follows awkwardly after 7^{1-7}. It would be naturally at the first interview that Pharaoh would demand a wonder. Ch. 11^{4}, in which Moses speaks as a matter of course to Pharaoh, comes strangely after 10^{29}, in which he agrees never to see Pharaoh's face again. In the Sinaitic narrative as it now stands, it is almost impossible to get any intelligent idea of the order of events. In Ex 19 alone, Moses, the old man of 80, ascends and descends the mount no fewer than 4 times $19^{3.\ 7.\ 8b.\ 9b.\ 14.\ 20.\ 25}$. Ch. 20 follows very abruptly upon 19^{25}. Moses ascends again apparently in 20^{21}, and no fewer than 3 times in ch. 24, without any descent being mentioned between $24^{9.\ 13.\ 18}$. In ch. 33 there is obviously no connexion between vv.^{12} and ^{11}, and it is difficult to see the connexion between vv.$^{7-11}$ and the rest of the chapter, and throughout there is a want of any definite order in the various pleadings of Moses with God. Lv 26^{46} marks the conclusion of the Sinaitic legislation, and yet other cases follow in ch. 27, and a second similar conclusion is given at the close, 27^{34}. Nu 7^{1-9} seems to imply that preparations for the journey from Sinai were made directly after the completion and consecration of the tabernacle, and it is difficult to see what room is left for the legislation contained in the whole of Leviticus. The account of the spies in ch. 13 and the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram in ch. 16 involve numerous petty difficulties if read as continuous narratives (see below, iii. 2. C). The writing of Moses' song in Dt 31^{22} and of the law in 31^{24} are clearly out of place, the former referring to the following chapter, the latter to the laws given in previous chapters. The breaks in Joshua are not so obvious at first sight, but a careful reader will see that the book represents two different conceptions of the conquest of Canaan—one a rapid and complete conquest of almost the whole land under Joshua, and a subsequent allotment of the conquered portions; the other a gradual settlement carried out by the independent action of several tribes, an allotment having taken place before the conquest. The latter conception is more in agreement with Jg 1. But the accounts in Joshua which embody these two ideas have been so carefully interwoven that if that book stood alone it would be difficult to found an argument upon them.

(d) Differences of style and conception.—These, especially so far as they are connected with special phraseology, will be treated more fully at a later stage of the inquiry. It will be sufficient for the present, in addition to what has been already said of the Bk. of Joshua, to point out two very striking examples. (1) Notice the very remarkable difference in the whole tone and character of the two Creation stories, Gn $1–2^{4a}$ and 2^{4b} etc. The first describes creation as taking place in a systematic order, reaching its climax in man created male and female, everything being made out of nothing by a separate fiat of almighty God. In the second, all other things belonging to the earth (the heavenly bodies are not mentioned) are made, after the existence of the first man, in the order best suited for his wants, ending in the creation of woman. Men at least are moulded out of another material, the first man out of the dust of the ground, the first woman out of a rib taken from her husband. J″ walks and talks almost as a man with men. The first account is in form artificial and rhythmical, the second graphic and picturesque. (2) We may observe the same kind of difference in the conception of Moses. According to Ex 15^{22} 4^{10-17} he is indeed an able and practical leader, but a weak and timid speaker, who is allowed to engage Aaron as his spokesman. In Dt he appears as the most fluent and eloquent speaker of the Bible.

It can hardly be denied that these facts taken together form an irresistible argument for the belief that the Hex. was compiled from a variety of sources. It has been sometimes suggested that Moses compiled Genesis, but actually wrote the last four books of the Pentateuch. This does not meet the facts of the case, because, as already seen, the same phenomena which prove Genesis to be a compilation and not an original work appear abundantly in Exodus, and evidently enough in the other books of the Hexateuch. The compilation must therefore have taken place considerably after the time of Moses.

ii. METHOD OF COMPOSITION.—A. Three views at least are possible, which we may call (1) conglomeration or crystallization, (2) expansion, (3) stratification.

(1) The first would imply that a number of fragments, handed down either in writing or by oral tradition, were collected together so as to form a literary whole. If the fragments were collected at one single time the process might aptly be called conglomeration. Crystallization becomes the more appropriate term if we suppose that the fragments were gathered by degrees round some earlier nucleus. In fact it approaches more or less closely to (2).

(2) The second hypothesis is that a small original document, or a very definite oral tradition, was expanded by frequent revision at subsequent periods.

(3) Stratification is intended to imply that certain more or less independent documents, dealing largely with the same series of events, were composed at different periods, or, at any rate, under different auspices, and were afterwards combined, so that our present Hex. contains these several different literary strata.

There is probably some degree of truth in all these hypotheses, but there are strong reasons for believing that the last most nearly expresses the truth, and with some modifications it is the accepted theory of the great body of modern critics. The necessary modifications are: (a) that each stratum, before its incorporation into the united work, was subject to more or less revision, and in some cases considerable expansion from time to time; (b) that the combination of the several strata was itself a gradual process, some being already combined before others had been produced; (c) that the whole when combined was subject to editorial revision; (d) that certain fragments remain which probably did not originally belong to any of these larger strata, but have been connected with them either by the original writers or by later revisers.

B. The main grounds for accepting this third hypothesis (stratification) are: (1) that the various literary pieces, with very few exceptions, will be found on examination to arrange themselves by common characteristics into comparatively few groups; (2) that an original consecution of narrative may be frequently traced between what in their present form are isolated fragments. This will be better understood by the following illustration. Let us suppose a problem of this kind: Given a patchwork quilt, explain the character of the original pieces out of which the bits of stuff composing the quilt were cut. First, we notice that, however well the colours may blend, however nice and complete the whole may look, many of the adjoining pieces do not actually agree in material, texture, pattern, colour, or the like. Ergo, they have been made up out of very different pieces of stuff. So far, we have only proved what may turn out to be the first hypothesis of those given above, a conglomeration of fragments. But suppose that we further discover that many of the bits, though now separated, are like one another in material, texture, etc., we may conjecture that these may have been cut out of one piece. But we shall prove this beyond reasonable doubt if we find that several bits when unpicked fit together, so that the pattern of one is continued in the other; and, moreover, that if all of like character are sorted out they form, say, four groups, each of which was evidently once a single piece of stuff, though parts of each are found missing because, no doubt, they have not been required to make the whole. But we make the analogy with the Hexateuch even closer, if we further suppose that in certain parts of the quilt the bits belonging to, say, two of these groups are so combined as to form a subsidiary pattern within the larger pattern of the whole quilt, and had evidently been sewn together before being connected with other parts of the quilt; and we may make it even closer still, if we suppose that, besides the more important bits of stuff, smaller embellishments, borderings, and the like, had been added so as to improve the general effect of the whole.

C. It will now be shown that this view of the composition of the Hexateuch is borne out by an examination of the books. To do so we will first call attention to a few isolated facts, the bearing of which on the general question will afterwards appear. (1) It is obvious to the most casual reader that the Bk. of Dt, speaking generally, differs strikingly in style and character from the other books of the Hexateuch. It produces when read a different impression, just as St. John produces a different impression from the other Gospels. On examination we discover that this difference of impression is chiefly due to its highly spiritual tone and its constant appeal to the emotions. (2) In Ex 20^{22}–23. 24^{3-8} we find a definite body of laws, religious and civil, both marked by their singularly primitive character, described as written in a book, and marking the basis of a special covenant between God and man. (3) Throughout a large part of Exodus, the whole of Leviticus, and the greater part of Numbers, we meet with a large number of laws, mainly ritual, but partly civil, marked, however, throughout by a sameness of tone and spirit, the stress being always laid on ceremonial observances. Thus we find three distinct codes—the Covenant code (C), the Deuteronomic (D), the Levitical or Priestly (P). These will be found on comparison to differ, not only in general tone and spirit, but also in several definite details, both in their religious and civil portions. For instance, compare C's altar of earth or rough stone (Ex 20^{24-26}) with P's elaborate altar of acacia wood overlaid with brass (27^{1-8}), the offerer apparently himself the priest in C (Ex 20^{24}) with the Levites all priests in D (Dt 18^{1} etc.), and the elaboration of High Priest, Priests and Levites of P, as frequently throughout Leviticus, etc. Notice the differences in the feasts both in number and character: in C three, entirely agricultural, depending in time on the season, namely, Unleavened Bread, Harvest, Ingathering, Ex 23^{14-16} (15^{b} appears to be a later interpolation, cf. 34^{22}); in D also three: Passover and Unleavened Bread, Weeks, Booths, Dt 16, mainly agricultural, but the first in part historical as a memorial of the departure from Egypt in haste, the last two still dependent on the seasons, vv.$^{9.\ 13}$, or the second only relatively fixed if the Passover is to be identified with the beginning of harvest; in P six holy seasons, besides the Sabbath, mentioned in the same category: Passover, Wave-sheaf, Weeks, Trumpets, Day of Atonement, Booths, Lv 23. Two of these only, Wave-sheaf and Weeks, are solely agricultural, the last partly agricultural and partly historical. The meaning of Trumpets is not explained; the Passover is historical, the Day of Atonement purely religious. The law of the manumission of slaves presents similar contrasts. In C (Ex 21^{2-6}) the Hebrew slave, bought as a matter of course, after six years' servitude is allowed to go free, but without the wife procured for him by his master and the children born in servitude. If from love of these or his master he elects to stay, his ear is bored, and he becomes his master's slave for ever. In D (Dt 15^{12-18}) the Hebrew slave who, in spite of his slavery, is, being a Hebrew, his master's brother, after six years' servitude (or possibly such of them as remained till the Sabbatical year, cf. 15^{1-11}) is to be manumitted with liberal presents in gratitude for his great service. Nothing is said of his wife and children, but it seems probable that they were to be manumitted too. If from love for his master and his master's family he elects to stay, he is treated as in C. In P (Lv 25^{39-55}) if a Hebrew, here called a brother, is sold into slavery through poverty (it is not conceived possible under any other circumstances), he is not to be treated as a slave at all, but as a hired servant. He is to be manumitted with his wife and children in the year of jubile, when he returns to his family and family possessions, which are then restored to him. But, even before this, any relative had the power to redeem him, or he might redeem himself. Slaves proper were to be only from the heathen around, or from the stranger that sojourned with them, and these were an absolute possession and heirloom.

That these three laws here contrasted belong to different dates is obvious. The similarity of form makes it equally clear that they are different versions, by revision, of the same law. The order of dates, both with respect to these and the religious laws before compared, is easily determined. The natural order is from the simpler to the more elaborate ritual, from the more barbarous to the kindlier treatment of fellow-countrymen. We should expect that in course of time feasts would be added, and for the sake of general convenience their dates more definitely fixed, and the priesthood become more ordered and defined. We know, too, that, as the danger of foreign invasion increased, the idea of a nation and of a religion both absolutely different from all others became more and more prominent, and hence a marked distinction between the treatment of the foreigner and the Israelite is a characteristic of late date (cf. Neh 13^{23-31}). We gather, then, that C, D, P is the historical order of these codes. It will be seen on examination how, in almost every particular, D marks a transition between C and P in the law of manumission. In C the treatment of slaves is harsh. They are regarded as little better than the absolute property of their masters. They have only the one chance of freedom, which, if they have married in slavery, can only be accepted at the cost of breaking the sacred ties of family. In D this harshness almost, if not entirely, disappears. It is suggested that the master might treat his slave so kindly that the latter would, apart from all other considerations, prefer his service to liberty, and if he did not the master was to reward him liberally. But if the slave elected to remain he had no second chance of liberty. In P the kindness hinted at in D becomes a legal requirement. The Hebrew slave had always through redemption a chance of liberty, and could not legally remain, even nominally, a slave after the year of jubile. The perpetual servitude of a Hebrew was in no case permissible.

D. How are these three codes related to the narrative portions of the Hexateuch? We may begin by examining Genesis. We find that the greater part of the book is divided into groups of longer or shorter pieces, generally paragraphs or chapters, distinguished respectively by the almost exclusive use of Elohim or J″ as the name of God. As the latter is the ordinary word throughout the other books of the Bible, it suggests at once that Elohim is purposely used in those sections where it occurs, because, according to Ex 3^{13-15} 6^{2-8}, the name J″ was first revealed to Moses in Midian, and it seemed improper to anticipate the name, even in the narrative portions of an earlier period. Further, it shows that this scruple was felt by one or more writers, but not by all. The theory advocated by some opponents of biblical criticism, that the names are used by the same writer with special reference to the subject in hand, Elohim representing the God of power, J″ the God of love, or other such distinctions, does not tally with the facts. Why in two narratives both dealing with Creation, and in two narratives both dealing with Abraham and Sarah's deceit, should Elohim be used in one of them and J″ in the other? But in other sections the name of God either seldom occurs, or Elohim is used by or to strangers, in which case J″ is on other grounds inappropriate; or again, in certain sections the two names seem to be used indifferently. Again, beyond Ex 6, the name of God is of less use as a criterion, because Elohim occurs seldom. We will provisionally designate the group of passages in which J″ is used as J, those in which Elohim is used as E. On further examination we discover that while J is, generally speaking, consistent in style and character, E, on the other hand, falls into two very distinct groups. One of them, which we will call provisionally E^1, is very much like J in general character and in the subjects with which it deals, and, moreover, has in many parts been combined presumably with J. The other, E^2, is entirely unlike either of these in style, but will be found on further examination to bear in point of language and character a close affinity to the P code. This is shown partly by the love for ceremonial law, as the Sabbath (Gn $2^{2.3}$), the provision against eating blood (Gn 9^4), the rite of circumcision (17, etc.); but even more remarkably by the use of the characteristic vocabulary and style of P. For example, in Gn $1–2^{3a}$ 'after his (her or their) kind' occurs very frequently as well as in 6^{20} 7^{14}. It also occurs in Lv 11^{14-29} (9 times), and far less frequently in the parallel passage of D (Dt 14^{11-18}); 'be fruitful and multiply' occurs in Gn $1^{22.28}$ 8^{17} 9^7 35^{11}, Lv 26^9. 'Everything that creepeth upon the earth (or ground),' Gn $1^{25.26.30}$ 6^{20} $7^{8.14.21}$ [contrast 7^{23} of J], Lv 11^{41-46}. We see, then, that the most characteristic phrases of Gn $1–2^{3a}$ occur not only in similarly characterized (i.e. E^2) passages of Genesis, but also in the code of P. We are thus justified in regarding P and E^2 as parts of a single source, and in future we shall understand P as including both. If we examine the narrative portions of Exodus and Numbers, we find the same phenomena, except that as here J″ is most frequently used as the name of God after Ex 3, it becomes more difficult to distinguish J and E. P can usually be separated with little difficulty because of its very marked character. Now, if we compare C with J and E, we find that it bears close affinities in point of language to both, so that we may call it JE, meaning thereby that in its final form it is probably a combination of both, and we shall further find it convenient to use this expression for the present for the J and E elements generally, without at this stage making any attempt to distinguish them. We shall find that by far the larger part of the narratives, as distinct from the laws, of Exodus and Numbers belong to JE, whereas, with special exceptions, the legal portions belong to P. In the last chapters of Dt and in the whole of Joshua we find elements of JE. In the latter book we also find elements which connect it with D (see below iii. 1. C). It should be observed that not only do we find here and there different separate pieces in the Hexateuch, shown by their characters to belong to these three sources, P, D, JE, but the pieces will often be found connected together by an obvious continuity of subject when pieced together, like the bits of patchwork in the illustration with which we started. For example, if we read continuously Gn 11^{27-32} $12^{4b.5}$ $13^{6a.11b.12a}$ $16^{1a.3.15-16}$ 17. 19^{29} $21^{1a.2b-5}$ 23. 25^{7-11a}, passages mainly, on other grounds, attributed to P, we get an almost continuous and complete, though very concise, account of Abraham's life. When we consider the number of revisions which the books of OT must have passed through, this is remarkable, and shows what a strong inclination the composers and editors must have had to preserve everything which they found.

iii. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE DIFFERENT SOURCES.—What has hitherto been said is little more than a statement of what has been proved by the critical investigation of some three-quarters of a century. A really satisfactory proof can only be obtained by one who has the patience to work out the problem step by step for himself. But to do this adequately a fuller account of these sources is necessary. For the convenience of the critical student these will now be taken in their order of difficulty, the first being that which can be most easily distinguished, and so with the rest.

1. D.—A. Characteristics of D.—As already observed, (a) the larger traits of D are very easily recognized. A serious student cannot fail to notice the hortatory character of Dt, its tone of gentle pleading, its spirituality as regards both God and man. God has no outward and visible form (Dt 4^{12}); God is near man, and His law is within man's heart (30^{11-14}); man's relation to God is by nothing more truly expressed than by love (6^5 10^{12}). The heart needs circumcision (10^{16} 30^6). Dt may be called the Gospel of the Hexateuch. Comparatively little importance is attached to religious ceremony. Though opposed to anthropomorphism, the writer expresses, in a very marked way, the personality of God in language which implies anthropopathic views; notice esp. 5^9 6^{15}. (b) The aims and contents of Dt are equally characteristic. It seeks emphatically to establish the worship of one God (6^4), and enjoins the absolute destruction of all visible representations of J″ as well as of heathen gods, the first by implication (4^{15}), the second by reiterated statement (7^{25} etc. $12^{2.3}$ etc.), the abolition of all places of worship except the one sanctuary chosen by God ($12^{5-7.\ 11.\ 14.\ 18.\ 21}$ $16^{2.6}$ etc.). Here, and here alone, they were to offer their sacrifices and keep their feasts. (c) Among the institutions contemplated, or perhaps we should rather say described, by Dt are a monarchy (17^{14-20}), a prophetic order (18^{15-22}), a priesthood of Levites; that is to say, every Levite is a priest without distinction; the phrase 'the priests the Levites' occurs frequently (17^9 18^1 etc.). (d) The style of Dt is smooth and flowing, tending to redundancy, generally pleasing to the ear, but at times perhaps a little tedious. Notice especially the accumulation of synonyms, or of words of the same class. Such phrases as 'with all thy heart, with all thy soul,' etc.; 'the ordinances, the statutes, and the judgments'; 'the stranger, the widow, and the fatherless,' are frequent. There is, too, a constant repetition of favourite phrases (see below, B (2)).

B. Language of D.—We shall find it convenient to distinguish (1) favourite words, especially where one synonym is used in preference to another; (2) characteristic phrases and expressions. Under (1) notice especially Horeb (for Sinai), אָמָה 'a maid-servant' (שִׁפְחָה only in 28^{68}); חָטָא, the unusual word for 'sin' (the common form חַטָּאת occurs thrice only); אַדְמָה 'earth' or 'ground,' very frequently in former sense (for common אֶרֶץ); לֵבָב 'heart,' very frequent (לֵב only 4 times); לִמֵּד 'to teach,' very frequent, marking the didactic character of the book; קְלָלָה 'a curse,' frequent (אָלָה occurs 6 times, 5 of them in Dt 29); קֶרֶב with בְּ or מִן 'in' or 'from the midst of' (for תּוֹךְ); שָׁמַר 'to keep, observe,' very frequent, esp. of keeping God's laws, etc.; also in Niphal in such phrases as 'take heed to thyself.' Under (2) the phrases 'J″ thy (your, etc.) God,' 'hear, O Israel,' 'prolong thy (your) days,' 'cleave to J″ thy God,' 'serve other gods, which neither you nor your fathers have known,' 'that it may be well with thee,' 'that thou mayest possess the land,' 'at that time,' are sufficiently familiar. Under both (1) and (2) we have given only a few of the most striking examples out of many. To show the full force of the argument we should have to point out the relative frequency of a very much larger number of words and phrases. But those given are so thoroughly characteristic that they will be at once recognized as specially belonging to Deut. by any one at all familiar with that book. Turn for example to Dt 6^{1-3}. In these 3 verses, taken almost at random, at least 8 examples occur of the words and phrases mentioned above; indeed there is hardly a single phrase in them, excepting 'a land flowing with milk and honey,' which does not illustrate the peculiar style of the book. It should be realized, too, that such differences of style as we can feel and appreciate go far beyond what can be expressed categorically, just as we may recognize a friend's face, or even his step or his handwriting, from a thousand, although we could but very imperfectly describe the manifold peculiarities which make up its individuality of character. These remarks are also true, more or less, of the characteristics of the other sources of the Hexateuch.

C. Extent of D.—Hitherto we have spoken of D as though it coincided exactly with Dt; but, as a fact, we find on examination (a) that the peculiar characteristics which mark D are not found in some few sections of Dt at all. (b) In other parts of Dt they are found less constantly, and these have also some peculiarities of their own. (c) The characteristics of D, or some of them, are found also in some other parts of the Hexateuch. In other words, D may be used in a narrower and a wider sense. In the narrower sense it includes only Dt 5–34 (or perhaps 12–34), except at least 31^{14-23} 32^{48-52} 34^{7-9} (see below, iii. 2 C). The portions of Hex. outside of Dt belonging to D in the wider sense are not so easily determined, though the fact that some do so belong may be regarded as certain. The reason is that in other parts of the Hex. we find very few passages which appear to have been originally written by D, but several which seem to have been revised by one or more writers in the spirit and style of D, because we find in them traces also of the characters which distinguish the earlier documents. Such revisions give rise to some of the greatest difficulties of biblical criticism, and it requires very nice handling to disentangle the various literary elements, but their extent is not large enough to throw the least serious doubt on the larger results of criticism, nor can there be any serious doubt of the fact of such revisions having taken place. As far as D is concerned, the revision seems to have varied very much in different cases. Sometimes a mere characteristic touch is added. Sometimes D must have rewritten passages altogether. Sometimes again D appears to have expanded the narratives, etc., by considerable insertions. This being the case, we can hardly be surprised at a considerable difference of opinion among critics. Thus Dillmann finds in Genesis a large number of passages belonging to D, whereas several critics find none at all. The most characteristic D passage of Genesis is 18^{19}. The suggestion that Abraham would or should command his children reminds us of Dt 4^{10} 6^7 11^{19} etc. 'Keeping' (of God's commandments) and 'doing judgment,' etc., are characteristically Deuteronomic; for the latter cf. Dt 6^1. Notice also the use of the synonyms 'justice' and 'judgment.' Ex 13^{3-16} is believed by many critics to have been revised by D. The solemn injunction to remember a great event in v.^{3}, the emphatic use of 'this day' in vv.$^{3.\ 4}$, the direction to instruct the children in v.^{14}, the striking metaphors of vv.^{9} and ^{16}, are all familiar characters of D (see Dt 16^3 6^{20} 6^8 11^{18}), though it is, of course, possible, on the other hand, that Dt $6^{8.\ 20-25}$ are in reality expansions of this very passage. There are also characteristic D touches in Ex 15^{25b-26}, 'a statute and an ordinance,' 'diligently hearken,' 'J″ thy God,' 'commandments and statutes.' When several touches of this sort occur together, it is extremely improbable that they are the result of a mere coincidence. Perhaps the most instructive example of a D revision is in the Decalogue in Ex 20. The expansion of the Decalogue, as distinct from the short commandments, which probably were the original 'ten words,' is full of D phrases: for example, 'J" thy God' (vv.[2, 7, 10, 12]), 'jealous God' (v.[5]), 'love me and keep my commandments' (v.[6]), and especially 'that thy days may be long' (v.[12]). There appear to be traces of a similar revision in Ex 34[10b-15]; and Nu 21[33-35] is by several critics regarded as interpolated from Dt 3[1-3]. When we come to Joshua we find that passages so characterized, instead of being as it were sporadic, become frequent; but except in 23, which is throughout Deuteronomic in style, they are mostly confined to the first 13 chapters. This seems to show that previous accounts of the conquest of Canaan were rewritten by D, who also added supplementary passages, such as 18[7] 21[43]–22[8] 23 and parts of 24, while in the earlier books, as in some of the Exodus passages already cited, the D elements are so fused as to make an exact analysis very difficult and uncertain.

D. Date and Origin of D.—D, or part of D, has long been recognized as the book found in the temple in Josiah's reign, the account of which is given in 2 K 22, chiefly on the following grounds. (1) The whole of the Pentateuch, or even of the legal portions of it, could not have been read twice in one day, as was apparently the case with this book (2 K 22[11] 23[2]). (2) Josiah's reforms, confessedly based upon this discovered book, were, in fact, carried out in the spirit of Dt (a) by the destruction of the high places, not only idolatrous, but those in which J" had been worshipped (2 K 23[8, 9]), so that the one single sanctuary, so emphatically ordered in Dt, then first became an established fact (it is clear that the attempt of Hezekiah, 2 K 18[4], to put down the high places was only partial or tentative); and (b) in connexion with this by the keeping of the passover at Jerusalem, cf. 2 K 23[21-23] with Dt 16[5, 6]; (c) by the abolition of the Asherim and of all idolatrous images and symbols of worship. (3) The stress laid upon the prophetic order is specially suitable to this period, when the prophets exercised so great and wide an influence. That Jeremiah should have been permitted to utter such prophecies as those contained in chs. 7 and 22 with reference to the temple worship and the royal house without molestation, shows the awe which the prophet's office inspired. (4) The peculiar ideas and thoughts, and to a certain extent the phraseology, of D penetrate Jeremiah's prophecies, and in a less degree those of Ezekiel, as we should expect from a newly-written, epoch-making book. Take, for example, such remarkable thoughts as the spiritual circumcision, cf. Dt 10[16] 30[6] with Jer 6[10] 9[25, 26], Ezk 44[7], and the law written in the heart, cf. Dt 30[11-14] with Jer 31[31-34] and Ezk 36[27]. But in both cases, the latter especially, the peculiarities in the style, etc., of these prophetic writers forbid our ascribing Dt to either prophet. And yet some of the ideas of Dt are to be found in a less complete form in Isaiah, and in this connexion we may bear in mind the first attempts by Hezekiah to put down the worship of the high places. From these facts we may conclude that Dt, or the essential part of it, was written either in the reign of Manasseh, or very early in that of Josiah. (1) If the former, it may have been the work of some priest or priests, who employed the time spent in forced seclusion in committing to writing their view of the law, derived partly from earlier documents, partly from the traditional teaching of the priests, and coloured largely, no doubt, by the religious ideas and feelings of their own time. In this way round an earlier nucleus a new body of laws might have gathered, which would naturally have developed all the more rapidly, as the priests, unable during the long reign of Manasseh to perform their ordinary functions, had more leisure for spiritual meditation, just as afterwards the Mishna resulted from the expulsion of the Jews under Hadrian. If so, this law-book was probably hidden by some priest for safety in the temple, in the hope that it might survive those troublous times as the written record of God's law, and the discovery of it may have been perfectly genuine. Even supposing that its existence and whereabouts were secrets known to the priests, this would not present a very serious moral difficulty. Just as the writer or writers of Dt in describing the customs and laws of their own times genuinely believed that they were giving the laws dictated by Moses by express revelation, their successors would have held the same belief, even though they may have known that they had been secretly written down, just as late Jews firmly believed that besides the Pentateuch a very large number of laws had been handed down from Moses by oral tradition. To understand the views of such an age we must first realize the entire absence of anything approaching to literary criticism. (2) Although not a necessary result of accepting the later date, the majority of critics believe this book of the law to have been the result of a pious fraud promulgated by Hilkiah and Shaphan with the intention of deceiving Josiah into the belief that the reforms which they desired were the express command of God revealed to Moses. We must reserve for a later stage some remarks about the various extensions and modifications of D. It will be enough at present to say that according to either view the book discovered can hardly be the whole of Dt, but rather the law which it contains, i.e. in the main, 12-29[1] or 12–31[13], with possibly the addition of 5–11.

2. P. The Priestly Book.—A. The most striking general characteristics of P are: (1) first and foremost, the love of ceremonial law, most obvious, of course, in the legal sections, as in Leviticus and the Priestly laws of Exodus and Numbers, but very noticeable also in the narrative sections, as shown, for example, in the institution and reference to the Sabbath in Gn 2[2, 3], Ex 16[21-30]; the prohibition against eating blood, Gn 9[4]; the rite of circumcision, Gn 17. 21[3-5]; the Passover, Ex 12[1-20], Jos 5[10-12]. (2) Fondness for statistical details, esp. those connected with persons and dates. The exact lengths of the lives of the patriarchs are always given, Gn 5. 9[29] 11[10-32] etc. By the age of a patriarch are marked the exact dates of important events, such as the beginning and end of the Flood, Gn 7[11] 8[13], in which last the very day of the month is given; the institution of circumcision, 17[24]; the age of the father at the birth of the firstborn (or covenant ?) son, Gn 5. 11[10-26]. The exact details and dimensions of the ark are given, 6[14-17], as well as of every part of the tabernacle and its contents, Ex 25–31[17] 35–40. Notice also the frequent insertion of genealogies, for the most part little more than lists of names, Gn 5. 11[10-26] 25[12-18] 36. (3) A tendency to symmetry and similarity of phraseology in describing similar events. Notice, for example, in Gn 1 the regular repetition of such phrases as 'and God said' and 'God saw that it was good,' 'and the evening and the morning were the first (second, etc.) day.' The genealogies of Gn 5 and 11 are like recurring patterns, the verses scarcely varying except in the name and the number of years. In the five wonders of P in Ex 7–9 (see below iii. 2. C) there is a similar framework of phraseology into which the varying details are inserted. 'J" spake unto Aaron (or unto Moses and Aaron)'—direction how to perform the wonders, beginning in the first four with 'take thy rod,' or an equivalent phrase—statement that the plague was done accordingly—that the magicians could (or could not in the last two) do so with their enchantments—and that Pharaoh's heart was hardened (with some variation of phrase), 'and he hearkened not unto them as J″ had spoken.' (4) We see also the same tendency to symmetry in the insertion of the same or similar headings in introducing subjects of a like kind, as 'these are the generations of,' Gn 2^4 (transposed probably from before Gn 1^1) 5^1 6^9 10^1 $11^{10.\ 27}$ $25^{12.\ 19}$ 36^1 37^{2a}, 'and Moses gave unto the tribe of,' Jos $13^{15.\ 24.\ 29}$; and of similar conclusions at the end of a subject or part of a subject, as, for example, in Gn $10^{5.\ 20.\ 32}$, Ex $25^{9.\ 40}$ 26^{30}, Jos $13^{23.\ 28}$. (5) In form P is in its narrative portions little more than a collection of dry annals. Stories are seldom inserted, and when they are it is for the sake of some ceremonial provision, as the Creation story of Gn 1 for the Sabbath, the Flood story as an introduction to the prohibition against eating blood. Both lack the picturesqueness of the corresponding J stories, and all that P has to say of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah is the bare statement of 19^{29}. There is nothing thought worth preserving of P's history of Joseph except the short statistics of Gn 37^{1-2a} 41^{46a} $46^{6.\ 7}$, and possibly $47^{6a.\ 7-11\ 27b.\ 28}$. (6) P's style is stiff and formal, and seldom marked by delicate poetic feeling or grace of treatment, though occasionally stately and dignified, as in the Creation narrative, where the symmetry is certainly melodious, and adds grandeur to the conception. The repetitions help us to realize the almighty power of God. So, too, in the description of the five wonders in Egypt, Ex 7–9, the repetitions serve to intensify the stubborn obstinacy of Pharaoh in resisting the divine power. Again, Gn 23, though introduced by P with the obvious purpose of accounting for the burying-place of the patriarchs, is distinctly interesting because of its archæological quaintness, and is probably based upon some ancient document. The same is true of Gn 14, if, as some critics maintain, in its present form it belongs to P.

B. Vocabulary and Language of P.—In Genesis and Ex 1–5, prior that is to the revelation of the name J″, P always uses as the name of God 'Elohim' or אֵל שַׁדַּי 'God Almighty,' the latter esp. of His revelation of Himself to the patriarchs, cf. Ex 6^2 with Gn 17^1 35^{11} 48^3; P uses בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל 'the sons of Israel,' not 'Israel,' so also 'the children of Heth' ('Hittite' only in sing.); אֲנִי (130 times) for the more archaic אֲנֹכִי (once only in P); נֶאֱסַף in the phrase 'gathered to his people,' of burial; 'according to their generations'; זָכָר וּנְקֵבָה 'male and female,' Gn 1^{27} 6^{19} (in 7^2 J has אִישׁ וְאִשְׁתּוֹ 'man and his wife'), Lv $3^{1.\ 6}$ etc.; 'thou (you, etc.) and thy seed after thee,' Gn 9^9, Ex 28^{43}; בְּיַד 'by the hand of,' with words of command; 'that soul shall be cut off from his people,' and similar phrases, Gn 17^{14} (contrast 'shall surely be put to death' in the Book of the Covenant, Ex 21 (E)); לוּן 'to murmur' (only in P); מִין 'kind,' Gn 1 (throughout), Lv $11^{14.\ 15}$; הַמִּשְׁכָּן 'the dwelling,' of the tabernacle (about 100 times); עֵדוּת 'testimony,' as in the phrase 'the ark of the testimony' (only thrice in JE, and that in disputed passages); בְּעֶצֶם הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה 'in the bone of this day,' i.e. 'in this very day,' 14 times; 'be fruitful and multiply,' very frequent; 'Paddan-aram,' never 'Naharaim' (the abode of Laban is called 'Haran' in JE, cf. Gn 28^{10} 29^4 with 28^2 33^{18} 35^9, 'the children of the East' in 29^1); 'Sinai' (never 'Horeb'). There is also an avoidance of several otherwise common words and phrases, such as נָא with imperatives, גָּרַשׁ 'drive out,' עָשָׂה חֶסֶד 'do mercy,' וַיֹּסֶף 'and he added' to do something, i.e. did it again, לְפִי חָרֶב 'by the mouth, i.e. the edge, of the sword,' though these last two are so common as in a literal Greek translation to have found their way into the language of NT (Lk $20^{11.\ 12}$ 21^{24}, He 11^{24}), 'a land flowing with milk and honey' (except in Lv 20^{24}). In this list, which is only a small selection out of many, all sacrificial terms and words of a like nature, which might be accounted for simply by the peculiar subject-matter of P, have been studiously avoided. In P the argument from language is quite as strong as that derived from the general character of that document. In most passages either taken alone would form conclusive evidence.

C. Extent of P.—In Genesis P can be at once distinguished from J by the use of Elohim, from E by its general characteristics, style, and vocabulary. All the Elohistic passages of 1–11 belong to P, and create little or no difficulty. In the rest of Genesis we find belonging to P: (1) Short historical notices dealing with (a) leading events, such as the rescue of Lot from the cities of the Plain, 19^{21}; Jacob's return from Paddan-aram, 31^{18} 33^{18}; his descent into Egypt with a characteristic statement of date, 46^6; the settlement of Esau in Seir, 36^{6-8}; (b) statistics of births, deaths, and marriages, $16^{3.\ 15}$ 21^3 25^{26b} etc.; (c) chronological details, 12^{4b} 41^{46}. (2) Genealogies, 25^{12-18} 35^{23-29} (ch. 36 as a whole is probably a still later insertion). (3) The blessings of Abram, Sarai, and Ishmael, connected with the rite of circumcision, and in the case of the first two the change of name, ch. 17; of Jacob by his father in connexion with his dismissal and projected marriage with one of his own family in contrast to the heathen marriage of Esau, 27^{46}–28^9; and again directly by God, with change of name, 35^{9-15}. (4) The purchase of Machpelah, explaining the origin of the burial-place of the patriarchs, ch. 23, who, according to P, were all buried there, as well as their wives, 23^{19} 25^9 49^{31} 50^{13}.

In the Sinaitic portion of Exodus the P sections are obvious. We may, without hesitation, ascribe to P 24^{15b-18} (or ^{18a}) 25^1–31^{17} (or possibly ^{18}) 35–40. In the earlier parts of Ex, P is more fragmentary, but it will be readily recognized that the following passages contain several of its characteristics and are evidently connected together. In 1^{1-7} we have a genealogical notice, with the statement in v.^{7} that the Israelites were 'fruitful and multiplied.' 2^{23b-25} is a passage with Elohim as the name of God, and refers back to the patriarchal covenant of Gn 17, etc., and therefore must also be assigned to P. We find the connexion between these two sections in 1^{14} a concise doublet of vv.$^{8-13}$, which latter has not the characters of P, and belongs therefore to another source (JE). In 6^{2-9} we have P's version of the revelation of the sacred name J″ (contrast 3) marked as P's by אֵל שַׁדַּי (see above, iii. 2. B). 7^{1-7} is clearly P's introduction to its five wonders (vv.^{6} and ^{7} are very characteristic of P). P's five wonders follow in 7^{8-13} rod into serpent, $7^{19-20a.\ 21b-22}$ water into blood, $8^{5-7.\ 15b.}$ [Heb. $8^{1-3.\ 11b}$] frogs, 8^{16-19} [Heb. 8^{12-15}] lice, 9^{8-12} boils, and $11^{9.\ 10}$ (by some ascribed to R) appears to mark the conclusion. In $12^{1-20.\ 28}$ we have the ordinances of the passover, marked as P's both by its language and ceremonial character. Ch. 16, in its present form, appears largely to belong to P (special points of interest for P being the stringency of the Sabbath requirements, vv.$^{26-30}$, and the preservation of the pot of manna), though parts of the chapter are regarded by many critics as later. The rest of P in this part of Exodus consists merely of short statements giving an itinerary of the journey from Egypt to Sinai.

The whole of Leviticus evidently belongs to P in the wider sense of the word, and almost the whole of Numbers. The exceptions are: (a) Nu 10^{29}–12; (b) 13. 14; (c) 16; (d) 20–21; (e) 22^2–25^5; (f) 32. Of these (a) and (e) belong entirely to JE (see BALAAM). In (d) and (f), if we except perhaps 20^{1-13}, only unimportant fragments of P have been introduced. In (b) (the account of the spies) and (c) (the rebellion of Korah, Dathan and Abiram), P's narrative has been combined with JE, but in both it can generally be separated without much difficulty. In 13^{1-17} we have the list of the spies, their fathers and their tribes, symmetrically arranged with a characteristic heading and conclusion, 'these are the (their) names,' etc., vv.[4] and [16], a descriptive summary of the geographical range of their search (omitting the picturesque details of JE, such as the huge bunch of grapes, and the terrific giants), and the date of their return, vv.[25. 26a]. In their report no mixture of character is displayed, but there is a sharp contrast between the bad report of the ten spies, v.[32a], and the good report of Joshua and Caleb, 14[6. 7], of whom the latter only appears in JE. The effects on the congregation, as told in the P narrative, are probably to be found in 14[1. 2] (in part) [5] and [10]. This last verse has P's characteristic 'tent of meeting.' P's narrative seems to be continued in v.[26], but in this section the analysis is far more difficult and uncertain. In ch. 16 we can separate with little trouble P's rebellion of the Levitical Korah from JE's popular rebellion of Dathan and Abiram, the one against the high priesthood of Aaron, the other against the secular authority of Moses. Quite apart from the critical characters which mark the various sections of the chapter, it is evident that we have not here a single consistent account of a double rebellion, against Church and State, so to speak. For example, in v.[22] there is an allusion to the sin of 'one man,' evidently Korah, the 250 of v.[35] being merely his satellites; but almost immediately after, in v.[24], Dathan and Abiram are connected with Korah, as though acting in concert. In v.[25] the first two appear alone, and in v.[26] the warning to depart out of their tents, which as given by God in v.[24] refers to all three, is given by Moses only with reference to Dathan and Abiram. The test by which the claim of these two is to be tried, vv.[29. 30], is different from that threatened to Korah and his men in v.[7]. The latter, which is to take place while they are engaged in offering incense, is evidently connected with the punishment of v.[35]. There can be little doubt that in P's original account Korah was consumed by fire with the 250. It is probable that when the accounts were welded together his name was added in v.[32], and those of Dathan and Abiram in vv.[24] and [27a]. Except for some such modifications we can recognize P's narrative in vv.[1-11. 16-24. 27a. 35-50]. The portions of Dt commonly assigned to P are 4[41-43], the appointment of the cities of refuge, a necessity which arose in course of time out of the abolition of the high places where sanctuary was originally permitted, 32[48-52] 34[1a. 7-9]. P's account of the last days of Moses contains, among other characteristics of P, Moses' exact age, 34[7], and the statement that 'the children . . . did as J″ commanded Moses,' 34[9].

In Joshua the P portions are somewhat curiously distributed. P must certainly have contained some account of the conquest of the country, but it is probable that this was told in a dry and summary manner, and that the compilers preferred the more detailed and interesting account of the older sources. Certain it is that in chs. 1–12, containing the account of the conquest of the country, the only fragments which can be definitely recognized as derived from P are the accounts of the passover and other events in Gilgal told in 4[19] 5[10-12], and of the covenant made with the Gibeonites by the princes of the congregation, 9[15b. 17-21. 27a]. There are also suspicions of P in such details as those given in 3[4a] 4[13] 7[18b], but we certainly cannot prove from them what the range of P's narrative really was. Beyond ch. 12 there is some difficulty, as there is evidence of mixture with other sources, but the following passages in their present form with little doubt belong to P, 13[15-33] 14[1-5] 15[1-12. 20-62] 16[4-9] 17[1a. 3-6] (notice, among other things, the characteristic headings). With ch. 18 we get on clearer ground. With the exception of 18[2-10] and 19[40b-47. 49-50], 18–21[42] and 22[9-34] belong almost entirely to P. It should be observed, however, that in this general analysis of P we have not, as a rule, attempted to distinguish between the work of P proper and later revisers.

D. Date and Origin of P.—(1) The date cannot be earlier than Solomon's Temple. The condition of religious worship evidenced by the Books of Judges and Samuel, for example the social character of the sacrificial feasts, Jg 21[19], 1 S 9[12-24] 20[18-24] etc.; the performance of sacrificial rites by other than Levites, as by Samuel, 1 S 7[9] 10[8] etc. (though an Ephraimite, 1 S 1[1]), David, 2 S 6[17], and David's sons, 2 S 8[18]; the illegality of the priestly portions, 1 S 2[12-17], which though enjoined by the Levitical law are here regarded as so sinful as to warrant the downfall of the house of Eli (2[22b.] is a very late gloss, not found even in the best MSS of the LXX),—all show that the laws of P were either unknown, or absolutely ignored during this early period. (2) Even after Solomon's reign, even if we could suppose that 1 and 2 K always give us an accurate account of the matter, and were not themselves influenced by P or kindred elements, the Levitical law would appear to have been only very partially observed. There are few references to it beyond the elaborate descriptions of the temple in 1 K 5–7. It is still disregarded by such great lights as Elijah and Elisha, who as prophets themselves sacrificed just as Samuel had done, and that without any regard for the one sanctuary which P throughout supposes, for example Lv 17[3. 4]. (3) This argument from silence is strengthened by the remarkable fact that in Chronicles we have in many respects a Levitical version of the same facts as those differently related in Samuel and Kings; as, for example, of the bringing up of the ark from Kiriath-jearim (contrast 2 S 6 with 1 Ch 15–16[6]), and the conspiracy against Athaliah (contrast 2 K 11 with 2 Ch 22[10]–23), making it almost certain that the Books of Samuel and Kings were in the main written before, those of Chronicles after, the institutions of P were formulated. (4) A further terminus a quo is furnished by a comparison between the codes of D and P. We have already shown at some length reasons for believing that the code of P was subsequent to that of D (see above, ii. C), showing in every respect signs of greater elaboration and development. (5) The style of P shows, by its stiffness, artificiality, and conciseness of treatment, that it is dealing with a dead past—a mere summary composed out of old written records, not the perpetuation in literary form of a still living tradition. All these facts point in the same direction, that P was far later than JE, and probably considerably later than D. Indeed, a considerable distance of time is required to account for the difference of vocabulary. (6) There is no historical event likely to account for P previous to the Exile. Such a document as compared with D marks a reformation, one might almost say a revolution, in religious worship. But it may easily be accounted for by the Exile itself. Outside of P there was no complete system of ritual laws. In all probability, they were largely traditional and of gradual growth. Some of them were codified in Dt, but a great many points are not mentioned, for precisely the same reason that many points of ritual are left untouched in the rubrics of the English Prayer-Book, because they are matters of common knowledge settled by prevailing custom. If a stranger could be supposed to have to conduct a service in an English Church, he would not know what he was expected to say, or whether he was expected to say anything, before and after the sermon, in what part of the Church he was to read the lessons, the Litany, or preach the sermon, and many other things of the kind. How many more serious questions must naturally have arisen concerning the ritual of sacrifice, involving, as it did, so much manual work! These things were originally decided, it is probable, by local custom. When religious worship had become centralized at Jerusalem they would probably be settled authoritatively by the body of priests, who are likely to have followed in the main the traditions of the old sanctuary of Jerusalem. (7) But when the line of tradition was broken by the Exile the need would have arisen for more elaborate directions, and we do actually find the prophet Ezekiel framing a sort of manual of ritual, though in some respects ideal and visionary (chs. 40–48). (8) But the troubles and disturbances which followed upon the Restoration must have made it difficult to establish any complete system of worship, and we do not hear of any complete religious organization till the time of Ezra. It would probably then be near the truth to say that P is the result of the religious movement which began with Ezekiel in Babylon, and found its completion with Ezra. Just as the book of the Law found in the house of J″ in Josiah's reign was D, or the nucleus of D, so it is likely that the law-book read by Ezra, Neh 8, was P, or the essential part of P. It is important to observe that the legal ordinances referred to in Neh are to be found in P rather than in D; for example, the custom of dwelling in booths, 8^{13-18}.

3. JE. The Jahwistic and Elohistic Sources.—A. When we have taken away from the Hexateuch all the passages which can with a fair degree of probability be assigned to D or P, we find that the remainder forms a fairly complete and homogeneous whole, giving us, by a succession of narratives more or less connected, an outline of Jewish history from the Creation to the Settlement in Palestine, in fact covering, speaking generally, the same ground as P. This remainder we might have regarded as one literary source, were it not that a difference of authorship is discovered by the use of Elohim and J″ in Gn–Ex 3 (see above, ii. D), which enables us to distinguish at once a certain number of sections as belonging to J and E respectively. Thus to J belong 2^{4b}–4^{26} 5^{29} 6^{1-4} 7–8 (ptly.) 9^{20-27} $10^{8-19.\ 21}$ 11^{1-9} $12^{1-4a.\ 6-20}$ $13^{1-5.\ 6b-11a.\ 12b-18}$ 15 (with some mixture perhaps of E), $16^{1b-2.\ 4-14}$ 18. 19^{1-28} 22^{20-24} (unless the insertion of a reviser) 24. 28^{13-16} 38. 39. To E we may with equal certainty assign 20^{1-17} 21^{6-32} 22^{1-13} $28^{10-12.\ 17-22}$ $31^{4-17a.\ 19-44}$ 31^{51}–32^{2} 35^{1-5} 40–42. 45 (almost entirely) 46^{1-5} $48^{1.\ 2.\ 8-22}$ 50^{15-26}. But in other sections either the name of God seldom occurs, or the names at first sight seem used indifferently, the sections being in the latter case generally compounded, as a close examination shows, of both sources. After Exodus, though we can readily see that both sources still continue, the distinction becomes more difficult, because though E, unlike P, still uses the name Elohim sometimes, J″ is more generally used; but even here this occasional use of Elohim is often helpful in discovering E sections. The mixture of divine names in Gn–Ex 3 sometimes arises from the fact that E purposely uses the name J″ and vice versâ. Thus E of necessity used the name J″ in Ex 3^{14} itself, but also in Gn 28^{22}, where the name has a peculiar emphasis, the point being that Jacob promises to worship his country's God even in a strange land; the name is, however, sometimes assigned to a reviser. This is probably the case also with Gn 22^{14}, unless it be actually a Jahwistic passage inserted in the E story. On the other hand, Elohim is sometimes used by J: (1) When God is spoken of by those not in covenant with J″, as by Adam and Eve before the time of Seth, when men began to call on the name of J″ (Gn 4^{26}), and by the Serpent (Gn 3^{1-5} 4^{25} etc.). (2) When emphasis is laid on God's abstract nature, especially in contrast to man, Gn 16^{13} 32^{30} (see below, iii. 3. B). (3) In the construct state, when with a following word it is used descriptively of God, as 'God of Abraham,' 'of heaven and earth,' etc., Gn $24^{3.\ 7.\ 27}$ 26^{24} etc.

B. The separation of J and E in mixed passages, and those especially in which the name of God is for any of the reasons given not a sufficient criterion, as in the later books of the Hexateuch, is a matter of considerable difficulty, there being no characters of J or E so marked as to enable us (as we could with D and P) at once to assign the sections in which they occur to either source; but it can in most cases be decided with a fair degree of certainty. Moreover, the more the passages which can be definitely assigned to one source or the other, the easier the task becomes, because we obtain a larger number of criteria by which to recognize either source. But in spite of the labours of critics there still remains a considerable number of passages in which the division of sources is very uncertain. There is, too, always a certain danger of using as criteria comparatively rare words or phrases, which possibly by accident happen to occur once or twice in one source or the other. The reasonings by which the critical results are obtained are very complicated. They are chiefly those suggested by breaks in the narrative, points of contact, whether by continuity of language or connexion of subject, with known E or J fragments, and the like. Such arguments are often more trustworthy than those derived from vocabulary. We can make this clearer by analyzing Gn 32 as an example. Here there is no P passage, and the whole certainly belongs to JE. Vv.[1] and [2] (Heb.[2.\ 3], and so on with the other verses) are obviously the conclusion of an E section (31^{51}–32^{2}), the name Elohim being used throughout and constantly, though the section has no P characteristics. It will be seen on examination that vv.[3-13a] belong to J. For (1) there is no apparent continuity between vv.[2] and [3]. (2) On the other hand, vv.[3-13a] form a narrative continuous in itself without any obvious breaks, and the same is true of vv.[13b-21]. (3) Vv.[3-13a] contain parallels, differing in detail, both with the preceding and the following paragraphs, and therefore belong to a different source from either. Thus v.[10c] gives a different explanation of Mahanaim from that given in v.[2], and in vv.[13b-21] Jacob is (a) again described as dividing his property in view of the coming of Esau, but (b) differently, each drove by itself, vv.[16.\ 17], instead of the whole into two, v.[7], and (c) with a different purpose, in order to propitiate his brother by degrees with an accumulation of peace-offerings, vv.[17-20], not that one might escape if Esau attacked the other, as in v.[8]; (d) the property is differently described, goats being added, slaves—male and female—omitted, or rather male slaves mentioned, not as part of the proposed present, but as having charge of it, cf. vv.[14-16] with [5.\ 7]. Again, v.[21b] is a repetition of v.[13a]. (4) Again, both vv.[3-13a] and [13b-21] have points of contact with other known J and E sections respectively. Thus the possessions of $32^{5.\ 7}$ correspond very closely with 30^{43}, which belongs to J's account of the manner in which Jacob obtained his wealth by trickery, 30^{35-43}, and stands in contrast to E's account, which describes it as a miracle revealed by God in a dream, 31^{4-17}, or, at any rate, as so explained by Jacob. The latter passage is marked as E's by the constant use of Elohim. Again, 32^{9} refers to 31^{3}, an evidently J passage. So far all is clear, but in vv.[22-32], which has the appearance of a complete and unmixed passage, there is some difficulty. At first sight we should naturally think that it belongs to E, because of Elohim in vv.[28] and [30], and it is so referred by Dillmann; but the word, which is after all only one out of many criteria, may have been used purposely to express the abstract idea of God. The divine nature was such that even to see God, far more to wrestle with Him, meant death. And there are, in fact, many reasons for ascribing the passage to J. (1) The crude anthropomorphism is more in accordance with J's conception of God, see Gn 3^8 8^{21} 11^5 $18^{1.\ 2}$, Ex 4^{24} etc. E, indeed, is fond of dreams described as dreams (Gn 20^3 $28^{10\text{-}12}$ 40. 41), but with J even these are described realistically (see Gn 15^{17}, and cf. $28^{13\text{-}16}$ (J) with $28^{12.\ 17\ \text{etc.}}$ (E)). (2) Stories explanatory of place-names are far more characteristic of J than of E. (3) V.[23b] is a doublet of v.[21], which speaks of the present as having already gone over. We may confidently then assign to E $32^{1.\ 2.\ 13b\text{-}21}$, to J $32^{3\text{-}13a.\ 22\text{-}32}$. The examination of this chapter will give some idea of the methods by which J and E may be often separated, but it must be admitted that in many cases, as in Gn $27^{1\text{-}45}$, the analysis is much more difficult and uncertain.

C. For a complete analysis of JE throughout the Hexateuch the reader is referred to the critical works enumerated at the end of this article, especially the Tables prefixed to Holzinger's work, and artt. EXODUS, NUMBERS, etc. Sometimes the subject-matter forms indirectly a sufficient criterion for E or J. In the last chapters of Genesis and the early chapters of Exodus we find, as already noticed, two distinct traditions with regard to the locality occupied by the Israelites—one representing them as being in Goshen, apart from Egypt; the other as being among the Egyptians, employing the same midwives, able in the hurried departure of the night-journey to borrow jewels of their Egyptian neighbours, their houses so close together that the difference put by J″ between the Egyptians and Israel in the plague of the firstborn was a miracle of Divine Providence. The second view is certainly that of P (see Gn $47^{6a.\ 7\text{-}11}$), but we find it also running through several JE sections. Now there are several reasons for ascribing Gn 46^{28}–47^5 to J, among them being the prominence given to Judah, as in what we have reason to believe to be the J fractions of 37. 38. and 43, and the use of the word 'Israel' for 'Jacob,' the latter being generally found in E. It will therefore follow that in the JE portions all the sections in which Goshen is spoken of as the home of the Israelites belong to J, the rest to E.

D. The general characteristics of JE stand in marked contrast to P. The narratives are full of life and movement, and have a genuine local colour. The characters are men and women with flesh and blood, engaged in all the real and varied occupations of a simple and natural life. The stories are never so subordinated to a religious or historical purpose as to lose their individual interest. They give the impression that, from whatever sources the writers may have derived the thread of their stories, the colouring is that of a life with which they were familiar in all its aspects. But beyond this it will be found that J and E have each sufficiently marked characters of their own. The God of E is a God separate from man, who reveals Himself usually by a voice from heaven, often that of an angel, as in Gn 21^{17} 22^{11} (where Elohim seems to have been altered into J″ to agree with 22^{14}); so in Gn 28^{12} the angels need a ladder to ascend and descend to and from God (contrast J's account in ver.[13] 'and behold J″ stood beside him'). Or God reveals Himself by a dream, as in Gn 20^3 31^{11}. Even when anthropomorphic expressions are used, as 'God came,' Nu 22^{20}, 'the finger of God,' Ex 31^{18b}, 'spake unto Moses face to face,' Ex 33^{11} (cf. Nu 12^8), they do not seem, as in J, to convey any definite anthropomorphic idea. But the J″ of J is much more human. Though recognized as 'the God of heaven' and the 'God of earth,' Gn 24^3 etc., He was yet believed on occasions to have in His own person walked and talked with men, Gn 3^8 $18^{1\ \text{etc.}}$ 28^{13}, Ex 4^{24}, so that Abraham actually mistook Him for a man, and Jacob wrestled with Him by night, Gn 32^{24}. He needed to go down in order to see the city and the tower, which the children of men builded, and again to see whether the Sodomites had done altogether according to the cry which had reached Him in heaven, Gn 11^5 18^{21}. E has a good deal more to say of religious worship, especially in connexion with different localities, such as Bethel and Shechem, so much so that God is once actually called 'the God of Bethel,' Gn 35^7. To E belong the earliest sacrificial laws, Ex $20^{22\text{-}26}$. E mentions the construction of the holy Tent of Meeting, $33^{7\text{-}11}$, and the ark, which is spoken of almost as though it were itself an object of religious worship, Nu $10^{33\text{-}36}$. E also speaks of other primitive symbols of worship, as, notably, pillars, Gn $28^{18.\ 22}$ 31^{45} 35^{14} (probably taken from E though in a P section), Ex 24^4; teraphim, Gn $31^{19.\ 30}$; the brazen serpent, Nu $21^{4\text{-}9}$ (cf. 2 K 18^4). But such symbols do not always meet with approval. Jacob as an act of exceptional piety makes his family put away their strange gods (teraphim) and ear-rings (a religious charm?), Gn $35^{2\text{-}4}$; the calf-worship is condemned, Ex 32. E also has a reference to tithe in Gn 28^{22}. In J the feasts of the sacrificial laws, in their earliest form at any rate, have less of a ritual element, Ex $34^{10\text{-}28a}$, cf. $23^{10\text{-}33}$. As compared with E, J's narratives are, on the whole, more graphic and picturesque, and appeal more powerfully to the imagination, as especially Gn 2^{4b}–3. 24, Ex 2; but this is partly due to the subjects treated of. J's style is remarkably easy and simple, that of E is somewhat more stiff and formal, and the treatment more dignified, as in Gn 22. We have a good illustration of their difference of character in their treatment of the marvellous. In J the most wonderful phenomena appear quite natural. The writer feels himself in an ideal fairy land in which no wonders are surprising. When we are told that J″ brings the animals to the man to see what he would call them, we do not think of asking how this was possible, or even how it was done. But in other cases what in E are insisted upon as miracles, are in J ascribed to natural means. In J Jacob obtains his flocks and herds by a cunning trick thoroughly in keeping with his character, Gn $30^{35\text{-}43}$. In E it is by a special act of God's providence, $31^{4\text{-}13}$. In J the wonders of Egypt are performed by natural agency. It is an east wind that brings the locusts, Ex 10^{13}, that drives back the waters of the Red Sea, 14^{21}. In E these are performed by the, so to speak, magic power of Moses' rod. Similarly, Amalek is defeated by the virtue of Moses' uplifted hand. The story of Jacob and Laban illustrates also another tendency of E, to soften moral difficulties. The deception of his old father had been largely the fault of his mother, and also took place before the covenant with God at Bethel, and therefore might be passed over, but Jacob's dishonesty in dealing with Laban seemed inconsistent with the character of a patriarch. Notice again how E justifies the expulsion of Hagar, which in J is merely the result of jealousy (Gn $16^{4\text{-}6}$), by representing it as the express command of God (21^{12}). There are also some important differences in the subject-matter of these two. In J Moses acts by and for himself. In E much importance is attached to subordinates. Aaron assists him in his miracles, and Jethro gives him practical advice, and leads him in the wilderness, Ex 18. Joshua acts as his minister, 24^{13}. In J the patriarchs are connected with Hebron, Gn 13^{18} 18^{1}, in E with Beersheba, 22^{19} 28^{10} 46^{5}, and Shechem, 33^{19} 48^{22}. In J Judah takes the leading part among Joseph's brethren, Gn 37^{26} $43^{1\text{-}14}$ $44^{14.\ 16.\ 18}$ 46^{28}, in E Reuben, $37^{21.\ 22.\ 29}$ $42^{22.\ 37}$. In E the prophetic element is more prominent than in J. Abraham, Gn $20^{7.\ 17}$, and Moses, Ex 33^{11} (E?), Nu 12^{8}, Jos 14^{6} (cf. also Ex $20^{18\text{-}21}$, Nu 11^{2} 21^{7}), are described as prophets, Miriam as a prophetess, Ex 15^{20}. Joshua is the prophetic successor of Moses, both in wonder-working, Jos 8, and in his final exhortation and the promulgation of his law-book, 24.

E. Besides the use of Elohim and J″ respectively, we find the following words and phrases characteristic of these two documents:—

E.—'Amorites' (used as name of aborigines of Palestine) for 'Canaanites.' 'Horeb' for 'Sinai.' 'Jacob' for 'Israel' (yet latter occurs in several E passages, esp. Gn 48–50, perhaps introduced by R). 'Jethro' for 'Raguel' of J. 'The man Moses,' three times. אָמָה 'handmaid,' for שִׁפְחָה (J) invariably, as in Ex 21. בְּעִיר 'beast' (only in E). בַּעַל 'lord' in its several uses as 'husband' (J and P have אִישׁ in this sense, E never). חִזֵּק לֵב 'harden heart,' Ex 1–12, for הִכְבִּיד, הִכְבֵּד לֵב (J). כֹּה of place (J applies it to time). לִבָּם for לֵב (J). נָסָה 'try,' 'prove,' esp. of God, as in Gn 22^{1}, Ex 15^{25} 20^{20} (?Ex 16^{4} $17^{2.\ 7}$). הֶעֱלָה 'bring up,' of bringing up the Israelites out of Egypt. פָּנַע בְּ 'to light upon,' as in Gn 28^{11}. רַגְלַיִם, lit. 'feet,' in sense of 'times,' Ex 23^{14}. רָפָא 'heal,' with God as subject, Gn 20^{17}, Nu 12^{13} (so a ground for ascribing Ex 15^{26} in its original form [see above, iii. 1. C] to E). שִׂים לְגוֹי, lit. 'put for a nation,' for עָשָׂה לְגוֹי, lit. 'make for a nation' (J). תְּמוֹל שִׁלְשֹׁם 'the day before yesterday,' with בְּ or זִן, certainly characteristic of E, though in some of the Ex passages all critics do not agree. פָּתַר 'interpret' of dreams.

J.—אֲרַם נַהֲרַיִם 'Aram Naharaim' for 'Paddan-aram' (P). 'Israel' for 'Jacob.' 'Sinai,' as in P, for 'Horeb' (D, E). 'Canaanites,' but 'Perizzite,' Gn 13^{7} 34^{30}, Jg $1^{4.\ 5}$ (according to Meyer an interpolation). 'To find grace in the eyes of,' very frequent in J, also in some JE passages. 'To call on the name of J″' frequent. 'To run to meet' frequent. Israelites called 'Israel,' not 'sons of Israel' (P), so 'Egypt' for 'Egyptian,' 'Reuben,' 'Gad,' etc., of the separate tribes. 'His brother,' in genealogies. אַדְמָה 'land,' where אֶרֶץ would be used by E and P. אֲנִי for אָנִי, usually. לָקַח לוֹ אִשָּׁה 'took him a wife,' regular formula in J, but once in E. בְּאָזְנֵי 'as thou goest.' בִּי אֲדֹנִי 'I pray thee, my lord,' frequent but not exclusively in J. חִיָּה זֶרַע 'to preserve seed alive.' חָרַב 'to be dry,' as of the Flood, for יָבֵשׁ (P). טָרַם for בְּטֶרֶם (E, only once in J). יָלַד Qal, 'to beget.' יָשַׁב בְּתוֹךְ 'dwell in the midst.' כָּבֵד in sense of 'to be great, important.' לֵב for 'self,' as Gn 6^{6} 8^{21}. מִכְפּוֹא 'fodder,' Gn $24^{25.\ 32}$ (E has תֶּבֶן, Gn 45^{33}). נָא with imperatives, etc. (in Gn 40 times in J, 6 in E). נִשְׁמַת חַיִּים 'breath of life,' Gn 2^{7} 7^{22} (רוּחַ inserted), for רוּחַ חַיִּים (P), הַבְּהֵמָה, הַחַיָּה, etc., frequent. צְעִירָה, צָעִיר of younger brothers and sisters (E קָטֹן). שָׁלֹחַ יָדָא frequently, but once in E, Gn 21^{31}. שִׁפְחָה with P, etc., for אָמָה (E). Notice also a preference for the verbal suffix אֵת.

F. Date and Origin of JE.—The fact that most of the contents of JE are referred to by Amos and Hosea makes it probable that JE was prior to these prophets, but not absolutely certain, because, when these books were written, the stories may still have been current only in the form of oral tradition, and the absence of any mention of the story of Joseph, so full of religious and moral suggestions, is remarkable, though in such short books it is far from conclusive. But the priority to these prophets is made still more likely by the attitude of E towards religious symbols (see above, iii. 3. D). Hosea and Amos, while they show that such symbols still existed as a matter of course, evidently regarded them with disfavour. It is significant also that E, though disapproving of human sacrifice, exhibits no horror at the thought of it. To accept the blood of victims instead was a gracious act of God, who was willing in mercy to waive His just rights (Gn 22). Again, the fact that E speaks of Abraham, Moses, etc., as prophets (see iii. 3. D), points to a time when the prophet occupied an influential position. Add to this that the highest teaching of JE resembles that of the prophets. We can hardly then be far wrong in regarding the times of Hosea and Amos as the terminus ad quem for JE. But the differences of character between J and E, especially in their theological conceptions, tend to show that J is the older of the two documents. Moreover, the differences that we find within each of these documents, but most especially in J (see below, iii. 4. A), make it likely that both J and E were originally collections of stories varying in date, and probably handed down for the most part, if not entirely, by oral tradition, some of them, it may be, centuries before they were committed to writing. Probably, as among other nations, the oldest which acquired a fixed form were popular songs describing some great national events, such as the Song of Miriam (Ex 15) and those preserved in Nu 21 (cf. also the Song of Deborah, Jg 5). In Gn $4^{23.\ 24}$ we have evidently a fragment of a song far older than the text with which it is incorporated. The chief allusion in the poem was apparently not understood, or at any rate is left unexplained by J. The attempt to fix the date of JE by comparing the patriarchal stories with the relations between the Israelites and the surrounding tribes is not very satisfactory. It may be true that the origin attributed to the Moabites and Ammonites is due to the animosity felt against these related peoples, but the animosity was so constant, at least from the time of the Judges, that we get little help in fixing the date of the story. Again, to refer the whole story of Joseph to the ascendency of the Northern kingdom in the time of Jeroboam II., and date its origin at this period, is to suppose it a deliberate invention, not, as the analogy of other such stories renders far more probable, a legend which had gradually grown up by oral tradition. From the importance attached to the local sanctuaries of Bethel, Shechem, and Beersheba (which last belonged to Simeon, one of the ten tribes), and the great prominence of Joseph, the father of Ephraim and Manasseh, it has generally been supposed that E at any rate was the product of the kingdom of Israel. Add to this that the North, the mission field of Elijah and Elisha, was in early times the chief scene of literary and prophetic activity. These arguments apply also, but with less force, to J, where Hebron takes the place of Beersheba as the abode of Abraham and Jacob; and Judah, instead of Reuben, holds a prominent place in the history of Joseph. From these facts it has been argued that J, though its material was originally derived from the same source as E, either in oral or written form, is in its present form the work of a Jewish composer or editor.

G. It is probable that J and E were blended into one whole before D's law-book was composed, as Dt 5–11 suppose it. Even if these chapters are not the work of D proper, they must have been added very shortly after.

4. Distinctions within the various sources.—We have hitherto regarded the different sources of the Hexateuch, for the most part, as though they were each homogeneous in character. In a certain sense they are, in that they possess individual characters which distinguish each from the rest; but within these are found considerable variations, just as we find among plants or animals several distinctly characterized species under one genus, or, to use a still better simile, varieties under one species. It is, in fact, probable that each of these larger sources represents in itself the result of a literary process extending in some cases over centuries.

A. For example, in the J sections of Gn the Flood story, with the beginnings of civilization and the dispersion of races following upon it (11^{1-9}), seems hardly consistent with the growth of civilization described in 4^{16-24}. It has also been suggested that Noah the inventor of wine (9^{20-27}) belongs to a distinct cycle of legends from Noah the hero of the Flood, and that 6^{1-4} gives a different explanation of the origin of sin from 3. Finally, it seems probable that the story of Nimrod, etc. (10^{8-15}), came from the same cycle of stories as the Flood story, and is also of Accadian origin. Hence some critics have drawn a definite distinction between two series of stories, which they have denoted as J^1 and J^2 respectively. To the latter Wellhausen ascribes J's Flood, together with $10^{8-15.\ 18b.\ 19.\ 21.\ 25-30}$ 11^{1-9}. Some critics, however, have ascribed 6^{1-4} as well as 10^{16-18} to revisers of JE (JE^s). Attention has been called to the fact that whereas in J^2 the three sons of Noah are Japheth, Ham, Shem (Gn 10), the sons of Noah in J^1 (9^{20-27}) were originally, as vv.$^{26.\ 27}$ apparently show, Shem, Canaan, Japheth. In Gn 12 and later chapters J^2 has been found by some critics a convenient peg on which to hang unknown fragments, interpolations, etc., such as 12^{10-20} $18^{17-19.\ 22-33a}$, and even 20^{18}, passages usually referred to JE^s or R.

B. Distinctions in E are not so frequently insisted on, but some critics have referred to an earlier source, E^1, such passages as show traces of archaic ideas or expressions, such as the anthropomorphic expressions of Gn 20^{3-7} (cf. Nu 22^{20}, etc.), the ancient custom referred to in Gn 20^{16}, the word קְשִׂיטָה in Gn 33^{19}, Jos 24^{32}.

C. In D we can trace several different stages. It is now generally admitted that the Deuteronomic Code begins either with Dt 5 or with Dt 12. Dt 1–4, and perhaps also 5–11, were afterwards written as an introduction, and still later the history was continued with the Deuteronomic recension of Joshua. It seems likely that these were the gradual work of the Deuteronomic school, extending well on into the period of the Jewish captivity. The D elements of the earlier books of the Hexateuch are sometimes ascribed, not to this school, but to the compilers of JE. At any rate, they probably belong to a comparatively early period.

D. In P the fact of constant revision and gradual compilation is easy to prove, but it is not so easy to say how many distinct stages there were in its history, still less to assign the exact dates to which they belong. The following facts are, however, capable of easy demonstration.

(1) The nucleus of P lies in what is known as the Code of Holiness (P^h) contained in Lv 17–26, though these chapters now contain many interpolations (esp. $22^{17-25.\ 29.\ 30}$ $23^{1-8.\ 23-38}$ 24^{1-14}). This section is marked off from the rest of the P legislation (a) by its highly spiritual character and intense feeling of reverence for the holiness of God and everything connected with His service. P^h is the centre and kernel of the new religious movement; (b) by its intimate relation to the ideal of ritual, etc., sketched out by Ezekiel, chs. 40–48; (c) by its use of a special terminology, words and phrases being found which occur nowhere else. It will be sufficient here to call attention to such phrases as 'I am J″,' 'I J″ am your God,' 'I your God am holy,' and the like; 'walk in my (etc.) ordinances,' 'do and keep my statutes and my judgments,' אֶתֵּן פָּנַי, 'I will set my face,' 'that man shall be cut off from his people,' 'my (J″'s, etc.) Sabbaths.' For a more complete list see Driver, LOT^{6}, 49. (d) By discrepancies between P^h and the general body of Levitical law. Thus in P^h the later distinction between the high priest and the ordinary priests is still in the making. The chief priest is but primus inter pares (the priest who is greater than his brethren, Lv 21^{10}). Notice that the injunction which in Lv 21^{10} is laid upon the chief priest only, not to let the hair of his head go loose, or rend his clothes, is in Lv $10^{6.\ 7}$ laid upon all the priests. The Feast of Booths lasted, according to the original text of Lv 23^{39-44}, 7 days instead of 8, and is still determined by the season, 'when ye have gathered in the fruits of the land'; the addition of the 8th day and the words 'on the 15th day of the 7th month' in v.^{39}, evidently are interpolations (inconsistent with vv.$^{40-42}$) added when the laws were incorporated into the larger code. On the other hand, it is possible that P^h included passages now outside Lv. 17–26, as esp. Ex $6^{6.\ 7}$, Lv $11^{1-23.\ 41-47}$ in their original form. With reference to the relation of P^h to Ezekiel, it should be noticed that the resemblance extends not only to the general tenor of the subject, a thing in itself striking enough, but even to the style and phraseology; and in this respect it is not confined to these chapters of Ezekiel, but several expressions of P^h are found scattered in various parts of the prophet [see Kuenen, § 15, note 10]. That P^h, therefore, was written either by Ezekiel himself or by one imbued with his spirit, and in all probability a contemporary, does not admit of reasonable doubt, and we cannot be far wrong in assigning it to the latter half of the Exile.

(2) The next in order of time, and the most important of the Priestly documents, is the historical and legislative work known frequently as P^g, which contains all of P excepting P^h on the one hand, and certain later accretions in the legislative portions on the other. The central feature of P^g is the promulgation of the laws, which are all represented as revealed to Moses on Mt. Sinai. P^g was probably, as already suggested, the law promulgated by Ezra, Neh 8. 9^3. Notice that the Feast of Booths is kept eight days according to P^g, see Nu 29^{35}.

(3) A third stage is reached in the union of P^g and P^h, but whether it took place before or after the promulgation of P by Ezra cannot be determined. All that can be said with certainty is that Ezra was the head, perhaps the founder, of a school of scribes specially suited for carrying out a work of this kind.

(4) Lastly, there is evidence of various additions and revisions of the Priestly Code made from time to time (P^s). The most important of the former in Ex–Nu are Ex 30. 31^{1-17} 34^{29-35} 35–40, Lv 1–7. 8. 11^{24-40} 12–15. 16 (in part), most of Nu 1–10^{28} 15. 19, the whole of 28–31. To these we should add the additions to P^h, esp. in Lv 23, to make it agree with P^g. The necessity of supposing such additions to P^g cannot be here proved at length. It is enough to say generally that the proof lies in certain repetitions, inconsistencies, and want of sequence. For example, Ex 35–40 Lv 8 taken together are a repetition of Ex 25–29. Ex 30^{1-10} describes a special altar of incense of which there is no mention in the list of holy things in 26^{31-37}. Cf. Lv 16^{12}, which seems to imply that the one altar was used both for incense and sacrifice. Ex 30 (or at any rate 35) –Lv 8 breaks the sequence between Ex 29 and Lv 9, and Lv 1–7 is itself a collection of laws with several slight inconsistencies. Finally, Lv 11–15 breaks the connexion between 10 and 16.

(5) To these we should also add the incorporation of the already united JED into P; but to what date either this or the various supplements spoken of under (4) belong, cannot be determined. Probably, the latter represent a long and very gradual process. Kuenen argues from the difference of arrangement found in the LXX translation of Ex 35–40, belonging to 3rd cent. B.C., that the final redaction of these chapters was even then hardly completed.

5. Editorial Revisers.—It has not been found practicable within the limits of this article to give a complete estimate of the work of the various editorial revisers. That several alterations were made as the different sources were welded together is practically certain. A few examples of editorial emendations must suffice. In Gn 22^2 'the land of Moriah' is very suspicious (esp. if, according to Gn 14, Jerusalem was already in existence), inasmuch as (1) the name Moriah does not appear again until the very late Book of Chronicles, (2) E otherwise shows no partiality towards Judah, (3) it could not have taken 3 days to get from Beersheba to Jerusalem, see v.^{4}. It is probable, therefore, that an original 'Amorite' or name of some Ephraimitish mountain, which had perhaps become illegible, was altered by a reviser with Southern propensities, possibly JE, but more probably P^s. 22^{14-19} is certainly not part of the E narrative, but is possibly some fragment of J worked in to suit the story. It is, however, to be observed that in v.^{18} 'be blessed' is הִתְבָּרְכוּ, not וְנִבָרְכוּ as elsewhere in J; so some have regarded it as the work of a reviser. In $35^{14.\ 15}$ we have probably the working in of an E fragment in a section of P (see above, iii. 3. D). Ex 34^{11-26} has been revised by JE or D to agree with other passages, and in vv.$^{29-35}$ it is followed by a story embodying perhaps an old tradition, but written in the spirit and style of P.

iv. SUMMARY.—We may now summarize in this way the probable history of the Hexateuch. For many centuries probably the only records of the past were those contained in song and saga. It is very possible that, as with the ancient Icelanders, these were recited at religious festivals (Ex $15^{1.\ 20.\ 21}$, cf. Jg 11^{40}). The first attempts to collect these, so as to form a connected written history, probably date from the 8th or 9th cent. B.C., and originated presumably in the schools of the prophets. There are sufficient evidences of two distinct versions of this ancient history, J and E; but though they deal for the most part with the same cycle of subjects, and E is probably the later of the two, there is no proof that there is any literary connexion between them. Later on, towards the close of the 7th cent., these two documents were combined together, but so skilfully that it is often very difficult to separate them (JE). About the same time in Jerusalem a code of ritual regulations and customs, commonly believed to have been revealed by God to Moses, was set forth in writing and afterwards published in the reign of Josiah (D). This code was shortly afterwards provided with a historic setting and combined with the earlier history, and the whole, especially the conquest of Canaan, revised by the same school (JED). It has been conjectured by Kuenen, who has been followed by several other critics, that E's Book of the Covenant, Ex 20^{22}–23, was originally represented as drawn up on the plains of Moab, and that, when the code of D was substituted for it, the former was put back so as to form part of the Sinaitic legislation. This will account both for the present difficulty in connecting Ex 20^{22}–24^{11} with its context, and also for the fact that, while in the historical summary of Dt 1–4 there is no reference to the Bk of the Covenant, several of its provisions in a revised form appear in the main body of D. During the Exile, possibly before the work of D^s was complete, a new body of ritual law, more priestly in its character, was drawn up, probably by some disciple of Ezekiel, and very possibly under his direction (P^h). This was followed by a new version of the whole history, and especially the legislation, conceived in a still more sacerdotal spirit, which was probably completed about a century later, and promulgated by Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh 8. 9) (P^g). Finally, by the union of this with P^h, and the additions of new laws and regulations from time to time, and various editorial revisions extending down to it may be the 3rd cent. (P^s), we get our present Hexateuch.

v. THE HISTORICAL VALUE OF THE HEXATEUCH. —It is, of course, obvious that the Hexateuch as it stands is not strictly a historical work. It did not need criticism to discover this, but criticism makes it absolutely certain. It shows that the most definite and statistical details, those given namely in P, are the least to be depended upon, being unknown to the earliest writers, and apparently the calculations of a writer very far removed from the events described. There is also observable throughout a tendency in the various writers to throw back into their composition the customs, etc., of their own times. Thus the whole body of laws, originating in local custom, or handed down as common law and promulgated from time to time, would come to be fathered on Moses; just in the same way as the Chronicler read into the old documents the ritual of his own day. Similarly, it is probable that the contemporary religious and social customs of Northern Israel are in JE described as those of their ancestors who lived in a distant past. Regarded as a history of the ancient migrations of the Israelites, their establishment as a religious and political community, and their settlement in Canaan, the Hexateuch contains little more than a general outline on which to depend. We may gather that the Israelites were one among a number of Semitic peoples, who after long migration settled in or near Egypt, from which after a period of serfdom they finally escaped, and after further migrations gradually gained a footing in the trans-Jordanic territory, and afterwards made various incursions across the Jordan; until, finally, the larger part of the territory, especially on the hills where the Canaanitish chariots were useless, fell into their hands. That so many traditions and stories should have attached themselves to Abraham and Moses, even though many of them may be inapplicable or exaggerated, shows what a deep impression their personality and work made upon their generation, and it is hardly too much to say that probably all that was noblest and best in the nation must be attributed to such men as these who first sowed the seed, of which the prophetic teaching was the fruit. But if the Hex. has little to tell us of the early history of Israel, it has much to tell us of the times in which the authors lived. The habits and customs, the ideas, above all those connected with morality and religion, are faithfully represented. And thus we are enabled to trace something more than an outline of that history of religion which was the needful preparation for the teaching of Christ.

LITERATURE.—J. W. Colenso, The Pentateuch and Book of Joshua critically examined, 7 parts, London, 1862–1879; W. R. HEZEKIAH (on forms and meaning of the Heb. name see next article).—1. A king of Judah (see next art.). 2. An ancestor of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph 1^1), possibly to be identified with the king of the same name. 3. Head of a family of exiles who returned, Ezr 2^{16} = Neh 7^{21} (cf. 10^{17}).

HEZEKIAH (חִזְקִיָּהוּ or חִזְקִיָּהוּ, also חִזְקִיָּה or יְחִזְקִיָּה 'J" hath strengthened' or 'J" strengtheneth,' LXX Ἐζεκίας, Assyr. Ḫazaḳi(i)au).—A king of Judah, son and successor of the feeble and superstitious Ahaz, with whom he contrasts as favourably as with his own son and successor Manasseh. He is conspicuous in Jewish history as the first king who is said to have attempted a reformation of religion on the principles which we find formally laid down in the Bk. of Deuteronomy (2 K 18, 2 Ch 29 ff.; see HIGH PLACE, ii. p. 382[b]). Special interest also attaches to his reign on account of his close personal connexion with the prophet Isaiah, who occasionally exerted a great influence over him (especially in the memorable crisis which issued in the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib), and also because of the strong light thrown upon his times by the cuneiform inscriptions as well as by extant prophecies. H.'s history is recorded in 2 K 18^{13}–20^{19}, Is 36–39, and 2 Ch 29–32. The two former are very much alike, K being on the whole more full and exact, and Is having been borrowed from it by the compiler, who added the Song of H. (Is 38^{9-20}), but omitted the annalistic fragment in 2 K 18^{14-16} as not suiting his purpose, which was to trace the fulfilment of the prophecies of Isaiah in connexion with the siege of Jerusalem. Kings is evidently based not only on State annals, but also on prophetic narrative (derived partly from authentic documents, partly from tradition), which bears traces of the style of D in $37^{4.\ 34.\ 35}$ $38^{1.\ 3.\ 5}$ 39^1, and cannot be assigned to Isaiah (as suggested by 2 Ch 26^{22} 32^{32}) nor yet to a contemporary, in view of (a) the nature of the statements in $37^{7.\ (38).\ 36}$ 38^5, (b) such late words as יְהוּדִית ($36^{11.\ 13}$), (c) the apparent anachronisms in 36^{19} 37^{38}, and (d) the want of order and coherence in the narrative when carefully examined and compared with the Assyr. records.

The chronology of Hezekiah's reign is beset with special difficulty. According to 2 K 18^{10} the Fall of Samaria (722 as determined by Assyriologists) took place in the 6th year of H., which would give 728–7 as the date of his accession (Ewald, Bredenkamp, Delitzsch, Orelli, Strack, Driver, Kirkpatrick, Duhm, Skinner. Ussher, Winer, W. R. Smith make it 725). In 2 K 18^{13}, on the other hand, the invasion of Jerus. by Sennacherib (701) is said to have taken place in the 14th year of H., who must thus have commenced to reign in 715–4 (Kamphausen, Wellhausen, Ed. Meyer, Kittel, Guthe, Stade, Cornill, Hommel, Cheyne).

An attempt has been made to reconcile the earlier date with 2 K 18^{13} by supposing 14th to be a mistake for 24th (Bredenkamp), 27th (Rawlinson), 29th (Oppert), also by taking vv.[13-16] to refer to a campaign of Sargon in 711 (the name 'Sennacherib' being considered a late and erroneous insertion), a theory first advanced by E. Hincks (who confined the reference to Sargon to v.[13]); but for reasons stated by Kuenen, W. R. Smith, and others, the theory of such an invasion by Sargon is now generally abandoned, and the best solution is probably to be found in a rearrangement of the narrative. We have a clue to such rearrangement in 2 K 20 (Is 38), which records a sickness of H. that must have taken place in the 14th year of his reign if the latter extended to 29 years, and if H. lived 15 years after his recovery (2 K 18^2 20^6, Is 38^5). This sickness the compiler seems to have connected with the invasion by Sennacherib (2 K 20^{6b}, Is 38^6), applying to the invasion the note of time (14th year), which properly belonged to the sickness, and introducing the latter with the words 'In those days,' which may have originally belonged to the invasion. This view is supported by the fact that the account of Merodach-baladan's embassy, which took place after the sickness (2 K 20^{12}, Is 39^1), ought certainly to have come before the invasion, as after that event Merodach-baladan was not in a position to send ambassadors, his downfall having taken place the year before (702); nor was H., after being impoverished by the war (2 K 18^{13-16}), possessed of such treasures as would be likely to excite the admiration of his visitors (2 K 20^{13}, Is 39^2). A middle date is suggested by Winckler (followed by McCurdy), who takes 2 K 16^2 as his guide, setting aside both 18^{10} and 18^{13}, and fixes H.'s accession at 720–19. The earlier date, however, besides having 18^{10} to rest on, fits in with the subsequent chronology of the kings of Judah, and agrees with Jer $26^{18f.}$, which represents H. as under the influence of the prophet Micah, who is known to have prophesied before the Fall of Samaria (Mic 1^6). On the other hand, it aggravates the discrepancy between the age of Ahaz at his death (by reducing his reign from 16 to 8 years, while the 715 date gives him 20 years of a reign) and the age of H. at his accession, which is stated in 2 K 18^2 to be 25 years (but in LXX 20),—a difficulty which Whitehouse meets by supposing that H. was co-regent with his father from 727 to 715, and that his 14th year is to be reckoned from the latter date, when he was in a position to initiate a new policy following the counsels of Isaiah.

This uncertainty as to the chronology is of less importance, as the interest of H.'s reign, in the light both of prophecy and the Assyr. records, practically closes with the invasion in 701. Even if we suppose him to have lived till 686 (as the later date for his accession would imply), we gain little or no additional information regarding the events of his reign. Assuming that H. came to the throne in 727, it was as a young and inexperienced prince in the midst of faithless and time-serving politicians, who scorned the teaching of the prophets, and a like-minded priesthood. The deplorable state of morality and religion is evident from Mic 1 ff. (cf. Is 28) delivered on the eve of the siege of Samaria, i.e. about 725. These testimonies, as well as the fact that the anti-prophetic party continued in the ascendant till 701, oblige us to receive with caution the circumstantial account given by the Chronicler (2 Ch $29^{3ff.}$) of the reforms effected by H. in the very first year of his reign. He is said to have purified and refurnished the temple, which had been shut up by Ahaz after being despoiled of its treasures, to have renewed the ancient sacrifices with great magnificence and pomp, to have ordained a joyful celebration of the long-neglected Passover, after purging Jerus. of its idolatrous altars and sending out invitations to the Israelites in the north, 'the remnant that had escaped out of the hands of the king of Assyria.' So great was the enthusiasm said to have been evoked that it led to a general crusade against the images and altars and high places in the cities of Judah and Benjamin, Ephraim and Manasseh, both king and people at the same time giving evidence of their devotion by their munificent provision of tithes and offerings for the support of the priests and Levites, who were now carefully registered and organized. The only part of these reforms that is recognized in K is the removal of 'high places' and destruction of 'pillars' and 'Asherah' (2 K $18^{4.22}$), but a remarkable instance of H.'s zeal for purity of worship is also given (v.^{4}) in his destruction of 'the brazen serpent that Moses had made' which had become an object of worship in Jerusalem (see NEHUSTAN).

While it is generally admitted that H. paved the way for the reformation carried out by Josiah in the next century, not only prohibiting idolatry, but seeking to centralize the national worship by destroying the local sanctuaries in the provincial cities of Judah, around which heathen practices were apt to gather (cf. Mic 1^{5} 5^{12-14}, Is 30^{29} 31^{9} 1^{29} 2^{20}), it is held by Wellhausen, W. R. Smith, Nowack, Stade, and others, that the reforms could only have taken place after the Assyrian invasion, which brought dishonour on the provinces, but was the means of exalting Jerus. and glorifying its protecting deity, thus counteracting the idolatrous tendencies inherited from the previous reign. In proof that the reformation could not have been earlier, they cite the allusions to prevalent idolatry in such late prophecies of Isaiah as 30^{22} 31^{7} (c. 702). These indeed show that the reformation had been far from perfect (cf. 2 K 23^{13} and revulsion under Manasseh), being largely due to royal command; but the whole traditional account of H.'s reign points to an earlier date for his turning to J″. Cf. Jer $26^{18f.}$ already referred to, the eulogistic summary in 2 K 18^{3-7}, H.'s plea for divine favour in 20^{3}, and the demolition of high places, etc., ascribed to him by the Rabshakeh in 18^{22}, which, even if an interpolation (Cheyne), was not likely to be introduced unless it had some basis of tradition to rest on.

In addition to his work as a religious reformer, H. revived in some measure the glories of his great-grandfather Uzziah by successful inroads upon the Philistines, over one of whose cities (Ekron) we find him in 701 holding a position of suzerainty; by his care for the interests of national defence, repairing the walls and fortifications of Jerus., fitting up arsenals, constructing aqueducts and reservoirs for securing to Jerus., and cutting off from besiegers, a permanent supply of water; by building cities, and encouraging trade and agriculture through the erection of shelters for sheep and cattle and of store-houses for produce. Whether the underground tunnel leading from Gihon (the modern 'Fountain of the Virgin') to the upper pool of Siloam (1708 ft. long, and a work of great engineering skill) is to be identified with 'the conduit' mentioned in 2 K 20^{20} as the work of H., and apparently referred to in 2 Ch 32^{30} (cf. 32^{4} 22^{9-11} and Sir 48^{17}), is still a moot point, different opinions being held by experts as to the age of the inscription (discovered in 1880) at the mouth of the tunnel, which is in round characters and in old Hebrew but bears no date,* the question being also complicated by the mention of an already existing Shiloah in Is 8^{6}, on which see Dillmann's note, and Stade, GVI 593 f.

Among the merits which tradition assigned to H. was a taste for music and literature. In his restoration of the temple service, music, both vocal and instrumental, has a prominent place (2 Ch 29^{25-30}). In Pr 25^{1} we read of 'the men of Hezekiah' who copied out the proverbs of Solomon, and in the Talm. (Baba bathra, f. 15*a*) 'H. and his associates' are credited with the 'writing' of certain books of the OT. Is 38^{9-20} even contains a song which bears in its superscription to have been written by H. at the time of his sickness and recovery. But it is absent from 2 K, and its late insertion in Is appears to have disturbed the text, displacing v.$^{21f.}$. Moreover, it has no distinct marks of its alleged royal authorship, and bears a strong resemblance to Job and the later Psalms. For these reasons it is considered post-exilic by most recent critics, and is even supposed by Cheyne to refer (like Ps 88 and La 3) to the experience, not of an individual, but of the church-nation. In all probability, it was introduced into Is from a collection of liturgical songs (v.^{20}). The sickness referred to appears to have been of the nature of a boil or an abscess, being described by the same name (שְׁחִין) as is applied to one of the plagues of Egypt (Ex 9^{9}) and to the disease of Job (2^{7}). Its connexion with leprosy (Lv 13^{18}) explains the promise given to H. that on the third day he would 'go up unto the house of J″.' The effect produced on H. by the prophetic announcement that his illness was to prove fatal, illustrates his tender and emotional nature, and enables us to understand the influence exerted over him by the wise and fearless counsellor who on this as on other occasions interpreted to him the will of J″. With regard to the sign given to H. by the prophet in token of his recovery, if the fuller text in K be accepted as the original, the narrative must be held to imply a claim on the part of Isaiah to a miraculous control of the forces of nature (20^{9}); but if K be regarded as an expansion and Is be held to be the original (Stade, Duhm, Dillmann), it is possible to explain the deflection of the shadow as the result of a partial eclipse of the sun or of refraction of light by the atmosphere, the mode of expression in Is 38^{8b} being similar to that in Jos 10^{13}, and capable of similar interpretation (see DIAL).

Probably, it was shortly after this sickness (c. 714) that the messengers arrived from Babylon (2 K 20^{12-19}, Is 39). Even if we must regard the promise of deliverance from the king of Assyria in 2 K 20^{6b} Is 38^{6} as an interpolation, it is certain that about this time H. had reason to apprehend danger from that quarter. Almost from the commencement of his reign (cf. Is 28) there had been a growing feeling at Jerus. in favour of an alliance with Egypt. The feeling was shared by most of the Phœn. and Philistine powers, and in 720 a bold attempt was made by Gaza, with the support of Egypt, to throw off the supremacy. The defeat of the allied forces at Raphia crushed the movement before it broke into a general revolt; but Judah was no doubt more or less implicated, and it may have been to what took place at this time that Sargon refers in his Nimrod inscription (c. 717) when he speaks of himself as the 'conqueror of the remote land of Judah'—unless we suppose (with Winckler and Delitzsch) that Judah is here used by mistake for Israel. For the next seven or eight years Sargon was fully occupied in the consolidation of his empire in the east, and during that time the impression made on Judah and its neighbours by the fate of Samaria and Damascus had almost worn off, and a widespread conspiracy was forming against the domination of 'the great king.' With this we may connect the embassy from Merodach-baladan, Sargon's chief rival, who held the throne of Babylon from 721 till 710 when he was overthrown, only to regain his independence after Sargon's death, when he again wore the crown for about nine months, in 704–3; and to the latter period a few critics would assign his embassy to Jerus. (Wellhausen, W. R. Smith, Cheyne, McCurdy). The ostensible object of the visit was to congratulate H. on his recovery (cf. 2 Ch 32^{31}), but the real purpose (of which the accompanying gifts were a well-understood sign) was to court an alliance against the Assyr. power. The welcome which H. gave to the messengers, and the pride with which he showed them his sacred treasures and military stores, brought upon him, as might have been expected, the severest censure of the prophet; but the prediction of a Babylonian captivity for his family and possessions wears the appearance of a 'vaticinium ex eventu,' having nothing in common with the general tone of Isaiah's teaching at this time, which represents everything as culminating in the great struggle with Assyria. Notwithstanding the prophet's inflexible opposition to any alliance either with Babylon or Egypt, the danger of Judah's being involved in hostilities only became more threatening during the next few years (713–10), as we may judge from the intense earnestness of the prophet's utterances in connexion with the siege of Ashdod (Is 20), when he felt called of God to go about for three years 'naked and barefoot' in token of the fate which would overtake the Egyptians and their allies, as well as from Sargon's Ashdod inscription, which mentions the king of Judah among other tributaries who were at this time 'plotters of sedition,' stirring up rebellion against him and bringing gifts of friendship to Pharaoh, king of Egypt.

The death of Sargon in 705, and the accession of a new and untried king, was the signal for a fresh attempt on the part of many vassals to regain their independence. In the first instance Sennacherib directed his attention to his rebellious subjects in the east, and it was not till 701 that he turned his arms against Palestine in his third campaign, of which we have several monumental records, the fullest being that on the Taylor cylinder. But the rebels were slow in arriving at concerted action, owing to their dependence on Egypt; and in several of Isaiah's discourses about this time (chs. 29–32, cf. 18) we can trace the secret negotiations with Egypt, against which the prophet inveighs vehemently, predicting the utter failure of the hopes his countrymen were setting on 'Rahab that sitteth still' (30^{7} RV), and the shame and ruin they would bring upon themselves by their faithless and short-sighted policy—which was destined, however, to issue in a marvellous deliverance which would prove the regeneration of the national life. By this time H. had openly thrown off his allegiance under the influence of his premier, Shebna, apparently of foreign extraction, whose downfall is predicted by Isaiah a little later in $22^{15ff.}$, and who afterwards appears in an inferior office in 36^{3}. That H. took a leading part in the revolt is evident from the fact recorded by Sennacherib in the cylinder referred to (col. ii. ll. 70 ff.), that H. had imprisoned at Jerus. Padi, king of Ekron, whose subjects had dethroned him on account of his loyalty to Assyria.

After reducing or receiving the submission of a number of powers on the east and north of Palestine, Sennacherib proceeded southward along the Maritime Plain, to punish the ringleaders in the revolt. In doing so, it is possible that he may have despatched a portion of his army to invade Judah from the north, and of this some writers find evidence in the description of the Assyr. advance in Is 10^{28-32}. But probably this is only an ideal picture, and the great prophecy of which it forms part (10^{5}–11^{16}), proclaiming both the mission and the doom of Assyria, admits of other dates, e.g. 711 (Cheyne [who, however, connects vv.$^{27b-32}$ with the siege of Samaria in 722], Guthe, Dillmann, Giesebrecht) and even earlier (W. R. Smith, G. A. Smith). The Assyr. record goes on to tell that Sennacherib took Ashkelon, and that his approach had struck terror into the hearts of the men of Ekron when he was confronted by a great army of Egyptians and Sinaitic Arabians under several of their kings, who had come to the relief of Ekron. These he defeated at Eltekeh (Altaku), and afterwards took Ekron. It was only then apparently that he sent his troops into Judah, where (he says) they took 46 fenced cities and small towns without number, carrying off 200,150 captives (probably an exaggeration) and obliging H. to sue for peace, which was granted him on payment of heavy exactions, including 30 talents of gold and 800 talents of silver, a narrative which is in substantial agreement with 2 K 18^{13-16}, even the discrepancy between the 300 and the 800 talents of silver being perhaps accounted for by the different standards of the two countries (Brandis, Münz-system, p. 98).

Such crushing calamities (Is $1^{5ff.}$) could not fail to be regarded as a vindication of the prophet's counsel, and a condemnation of the policy to which he had been so strongly opposed. H.'s eyes were now opened to see where the true interests of his kingdom lay; and from this time we find Isaiah enjoying his fullest confidence, and guiding the national policy. But there were some on whom the lesson was lost, painful though it had been—citizens who gave themselves up to shameless mirth and revelry as soon as they saw the beleaguering force preparing to withdraw (Is 22). They thought the crisis was over, but it was not so. For Sennacherib soon realized the danger to which his army would be exposed if he advanced into Egypt, leaving such a strong fortress as Jerus. in the hands of a doubtful vassal like H.; and even at the expense of a breach of faith with H. (Is $33^{1.\ 8}$, Jos. Ant. x. i. 1) he resolved to make a fresh demand for its surrender. Recent critics (Stade and his followers) have detected in the long narrative (2 K 18^{17}–19^{37}) a somewhat confused combination of two different accounts, which, if referring to two different occasions, ought to be transposed; and Tiele would even place last of all the events related in 2 K 18^{14-16}. The problem is too intricate to be dealt with here. But there is no reason to doubt that Sennacherib made a renewed attempt from Lachish (with which his military achievements are associated in recently-discovered monuments, although he himself does not mention it even by name), and perhaps also from Libnah, to which he may have retreated on hearing that Tirhaka was coming out to meet him (2 K 19^{8}). That he failed to take Jerus. is almost implied in his own vague statement that he shut up H. like a bird in a cage; and his concluding boast about the tribute and other gifts being sent to him at Nineveh (instead of to Lachish, as related in Scripture) is evidently introduced to save any necessity for recording his subsequent disasters. These disasters are involved in mystery. But the biblical account finds an echo in the story told by Herod. (ii. 141), the destruction of his army being probably due to a plague (2 K 19^{35}, Is 37^{36}, cf. 2 S $21^{15f.}$, 1 Ch $21^{12ff.}$ and Is $6^{4f.}$) in the pestiferous region on the borders of Egypt where the Crusaders and others have had a similar experience (cf. 2 K 19^{24} RV). The impression made on Sennacherib was such that though he lived for twenty years longer he never again entered Pal. or besieged Jerusalem. On the other hand, the dramatic account of the conference between his three emissaries (all whose names have now been identified with the titles of Assyr. officers) and the three Jewish deputies, on a famous spot under the walls of Jerus. (cf. Is 7^{3}).

bears the stamp of historical reality, as does also the letter which H. is said to have afterwards received from him. In the prophetic words which are embodied in the narrative we have for the most part the genuine utterances of Isaiah, harmonizing with that 'most beautiful of all his discourses' (ch. 33) which marks the peaceful and triumphant close of his ministry, and which finds an echo in the 46th, perhaps also in the 48th, 75th, and 76th Psalms.

The event which was thus commemorated was one of the most impressive and glorious in Heb. history, and has taken rank in the estimation of the Jews with the Exodus from Egypt and the Return from Babylon. It was a most fateful moment, not only for Israel but for its religion; and while the victory of faith was mainly due to the influence of the one inspired man who held fast the conviction that in the Lord J" was everlasting strength, and that amid all wreck and ruin He would preserve Mt. Zion inviolate as His holy habitation, the glory of the time falls also on the sovereign who shared his lofty spirit and fulfilled in some degree his Messianic hopes, when he made such a heroic stand against the dreaded invader before whom all the other kings of Palestine and Philistia had succumbed. Not unfitly, therefore, it stands written that 'after him was none like him among all the kings of Judah, nor any that were before him' (2 K 18^5).

HEZION (חֶזְיוֹן 'vision'; Ἀζεί B, Ἀζαήλ A, Luc.). —Father of Tabrimmon and grandfather of Benhadad, the Syrian king whose alliance was sought by Asa, king of Judah, against Baasha, king of Israel (1 K 15^{18}). It has been plausibly suggested (Ewald, Thenius, Klostermann, etc.) that Hezion is identical with Rezon of 1 K 11^{23}, the founder of the kingdom of Damascus, and an adversary to Solomon. The three generations of Syrian kings may very well correspond with the four generations of the kings of Judah, since Abijam, Asa's predecessor, reigned for three years only. In place of Rezon in 1 K 11^{14} [Heb.^{23}] B reads Ἐσρώμ, Luc. Ἐσρών, Pesh. ܚܙܝܘܢ; and Klostermann regards חֶזְרוֹן Hezron as the original form of the name in both passages 11^{23} 15^{18}.

HEZIR (חֵזִיר, either for חֲזִיר 'boar,' or cf. New Heb. חֲזוּר 'apple').—1. The 17th of the priestly courses (1 Ch 24^{15}). 2. A lay family, which signed the covenant (Neh 10^{20} [Heb.^{21}]). For the name cf. the inscription on the grave of the 'sons of Hezir,' dating from the 1st cent. B.C. (see Driver, Text of Sam. p. xxiii). See GENEALOGY, III. 15.

HEZRO, HEZRAI (Kethibh חֶצְרוֹ, Kerê חֶצְרַי; Ἀσαραί). —One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23^{35}). He was a Carmelite, i.e. a native of Carmel, the modern Kurmul, in the hill-country of Judah (see CARMELITE). In the parallel list (1 Ch 11^{37}) the reading of the Kethibh (Hezro) is retained, but the LXX supports the form Hezrai (B Ἡσερέ; א Ἡσεραί; A Ἀσαραί).

HEZRON (חֶצְרוֹן and חֶצְרֹן).—1. A son of Reuben, i.e. the eponymous head of a Reubenite family, Gn 46^9, Ex 6^{14}, Nu 26^6 = 1 Ch 5^3. 2. A son of Perez and grandson of Judah, i.e. the eponymous head of a Judahite family, Gn 46^{12}, Nu 26^{21} = Ru $4^{18.\ 19}$, 1 Ch $2^{5.\ 9.\ 18.\ 21.\ 24.\ 25}$ 4^1. This Hezron appears also in the NT in the genealogy of our Lord, Mt 1^3, Lk 3^{33} (in both of which passages AV following TR Ἐσρώμ has Esrom. WH has in Mt Ἐσρώμ, in Lk Ἐσρών). The gentilic name Hezronites (הַחֶצְרוֹנִי) occurs in Nu 26^6 referring to the descendants of No. 1 above, and in v.^{21} referring to those of No. 2.

HEZRON (חֶצְרוֹן).—1. A town in the south of Judah (Jos 15^3) = Hazar-addar of Nu 34^4. It appears to be different from 2. Kerioth-hezron (קְרִיּוֹת חֶצְרוֹן), Jos 15^{25}, which is prob. identical with Hazor, No. 4. The name Hezron probably survives at Jebel Hadhireh, a mountain in the Tîh desert N.W. of Petra.

HIDDAI (חִדָּי; B Ἀδαοί and Ἀδροί;* A Ἀθθαί).—One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23^{30}). He is described as 'of the brooks [נַחֲלֵי, 'torrent-valleys'] of Gaash,' and probably lived in the neighbourhood of Mt. Gaash (cf. Jos 19^{50} 24^{30}, Jg 2^9) in the hill-country of Ephraim. Thenius and Wellh. prefer the alternative form Hurai (חוּרַי; B Οὐρεί; A Οὐρί), which is given in the parallel list 1 Ch 11^{32}.

HIDDEKEL (חִדֶּקֶל).—The name given to the Tigris in Gn 2^{14}, Dn 10^4. In the Sumerian or pre-Semitic language of Babylonia, the river was called Idikla and Idikna, which the Semitic Babylonians modified into Diklat by dropping the initial vowel and affixing the Semitic feminine suffix. Diklat is the Diglit of Pliny (HN vi. 27) and the Dijlah of to-day. The Persians assimilated the name to their own word tigra 'an arrow' (see Strabo, xi. p. 529; Q. Curt. iv. 9. 16; Eust. ad Dionys. Perieg. v. 984), from which was derived the Gr. Tigris. It is possible that in the first syllable of Idikla we have the Sumerian id, 'river.' See further Del., Paradies, 110 f., 170 ff.

HIEL (חִיאֵל 'brother of God' or 'he whose brother is God.' The name is a contraction of אֲחִיאֵל Ahiel, and this form appears in LXX [Ἀχειήλ B, Ἀχιήλ A]. Cf. חִירָם for אֲחִירָם, and Phœn. חכלבת for אחכלבת).—A Bethelite, famed as the rebuilder of Jericho, in the reign of Ahab (1 K 16^{34}). He is said to have laid the foundations of the city at the cost of the life of Abiram his firstborn son, and to have set up the gates with the loss of his youngest son Segub; in fulfilment of Joshua's curse pronounced against the rebuilder of Jericho (Jos 6^{26}). The meaning of this statement possibly is that the builder sacrificed his sons, perhaps by enclosing them alive in the foundation and wall, in order to secure the prosperity of the city by this costly blood-offering. See FOUNDATION. Or, the tradition may have been that, through failure to perform such a rite, his eldest and youngest born sons were claimed by the offended deity at the initiatory and final stages of the building operations. For instances, from various sources, of the widespread primitive custom of human sacrifice 'in order to furnish blood at the foundations of a house or of a public structure,' cf. H. C. Trumbull, The Threshold Covenant, p. 46 ff. It may be urged, however, that the language of 1 K 16^{34} implies not a usual practice, but the occurrence of something involuntary on the part of Hiel; e.g. that the death of his sons was the result of accidents during the building operations.

HIERAPOLIS (Ἱεράπολις, in more classical form Ἱερὰ Πόλις, and in ruder native Greek Ἱερόπολις), a city on the north edge of the Lycus valley, probably originally Lydian, but in the Roman period always reckoned to Phrygia, played a highly important part in the early history of Christianity. In the Bible it is mentioned only in Col 4^{13} in association with Laodicea. Standing on the site on the north edge of the Lycus valley, one looks due south across the hollow valley about 6 miles to Laodicea on a slight rising ground, while Colossæ, about 12 miles distant to the south-east, is concealed by the low hills that separate the upper or Colossian glen from the lower or Laodicean glen of the Lycus. Hierapolis, probably, was originally the 'Holy City' of the tribe Hydrelitai, which possessed the north bank of the Lycus; and Kydrâra (i.e. Kydrêla, Hydrêla) in Herod. vii. 31 is probably another name for it. It was marked out to the inhabitants by its marvellous medicinal hot springs as the place where divine power was plainly present. The water of these springs is strongly impregnated with alum (being on that account very useful for dyeing purposes), as Hamilton mentions, and it forms a calcareous deposit with extraordinary rapidity, so that the site is almost entirely covered with encrustation formed since the city was ruined, while the precipitous rocks on the south side of the city, over which the water tumbles in many rivulets, have been transformed into the appearance of 'an immense frozen cascade' (Chandler).* Even more remarkable was the Ploutonion or Charonion, a hole just large enough to admit a man, reaching deep into the earth, from which issued a poisonous vapour, the breath of the realm of death. Strabo had with his own eyes seen sparrows stifled by this vapour. The city, though devoid of political importance, derived high social consequence and prosperity in the peaceful Roman period from its religious character; and here, as the special stronghold of Satan, Christianity fixed itself from the first. The filling up of the Charonion, the dwelling place of the hostile power, may be plausibly attributed to Christian action in the 4th cent.

From the NT narrative (Ac 19^{10} and Col) it is clear that the Church in Hierapolis was founded through the influence diffused over Asia from St. Paul's residence in Ephesus (perhaps by Timothy, Col 1^{1}). But later legends† describe the Apostle Philip as the evangelist both of Tripolis (about 10 miles to the north-west, and also in view) and of Hierapolis, in which the Apostle John also preached; and the Hierapolitan Echidna (i.e. the serpent-form in which the Phrygian god Sabazios was there and everywhere represented) is described as their special enemy. It appears well attested that Philip preached and resided in Hierapolis, and that he was buried there with his two daughters, who were virgins, while a third daughter of his was married and buried in Ephesus (Eusebius, HE iii. 31, quoting Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus about A.D. 190). Owing to mere confusion of name, Philip the deacon (who had four prophetic daughters, Ac 21^{8}) is connected by some authorities with Hierapolis; but legend and an inscription‡ found in the city agree with the earliest historical authority, Polycrates. The city, apparently, assumed for a time the name Philippopolis, for Tatianus, bishop of Philippopolis in Phrygia, at the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, was in all probability bishop of Hierapolis,§ and so also Andreas of Philippopolis in Phrygia in A.D. 692. Ten Christian inscriptions of Hierapolis are published;‖ two of them may perhaps be Jewish, if not Jewish-Christian.

Probably, nowhere in Asia Minor was the opposition between the native superstition and the Christian religion so strongly accentuated as in Hierapolis. In greater cities, like Ephesus, political considerations came in to complicate the antagonism. But Hierapolis was important only as the home of religion; the native superstition is there revealed to us in its sharpest and most aggressive form, as the worship of the mother goddess Leto (see DIANA) and her son Lairbenos (a form of Sabazios).

The early coins of the city, until about the time of Christ, bear the ruder native name Hieropolis, while those of Augustus' later period and all subsequent emperors have the more correct form Hierapolis; the change of spelling shows that a step in the Hellenization of the city was made about that time (though private persons seem to have occasionally used the form Hieropolis much later).* The Christians preferred the form Hierapolis.†

In the apostolic period H. was a flourishing city, to whose medicinal springs numerous visitors flocked; its prosperity lasted through the Roman period (as is shown by its rich coinage); and it easily recovered from such losses as that of the earthquake which probably injured it in A.D. 60 (Tacitus, Ann. xiv. 27). Epictetus is the only important figure in literature connected with Hierapolis. It was made by Justinian, if not earlier, a metropolis; and the north-west part of the great province of Phrygia Pacatiana was placed under it.‡ The fact that several Christian martyrs were executed at Hierapolis§ shows that it was a leading city under the Empire, where the proconsul held trials. The Neokorate in the Imperial religion was conferred on it by Caracalla about A.D. 215 (Athen. Mittheil. xix. p. 118).

HIGH, HIGHMINDED. — High is occasionally used in the sense of 'tall,' as 1 S 9^{2} 'From his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people' (גָּבַהּ); Jth 16^{7} 'For the mighty one did not fall by the young men, neither did the sons of the Titans smite him, nor high giants set upon him' (ὑψηλοὶ γίγαντες). So occasionally in Shaks., as Merch. of Venice, V. i. 163—

> 'A kind of boy, a little scrubbed boy,
> No higher than thyself.'

From the literal sense, 'high' passes readily into certain figurative applications, but that which we take as fig. would often to the religious consciousness of Israel be quite literal. See GOD, RELIGION, and compare the following passages: Ps 71[19] 'Thy righteousness also, O God, is very high'; 92[3] 'But thou, LORD, art most high (RV 'art on high') for evermore'; Is 6[1] 'I saw also the LORD sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up'; 57[15] 'For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity'; 2 Co 10[5] 'Casting down imaginations and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God' (πᾶν ὕψωμα); with many more. But in the foll. the fig. sense is complete, Dt 26[19] 'And the LORD hath avouched thee this day to be his peculiar people . . . and to make thee high above all nations which he hath made, in praise, and in name, and in honour'; 32[27] 'Our hand is high (RV 'exalted'), and the LORD hath not done all this'; 'a man of high degree' 1 Ch 17[17] (הָאָדָם הַמַּעֲלָה, text certainly corrupt), or 'men of high degree' Ps 62[9] (בְּנֵי־אִישׁ). Cf. Lk 16[15] Wyc. 'that that is high to men, is abhomynacioun bifor god.' So frequently in Shaks., as Two Gent. of Verona, II. iv. 106—

'Too low a mistress for so high a servant.'

In this way 'high' takes on an offensive meaning, haughty, as Ps 101[5] 'Him that hath an high look and a proud heart will not I suffer'; Pr 21[4] 'An high look, and a proud heart, and the plowing of the wicked is sin' (רוּם עֵינַיִם, lit. as AVm, 'haughtiness of eyes'); which can also be illustrated from Shaks., as I Henry VI. IV. vii. 39—

'Once I encountered him, and thus I said:
"Thou maiden youth, be vanquished by a maid";
But with a proud majestical high scorn,
He answered thus: "Young Talbot was not born
To be the pillage of a giglot wench."'

Notice in this connexion the phrase 'high calling,' Ph 3[14], lit. 'calling upward' (ἄνω κλῆσις) as RV, which is better than the 'heavenly calling' of Lightfoot and others, though that is the ultimate destination.

In the phrase 'high day' we find two different meanings—(1) 'great,' practically equivalent to 'holy' in Ad. Est 16[22], Sir 33[9], Jn 19[31]; and (2) the same as modern 'broad,' referring to the full light of day, in Gn 29[7].

For Most High see GOD; for High Place see the following art.; for High Priest see PRIESTS AND LEVITES; and for Highest Room (Lk 14[8] πρωτοκλισία) see HOSPITALITY, HOUSE, ROOM.

In Ro 11[20] [WH μὴ ὑψηλὰ φρονεῖν] and in 1 Ti 6[17] the verb ὑψηλοφρονεῖν is tr[d] 'to be highminded'; and in 2 Ti 3[4] the ptcp. τετυφωμένος is tr[d] 'high-minded' (RV 'puffed up'). Thus in all its occurrences in AV highminded has the bad sense of 'haughty,' 'overweening,' its almost invariable meaning at the time. As Davies points out (Bible English, p. 207), Andrewes uses the word in a good (though not in the modern) sense when he says (Sermons, v. 50), 'O that you would mind once these high things, that you would be in this sense high-minded,' but it is plain that he is accommodating the word to his purpose; elsewhere he uses it in the same sense as AV. Cf. Babees Book (E.E.T.S.), p. 93, 'A hye mynded man thinketh no wight worthy to match with him.'

Highness, which, except in reference to persons of rank, is now displaced by 'height,' is found twice in AV, Job 31[23] 'For destruction from God was a terror to me, and by reason of his highness I could not endure' (שְׂאֵת; RV 'excellency'; Amer. RV 'majesty,' which is Davidson's word); and Is 13[3] 'I have commanded my sanctified ones, I have also called my mighty ones for mine anger, even them that rejoice in my highness' (עַלִּיזֵי גַּאֲוָתִי; RV 'my proudly exulting ones,' RVm 'them that exult in my majesty'). Cf. 2 Co 10[5] Wyc. (1388) 'And we distrien counsels, and alle highnesse that higheth it silf aghens the science of God.' Fisher (on Ps 143) shows the word passing to its mod. sense: 'Blessed Lorde vouchsafe give us leve to speake unto thy hyghnes in this matter.'

HIGH PLACE, בָּמָה pl. בָּמוֹת. LXX τὸ ὑψηλόν, about 56 t.; ἀβαμά, ἀββαμμά (ἀβανά B, ἀββανά A), Ezk 20[29]; τὰ ἀγαθά, Is 58[14]; ἄλσος, Jer 26[18], Mic 3[12]; ἁμαρτία=חַטָּאת, Mic 1[5]; βαιμών, Jos 13[17]; Βαμά, 1 S 9[12. 13. 14. 19. 25] 10[5], 1 Ch 16[39] (21[29] Lag.), 2 Ch 1[13], A. In some other passages the LXX renderings prob. rest on a different text from MT.

I. The original signification of the word cannot now be exactly determined, but that it denoted 'high, rising ground' is probable for the following reasons:—(a) The corresponding word in Assyr. (bamâtu, pl. bamâti) is said to mean 'height.' Del. (Assyr. Hwb.) renders 'Höhe (opp. Thal), ši-i-ru ba-ma-a-ti Feld und Höhen.' (b) We read of people 'going up' to (1 S 9[13. 19], Is 15[2]) and 'coming down' from (1 S 10[5] 9[25]) a high place. (c) בָּמָה is used to explain גִּבְעָה רָמָה 'high hill' (Ezk 20[29]).

II. In poetical language the word is used quite generally to denote the mountain fastnesses of the land, which ensure dominion to their holder (Ezk 36[2]). In this sense it is used of Israel (Dt 32[13] 33[29], Is 58[14]; cf. 2 S 22[34]=Ps 18[33], Hab 3[19]); of God (Am 4[13], Mic 1[3]; cf. Job 9[8] 'the waves,' marg. 'heights,' RVm 'high places,' 'of the sea'; cf. also Is 14[14] 'heights,' lit. 'high places,' 'of the clouds,' of the king of Babylon). But much more frequently it signifies 'high places' as places of religious worship. That these were the customary and legitimate places of worship for the Isr. until the 7th cent. there is abundant evidence. Samuel was accustomed to sanction such worship by his presence and blessing (1 S 9[12. 13. 14. 19]). They were situated on the outskirts of the city (1 S 9[25] 10[5. 13]). In the days of Solomon 'the people sacrificed in the high places' (1 K 3[2]). Solomon himself, we are told, 'sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places' (1 K 3[3]), and, in particular, at Gibeon 'the great high place' (1 K 3[4]). The same is true of the reigns of Rehoboam (1 K 14[23]), Jeroboam (1 K 12[31. 32] 13[2. 32. 33]), Asa (1 K 15[14]), Jehoshaphat (1 K 22[43]), Jehoash (2 K 12[3]), Amaziah (2 K 14[4]), Azariah (2 K 15[4]), Jotham (2 K 15[35]), Ahaz (2 K 16[4]), and Elijah laments bitterly that the local sanctuaries of J" had been destroyed (1 K 19[10. 14]). True, the compiler of the Bks. of Kings looks upon the worship at high places as a stain upon the government of these rulers, and sees in it additional ground for condemnation of the apostate kings (e.g. Manasseh, 2 K 21[3]), and one cause of the captivity of the northern tribes (2 K 17[9. 11]); but this is due to his inability to recognize that a custom which in his own day was under the ban of the ceremonial law, had ever been legitimate in monarchical times. It may seem strange perhaps that in the Bks. of Kings this worship should meet with such condemnation, whilst in Samuel the many allusions to it are passed over unnoticed; but this is explained by the fact that the editors of these books were influenced by the theory that such worship at high places was lawful before the erection of Solomon's Temple, but was inexcusable afterwards; cf. 1 K 3[2] 'Only the people sacrificed in the high places, because there was no house built for the name of the Lord until those days.' In the passages already cited, high places are expressly mentioned, but in very many other cases the existence of sanctuaries of J″ all over the country in the period before the establishment of the monarchy is presupposed, e.g. at Bochim (Bethel?) (Jg 2^5), Ophrah (6^{24} 8^{27}), Zorah (13^{16-19}), Shiloh (18^{31}), Bethel ($20^{18.\ 23.\ 26}$ $21^{2.\ 4}$), Mizpah (Jg 20^1, 1 S 7^9), Ramah (7^{17} 9^{12}), Gibeah (10^5 14^{35}), Gilgal (10^8 11^{15} 13^9 15^{21}), Bethlehem (16^2 $20^{6.\ 29}$), Nob (21^1), Hebron (2 S 15^7), Giloh (15^{12}), and the threshing-floor of Araunah (2 S 24^{25}). For a sanctuary that was purely Israelite in origin, cf. that at Dan (Jg 18^{30}).

But, widespread as was the worship at the local high places, there were gradually developed tendencies towards a centralization of the worship of J″. It was very natural, for instance, that the sanctuary at which the ark was stationed should enjoy a certain pre-eminence over the surrounding high places. Thus Shiloh (1 S 1^3) and, at a later period, Jerus. no doubt overshadowed the neighbouring sanctuaries and attracted worshippers from a wide area. Again, the establishment of the monarchy indirectly favoured religious, as directly it brought about political, unity. And, lastly, in the worship at high places itself there lurked a danger which eventually brought about their overthrow. This danger was twofold. Many of the more important of the high places had been the sites of Can. shrines (Dt $12^{2.\ 30}$, Nu 33^{52}). With the place of worship the Isr. had taken over also the symbols of worship, the Mazzébahs (see PILLAR) and the Ashérahs (wh. see). What was more likely than that the lascivious tendencies which had characterized the older forms of worship should lie hidden beneath these external symbols, and, defying expulsion, should burst forth from time to time into fresh vigour? Or, again, what was more probable than that J″ should seem to be brought down to the level of the Can. gods, of whose shrines He had taken possession, and whose name He sometimes assumed, and so become confounded with them alike in outward worship and in moral characteristics? [For such confusion of J″ with the Can. Baalim, cf. Hos $2^{16.\ 17}$, and the proper names Jerubbaal (Jg 6^{32}), Meribbaal (1 Ch 8^{34}), Beeliada (1 Ch 14^7); and see Moore on Jg 6^{32}, with the references there given].

How real these dangers were may be learned from the vigorous way in which the prophets of the 8th cent. denounce the worship at high places as it existed in their own day. Cf., for the northern kingdom, Hos 10^8 'The high places of Aven, the sin of Israel shall be destroyed; the thorn and the thistle shall come up upon their altars' (2. $4^{13.\ 15.\ 17}$ 5^1 8^5. ^{11} $10^{1.\ 2.\ 5}$ 12^{11} 13^2); Am 7^9 'The high places of Isaac shall be desolate, and the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste' (4^4 5^5 7^{13} 8^{14}); and for Judah see Mic 1^5 'What are the high places of Judah? are they not Jerusalem?' (where, however, we should probably read, with the LXX, 'sin' for 'high places') (5^{13} 67). Micah, writing probably after the fall of the northern kingdom, declares that the sanctuary at Jerus. is destined to the same fate that has fallen upon the high places of the sister kingdom. 'Jerus. shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of a forest,' i.e. as the high places that have been converted into waste forest-land by the invading army (3^{12}=Jer 26^{18}; cf. Ezk 36^2).

It should be noticed that what these writers denounce is, not the worship at high places in itself, but the corruption that has contaminated the worship of J″ at the local high places, and that they regard the approaching destruction of the high places, which they foretell, as part of a temporary loss of a national existence. Cf. Hos 3^4 'Without king, and without prince, and without sacrifice, and without ephod or teraphim.' The growing feeling against the corrupted local sanctuary worship was no doubt fostered by the introduction of foreign cults by some of the kings. Thus Solomon, we read, built high places for Chemosh and for Molech (1 K 11^7), for Ashtoreth (2 K 23^{13}); Ahab built an altar for Baal (1 K $16^{31.\ 32}$); Manasseh did the same (2 K 21^3; cf. Jer 7^{31} 19^5).

For this corrupt state of things there were two possible solutions. There might be reformation, or there might be abolition combined with the centralization of the worship of J″ at Jerusalem. The latter was the course actually taken when the unifying tendencies of which we have spoken ripened into maturity. The compiler of the Bks. of Kings ascribes it to Hezekiah (2 K $18^{4.\ 22}$ 21^3), but there are reasons for doubting the accuracy of his statement. 2 K 18^{4b} seems to be a later addition to the original passage; v.^{22} occurs in a section that is certainly of a late date; 21^3 is due to the compiler; Hezekiah's reform, if historical, must have been singularly ineffective, for in the accounts of Josiah's reformation we have no hint of earlier steps in the same direction; lastly, Isaiah betrays no hostility to the high places as such (cf. Wellh. Proleg. p. 46; Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 14; Montefiore, Hib. Lects. p. 164; and, for a conservative view, Kittel, Hist. of the Heb. ii. 356). But, whatever may have been the action of Hezekiah with regard to the high places, the legislation of Josiah (B.C. 639–608) against them was carried through systematically and with thoroughness. Inspired by the then lately promulgated (B.C. 621) law of Deuteronomy (ch. 12^{3-5} and freq.), the young king caused the destruction of the high places throughout his dominions (2 K $23^{5.\ 8.\ 13.\ 19}$). The idolatrous priests were apparently put to death (2 K 23^5), the priests of J″ were to be allowed to come to Jerus., but not as sacrificing priests (2 K 23^9); the worship of J″ was henceforth to have its sole sanctuary at Jerusalem.

A reformation so radical as that just sketched had of course its losses as well as its gains. The latter were seen in the sweeping away of a system that was polluting the very life-blood of the nation, and in the quickening impulse which it must have given to political unification, and to the spread of a more spiritual conception of the national God. But the loss was very great. It was an age when the social and the religious instincts found expression through the same channels, and the abolition of the local shrines must have affected everyday life in the rural districts in a hundred ways. For instance, from time immemorial all shedding of blood had been looked upon as sacrifice; now sacrifice was to be lawful only at Jerusalem. Again, many of the older local festivals would lose their importance now that there was no sanctuary round which they could revolve (cf. 1 S 1^3 20^6 25^2, 2 S 13^{23}). And, lastly, the abolition of the country priesthood, whilst it deprived a large class of the means of livelihood (Jg 17^5), removed from their position the recognized educational authorities (Mic 3^{11}, Dt 33^{10}), and made no provision for any substitute. Still, the spontaneous religious feeling of the country districts needed outlets for their expression, and the loss of those 'who handled torah' had to be supplied. If the body ecclesiastic was to have its heart in Jerus., it needed also its main arteries throughout the country, and in time such were found for it. In the post-ex. community the synagogue (wh. see) with its worship of prayer supplied to some extent the place of the high place with its cycle of sacrifices, and the recognized teachers of the Levitical law took the place of the older provincial priests.

III. The fortunes of the local high places thus briefly sketched from the historical books may be traced through the same stages in the legal codes. In the earliest legislation high places are not actually mentioned, but they are presupposed. Cf. Ex 20^{24} 'An altar of earth shalt thou make unto me, and shalt sacrifice thereon thy burnt-offerings, and thy peace-offerings, thy sheep and thine oxen: in every place where I record my name I will come unto thee and I will bless thee.'

Cf. also Ex 22^{29}, which presupposes the existence of local sanctuaries. In entire agreement with this the writers of the narrative portions of JE represent the Patriarchs as erecting altars wherever occasion demanded. Thus, e.g., Abraham builds altars at Shechem (Gn 12^{7}), at Bethel (12^{8} 13^{4}), at Mamre (13^{18}), and on Mount Moriah (22^{9}); Jacob sacrifices on the mountain of Gilead (31^{54}), and builds altars at Shechem (33^{20}) and at Bethel ($35^{1.\ 3.\ 7}$); Isaac does the same at Beer-sheba (46^{1}); and Moses builds an altar at Rephidim (Ex 17^{15}), and prescribes the erection of one on Mount Ebal (Dt 27^{5}; cf. Jos 8^{30}).

When we reach the Great Code of the 7th cent. [D=Deuteronomy] all this is altered. True, the compiler nowhere mentions by name the high places of J″, but his zeal for their removal betrays itself in every page of his work. All the sanctuaries of Can. origin are to be destroyed (Dt $12^{2.\ 3}$), and for the Israelites there is to be but one place of sacrifice. 'Ye shall not do so unto the Lord your God. But unto the place which the Lord your God shall choose . . . thither thou shalt come, and thither ye shall bring your burnt-offerings . . .' ($12^{4\text{-}7}$). 'Take heed to thyself that thou offer not thy burnt-offerings in every place that thou seest' (12^{13}; cf. $12^{21.\ 26}$ $14^{23\text{-}25}$ 15^{20} $16^{2.\ 5.\ 6.\ 15.\ 16}$ 17^{8} 18^{6}).

Lastly, in the latest of the Pentateuchal Codes (P=Priestly Code) the one sanctuary is not so much inculcated as tacitly assumed (cf. Wellh. Proleg. p. 34).

IV. It has been said above that בָּמָה originally signified 'high, rising ground,' and it is probable therefore that the simplest form of high place was an altar on any slight elevation. They were situated generally, it may be supposed, near a city; cf. 1 S 9^{25} 10^{5}. Close to the altar would be placed the Mazzébah and the Ashérah. Sometimes we find the high place distinguished from the altar (2 K 23^{15}, Is 36^{7}, 2 Ch 14^{3}). Again, the high place is distinguished from the hill upon which it stood (Ezk 6^{3}, 1 K 11^{7} 14^{23}). In these passages the name seems to be transferred from the actual site to the apparatus for worship which stood upon it. In the vicinity of the altar were erected buildings for various purposes, the so-called 'houses of high places' (1 K 12^{31} 13^{32}, 2 K 23^{19}). In the case of idolatrous high places, these sometimes contained an image of the god worshipped (2 K 17^{29}). With 'high place' in this secondary sense of 'shrine' or 'sanctuary' we may compare those passages which speak of 'high places' in valleys (Jer 7^{31} 19^{5} 32^{35}, Ezk 6^{3}), or in cities (1 K 13^{32}, 2 K $17^{9.\ 29}$ 23^{5}), or 'at the entering in of the gate' (2 K 23^{8}; cf. Ezk 16^{24}). Cf. also Am 7^{9}, where it is synonymous with 'sanctuary' (מִקְדָּשׁ). In some of these cases it is probable that an artificial high place, with of course the necessary adjuncts, is intended. With this would agree the terms which are used of the destruction of 'high places.' So, e.g., 'destroy' (Ezk 6^{3}, 2 K 21^{3}; cf. Lv 26^{30}, Nu 33^{52}, where a synonymous term is used), 'break down' (2 K $23^{8.\ 15}$), 'burn' (2 K 23^{15}).

In connexion with these local sanctuaries we find, in addition to the Mazzébahs and Ashérahs, also Ephods and Teraphim (wh. see). So in Jg 17^{5}, 1 S 21^{9}; cf. Jg 8^{27}, Hos 3^{4}. That the former were images used in consultation of J″ is probable from 1 S $14^{18\ \text{mg.}}$ 23^{9} 30^{7}. (See Moore on Jg 8^{27}). And in connexion with the Ephod we have the Urim and Thummim, or sacred lots for giving oracles, 1 S 14^{41} (on the reading see Driver, ad loc.). For the priests of these high places see CHEMARIM, PRIEST.

V. In four passages of OT the plur. of the word is used as a proper name. These are Nu $21^{19.\ 20}$, Nu 21^{28} RVm 'Bamoth of Arnon,' Jos 13^{17} Bamoth-baal. In this connexion it is noteworthy that the word occurs twice upon the Moabite Stone.

l. 3 'and I made this high place for Chemosh in QRHH.'

l. 27 'I built Beth Bamoth, for it was destroyed.'

HILEN (חִילֶן), 1 Ch 6^{58}.—See HOLON, No. 1.

HILKIAH (חִלְקִיָּה, חִלְקִיָּהוּ 'J″ is my portion,' or 'he whose portion is J″').—1. The father of Eliakim, who was 'over the household' under Hezekiah (2 K $18^{18.\ 26.\ 37}$=Is $36^{3.\ 22}$; cf. Is 22^{20}).

2. The high priest in the reign of Josiah. He it was who found the book of the law in the temple, whilst the building was undergoing repair in the 18th year of Josiah (B.C. 621). That this book was substantially the Bk. of Deuteronomy is generally acknowledged (see DEUTERONOMY). Hilkiah communicated the news of his discovery to Shaphan the scribe, and this latter, having first made himself acquainted with the contents of the book, then read it before the king. Josiah was greatly moved upon hearing the threats and warnings of Deuteronomy against the introduction of idolatrous cults and the unrestricted worship of J″ elsewhere than at the central sanctuary—'the place which the LORD God shall choose to put his name there' (Dt 12^{5}). Immediately a deputation was formed by order of the king, consisting of Hilkiah and others, who proceeded to Huldah, the prophetess, to learn at her mouth the will of the Lord. Huldah predicted the certain fall of the kingdom of Judah, on account of the religious abuses which had been introduced under king Manasseh, but added that for Josiah's sake a respite was to be granted, that he might not see the evil which J″ would bring upon Jerusalem.* After receiving the message of the prophetess, the young king at once commenced active measures, and carried out the great religious reformation which is associated with his name (2 K 22 f. =2 Ch $34^{8\text{ff.}}$).

The narrative contains no suggestion by which a charge of fraud can be fastened upon Hilkiah, as though he had deposited the book in the temple and had then professed to make discovery of it, while all the time he was acquainted with the author of it, even if he were not himself the author. On the contrary, the simple and straightforward account of the repairs which were being carried out in the temple, and which led to the discovery, makes the inference obvious that the high priest was previously unacquainted with the book, and that it must have been placed in the temple for safety some time previously, either during the troublous reign of Manasseh, or during the earlier years of Josiah.

3. The father of Jeremiah, and member of a priestly family at Anathoth (Jer 1^{1}). 4. The father of Gemariah, who acted as ambassador from king Zedekiah to Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 29^{3}). 5. 6. Levites of the clan of Merari, 1 Ch 6^{45} [Heb.^{30}] 26^{11}. 7. A contemporary of Ezra, who stood at his right hand when he read the book of the law publicly (Neh 8^{4}). Probably, the same Hilkiah is mentioned as one of the chiefs of the priests who went up to Judæa with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh $12^{7.\ 21}$).

HILL, HILL-COUNTRY.—'Hill' is in AV the rendering of (1) גִּבְעָה (always), (2) הַר (sometimes), (3) in Mt 5^{14}, Lk 4^{29} ('the brow of the hill') 9^{37} of

* Probably, Huldah's speech has been to some extent amplified by a redactor of K in exilic times. See KINGS, BOOKS OF.

ἔρος (RV in 9[37] 'mountain'), and (4) in Lk 3[5] 23[30] of βουνός (LXX usu. for גִּבְעָה); it occurs also in 1 S 9[11] for מַעֲלֶה (RV 'ascent'), in Is 5[1] in 'a very fruitful hill' (the paraphr. rend. of the Heb. 'a horn, the son of fatness'—'horn' being, as in Arab., fig. for a small isolated eminence), and in Ac 17[22] for πάγος (RV 'Areopagus'). Hill stands also in RV for עֹפֶל, a swelling or bulging place, in 2 K 5[24], Is 32[14], Mic 4[8].

'Hill' is thus the most characteristic rendering of גִּבְעָה, a word which, coming from a root signifying to be convex (cf. גֵּבִיעַ 'bowl,' Aram. גְּבִיעָא 'humpbacked'), no doubt denotes properly (Stanley, Sin. and Pal. 138, 497) the large rounded hills, mostly bare or nearly so, so conspicuous in parts of Palestine, especially in Judah. Several places situated on such hills derived their names from the circumstance, as 'Gibeah of Saul,' 'Gibeah of Phinehas,' 'Gibeah of the Foreskins,' etc. (see under GIBEAH); cf. the hill of Moreh (or of the Teacher) Jg 7[1], the hill of God (Gibeah) 1 S 10[5], the hill of Ḥakîlah 1 S 23[19] 26[1. 3], the hill of Ammah 2 S 2[24], the hill of Gareb Jer 31[39], also 1 S 6[1], 2 S 6[3. 4] 'the hill' (near Kiriath-jearim)—all localities so called from the same marked topographical feature. Zion, it may be noticed, though sometimes termed a 'hill' in AV, RV (as Ps 2[6] 3[4] 15[1]), is in the Heb. regularly a 'mountain' (הַר); it is spoken of as a גִּבְעָה only Is 10[32] 31[4] (in both ‖ 'mountain'), Ezk 34[26]; cf. Zeph 1[10]. Hills of the same kind were also a favourite spot for the idolatrous rites of the Canaanites, which the Israelites were sometimes only too ready to take part in: the standing phrase is 'on every high hill, and under every spreading tree' (1 K 14[23], 2 K 17[10], Jer 2[20] al.; cf. Dt 12[2], Hos 4[13], Is 65[7], Jer 13[27], Ezk 20[28] etc.). Notice that גִּבְעָה is also the term used in Ex 17[9. 10]. A recollection of what a גִּבְעָה was adds force to Isaiah's picture of every high hill being fertilized by 'streams and water-courses' in the ideal future (30[25]). גִּבְעָה is never used for a range of mountains (like הַר); but it often stands in poet. parallelism with 'mountain.' See e.g. Gn 49[26], Is 2[2], 30[17] 40[4. 12] 41[15].

The passages in which 'hill' stands for הַר may next be considered. הַר is a much more general term than גִּבְעָה: it may be applied to what we should call a mountain-range, to a simple 'mountain,' and also to a block of elevated country (as the central part of Palestine). It thus no doubt in particular cases may correspond to what we should term a 'hill'; but it lacks the definite and distinct characteristics of the גִּבְעָה. Its being represented by 'hill' in AV is sometimes a source of confusion. Thus the 'hill' of Ex 24[4] is the 'mount' of vv.[12. 13. 15] etc.; the 'hill' of Nu 14[44. 45], Dt 1[41. 43] is the 'mountain' of Nu 14[40], Dt 1[44]; 1 K 11[7] the 'hill' in front of Jerusalem is the 'mount' of Olives; the 'hill' of Zion in Ps 2[6], and the 'holy hill' of 3[4] 15[1] 43[3] 99[9] (cf. 24[3] 68[16b]), is the 'mount' Zion of other passages. Other passages in which 'mount' or 'mountain' would have been better than 'hill' are Gn 7[19] (see v.[20]), Dt 8[7] 11[11], Jos 15[9] 18[13. 14], Jg 2[9] 16[3], 1 S 25[20] 26[13], 2 S 13[34] 16[13] 21[9], 1 K 16[24. 24. 24] (of Samaria, see Am 4[1] 6[1] AV), 20[23. 28] 22[17], 2 K 1[9] 4[27] (see v.[25]), Ps 18[7] 68[15. 16a] (of the great range of Jebel Ḥauran) 80[10] 95[4] 97[5] 98[8] 104[10. 13. 18. 32] 121[1], Lk 9[37] (see v.[28]). In the great majority of these passages the correction has been made in RV.

עֹפֶל, which is represented by 'hill' in RV of 2 K 5[24], Is 32[14], Mic 4[8], was also (with the art.) the name of the bulging side of Zion on the S. of the Royal Palace (see OPHEL): this is probably alluded to in Is 32[14], Mic 4[8]; in 2 K 5[24] the name is applied to some similarly shaped spot in Samaria (cf. Mesha's Inscr. l. 22).—'Hill' is never, it may be added, to be understood in RV in the common English sense of an ascent, and only twice in AV (1 S 9[11], 2 S 16[1]): the Heb. for this is מַעֲלֶה ('going up,' or 'ascent').

Hill-country occurs in AV 4 times, Jos 13[6] 21[11] (for הַר), and Lk 1[39. 65] (for ἡ ὀρεινή [often in LXX for הָהָר]); also Jth 1[6] 2[22] 4[7] 5[1] 6[7. 11]. In RV the term has been employed much more frequently. As was remarked above, the Heb. הַר is used not only of a single mountain, and of a range of mountains, but also often of a mountainous tract of country, esp. the elevated mountain tract, which forms, as it were, the backbone of Palestine, gradually rising from the plain of Jezreel on the N., sloping down on the E. and W. to the Jordan Valley and the Mediterranean Sea, respectively, and terminating (approximately) in the S. in the neighbourhood of Beersheba. In AV, הַר, in this application, is usually rendered 'mountain(s)' or 'mount,'—in neither case very suitably, 'mount' especially (as in 'Mount Ephraim,' 1 S 1[1] and frequently) suggesting a single eminence (as Mount Ararat, Mount Etna, Mount Zion, etc.), and not a tract of mountainous country. Accordingly, 'hill-country,' the phrase already used in the AV of Jos 13[6] 21[11], has in RV been generally substituted in all these cases. Thus Dt 1[7. 19. 20] 'the hill-country of the Amorites,' and 1[7] 'the hill-country' (both of the high central ground of Canaan): so Jos 9[1] 10[6. 40] 11[3. 16] 12[8]. Two parts of this 'hill-country,' which are frequently particularized, are the 'hill-country' of Ephraim (Jos 17[15. 16. 18] 19[50] 20[7] 21[21] 24[30. 33], Jg 3[27] 4[5] 7[24] 10[1] 17[1. 8] 18[2. 13], 1 S 1[1] 9[4] 14[22], 2 S 20[21], 1 K 4[8] 12[25], 2 K 5[22] 19[1. 16. 18], 2 Ch 13[4] 15[8] 19[4]: in Jer 4[15] 31[6] 50[19] 'the hills of Ephraim'); and the 'hill-country' of Judah (Jos 11[21] 20[7] 21[11], 2 Ch 27[4], Lk 1[65]; cf. v.[39], Jos 18[12], Jg 1[9. 19], 1 S 23[14]), the latter forming a clearly defined part of the territory of Judah (opp. to the 'lowland,' the 'Negeb,' and the 'wilderness'), the cities of which are enumerated in Jos 15[48-60] (cf. Jer 32[44] 33[13] 'the cities of the hill-country'; and see JUDAH). We also have the 'hill-country' of Naphtali (Jos 20[7]), as well as of the Ammonite territory (Dt 2[37]), and of Gilead (3[12]), on the E. of Jordan. G. A. Smith (HGHL 53) objects to the rendering 'hill-country,' on the ground that the Central Range of Palestine was recognized by the Hebrews as forming a single block, which they called accordingly not by a collective name but by a singular name, the mountain. The observation is, no doubt, correct; but 'the mountain' would in English have been so strongly suggestive of a single eminence that it could hardly be considered a preferable rendering.

HINGE (צִיר ṣîr, Arab. ṣā'ir, a pivot).—There seems to have been anciently only one kind of hinge in Syria, the pivot and socket. Doors of houses in Lebanon are made of wood, and generally the pivots on which the doors turn are projections of a piece of wood which runs the whole length of the door, and is called the ṣîyâr. The pivots themselves are called by the carpenters sûs, and are always of wood; they turn generally in sockets of iron, but sometimes a hole is made in a stone for the lower socket, and one is bored in the lintel for the upper.

On the east of the Jordan, in the Ḥauran, ancient buildings have been found in which the doors are made of one slab of stone, the projecting pivots being of stone also. The sockets are holes bored in the stone lintel and threshold. In 1 K 7^{50} פֹּת is the socket. (For a good illustration of an ancient door socket [of Sargon I.] see Hilprecht, Recent Researches in Bible Lands, p. 93).

DOORS OF LEBANON HOUSES, SHOWING PIVOTS AND LOCK.

The ancient Egyp. hinge consisted of a socket of metal with a projecting pivot, into which the corner of the door was inserted. This kind is not common in Syria. W. CARSLAW.

HINNOM, VALLEY OF, also called Valley of the Son of H., Valley of the Children of H. (גֵּי הִנֹּם Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}, Neh 11^{30}; elsewhere [except in 2 K 23^{10}, where Kethibh has גֵּי בְנֵי ה' גֵּי בֶּן הִנֹּם] always גֵּי בֶן הִנֹּם Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}, 2 Ch 28^{3} 33^{6}, Jer $7^{31.\ 32}$ $19^{2.\ 6}$ 32^{35}).—Hinnom is mentioned in the OT invariably in connexion with the term gai [construct gê] (ravine), the Kidron being called naḥal, and the vale of Rephaim 'ēmeḳ. It seems probable that gai denotes the channel or course through which water may make its way in the hills, and thus in Palestine becomes a ravine in the mountains; but the word cannot by itself be taken to mean any particular nature of ravine. It is used, in contradistinction to mountains, to denote valleys or depressions (Is 40^{4}).

Naḥal is the exact equivalent of the modern wâdy. See BROOK. It is used of the deep gorges of the rivers Arnon and Jabbok, and of the shallow sandy stream of the 'river of Egypt' (Wâdy el-'Arîsh).

'Emeḳ is a broad vale fit for flowers (Ca 2^{1}), for corn land (Ps 65^{13}), for battlefields (Job 39^{21}), and chariots (Is 22^{7}).

It has been suggested by Birch (PEFSt, 1878, p. 179) that these three names represent the three valleys which encompass Jerusalem, east, centre, and west, in the order they are given in the OT, viz.:—naḥal, Kidron; gai, Tyropœon or Hinnom; 'ēmeḳ, Rephaim; but, unfortunately, this easy solution of a very difficult question does not satisfy the conditions.

Although the same appellative is used in the OT for a particular portion of a valley, there seems no reason against the various lengths of a valley being called naḥal, gai, and 'ēmeḳ in succession according to the requirements of the case; and it is obvious that when the branches of a valley have these different names, the portion below the junction must differ in name from one or other of them. Stanley (SP, Appendix, p. 432) points out that in 1 S 17^{2} 'ēmeḳ and gai seem to be used convertibly, and suggests that the 'ēmeḳ 'of the terebinth' contracted into a gai in its descent towards the plain of Philistia. It is suggested that in this case the 'ēmeḳ 'of the terebinth' (Valley of Elah) was the designation of the valley generally, while the separate portions were termed gai, etc., according to their character. At the present day the Arabs are in the habit of giving descriptive names to each reach of a valley, in addition to the general name for the whole valley.

Whatever view is taken of the position of the valley of Hinnom, all writers concur in its extending to the junction of the three valleys of Jerusalem below Siloam, i.e. there must be one spot below Siloam which all agree in making a portion of the valley of Hinnom. It is suggested that the valley of Hinnom does not end here, but is the name of the whole valley (Wâdy en-Nâr), extending from the north of Jerusalem to the Dead Sea. The point, then, which requires to be cleared up is whether it is the east valley or Kidron, the centre valley or Tyropœon, or the west valley or Wâdy er-Rubâbeh.

It is stated (Neh 11^{30}) that on the return of the children of Judah after the Captivity, they 'encamped from Beersheba unto the valley of Hinnom'—where the gai of Hinnom may be the Wâdy en-Nâr, extending from Jerusalem to the Dead Sea. The valley of H. was near the gate Harsith of Jerusalem (Jer 19^{2}), which in AV is tr^{d} 'east gate' (AVm 'sun gate'), and in RVm 'gate of potsherds.' It is stated (1 Ch 4^{23}) that the potters 'dwelt with the king for his work,' possibly near the king's palace at the southern side of the temple near the water gate, above the Kidron.

The word gai is also used for the 'valley gate' (2 Ch 26^{9}, Neh $2^{13.\ 15}$ 3^{13}), which appears to have been on the west side of Jerusalem above the Tyropœon valley near the present Jaffa gate.

The valley of Hinnom is mentioned in connexion with the boundary-line between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}), but otherwise principally with reference to the abominable rites and ceremonies of the Ammonites. The high places of Tophet and Baal, where children were passed through the fire to Molech (Jer 7^{31} 32^{35}), were built in this valley. Ahaz and Manasseh burnt incense and passed their children through the fire to Molech (2 Ch 28^{3} 33^{6}). This practice was perhaps tolerated in Jerusalem by Solomon (1 K 11^{7}). Josiah defiled Tophet in order to prevent these horrible rites from being carried out there; and from the allusion to the graves of the children of the people (2 K $23^{6.\ 10}$), it would appear that it was near the common burial-place. It was to receive the name of the 'Valley of Slaughter' in time to come (Jer 7^{32} 19^{11}).

According to Buxtorf, Lightfoot, and others (following Kimchi), there were perpetual fires kept up in this valley for consuming dead bodies of criminals and carcases of animals, and the refuse of the city; and this may be accepted (but see Robinson, BRP i. 274) as the most probable method of disposing of the immense masses of refuse which required to be destroyed for the sake of the health of the city (Rosenmüller, Biblische Geogr. II. i. pp. 156, 164).

The Talmudists place the mouth of hell in the valley of H. 'There are two palm trees in the valley of Hinnom between which a smoke ariseth —and this is the door of Gehenna' (see Barclay, City of the Great King, p. 90, and art. GEHENNA). In this sense it was used by our Lord (Mt 5^{29} 10^{28}, etc.). Jerome (Comm. in Jer. 7^{31}, and on Mt 10^{28}) describes Tophet as a pleasant spot in the valley of Hinnom, with trees and gardens watered from Siloam, lying at the foot of Moriah (i.e. in the gardens below Siloam at the junction of the east and west valleys).

Stanley (Sin. and Pal. p. 172) suggests that the ravine (gai) was named Ge Ben Hinnom, or Ge-Hinnom, after some ancient hero who had encamped there, and that from this was formed the word Gehenna. In the Mohammedan traditions the name Gehenna is applied to the valley of the Kidron (Ibn Batuteh, 124; Le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, p. 218). Stanley further points out (Recov. of Jerus. xiv.) that the valley of H. includes, if it is not identical with, the glen of the Kidron east of the city. 'This appears to follow beyond question from Jer 19^{11}; and it agrees, not only with the Mussulman nomenclature, but with almost all the biblical indications on the subject, and especially with the word Ge-hinnom.'

The point which now requires clearing up is the identification of one of the three valleys which encompass Jerusalem as the valley of Hinnom. From En-rogel, 'the border went up by the valley of the son of H. unto the side of the Jebusite southward (the same is Jerusalem); and the border went up to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of H. westward, which is at the uttermost part of the vale of Rephaim northward' (Jos 15^{8}). 'And the border went down to the uttermost part of the mountain that lieth before the valley of the son of H., which is in the vale of Rephaim northward, and it went down to the valley of H., to the side of the Jebusite southward, and went down to En-rogel' (Jos 18^{16}). In considering the direction of the valley of Hinnom south of the city of Jebus, it must be recollected that though we know the limits of ancient Jerusalem, on east, west, and south, by the deep valleys that begirt it, we do not know for certain what portions of it comprised the city of Jebus, and there is considerable difference of opinion on the subject owing to the many very difficult points which are not yet cleared up; in fact, the only solution appears to be derived from considering the dual condition of the ancient city to which references appear constantly in OT and early writings.

The following points seem to be concurred in generally:—

(1) That the temple mount (Moriah) is the eastern hill on which the Dome of the Rock now stands.

(2) That the city of David as mentioned in the Book of Nehemiah is on the spur of Ophel south of the temple area and extending to Siloam.

(3) That the Akra of the Maccabees and Josephus is either north or north-west of the temple area.

(4) That the upper part of the city, the modern Zion, is the φρούριον or upper market-place of Josephus, taken into the city by king David, and not necessarily a part of the ancient city Jebus.

A very brief summary of the information concerning Jerusalem is necessary to clear up this question as to Hinnom. It appears to be conclusively proved by the Tel el-Amarna tablets, that as far back as the year B.C. 1400, or prior to the time of the Judges, Jerusalem or Jebus was known as Urusalim (the element Uru being indicated by the Sumerian ideogram uru='city' (Hommel, AHT p. 201). 'Jebus, which is Jerusalem,' is first spoken of in OT in the account of the spies (Nu 13^{29}, Jos 11^{3}) as 'the Jebusite in the mountains,' and in the Book of Joshua (15^{63}) is allotted to Judah, and (18^{28}) also to Benjamin. It is stated that neither the children of Judah nor the children of Benjamin could drive out the Jebusites, and that they dwelt with them there. It would appear, therefore, either that Jerusalem was common to both tribes, or that a portion was allotted to each, or that different writers reckoned it differently. Lightfoot, quoting from the Talmud, states (Prospect of Jerusalem), 'For most part of the courts were in the portion of Judah; but the altar, porch, temple, and most holy place were in Benjamin.' It was reserved for king David to capture the stronghold of Zion, and the Millo or citadel. It is stated (2 S 5^{7}=1 Ch 11^{5}), 'Nevertheless, David took the stronghold of Zion: the same is the city of David.' The going up of Joab by the 'gutter' or watercourse, related subsequently, may have been a separate assault on another part of the city. Josephus evidently favours this view, for he says that David began the siege, and that he took the lower city (τὴν κάτω πόλιν) by force, but the citadel (ἄκρα) held out, and that it was taken by Joab (Ant. V. ii. 2, VII. iii. 1). If the stronghold of Zion may be accepted as the lower city of Josephus, and Millo as the Akra or citadel which Joab took, all difficulties concerning the passages appear to vanish.

The difference between the stronghold of Zion and the citadel of Millo seems to be accentuated in the following passages:—

'And David dwelt in the stronghold (mĕzûdah), and called it, The city of David. And David built round about Millo and inward' (2 S 5^{9}). 'And he built the city round about, from Millo even round about; and Joab repaired the rest of the city' (1 Ch 11^{8}). Millo is mentioned as separate from the walls of the city also in the following passages, 1 K $9^{15.\ 24}$ 11^{27}, 2 Ch 32^{5}. The meaning of Millo is given in QPB as rampart, and by Gesenius (Lex.) as a rampart or mound, built up and filled with stones or earth. Lightfoot says, 'Millo, which was an outward place and the suburb of Zion, distinguished and parted from Zion by a wall, yet a member of it and belonging to it.' Williams (Holy City, part ii. p. 43) says, 'It must never be forgotten that Jerusalem was originally two distinct cities united together by David.' Stanley has pointed out that the stronghold, fort or castle, of Zion, in all the passages (2 S $5^{7.\ 9.\ 17}$, 1 Ch $11^{5.\ 7.\ 16}$), represents the Hebrew words mĕzûdah (מְצוּדָה) or mĕzâd (מָצָד), the root meaning a lair whence hunters seek their prey, and to which they can flee as unto a safe retreat (Gesen.); the word itself denoting the top or summit of a mountain, or mountain castle. This word in the LXX is tr^{d} in all these instances as ἡ περιοχή. Grove has also pointed out that Millo is rendered in every case (except 2 Ch 32^{5}) by the LXX as ἡ ἄκρα (the citadel), which they employ nowhere else in the OT. This word ἡ ἄκρα is also used both by Josephus and the Book of Maccabees for the fort or citadel overlooking the temple to the north-west, during the struggle with the Macedonian adherents of Antiochus, which was at last razed and the rocky hill levelled by Simon Maccabæus (Jos. Ant. XIII. vi. 7; BJ V. iv. 1; but cf. 1 Mac $1^{30f.}$ $14^{36f.}$). Sayce (PEFSt, 1883, p. 214) also points to a 'stronghold of Zion' on the lower hill taken by David before he stormed the Jebusite citadel on the upper hill;* and states further, 'The dual form Jerushalaim, which apparently goes back to the time of the Maccabees, probably refers to the old division of Jerusalem into the lower city and the temple-hill.' The whole testimony appears, therefore, to be in favour of a Jerusalem separated into two portions—one called the lair or stronghold, which is the city of David, the other called the Millo or citadel. Now, the Book of Nehemiah clearly seems to place the city of David on the spur of Ophel south of the temple, above Siloam (Neh 3^{16} 12^{37}). Again, Josephus, while placing ἡ ἄκρα (the citadel) to the north-west of the temple, also speaks of the lower part of the city being taken by David, and places it near Ophel. The Books of Maccabees speak of the same citadel (ἡ ἄκρα) as Josephus does, and call the temple mount Sion (1 Mac 4^{37} 5^{54}). It therefore appears, that to accept the Ophel spur as the city of David or Zion, and the high ground east of the holy sepulchre as the Millo or citadel of the ancient Jerusalem, will satisfy the various data in the OT, the Books of Maccabees, and Josephus. We thus arrive at the conclusion that the boundary-line between Judah and Benjamin, which went up the valley of Hinnom, was drawn south of either the spur of Ophel or of the citadel (ἡ ἄκρα), or of both.

The next point to ascertain is the position of En-rogel; and this seems comparatively easy, as there appears to be a consensus of opinion at the present day that it corresponds to the copious Virgin's Fountain. It is the only known fountain in the vicinity of Jerusalem. The Bîr Eyûb is a well and not a spring, the water being 70 to 80 ft. below the surface of the ground in summer. In a land where there are so few springs, this alone ought to identify it. The Virgin's Fountain is close to the stone Zehweileh, which Ganneau has identified as the stone Zoheleth, which is close to En-rogel (1 K 1^{9}). This position of En-rogel satisfies the requirements of the two passages (2 S 17^{17}, 1 K 1^{9}). Josephus describes it in two passages (Ant. VII. xiv. 4, IX. x. 4) as close to the royal gardens, and the Book of Nehemiah places the king's garden near Siloam (Neh 3^{15}). The Virgin's Fountain also appears to be Gihon-in-the-valley (Siloam being Gihon). Thus Hezekiah stopped the upper outlet at the Virgin's Fountain (Gihon) and brought it through the rock to Siloam (2 Ch 32^{30}) to the west side of the city of David, the city of David being on Ophel.

The third point to ascertain is the general position of the 'mountain that lieth before the valley of H. westward.' Assuming that the fountain of Nephtoah is identified with 'Ain Lifta, about 2½ miles to the north-west of Jerusalem, the mountain which lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward appears to be the high ground immediately north of Jerusalem, which, though not exactly a mountain, is the highest ground in the neighbourhood, from which valleys start in all directions to the Mediterranean and Dead Sea. The site of the Russian hospice may be said to occupy the position of this mountain. The line of boundary between Judah and Benjamin may now be traced from En-shemesh (east of Jerusalem) to En-rogel, thence up the valley of Kidron to a point opposite to the southern side of the temple, thence across the temple courts south of the temple, and up the valley on the south side of Akra to the Jaffa gate, and thence north by the Russian hospice to Lifta. Under this disposition the valley of Kidron becomes the valley of Hinnom; but it is suggested, that while the Kidron is only the name for the small narrow portion of the valley east of the temple, the valley of Hinnom is the name of the whole valley reaching from near the Russian hospice to the Dead Sea, which is now called Wâdy en-Nâr or the Valley of Fire. 'The head of this valley of Hinnom or Kidron commences near the Jaffa road, a mile and a half north-west of Jerusalem, and runs along the northern side of the Tombs of the Kings' (Recovery of Jerus. p. 291). Thus the boundary-line, after leaving the valley of H. on the east of the temple, again approaches it north-west of Jerusalem at the highest point of the land, i.e. to the 'top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward' (Jos 15^{8}).

As all writers appear to concur in considering that the position of Tophet in the valley of Hinnom was in the vicinity of Siloam, near the junction of the three valleys which are about Jerusalem, on the level ground there, it seems quite immaterial, so far as Tophet is concerned, which of those valleys was Hinnom, and the interest in this matter lies in the question, already answered, connected with the topography of Jerusalem as to the position of the city of David.

A brief description is here given of these three valleys—

(1) The Kidron Valley will alone suit the requirements of Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}, if En-rogel is to be accepted as identical with the Virgin's Fountain in the Kidron, as from thence the line 'went up by the valley of the son of Hinnom.' This identification allows of the partition of Jerusalem between Judah and Benjamin, and suits the requirements of OT, Books of Maccabees, Josephus, Talmudists, Jerome, and Jewish and Arab tradition. It also meets the requirement of Jos 15^{8} and 18^{16}, under which the boundary-line twice approaches the valley of H.,—first at En-rogel, and secondly at the top of the mountain before the valley of H. eastward. Against this identification is the use of the word gai in connexion with the valley gate; but this objection is involved in the identification itself of the nahal Kidron and the gai Hinnom as one and the same.

(2) The centre valley (or Tyropœon of Josephus), reaching from near the Jaffa gate or the Damascus gate to Siloam, has been identified by W. R. Smith (Encyc. Brit.[9] 'Jerusalem'), Sayce (PEFSt, 1883, p. 213), Birch (PEFSt, p. 179), and Schwartz (Das H. L. p. 190), as the valley of Hinnom. This appears to necessitate the Bîr Eyûb being identified as En-rogel, although Birch expressly states that the Virgin's Fountain is En-rogel. The line passing up the Tyropœon Valley separates the eastern mount from the western, and thus places part of the city, but none of the temple courts, in Judah. The difficulty about adopting this valley as the valley of H. is that it exists only in Jerusalem. It begins at the Damascus gate or at the Jaffa gate, and ends at the pool of Siloam. It is an important division in the city of Jerusalem, but it is very insignificant compared with the valleys to east and west of the city. It cannot fulfil either of the conditions of extending as far as the mountain that lieth before the valley of H., or as far as the 'ēmeḳ where Tophet was: a glance at the map or model will show that it is a geographical impossibility to consider the gardens below Siloam as part of the central valley. These gardens clearly belong to the junction of the east and west valleys. There is thus no part of the central valley where the high places of Tophet and Baal could have been built.

(3) The identification of the Wâdy er-Rubâbeh as the valley of H. has hitherto been generally accepted among Western writers, though Jewish-

* On the other hand, it may be maintained that 2 S 5^{8} simply describes the manner of the conquest of v.7, and that 'Zion' was the Jebusite stronghold. The passage is certainly ambiguous.

Arab tradition is against it. This valley commences as an 'ēmeḳ to the north-west of Jerusalem, and fulfils the condition of reaching 'the mountain which lieth over against the valley of H. to the westward'; it passes W.S.W. towards the Jaffa gate, then to south, and again trends round to the west and joins the Kidron near Siloam, thus compassing Jerusalem to the west and south. Two large reservoirs are built in it—the Birket Mamilla above, and the Birket es-Sultân below the Jaffa gate; its description in detail is given in the article JERUSALEM. At the junction of this valley with the Kidron it again forms an 'ēmeḳ or fields (Jer 31[40]). But to identify the Wâdy er-Rubâbeh with the valley of H. appears to require En-rogel to be located at the Bîr Eyûb, and the whole of Jerusalem to be in Benjamin.

The junction of the east and west valleys cannot be considered to belong to one valley more than the other, and, so far as localizing Tophet, all will allow that the valley of H. extended to this junction. It is stated by Jeremiah (7[32]) that the valley of H. in the vicinity of Tophet shall be called the 'valley of slaughter,' 'for they shall bury in Tophet till there be no more place'; later on he prophesies (31[40]), 'and the whole valley ('ēmeḳ) of the dead bodies, and of the ashes, and all the fields unto the brook Kidron, unto the corner of the horse gate to the east, shall be holy unto the Lord.' This seems clearly to point to the ground stretching from above the Virgin's Fountain to the Bîr Eyûb, including the mouth of Wâdy er-Rubâbeh. Now, this land is here described as 'ēmeḳ, although Kidron is termed a naḥal, and the valley of H. (wherever located) is termed a gai. This ground is also called fields (shĕdēmōth, Jer 31[40] [Kerē]), and the 'king's garden' by Siloam (Neh 3[15]), probably the same as the king's dale ('ēmeḳ), where Absalom raised a pillar (2 S 18[18]), stated by Josephus (Ant. VII. x. 3) to be 2 furlongs from Jerusalem. Josephus also relates that the 'king's paradise' or 'garden' was in the vicinity of En-rogel, where Adonijah conspired against king David (1 K 1[9]; Ant. VII. xiv. 4, IX. x. 4). Perhaps this may be the 'king's dale' or 'vale' ('ēmeḳ) of Shaveh (Gn 14[17]), where Melchizedek met Abraham. The garden of Uzza is not located (2 K 21[18]). This junction of the valleys may be the valley ('ēmeḳ) of Jehoshaphat or of decision (Jl 3[2. 12. 14]), where all nations shall be judged in 'the day of the LORD,' thus agreeing with the tradition of Christians, Moslems, and Jews for many centuries. See JEHOSHAPHAT (VALLEY OF). The 'king's gardens' were in the immediate vicinity of the remarkable waterworks constructed by the kings of Judah. The Virgin's Fountain is identified as Gihon in the valley (2 Ch 33[14]), the upper outlet of which was stopped by king Hezekiah, who 'brought it straight down by an underground way on the west side of the city of David' (2 K 20[20], 2 Ch 32[30]). This account exactly describes the rock-cut passage which runs through the Ophel spur to Siloam. There is, however, a still more ancient watercourse by which the Virgin's Fountain supplied the city of David with water (discovered by the present writer in 1868), and this waterduct has been identified by some as the 'gutter' by which Joab got up into the city of the Jebusites. On the outside of the Virgin's Fountain can still be seen the old conduit which led the overflow waters down the Kidron, and which may be identified as the conduit of the upper pool in the highway of the fuller's field (2 K 18[17], Is 7[3] 36[2]). It may possibly also be the 'king's pool' (Neh 2[14]). The pool between the two walls at Siloam is also mentioned (Is 22[9. 11], Neh 3[15]). But perhaps the greatest instance yet known of the magnitude of the waterworks of the past in the valley of Hinnom is the remarkable aqueduct cut in the rock running down the Wâdy en-Nâr below the Bîr Eyûb, discovered and cleared out in 1868 for several hundred yards, and serving for no apparent purpose. This seems probably the aqueduct to carry off 'the brook that overflowed through the midst of the land,' for 'Why should the kings of Assyria come, and find much water?' (2 Ch 32[4]).

HIP.—The only occurrence of this word in AV is in the proverbial expression Jg 15[8] 'And he smote them hip and thigh (שׁוֹק עַל־יָרֵךְ) with a great slaughter.' The Heb. is lit. 'leg upon thigh,' but the origin of the phrase is quite unknown. The phrase 'hip and thigh' comes from the Gen. Bible, which offers in the marg. 'horsemen and footmen,' the suggestion of Targ.; but that does not explain the expression. Nor is Kimchi's 'heels over head,' in reference to their flight, more likely or more lucid. Others suppose the meaning to be that they were cut in pieces, and limb piled on limb in bloody confusion. We may compare 'catch one or have one on the hip,' supposed to belong to the language of wrestling, and found in Shaks. and elsewhere, as Merch. of Venice, I. iii. 47—

> 'If I can catch him once upon the hip,
> I will feed fat the ancient grudge I bear him.'

RV introduces 'hip' into Gn 32[32 bis] 'the sinew of the hip,' for AV 'the sinew which shrank.' See SINEW.

HIRAH (חִירָה).—The Adullamite with whom Judah, according to the story of Gn 38 (J), appears to have entered into a kind of partnership in the matter of flocks (see Dillm. ad loc.). In vv.[12. 20] he is called the 'friend' (רֵעַ) of Judah. Instead of רֵעֵהוּ, the LXX must have read רֹעֵהוּ 'his shepherd,' for in both these verses it has ποιμήν. This reading is followed also by Vulg. (pastor, opilio) and Luther (Hirte), but there can be little doubt that it is wrong. From v.[1] it is evident that Hirah's relation to Judah was an independent one, even if Judah was the more important man of the two. After Tamar had successfully carried out her stratagem, it was by the hand of his 'friend' Hirah that Judah sent the promised kid to the supposed ḳĕdēshāh, Gn 38[20ff.].

J. A. SELBIE.

HIRAM (חִירָם; Χειράμ).—Some confusion exists as to the actual form of the name. In the books of Samuel and Kings the form given above is that which is usually adopted; but in 1 K 5[10. 18] [Heb. [24. 32]] 7[40] Hirom (חִירוֹם) occurs, while the Chronicler adheres to the form Huram (חוּרָם; in 1 Ch 14[1] Kethîbh חירם). The LXX invariably gives Χειράμ; Josephus Εἴρωμος (c. Apion. i. 17, 18) and Εἴραμος (Ant. VIII. ii. 6, etc.). The name further appears as Σίρωμος (Herodotus, vii. 98; Syncellus, p. 343 ff.) and Σούρων (Eupolemon cited by Eusebius, Præp. Evang. ix. 33, 34). The name is undoubtedly Phœnician, and is equivalent to Ahiram (אֲחִירָם Nu 26[38]) = 'brother of the exalted one';* cf. Baethgen, Beiträge zur Semit. Religionsgeschichte, p. 156 (but see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 75 ff., upon whose theory the meaning is 'brother is exalted'). According to Movers (Die Phönizier, i. p. 505 f.), Hiram or Huram is the name of a deity = 'the coiled or

* Names of this type are especially common in Phœnician; cf. Abibaal, Abiram. Similar instances of the dropping of the initial א occur in Hebrew (Hiel, 1 K 16[34] חִיאֵל, for אֲחִיאֵל), and in Phœnician (חמלך, חמלכת = 'brother of Milk,' 'of Milkath'; חתמלכת = 'sister of Milkath').

twisted one'; but this derivation is very improbable.

1. King of Tyre, and contemporary with David and Solomon. According to 2 S 5^{11}, 1 Ch 14^{1}, H. sent an embassy to David after the conquest of Jerusalem, and provided him with artisans and materials for the building of his palace. On the accession of Solomon messengers were again sent to the Israelite court, doubtless to offer congratulations to the new king (1 K $5^{1f.}$). A treaty was concluded between the two kingdoms, in accordance with which H. supplied cedar trees and fir trees from Lebanon, together with skilled workmen for the building of the temple. In return, Solomon paid a yearly tribute of 20,000 cors of wheat and 20,000 baths of pure oil (after the reading of LXX, 2 Ch and Josephus; the Hebrew gives '20 cors of oil,' 1 K 5^{6-11}). At the end of the twenty years 'wherein Solomon had built the two houses, the house of the LORD and the king's house,' he presented Hiram with twenty cities in the land of Galilee. The gift, however, failed to please the Phœnician king,* though in return he made Solomon a present of 120 talents of gold (1 K 9^{10-14}). The friendly relations between the two monarchs were further strengthened by their combined trading operations: for 'the king (Solomon) had at sea a navy of Tarshish with the navy of Hiram: once every three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks' (1 K 10^{22}, 2 Ch 9^{21}). In addition to this, we are expressly told that the sailors of Solomon's merchant vessels trading between Ezion-geber (at the top of the Gulf of Akabah) and Ophir were accompanied by Hiram's servants, 'shipmen that had knowledge of the sea' (1 K 9^{26-28}, 2 Ch $8^{17.\ 18}$), and were well acquainted with the route to Ophir (1 K 10^{11}).

In the Chronicler's account of Solomon's dealings with Hiram (2 Ch $2^{3ff.}$) the yearly tribute paid by the former is increased to '20,000 measures of beaten wheat, and 20,000 measures of barley, and 20,000 baths of wine, and 20,000 baths of oil,' and is applied to the maintenance of the Tyrian workpeople.

This statement seems due to some confusion on the part of the Chronicler: probably a certain quantity of wheat and pure oil was supplied to the Phœnician court, and a similar contribution of barley, wine, and oil handed over to 'the hewers that cut timber.' The Book of Kings only mentions the former payment, which the Chronicler incorrectly combines with a second statement (apparently obtained from another source) relating to the workpeople only. A more striking discrepancy between the two accounts occurs at 2 Ch $8^{1.\ 2}$, where the Chronicler, who ignores the present of gold made by Hiram to Solomon (1 K 9^{14}), refers to the cities of Galilee as if they had been presented to Solomon by Hiram. The omission, as well as the contradiction of the statement of 1 K $9^{11f.}$, is probably due to the desire of the Chronicler to bring the history more into conformity with the views of his own age. According to the later conception it would be as improbable that Solomon, with his fabulous riches, should receive gold from Hiram, as that he should present Israelite cities to a foreign monarch.

A more serious difficulty, however, confronts us when we compare the biblical narrative with the information supplied by Josephus from the Tyrian historians, Menander and Dius (Ant. VIII. ii. 6–9, v. 3; c. Apion. i. 17, 18). According to the latter, Hiram was the son of Abibaal, and died at the age of 53 after a glorious reign of 34 years. Now, we have already seen that the building of David's palace followed immediately after the capture of Jerusalem (2 S 5^{11}), i.e. in the seventh year of David's reign. It is further stated (1 K $9^{10f.}$) that Hiram was still alive in the twentieth year of Solomon's reign, so that, according to the biblical narrative, the total length of his reign must have exceeded 50 years. The disagreement between the two accounts is made even clearer by the statement of Josephus (Ant. VIII. iii. 1), that the building of the temple began in the 11th year of Hiram. For the temple was begun in the 4th year of Solomon (1 K 6^{1}), so that Hiram and David could have reigned only 8 years contemporaneously. It has been conjectured by Ewald (Gesch. iii. p. 307) and Bertheau (on 2 Ch 2^{2}) that the Hiram of David's reign was the grandfather of Solomon's contemporary. Thenius, on the other hand (on 2 S 5^{11}, 1 K 5^{1}), supposes that Abibaal was merely an honorary title, and that both father and son were called Hiram. The most probable solution of the difficulty is that the Books of Samuel are not chronologically arranged, and that David's palace was not actually built until the end of his reign (Movers, Die Phönizier, ii. 1, p. 148 f.; see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF).

Josephus further recounts (Ant. VIII. v. 3; c. Apion. i. 17, 18), on the authority of Menander and Dius, that Solomon and Hiram engaged in a contest with riddles, in which the former was finally overcome by a young Tyrian named Abdemon. In another passage (Ant. VIII. ii. 6–7) he sets forth the letters which passed between the two kings on the subject of the building of the temple, and asserts that copies were preserved, not only in Jewish books, but in the Tyrian state-records (cf. 2 Ch 2^{11}). In all probability, these letters are to be ascribed to Josephus himself; they are given at greater length by Eupolemon (Eusebius, Præp. Evang. ix. 33, 34), and are mentioned by Alexander Polyhistor (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 21). According to Clem. Alex. (loc. cit.) and Tatian (Or. c. Græcos, § 37), Solomon married the daughter of Hiram (cf. 1 K $11^{2.\ 5}$, where Zidonians are mentioned among Solomon's wives).

Among the more important events of the glorious reign of Hiram may be mentioned (1) the campaign against the inhabitants of Cyprus, who had refused to pay the customary tribute; (2) the fortification of the island of Tyre; (3) the erection of new temples to Hercules and Astarte. H. further restored many old sanctuaries and enriched one of the chief temples (that of Zeus-Baalsamin) with numerous golden ornaments, in particular with a golden pillar (mentioned by Herodotus, ii. 44). See Movers, Die Phönizier, II. i. 141 f.

2. The artificer procured by king Solomon from Tyre for the purpose of casting the various vessels and ornaments of brass for the temple (1 K $7^{13f.}$): acc. to 2 Ch 2^{13}, he was also 'skilful to work in gold and in silver . . . in iron, in stone, and in timber, in purple, in blue, and in fine linen, and in crimson.' The more important of his works were the two pillars of brass, the molten sea and the twelve oxen, the ten bases and the ten lavers, all of brass, besides the vessels of brass required for the temple service. According to 1 K 7 his mother was a widow woman of the tribe of Naphtali, and his father a Tyrian brassworker. The Chronicler, however, describes him as 'Huram Abi* (חוּרָם אָבִי;

* 1 K 9^{13} 'and he called them the land of Cabul.' Cabul is usually taken as='worth nothing.' It is more probable that the LXX ὅριον represents the truer reading, viz. 'land of Galilee' (אֶרֶץ הַגָּלִיל), supposing him to have connected the word with גֵּלָל 'dung.' See Klostermann in loc.). Buhl (GAP p. 221), however, considers that the territory lay somewhere near the town of that name (Jos 19^{27}) in N. Galilee: in this case the LXX ὅριον is treated as a mistranslation of גְּבוּל, as if גְּבוּל.

* The word 'Abi' (אָבִי 'my father') is usually taken (Bertheau on 2 Ch 2^{13}) in the sense of 'master,' a title of respect and distinction; cf. Gn 4^{20-22} 45^{8} etc.

4^{16} הוֹרָם אֲבִיו), the son of a woman of the daughters of Dan' (2 Ch $2^{13f.}$). As Giesebrecht has shown (ZATW, 1881, p. 239 f., but see Cheyne in Expository Times, June 1898, p. 471[a]), it is probable that the Chronicler has here preserved the truer account; the latter portion of the name was omitted as unintelligible by the author of Kings (cf. LXX to 2 Ch 2^{13} τὸν πατέρα μου, παῖδα μου). He further suggests that the dislike felt by the editor of Kings to the idea of the temple being built by a half-Phœnician, caused him to insert the words 'a widow of the tribe of Naphtali' (אַלְמָנָה . . . מִמַּטֵּה נַפְתָּלִי), the alteration of בְּנוֹת דָּן ('of the daughters of Dan') into מִמַּטֵּה נַפְתָּלִי ('of the tribe of Naphtali') being the more permissible, since Dan lay in the territory of Naphtali. Josephus (Ant. VIII. iii. 4) describes him as of the tribe of Naphtali on his mother's side, his father being Ur of the stock of Israel (cf. on this later tradition Ed. König in Expos. Times, May 1898, p. 346[a]).

J. F. STENNING.

HIRE, HIRELING.—Hire in AV is equivalent always to mod. wages. Thus Gn 31^{8} 'The ringstraked shall be thy hire'; Is 23^{18} 'And her merchandise and her hire shall be holiness to the LORD' (Del. 'her gain and her wages become holy unto J"'); Mic 3^{11} 'The heads thereof judge for reward, and the priests thereof teach for hire'; Lk 10^{7} 'the labourer is worthy of his hire.' Tindale has the word very much as in the mod. use in Mk 12^{1} 'And let yt out to hyre unto husbandmen.' The plu. 'hires,' now obsolete, occurs once in AV, Mic 1^{7} 'All the hires thereof shall be burned with fire.' So Wyc. (1388) in Lv 25^{53}, Ezk 16^{33}, and (1380) Ro 6^{23} 'Treuli the hyris of synne, deeth' (1388, 'For the wagis of synne is deth').

A hireling is a hired servant (for which see FAMILY, vol. i. p. 849[a]), and properly carries no suggestion of unfaithfulness. Thus Tindale, Works, i. 146, 'Hereby mayest thou not understand that we obtain the favour of God, and the inheritance of life, through the merits of good works, as hirelings do their wages.' So Rhem. has 'hireling' in Lk $15^{17.19}$, where all the other VSS have 'hired servant.' And cf. Sir 7^{20} 'Whereas thy servant worketh truly, entreat him not evil, nor the hireling that bestoweth himself wholly for thee.' But through Christ's use of the word in Jn $10^{12.13}$ it has come to express not only one who has no interest in his work, but even one who is unfaithful in the doing of it. Gosson (Schoole of Abuse, Arber's ed. p. 25) says, 'Poetrie and pyping have allwaies bene so united togither, that til the time of Melanippides, Pipers were Poets hyerlings; but marke I pray you, how they are nowe both abused.' The word 'hireling' is now as greatly abused as either, being carried quite beyond our Lord's meaning and intention. Shaks. does not use the word; but Milton (PL iv. 193) gives us—

> 'So clomb this first grand Thief into God's fold;
> So since into his church lewd hirelings climb.'

Then South, Sermons, iv. No. 5—'If we consider even Judas himself, it was not his carrying the bag, while he followed his master, but his following his master only that he might carry the bag, which made him a thief and an hireling.' Finally, Cowper, Truth—

> 'But with averted eyes th' omniscient Judge
> Scorns the base hireling, and the slavish drudge.'

HIS.—Under an impression, probably, that the 's of the poss. case was a shortened form of his (though it is really the remains of the Anglo-Saxon genitive ending -es), this adj. was employed throughout a long period to indicate possession. It probably arose from a desire to avoid adding s to a word which already had that sound, perhaps more than once. Hence it is generally found after words ending in s, and especially after proper names. Thus Ridley, Brefe Declaration (Moule's ed.), p. 119, 'Innocentius his fantastical invention'; and p. 140, 'Duns his fantastical imagination'; Knox, Hist. p. 101, 'Secondarily, said he, I greatly doubt whether James his commandment or Pauls obedience, proceeded of the holy Ghost'; Fuller, Holy Warre, I. 3 (p. 4), 'But his Holinesse his converting facultie worketh the strongest at the greatest distance.' It is freely employed, however, where there is no need to avoid repeating s. Thus Cranmer, Works (Parker Soc.), i. 2, 'And where he had reasons for the King his party, that he was moved of God his law, which doth straitly forbid and that with many great threats, that no man shall marry his brother his wife.' And, on the other hand, old writers had not so nice an ear as we ourselves in the matter of multiplying sibilants. We find in Cranmer, Works, i. 18, 'the King's Grace's most honourable Council,' and p. 151, 'the King's Highness's realm';* and in Hall (Works, ii. 190) even 'We are Moseses disciples.' The idiom indeed was left after a time to the caprice or taste of the writer. Tindale gives us in Mt 22^{32} 'I am Abrahams God, and Ysaacks God, and the God of Jacob.'

In AV 1611 his was used for the poss. case in 1 K 15^{14} 'Asa his heart was perfect with the LORD all his dayes,' and in Est 3^{4} 'to see whether Mordecai his matters would stand.' In 1762 these were changed into the usual form with 's. But in the heading of Dt 10 'Moses his suit' remains, and even 'Sarai her name' in Gn 17 [heading], and the foll. examples of his are still found in the Apocr., 1 Es 1 [heading] 2^{30} $3^{7.8}$, To 1 [heading], Jth 12^{15} 13^{9} 15^{11}. Three [heading] 2 Mac 1^{33m} 4^{38} 12^{22}; and in the Translators' Preface we find, 'Doth not their Paris edition differ from the Lovaine, and Hortensius his from them both,' and 'We might be taxed peradventure with S. James his words.'

HITHERTO was formerly an adv. of space as well as of time, as in Shaks. I Henry IV. III. i. 74—

> 'England, from Trent and Severn hitherto,
> By south and east, is to my part assigned.'

So in AV, Job 38^{11} 'Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further' (עַד־פֹּה); 2 S 7^{18}=1 Ch 17^{16} 'Who am I, O LORD God, and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?' (עַד־הֵנָּה, RV 'thus far'). Even when the ref. is to time, 'hitherto' was used in a sense that is now unfamiliar, expressing not only what has been up till now, but what is still going on. In Jn 16^{24} 'Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name,' the meaning is that that which is true up till now is no longer to be so. But in Jn 5^{17} 'My Father worketh hitherto, and I work,' though the Gr. (ἕως ἄρτι) is the same, the meaning is that the work still goes on (RV 'even until now'). Cf. Hamilton's Catechism, fol. 14^{b} 'Quhat is the trew sence of the same bukis is ye consent and authorite of our mother the haly kirk, fra the Apostils tyme hitherto'; and Udal, Erasmus Paraphrase, ii. fol. 279[a] 'He is as yet hitherto alyve, that the hater wisheth evill unto, and yet he him selfe is al ready dead. That mans life is safe: and this hath lost everlasting lyfe, being his owne murtherour.'

Hittites,' which is more closely defined in Jg 1^{26} as to the north of Palestine. In 2 S 24^{6} the unintelligible and corrupt 'Tahtim-hodshi' must be corrected into 'the Hittites of Kadesh,' according to a corrected reading of the LXX (Luc. εἰς γῆν Χεττιείμ Καδήs), so that the power of David extended northward as far as Kadesh on the Orontes close to the lake of Homs. Solomon imported horses from 'the kings of the Hittites,' as well as from the kings of Aram, from Egypt, or perhaps a northern Miẓir, and (according to a suggestion of Fr. Lenormant) from Ḳue on the Gulf of Antioch, the price of a horse being 150 shekels of silver (about £25, 1 K $10^{28.\ 29}$). These northern 'kings of the Hittites' were supposed by the Syrians of Damascus, when they were besieging Samaria at a later date, to have been 'hired' against them by the king of Israel (2 K 7^{6}).

Besides the northern Hittites, other Hittites, or 'sons of Heth,' are mentioned in the OT as inhabiting the south of Palestine. Abraham found them at Hebron (Gn 23^{3} 25^{10}); in Nu 13^{29} the Hittites are named along with the Jebusites and Amorites as dwelling in the mountains of Canaan; and Ezk (16^{3}) declares that the father of Jerus. was an Amorite, and its mother a Hittite. These southern Hittites are probably alone meant in Gn 10^{15}, though, as the Hamathites are also included among the children of Canaan, it is possible that the northern Hittites may be referred to as well. 'Uriah the Hittite' (2 S 12) may have belonged to the Hittites of the south, like the two Hittite wives of Esau (Gn 26^{34} 36^{2}; cf. 27^{46}).

On the Egyp. monuments the Khata or Hittites are first mentioned in the Annals of Thothmes III. of the 18th dynasty (B.C. 1503–1449). In B.C. 1470 the Pharaoh marched to the banks of the Euphrates and received the tribute of the land of the Hittites, 'the Greater,' consisting of 8 rings of silver 400 lb. in weight, and 'a great piece of crystal.' In B.C. 1463 tribute was again sent from 'the king of the Greater Hittite land.' Thothmes IV., the grandson of Thothmes III., repulsed an attack made by the Hittites upon Tunip (now Tennib) in N. Syria, and his two successors, Amenôphis (Amen-hotep) III. and IV., as we learn from the Tel el-Amarna tablets, were constantly called on to oppose the Hittite 'king,' who led his forces through the passes of the Taurus into the Egyp. province of N. Syria, or intrigued with disaffected Canaanites in Palestine. We hear, finally, of Eta-gama, the native governor of Kadesh on the Orontes, joining with the king of the Hittites and the king of Mitanni or Aram-naharaim against the Egyptians.

The decay of the Egyp. power in Syria enabled the Hittites to establish themselves, not only at Carchemish on the Euphrates, but also in the Amorite city of Kadesh on the Orontes, near the lake of Homs. Seti I., the second king of the 19th dynasty, claims to have overthrown them. They were ruled at the time by Mutal, the son of Mul-sar, who had been murdered, and who was the son of Saplil. Ramses II., the successor of Seti, continued the war. In the 5th year of the Pharaoh's reign (B.C. 1343), Ramses, while besieging Kadesh, saved himself from a Hittite ambuscade only by performing prodigies of valour, which formed the subject of a sort of epic on the part of the court-poet Pentaür. In the 21st year of Ramses (B.C. 1327) a treaty, offensive and defensive, was made between him and 'the great king of the Hittites,' Khata-sar, who had succeeded his brother Mutal, which put an end to the war. Among other stipulations it was agreed that all political refugees on either side should be pardoned. The observance of the treaty was placed under the protection of the Hittite and Egyptian deities, and the Hittite text of it was engraved on a silver plate, on which was an image of the god Sutekh embracing the Hittite king. The plate was brought to Egypt by the Hittite ambassador Tar-Tiseb. The treaty was faithfully kept, being cemented by the marriage of the daughter of the Hittite king to Ramses, and Kadesh continued to mark the southern limit of Hittite rule.

In the Aramæan districts south of the Taurus the Hittites do not seem to have been more than a conquering caste, and their power was broken by the invasion of the hordes from the islands and coasts of the Greek seas, who poured through Syria and the land of the Amorites into Egypt in the reign of Ramses III. of the 20th dynasty. When the Assyr. monuments, in the time of Tiglath-pileser I. (B.C. 1100), first begin to refer to the Khattâ (also written Khatê), in place of a single Hittite king who is able to summon allies from the distant regions of Asia Minor, we find a number of separate Hittite states. Of these Carchemish seems to have been the wealthiest and most important. The Assyrians penetrated into Kummukh (Commagênê), and compelled Sadi-Tesub (or Sadi-Anteru), son of Khattu-sar, the Hittite king, to become tributary. The name of Khattu-sar is plainly the same as that of the opponent of Ramses II.

In B.C. 880 Assur-naẓir-pal, the Assyr. king, received tribute from Sangara of Carchemish, and forced his way over the fords of the Euphrates to the west. His successor, Shalmaneser II. (B.C. 854), defeated a league of Hittites and Aramæans from Kummukh and the adjoining countries, of which Sangara was the head. The Assyrians had already extended the name of 'Hittite' from the Hittites proper to all the inhabitants of Syria and Palestine, and we find Shalmaneser II. including even the kings of Israel, of Ammon, and of the Arabs, among the 'Hittite' princes. Just as the Babylonians had given the name of 'Amorites' to all the inhabitants of Syria and Palestine, the 'Amorites' having been the dominant people of the west when the Babylonians first became acquainted with it, so the fact that the Hittites were the first and most powerful of the antagonists whom the Assyrians encountered in their Syrian campaigns, caused the name of 'Hittite' in the Assyr. period to be applied to all the nations west of the Euphrates. The capture of Carchemish by Sargon in B.C. 717, and the death of its last king, Pisiris, broke up the Hittite power in northern Syria, and threw the trade of W. Asia into Assyr. hands.

The Hittites under the name of Khatê are mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions of Armenia or Ararat. In the 9th cent. B.C. Menuas, king of Biainas or Van, defeated the Hittite king Sada-halis, and sacked the towns of Surisilis and Tarkhi-gamas. His son and successor, Argistis I., continued the war and conquered the Hittite city of Milid (the modern Malatiyeh). The 'land of the Hittites' of the Vannic inscriptions extended along the banks of the Euphrates from Palu in the east to Malatiyeh in the west.

A study of the Hittite proper names preserved in the Egyp. and cuneiform texts goes to show that they all belonged to the same family of speech, and that they can be traced far to the westward in Asia Minor. Thus the names of the Hittite princes, Saplil, Mutal, and Khata-sar, mentioned by the Egyptians, reappear in those of Sapalulvi, Mutallu, and Khattu-sar, who, according to the Assyr. monuments, were kings of Gurgum (in the neighbourhood of Zinjerli, N. of the Gulf of Antioch) and of Kummukh or Commagênê, while Mutallu is the Motalos of certain Gr. inscriptions of Asia Minor. It is further clear from the Tel el-Amarna tablets that the Hittites were of Cappadocian origin, that they had poured down from the fastnesses of the Taurus and had occupied the Aramæan cities and fertile fields of northern Syria. We may further gather from the Egyp. records that in the 14th and 13th cent. B.C. they had not only established themselves so far to the south as Kadesh on the Orontes, but had founded a military empire, which enabled the king of Kadesh to summon allies and vassals from Asia Minor.

The Hittites, as represented on the Egyp. monuments, were an ugly race, with yellow skins, black hair and eyes, receding foreheads, and protrusive upper jaws. The type is still preserved among some of the Cappadocian peasantry, especially S.W. of Nigdeh in the neighbourhood of the ancient Tyana. They wore boots with upturned ends, originally intended for use among the snows of the Taurus mountains; but they became so characteristic a national dress that at the Ramesseum in Thebes even the Hittites of Kadesh, on the warm plains of Syria, are depicted as wearing them. Over a tunic they also wore a long robe, which was allowed to fall open on one side in walking, and they seem to have gathered the hair at the back of the head into a sort of pigtail.

A curious class of monuments has been discovered of late years in Asia Minor and northern Syria, on which all these characteristics are reproduced. The monuments consist of bas-reliefs in a peculiar style of art, and of inscriptions in an equally peculiar hieroglyphic system of writing. Both the sculptures and the inscriptions exhibit heads and figures with exactly the same features, the same pigtails, costume, and snow-shoes as those which the Egyp. artists assigned to the Hittites. As we learn from the Egyp. records that the Hittites had a script of their own, as, moreover, the monuments referred to are found in the region over which the Hittite power extended according to the Egyp. and Assyr. texts, while there is no other known power to which they can be ascribed, the conclusion is obvious that they must be the monuments of the people called Hittites by the Hebrews, Egyptians, Assyrians, and Armenians. A reminiscence of their empire is probably preserved in a passage of Solinus (ch. xli. p. 195, ed. Mommsen).

Hittite art was based on that of early Babylonia, though some of the later monuments of it are modelled on the Assyr. art of the 9th and 8th cent. B.C. But, though based on Babylonian art, the elements which had been borrowed were profoundly modified, and a new and remarkable style of art was thus developed. The Hittites seem to have had a special fancy for combining parts of different animals into strangely composite and sometimes grotesque forms. It was through the Hittites that the winged horse made its way into Europe, like the two-headed eagle, originally derived, it would seem, from the heraldic symbol of the ancient Bab. city of Lagas (Telloh), but in later days adopted by the Seljukian sultans, and borrowed from them by the Crusaders.

Hittite sculptures and inscriptions can be traced as far south in Syria as Hamah (Hamath), and as far westward in Asia Minor as Lydia. In the pass of Kara-bel, near the site of Sardis, are the figures of two Hittite warriors, one of them accompanied by Hittite hieroglyphs, and supposed by Herodotus (II. 106) to be memorials of Egyp. conquest, while other Hittite hieroglyphs have been found at the side of the so-called 'Weeping Niobê' on Mount Sipylus. From the fact that the figures in the pass are those of warriors, and that in such of the inscriptions as are legible, including one discovered by Ramsay in Phrygia, the characters which denote the grammatical affixes are always the same, we may infer that the Hittite monuments, both of Syria and of Asia Minor, all belong to one people, and that the more distant of them imply conquest on the part of a great military power rather than artistic influence. The influence of Hittite art, which can be traced into prehistoric Greece, is of a different character.

There is a bilingual inscription, in cuneiform and Hittite characters, on the silver 'boss' of Tarkondêmos, but it has proved insufficient to furnish a key to the interpretation of the inscriptions. A brilliant attempt has been made, indeed, by Jensen (ZDMG, 1894, pp. 235 ff., 429 ff.), of which Hilprecht speaks very highly (Rec. Res. in Bible Lands, p. 178, 'correct in its principal results'; cf. Bab. Exped. of Pennsyl. i. 13, 'Jensen has forced the Hittite sphinx to surrender her long guarded secret'). The present writer cannot assent to Hilprecht's verdict. All we can gather with certainty is that the hieroglyphs are partly ideographic, partly phonetic; that some of them are determinatives; that the lines read alternately from right to left, and from left to right; and that the grammatical relations are marked by affixes. Most of the inscriptions are in relief. The proper names of genuine Hittite origin found in the Egyp. and Assyr. texts are non-Semitic, and a comparison of them goes to show that the nom. sing. of the noun was characterized by the suffix -s. As the Hittites ruled over an Aramaic population in N. Syria, we naturally find Aramæan by the side of Hittite names. The Hittite hieroglyphs were of native origin, and may have been selected from an older pictorial system of writing, once used in Asia Minor, of which certain characters on two seals discovered at Yuzghât, on the one side, and the Cretan pictographs recently brought to light by Evans, on the other side, may be further relics.

The primitive home of the Hittite race was probably Cappadocia. Here, at any rate, in the ruins of Boghaz Keui and Eyuk, to the east of the Halys, are the remains of two of their most important cities. Boghaz Keui seems to have been a centre of religious worship, and the figures of numerous deities are carved in relief upon its rocks. The mural crown worn by some of the goddesses passed westward into Greek art. Ramsay (Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, I. pp. xiii–xv, 1895) has pointed out that the ancient high-roads which intersected Asia Minor and led to northern Syria met at Boghaz Keui, indicating that here was the centre of an empire which once extended from Kadesh on the Orontes to the shores of the Ægean.

The relation between the Hittites of N. Syria and the Hittites of Genesis and Ezekiel who lived in S. Palestine is uncertain. We may infer, however, from the identity of name, that in the view of the biblical writers the two populations were connected in race. This is supported by the fact that, according to the Egyp. monuments, the Hittites and Amorites were interlocked in the north, just as they were, according to the OT, in the south. It is further verified by the expression, 'the land of the Hittites, the Greater,' used by Thothmes III., which implies that there was another lesser Hittite-land, as well as by a bas-relief at Karnak in which the people of Ashkelon are represented with characteristically Hittite features. This shows that a fragment of the Hittite race must have been settled in the south of Palestine (but see Gray, Expos. May, 1898, p. 340 f.).

A. H. SAYCE.

HIVITES (חִוִּי, always with the art. collectively,

חִוִּי; Εὐαῖοι).—The name of one of the petty tribes inhabiting Canaan, who were dispossessed by the Israelites. To judge from the passages which localize them most definitely, their home was in Central Palestine; in Jos 9^{7} (JE) and 11^{19} (D^{2}) the inhabitants of Gibeon, about 6 miles N.N.W. of Jerusalem, and (it seems to be implied in 9^{17}) of certain neighbouring cities, are called Hivites; in Gn 34^{2} (P; or [Corn.] E) the term is applied to Hamor, father of Shechem (who is here represented as an individual),* likewise a city in Central Palestine (Gn 33^{18}, Jg 9 etc.), 30 miles N. of Jerusalem; 2 S 24^{7} is ambiguous; but the statement that Joab passed from Zidon, through 'all the cities of the Hivites' to Beersheba, in the S. of Judah, is evidently quite consistent with the same locality. The expression, 'all the cities of the Hivites,' in this passage is, however, peculiar, and would seem to point to a somewhat considerable group of cities, still inhabited by Hivites, and possibly even further to the N. than Shechem. But if such existed, we do not know more about them; and it is remarkable that in the accounts in Jos 16^{10} $17^{12\text{-}13,\ 14\text{-}18}$, Jg 1 of the districts which the Israelites failed to conquer, there is no mention of Hivites. The other notices of the Hivites are (1) in the rhetorical lists of nations expelled by the Israelites (JE, D, D^{2}), Ex $3^{8,\ 17}$ 13^{5} $23^{23,\ 28}$ 33^{2} 34^{11}, Dt 7^{1} 20^{17}, Jos 3^{10} 9^{1} 11^{3} 12^{8} 24^{11}, Jg 3^{5}, 1 K 9^{20} (=2 Ch 8^{7}), from which nothing definite can be inferred respecting the place of their abode (unless their being mentioned usually before the Jebusites [of Jerusalem] may be taken as an indication that they were pictured as having lived near them); and (2) in Gn 10^{17} (=1 Ch 1^{15}), where, in accordance with the custom of Hebrew genealogists of representing the peoples inhabiting a country as the 'sons' of its eponymous ancestor, they are included among other tribes 'begotten' by Canaan.†

We do not possess the necessary data for determining with any confidence the character or racial affinities of the Hivites (see speculations in Ewald, Hist. i. 237; Sayce, Races of the OT, 119 f.). They were the actors in the ruse by which the Gibeonites secured themselves against the Israelite invaders; and if the isolated notice in Gn 34^{2} is to be depended upon, the people of Shechem, who take part against the Israelites in the graphic narrative of Jg 9, may have been Hivite (though they are not so termed in the narrative itself). Shechem and Gibeon are elsewhere (Gn 48^{22} E; 2 S 21^{2}) spoken of as 'Amorite'; but, in view of the manner in which the term 'Amorite' is employed (above, vol. i. p. 84; Driver, Deut. pp. 10–12), it is doubtful whether this fact authorizes the definite conclusion that the Hivites were racially 'Amorite.'

In Gn 36^{2} 'Zibeon the Hivite' is almost certainly an error for 'Zibeon the Horite' (see vv.$^{20,\ 24}$): in Jos 11^{3} read with LXX, and in agreement with the known home of the Hittites in the N., 'the Hittite under Hermon' in v.^{b}, with 'the Hivite' for 'the Hittite' in v.^{a}; and similarly in Jg 3^{3} 'the Hittites (for 'the Hivites') that dwelt in Mount Lebanon.' It has been conjectured that חִוִּי is connected with Arab. ḥiwā', 'a circle of tents' (cf. Havvoth-Jair), and means properly 'tent-dweller,' 'villager' (Ges. 'paganus'); but it is extremely uncertain if this is really the case (cf. Moore on Jg 3^{5}).

S. R. Driver.

HIZKI (חִזְקִי, possibly shortened from חִזְקִיָּהוּ, 'J" strengthened'). — A Benjamite, 1 Ch 8^{17}, AV Hezeki. See Genealogy.

* In 33^{19} 'the children of Hamor, the father of Shechem,' Shechem is clearly the place (father=founder, as 1 Ch $2^{50,\ 51}$ etc.); cf. Jg 9^{28} 'the men of Hamor, the father of Shechem.'

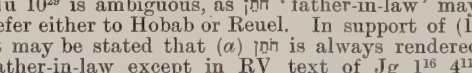
† 'Hivite' is read also by LXX, followed by Lagarde, Cheyne, Orelli, Duhm, and others, in Is 17^{9} ('like the deserted places of the Hivites and the Amorites, which they deserted before the children of Israel').

HIZKIAH (AV Hezekiah).—A son of Neariah, a descendant of David, 1 Ch 3^{23}.

HO.—The oft-occurring interjection הוֹי, which is more sympathetic—has more of grace in it—than אוֹי Woe!, is tr^{d} 'Ho!' in Is 55^{1} and Zec $2^{6\ bis}$; to which RV adds Is 29^{1}. Ho! does little more than arrest attention, unless its occurrence in Is 55^{1} has given it something of an evangelical tone. Shaks. uses it very often, expressing by its means (1) mockery or rebuke, (2) exultation, (3) pain, and (4) simply calling attention. See Ah, Ha.

HOBAB (חֹבָב 'beloved,' Ges.; 'serpent,' Wellh.). —The name occurs twice (Nu 10^{29}, Jg 4^{11}. In Jg 1^{16} B inserts Ἰοθόρ [so Jos. Ant. v. ii. 3]; A, Ἰωάβ). It is uncertain whether he was (1) the father-in-law (AV, RVm) or (2) brother-in-law (RV) of Moses.

The conflicting views may be tabulated thus—



Nu 10^{29} is ambiguous, as חֹתֵן 'father-in-law' may refer either to Hobab or Reuel. In support of (1) it may be stated that (a) חֹתֵן is always rendered father-in-law except in RV text of Jg 1^{16} 4^{11}. (b) Mohammedan tradition, almost without exception (Lane's Kuran, p. 47 n.), identifies Shoaib or Sho'eib [a corruption (?) of Hobab], a prophet sent to the Midianites (Koran, Sur. 7. 11. 26. 29) with Moses' father-in-law Jethro. (c) The narrative in Ex 2 seems to preclude the idea that the priest of Midian had sons. On the other hand, (a) חֹתֵן possibly means any relation on the wife's side, and (b) Reuel (Hobab's father) and Jethro seem to be identified (Ex 2^{18} 3^{1}, so Jos. Ant. v. ii. 3). However, Ewald (HI ii. p. 25 n.^{7}) conjectures that in Ex 2^{18} we should read 'Jethro the son of Reuel' (LXX ins. Ἰοθόρ in v.$^{16\ bis}$, and A substitutes Ἰοθόρ for Reuel in v.^{18}). 'Hobab was the man's real personal name, and Jethro, which signifies prefect, his title.' (c) In Ex 18^{27} (E) Jethro, unopposed by Moses, 'went his way into his own land'; whereas in Nu $10^{29ff.}$ (JE) it is implied that Hobab yielded to Moses' importunity, and remained with Israel. A parallel difficulty occurs in Nu 24^{25} (JE) compared with Nu 31^{8} (P). In each case we must remember that we have not all the facts before us: we are dealing, not with one consecutive narrative, but with a compilation of fragments. A difficulty, which equally affects both views, is the fact that Hobab is called a Kenite (Jg 1^{16} 4^{11}), whereas Exodus speaks of Moses' father-in-law as a Midianite. See, further, Dillm.-Ryssel, Ex-Lv, 1897, 25 ff.

Whoever Hobab was, he was the human agent by whom God led His people through the wilderness. This service to Israel was long kept in grateful remembrance (1 S 15^{6}).

HOBAH (חוֹבָה).—The place to which, acc. to Gn 14^{15}, Abraham pursued the defeated army of Chedorlaomer. It is described as 'on the left hand (מִשְּׂמֹאל, i.e. 'to the north') of Damascus.' It is identified by Wetzstein (see Del. Genesis,[4] p. 561 ff.) with the modern Ḥoba, 20 hours N. of Damascus. This certainly appears to be 'etwas weit,' as Siegfried-Stade remark; but the identification is accepted by Dillmann as more probable than one with a Ḥoba mentioned by von Troilo about a mile N. of Damascus.

HOBAIAH.—See Habaiah.

HOD (הוֹד 'majesty').—An Asherite, 1 Ch 7^{37}. See Genealogy.

HODAVIAH (הוֹדַוְיָה or הוֹדַוְיָהוּ; Kittel prefers to vocalize הוֹדִוָיָה, cf. LXX A Ὡδουία).—1. A Manassite clan, 1 Ch 5^{24}. 2. The name of a Benjamite family, 1 Ch 9^{7}. 3. A Levitical family name, Ezr 2^{40}, called in Neh 7^{43} Hodevah (which see). 4. A descendant of David, 1 Ch 3^{24} (הוֹדַוְיָהוּ; AV, following Kethibh הוֹדַוְיָהוּ, Hodaiah).

HODESH (חֹדֶשׁ 'new moon').—One of the wives of Shaharaim, a Benjamite, 1 Ch 8^{9}. See GENEALOGY.

HODEVAH (Kethibh הוֹדַוְיָה, Kerê, followed by RVm, הוֹדִיָה Hodeiah).—A Levitical family name, Neh 7^{43}, called in Ezr 2^{40} Hodaviah (which see).

HODIAH (הוֹדִיָה 'my "majesty" is J"').—1. A man of Judah, 1 Ch 4^{19}. AV wrongly takes it as a woman's name (see GENEALOGY, IV. 55). 2. A Levite, Neh 8^{7} 9^{5} 10^{10}. 3. Another Levite, Neh 10^{13}. 4. One of those who sealed the covenant, Neh 10^{18}.

HOGLAH (חָגְלָה 'partridge'). — Daughter of Zelophehad, Nu 26^{33} 27^{1} 36^{11}, Jos 17^{3} P.

HOHAM (הוֹהָם), king of Hebron, formed an alliance with other four kings against Gibeon, but was defeated by Joshua at Beth-horon, and put to death along with his allies at Makkedah (Jos $10^{3ff.}$). According to Hommel (AHT 223 n.), Hoham is identical with the Minæan name Hauhum (beginning with the guttural aspirate); but this combination is extremely precarious.

HOISE.—This is the older and more correct form of hoist, to which the t has probably been added from its presence in the past ptcp. It occurs Ac 27^{40} 'they . . . hoised up the mainsail to the wind.' Cf. Hall, Works, ii. 37, 'Who can pitty the shipwracke of those marriners, which will needes put forth, and hoise sailes in a tempest?' RV gives 'hoisting up the foresail,' and introduces 'hoist' also in 27^{17} for the simple vb. (αἴρω) of which the compound (ἐπαίρω) is here used. Both 'hoist' and 'hoised' are found as participles. Thus Hall, Works, ii. 40, 'Mee thinkes, I see Christ hoysed upon the highest battlements of the Temple'; and Shaks. Hamlet, III. iv. 27—'Hoist with his own petard.' J. HASTINGS.

HOLD.—As a subst. 'hold' occurs frequently in AV for a protected place, mod. 'stronghold,' for which the Heb. is generally מְצוּדָה or מְצוּדָה. In Jg $9^{46.\ 49}$ the word so tr^{d} is אֶרֶז, which occurs elsewhere only in 1 S 13^{6}, and of which the meaning is so doubtful that Moore declines to give it any rendering. Some commentators reckon it a secret chamber. RV retains 'holds' in Jg and gives that tr^{n} in 1 S, with 'holes' in marg. See Moore on Jg 9^{46}. The 'hold' of Ac 4^{3} is a general word, lit. 'keeping' (τήρησις). The same word with the adj. δημόσιος is tr^{d} in 5^{18} 'public prison.' RV gives 'ward' and 'public ward.' In Rev 18^{2} is found another general word (φυλακή), also originally an abstract term, 'guarding,' then a 'guard-room.' It occurs twice in this verse, being rendered in AV first 'hold' and then 'cage' (RV 'hold'). Perhaps 'dungeon' would be the best word here. For the Eng. word it will be enough to quote Bunyan, Holy War, p. 18, 'Wherefore into the castle he goes: it was that which Shaddai built in Mansoul for his own delight and pleasure; this now was become a Den and Hold for the Giant Diabolus.'

The verb 'to hold' is used in some obsolete or archaic senses: 1. To reckon, account, in 'hold guiltless' Ex 20^{7}, Dt 5^{11}, 1 K 2^{9}, or 'not guilty' Zec 11^{5}; 'hold innocent' Job 9^{28}; and 'hold contented' Sir 29^{3}. 2. To grip, Job 41^{26} 'The sword of him that layeth at him [leviathan] cannot hold' (RV 'avail'; Davidson, 'The sword does not hold or bite, but glances off his adamantine armour'); or restrain, keep under restraint, Lk 24^{16} 'But their eyes were holden that they should not know him' (ἐκρατοῦντο); Ro 7^{6} 'But now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held' * (κατειχόμεθα, RV 'we were holden'); or retain, keep hold of, Job 23^{11} 'My foot hath held his steps' (RV 'held fast to his steps'); Col 2^{19} 'And not holding the Head' (κρατῶν, RV 'holding fast'); or arrest (fig.) Ca 7^{5} 'The king is held in the galleries' (RV 'held captive'). Cf. Mk 3^{21} Tind. 'They went out to holde him. For they thought he had bene beside himselfe' (κρατῆσαι, Cran. 'to laye handes upon him,' AV 'to lay hold on him'). 3. To support, maintain, Ps 139^{10} 'thy right hand shall hold me'; 1 Mac 6^{52} 'Whereupon they also made engines against their engines, and held them battle a long season' (ἐπολέμησαν ἡμέρας πολλάς, RV 'fought for many days'). Cf. Defoe, Crusoe, p. 366, 'The battle, they said, held two Hours, before they could guess which Party would be beaten.' 4. Some phrases deserve attention: (1) Hold forth, Ph 2^{16} 'Holding forth the word of life' (ἐπέχοντες, Tind. 'holdinge fast,' Gen. [1557] 'putting forth,' Lightfoot 'holding out'). (2) Hold in, Jer 6^{11} 'I am weary with holding in.' (3) Hold of, Wis 2^{24} 'Nevertheless through envy of the devil came death into the world: and they that do hold of his side do find it' (οἱ τῆς ἐκείνου μερίδος ὄντες, RV 'they that are of his portion'). Cf. Tindale, Pent., Prologue to Numbers, 'He will hold of them and be sworne unto them to be their servaunte.' (4) Hold to, Sir 30^{13} 'Chastise thy son and hold him to labour' (ἔργάσαι ἐν αὐτῷ, RV 'take pains with him'); Mt 6^{24} (=Lk 16^{13}) 'either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other' (ἀνθέξεται). Cf. Dt 17^{16} Tind. 'But in ani wyse let him not holde to many horsses, that he bringe not the people agayne to Egipte thorow the multitude of horsses' (quoted also by Latimer, Sermons, Arber's ed. p. 25). (5) Hold up=support, Ps 119^{117} 'Hold thou me up, and I shall be safe'; 17^{5} 'Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not' (תָּמְכוּ אֲשֻׁרַי בְּמַעְגְּלוֹתֶיךָ, RV 'My steps have held fast to thy paths'; Wellhausen-Furness, 'My steps—they have followed close in thy footprints'); and the phrase 'hold up my face to,' 2 S 2^{22} 'Wherefore should I smite thee to the ground? how then should I hold up my face to Joab thy brother?' (6) Hold with, Dn 10^{21} 'And there is none that holdeth with me in these things but Michael your prince'; 1 Mac 3^{2} 'And all his brethren helped him, and so did all they that held with his father' (RV 'that clave unto'); Ac 14^{4} 'But the multitude of the city was divided: and part held with the Jews, and part with the apostles.' So Hos 11^{12} Cov. 'But Ephraim goeth aboute me with lies, and the house of Israel dyssembleth. Only Juda holdeth him with God, and with the true holy thinges.' J. HASTINGS.

HOLINESS.—IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.—The notion of holiness is expressed in Heb., as in the Semitic languages generally, by the two roots קדשׁ and חרם. Of these the latter was most widely diffused amongst the Semitic peoples, but in Heb. usage it was restricted to certain extreme kinds of consecration, usually involving the total destruction of the devoted thing (see CURSE). The distinctively OT developments of the idea are connected with קָדַשׁ, which is the root commonly employed by the Northern Semites; and in this article the various applications of this root will alone be considered.*

The original idea conveyed by the words is altogether uncertain, neither etymology nor the analogy of the cognate dialects having as yet thrown much light on the subject.† The truth is, that the words are nowhere found save in a religious sense, and the attempt to ascertain the physical conception on which this use is based is generally abandoned by modern scholars as hopeless. There is, however, a certain probability that the primary idea is that of 'separation' or 'cutting off.'‡ Although this view is not capable of demonstration, it may be adopted provisionally as one that fits in remarkably well with OT usage. Thus the technical antithesis to קָדֹשׁ is חֹל, a word which means simply 'open to common use,' 'profane' (see 1 S 21^5, Ezk 22^{26} etc.). At all events, it is correct to say that a holy object is one 'separated' from common use and contact by supernatural sanctions; and if we start from this negative definition of what the OT means by holiness, we shall probably not be far from the fundamental meaning of the root. It only needs to be remarked that in hardly any case does the 'separation' denoted by קדש amount to absolute removal from human use or contact (as is the case with חרם). All that is usually involved is that the use of the 'holy' is restricted by ceremonial rules, or confined to privileged persons or to particular times—a principle of which abundant illustration will be found in what follows. The holiness of places, things, seasons, even of persons, is thus safeguarded by a set of recognized religious usages, which sometimes, as in the Levitical ritual of OT, attain a high degree of complexity.

It is obvious from what has been said, that holiness, as a religious term, did not originate within the sphere of the revealed religion of Israel. It is one of those primitive concepts which have been taken up and purified by revelation, but which may retain some traces of their origin in a lower stage of belief. It is not surprising, therefore, if some survivals of ancient Semitic heathenism should appear amongst OT applications of the idea of holiness. One such survival is probably to be found in the conception of holiness as a quality transmissible by contact, and constituting in certain circumstances a danger to be scrupulously avoided (see Ezk 44^{19} 46^{20}, Ex 29^{37} 30^{29}, Lv 6^{27} etc.; cf. Hag $2^{12f.}$).§ Another peculiar case is that of the vineyard (or field) sown with different kinds of seed, which is said thereby to 'become holy' (Dt 22^9; cf. Lv 19^{19}). Again, in the pagan rites described in Is 65^5, the bystanders are warned not to come near lest they should be 'sanctified' (the verb to be pointed as Piel). These phenomena, which appear to our minds to introduce an irrational element into the idea of holiness, irresistibly suggest an affinity with a custom universal amongst primitive peoples, according to which man's free use of natural objects, etc., was restrained by fear of supernatural penalties. This institution has come to be denoted by the name taboo, and the instances just cited seem to indicate a close analogy between taboo and the primitive associations of the word 'holiness' in Semitic religion. This would account for the remarkable points of contact between the laws of holiness and those of uncleanness; the two notions being in their origin practically identical. The first great step towards the spiritualizing of the idea of holiness was taken by OT religion when it established a distinction between things whose use is prohibited because they are appropriated to J″, and things that may not be touched because they are hateful to Him. The latter belong to the category of the UNCLEAN (see the art.), while the term 'holy' is, as a rule, reserved for the former.*

In considering OT uses of the terms for holiness, it will be convenient to arrange them in the following order: I. Holiness of places, things, and seasons; II. Holiness of God and angels; III. Holiness of man.

I. HOLINESS OF PLACES, THINGS, AND SEASONS.—The material objects classed as holy are far too numerous to be separately mentioned here. The general principle of OT religion undoubtedly is that things are holy in virtue of their connexion with the worship of J″. The sanctuary itself in all its parts, the utensils employed in the ritual, the clothing of the attendants, the sacrifices and everything dedicated to J″, are sacred in various degrees through having been brought within the sphere of J″'s worship, and so 'separated' from their natural and common relations. It is true that the cases mentioned above (Dt 22^9, Ex 29^{37}, Lv 6^{27} etc.) can only with some difficulty be brought completely under this principle. An attempt is made to sustain the rule by the theory that such things or persons were forfeited for the use of the priests or the service of the sanctuary, as was the case with the censers of Korah's company, which having become holy through being presented to God were unfit for use, and were directed to be made into plates for the altar (Nu 16^{36-40} [Heb. 17^{1-5}]). This is possible, although there is no clear evidence of it, and, in the case of the field (Dt 22^9), a more likely supposition would be that the crop was simply not to be used. Even if it was confiscated, that was only a consequence of the holiness it had already contracted for a different reason; and it is probable that in such cases we have a survival of a conception of holiness in which a relation to J″ was not the exclusive regulating principle. But, with these unimportant exceptions, the rule holds good that holiness is an attribute of the things pertaining to the worship of J″, and is acquired by them through nearness to Him who is the source of all holiness. Holiness, in short, expresses a relation, which consists negatively in separation from common use, and positively in dedication to the service of J″.

An important corollary from this principle is that there is no such thing as natural or inherent holiness in any class of created objects (Baud. p. 45).

* The two primary words in which the root appears are the abstract noun קֹדֶשׁ (holiness) and the adj. קָדוֹשׁ (holy); the verbal forms in use appear to be all denominatives derived from these. The simple form of the verb (קָדַשׁ) occurs only 10 times, always with the sense of 'become holy,' or 'contract holiness'; Ex $29^{21.\ 37}$ 30^{29}, Lv $6^{11.\ 20}$, Nu $17^{2.\ 3}$, Dt 22^9, 1 S 21^6, Hag 2^{12} (in Is 65^5, and possibly 1 S 21^6, the text is wrongly pointed). The secondary sense is, of course, still more obvious in the two causatives (קִדֵּשׁ and הִקְדִּישׁ) and the two reflexives (נִקְדַּשׁ and הִתְקַדֵּשׁ). The other derivatives are מִקְדָּשׁ (sanctuary), קְדֵשָׁה [f קְדֵשָׁה] (ἱερόδουλος), and the proper names קֶדֶשׁ and קָדֵשׁ.

† Dillmann (AT Theol. p. 254) refers to the Assyr. kuddušu (said to be a synonym for 'bright'), and is disposed to connect the root, as others have done before him, with חדשׁ (new). Delitzsch, on the other hand (*PRE*², art. 'Heiligkeit Gottes'), reasoning from the Sumerian equivalent of kadištu (sacred prostitute), found a confirmation of the old theological definition of holiness as freedom from defect (omnis labis expers). But these are highly speculative constructions, which command no confidence, and, moreover, give no assurance that they reach the original sense of the word.

‡ See Baudissin, pp. 19-40; Nöldeke, LCBl, 1879, col. 361 f.

§ An Arabian parallel to the communication of holiness by clothing is given by W. R. Smith in *Rel. Sem.*² p. 451. 'At Mecca, in the times of heathenism, the sacred circuit of the Caaba was made by the Bedouins, either naked, or in clothes borrowed from one of the Homs, or religious community of the sacred city. . . . It appears that sometimes a man did make the circuit in his own clothes, but in that case he could neither wear them again nor sell them, but had to leave them at the gate of the sanctuary.'

* On the analogies between taboo and the Heb. laws of uncleanness and holiness, see J. G. Frazer, *Encyc. Brit.*⁹ art. 'Taboo'; and W. R. Smith, *Rel. Sem.*² pp. 151 ff., 446-454. A good account of Taboo will be found in Jevons' Introd. to the History of Rel. chs. vi.–viii.

Things are clean or unclean according to their natural condition,* and all that man can do is to recognize the fact and regulate his attitude to them accordingly. But things become holy by being dedicated to J″, and for nearly every kind of holy object the law prescribes specific ceremonies of consecration. Naturally, only things inherently clean could be so dedicated; hence, to some extent, holiness and cleanness are practically identical, and in OT the terms are liable to be interchanged. Nevertheless, the ideas are radically distinct, the category of cleanness is much more comprehensive than that of holiness, and nothing but confusion of thought can result from overlooking the distinction.†

Of all material embodiments of the idea of holiness, the most instructive and the most fundamental is the 'holy place' or sanctuary.‡ Without a particular place set apart for religious purposes, there could be no such thing as sacred objects or times or even persons in the OT sense (W. R. Smith, Rel. Sem.[2] p. 141). A holy place is in the first instance a space marked off, 'separated,' from common ground (see Ezk 42^{20}), and only to be entered by those who comply with the conditions of sanctity prescribed by usage or law. These conditions may in some cases be very simple (Ex 3^5, Jos 5^{15}), in others, as in the central sanctuary of Israel, they are extremely complicated; but they always exist, and compliance with them constitutes the holiness of the persons concerned. What in Israel makes the holiness of a place is the presence of J″, whose nature as the Holy One is expressed in the rules which regulate admission to His dwelling-place. Every spot where J″ appears to men is holy ground (Ex 3^5, Jos 5^{15}); even the temporary camp in time of war is consecrated by the presence of the God of the armies of Israel (Dt 23^{15}). The sanctuaries frequented by Israelites in pre-exilic times were the stated places where at set seasons the worshippers appeared before J″, and probably were all regarded as having been consecrated by a Theophany, in accordance with Ex 20^{24}. When the sacredness of these places was abolished by the law of the one sanctuary, the temple of Jerusalem became the sole earthly dwelling-place of J″ (Ezk 43^7, Ps 132^{14}, Zec 2^{10} etc.), and the centre from which the whole life of the people was sanctified. The symbolism of the second temple in particular, with its graduated series of sacred spaces culminating in the inmost shrine or most holy place, its different classes of ministers, and its minutely regulated ceremonial, was so designed as to form an impressive exhibition to the Israelites of the ruling idea of holiness. The quality of holiness pertains also to Mount Zion and Jerusalem (Is 11^9 27^{13}, Zeph 3^{11} etc.; Is 48^2 52^1, Dn 9^{24} etc.), and in a less degree to the whole land (Zec 2^{10} etc.). There is but one passage dating from before the Exile (Ex 15^{13}) in which holiness is directly predicated of the land of Canaan; but the idea is implied in Hos $9^{3.4}$ and elsewhere, and must be ancient.

Holy seasons, in like manner, are portions of time set apart from ordinary employments and dedicated to J″ by acts of worship (Neh $8^{9\text{-}11}$ 10^{31}). The chief of such seasons was the Sabbath (Gn 2^3, Ex $20^{8.11}$, Is 58^{13} etc.). The relation to the cultus is less apparent in the case of the year of Jubilee (Lv 25^{12}), but the separation from common time is equally obvious.

Amongst the various objects belonging to the temple ritual the term holy is applied to the sacrifices (Ex 28^{38} etc.), the shewbread (1 S 21^6), the incense (Ex $30^{35.37}$), the anointing oil (which the people were expressly forbidden to compound for common use, Ex $30^{25.33}$ etc.), the priestly clothing (Ezk 42^{14}, Ex $28^{2.4}$ etc.), etc. etc. (For a complete enumeration, see Baud. p. 44 f.).

II. Holiness of God (and Angels).—From a very early time the word 'holiness' appears to have been used by the Northern Semites to express the general idea of Godhead. In this vague sense it occurs in the Phœnician inscription of Eshmunazar in the title 'holy gods,' and the same phrase is found in the mouth of heathen speakers in Dn $4^{8.9.18}$ 5^{11}. In that expression 'holy' is not intended to convey any information as to the character of the gods; it is a mere 'otiose epithet, "the holy gods" meaning nothing more than "the gods."'* It will be found that no sense less comprehensive than this suffices to explain the Hebrew usage of the term. There are, no doubt, passages where one special attribute is more immediately suggested to the mind by the context, but there are others where it is clear that no particular divine quality is meant to be predicated, and indeed there is no single attribute which will cover all the applications of the word 'holiness' to God. The plural קְדוֹשִׁים (a so-called pl. of majesty formed after the analogy of אֱלֹהִים) is used of J″ almost as a proper name in Pr 9^{10} 30^3 (? Hos 12^1), and similarly the sing. קָדוֹשׁ in Is 40^{25}, Job 6^{10}, Hab 3^3. A predicate which is thus capable of being elevated to a proper name may be presumed to be that which includes all specific attributes, viz. divinity. Again, when J″ is said to swear by His holiness (Am 4^2, Ps 89^{35}, cf. 60^6 108^7), it might be supposed that the expression signifies to swear by that special attribute which is to be exercised in the act promised, just as when He swears by His strength (Is 62^8). But the more natural interpretation is, that to swear by His holiness is to swear by His divinity, or, as it is elsewhere expressed, by Himself (Am 6^8, Gn 22^{16} etc.). It is probably in the same vague sense that the adj. is used of the divine arm (Is 52^{10}, Ps 98^1), or the divine word (Jer 23^9, Ps 105^{42}). So also in the numerous passages where holiness is predicated of the name of God (Am 2^7, Ezk 20^{39}, Lv 20^3 etc.), the name of J″ being the expression of His whole being as revealed in Israel. Nor is the case different in such expressions as 'there is none holy as J″' (1 S 2^2). The meaning there is not that among divine beings J″ alone possesses the specific attribute of holiness, but that He alone is worthy to be regarded as truly divine; in other words, what is asserted is not anything about His character, but simply His supreme Godhead.†

It is plausible, though possibly misleading, to connect this most general sense of holiness with the assumed root-idea of the word, and to say that the aspect of divinity denoted by holiness is the

* i.e. from the standpoint of the law and the religion generally. There is much to be said for the view that originally uncleanness itself denoted a relation, viz. a relation to false deities.

† The antithesis of קֹדֶשׁ, as has been said, is חֹל; the opposite of טָהוֹר (clean) is טָמֵא (unclean). See Baud. p. 22 ff.

‡ The proper designation of a sanctuary is מְקֻדָּשׁ (used even of the sacred places of the heathen Is 16^{12}, Ezk 28^{18}); but in the Law the central sanctuary (tabernacle) is more frequently described simply as קֹדֶשׁ, sometimes also as מְקוֹם קָדוֹשׁ = 'holy place' (but only in such expressions as 'eat [wash] in a holy place'). קֹדֶשׁ is also used of the temple in Ezk, Ps, Dn, Ch.

* Davidson, Ezekiel (Camb. Bible), p. xxxix.

† The facts adduced in this paragraph are adverse to the view held by some writers, that holiness, even when predicated of J″, is a merely relative idea, denoting His fidelity to His covenant with Israel. There are, no doubt, passages which, taken by themselves, might seem to countenance that explanation. But when we take account of all the uses of the word, and especially of the fact that it was a common epithet of heathen deities, it is abundantly clear that holiness is an essential attribute of J″, apart altogether from His special relation to Israel. All the applications of the term can be explained in harmony with this position. Thus, to take a salient instance, the phrase 'Holy One of Israel' (see below) need not be paraphrased: 'the God who is Holy in virtue of His relation to Israel.' It may equally mean, and in point of fact does mean, 'the (essentially) Holy Being, who is God of Israel.'

'separation' of God from the world, or His transcendence. There is no doubt that the term does express the sense of an awful contrast between the divine and the human (Hos 11^9), although hardly, perhaps, between God and the universe. The opposition which is implied in its application to J″ is rather to the presumption and pride of man on the one hand, and the pretended deity of false gods on the other, than to the whole of created existence.* But whether this idea lies in the word itself, or whether it was reached through the impression caused by the multitude of inviolable things belonging to the sphere of deity, is a point which cannot be certainly determined. It has to be remembered that, in early times at least, the holiness of the gods had no definite meaning apart from the holiness of their physical surroundings.† An illustration of this mode of thinking is furnished by the exclamation of the men of Beth-shemesh after they had looked into the ark: 'Who is able to stand before J″ this holy God?' (1 S 6^{20}). There it is evident that the holiness of J″ and the holiness of the ark are practically identical, J‴s holiness being the quality manifested in His vindication of the inviolability of the sacred symbol. And so it must have been to a large extent in ancient religion: the divine holiness was not so much an object of intellectual contemplation as a fact borne in upon the mind by the constant presence of things and persons that might not be touched, places that might not be entered, and times in which ordinary employments were suspended, because of their appropriation to the service or worship of God.

The question as to the contents of the idea of divine holiness thus resolves itself into the larger question of the conception of Godhead by which religious practice and devotion were ruled; and the development of the idea in OT may be expected to proceed step by step with the progressive revelation of the character and nature of J″. Certain features of divinity, no doubt, retain a prominence due to the ancient associations of the word. The term never ceases to emphasize the awful side of the divine manifestation, and even in later writings this may sometimes be the only thought conveyed by its use. But that, after all, only means that J″ was always regarded as a Being of awful and unapproachable majesty, to be feared just because He was divine. And while the history of the idea certainly does not show any abatement of the sentiment of awe due to J″ as the Holy One, it does exhibit an advance towards the conception of Him as one to be feared, not simply because He is all-powerful, but because of His opposition to all that is impure and sinful.

There are three main aspects of deity specially associated with the term 'holiness' in different parts of the OT; and all of these might without difficulty be derived from the fundamental sense of unapproachableness, which is never absent from the notion of J‴s holiness.

(1) The negative idea of unapproachableness readily passes over into the positive conceptions of greatness, power, majesty, and the like. Of all uses of the word this is the most widely prevalent; and in nearly every part of the literature we find expressions where holiness conveys no other thought than the might and majesty of the God of Israel, or the awe and fear which His presence inspires in man. This appears, e.g., in the words of the men of Beth-shemesh already cited (1 S 6^{20}). So in Is 8^{13} to 'sanctify J″' is to regard Him as an object of fear and dread. In Ex 15^{11} J″ is extolled as 'glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders.' In the Psalms He is addressed as 'terrible out of his holy places' (68^{35}); His name is 'holy and terrible' (111^9); 'J″ is great in Zion, and exalted above all the peoples,' therefore they are exhorted to praise His 'great and terrible name; holy is it' ($99^{2.3}$). This conception is specially prominent in the Bk. of Ezekiel, where the divine holiness appears to denote no other attribute than that of majesty, exhibited in the exercise of irresistible power. J‴s 'holy name' is synonymous with His 'great name' (36^{21}, cf. v.^{23}); and when He is said to 'sanctify himself' (i.e. show Himself to be holy), or to 'sanctify his name,' which is profaned when He is forced to conceal any of His divine attributes, the meaning always is that by a display of might He produces the recognition of His true majesty ($36^{20\text{-}24}$ $38^{16.\ 23}$ 20^{41} etc.). These illustrations, which might easily be multiplied, will serve to show how largely the usage of the words for holiness is influenced by the majestic and awe-inspiring side of the divine nature.

(2) The priestly Torah, being largely occupied with questions of cleanness and uncleanness, was naturally led to present divinity as opposition to all that is impure; and hence in the legal books the idea of holiness approximates to that of physical purity (cf. Lv $11^{44ff.}$ $20^{25.\ 26}$, Ezk $43^{7.\ 9}$ etc.). It is an undue exaggeration of this fact that has led some theologians to suppose that the primary significance of holiness is purity in a physical sense, or freedom from defect, or 'normality of life' (Diestel). In reality this is but one manifestation of divinity (readily intelligible as a modification of the fundamental conception of unapproachableness); and although it is necessarily emphasized by priestly writers, it is altogether inadequate to explain the whole range of meaning covered by the term 'holy.' What it expresses is J‴s jealous care for the purity of His own worship, and that, again, is probably rooted in antagonism to the worship of heathen deities and other forms of superstition, especially the worship of dead ancestors (see Lv 19^{28}, Dt 14^1 etc.). The most characteristic expression of the idea is perhaps in the striking but somewhat difficult sentence, 'Be ye holy: for I am holy' (Lv 11^{44} 19^2 20^{26}, cf. 20^7 $21^{6\text{-}8}$). Evidently, the holiness of Israel is there conceived as in some sense a reflexion of the holiness of J″, for it is hardly reasonable to take the word 'holy' in two diverse acceptations in the two members of the sentence. While there are many ways in which holiness might be predicated of J″, and many also in which it might be predicated of Israel, there are very few in which the word could be applied to both. At all events, in such a connexion the holiness of God cannot be His deity in general, nor His power or majesty, but must mean that separation from impurity which belongs to His nature, and is to be reproduced and exhibited in the life of His people. Holiness in this sense is the ruling principle of the Levitical legislation, just as ethical righteousness is the supreme idea of prophecy. Although the expression of the idea occurs chiefly in later writings (esp. Ezk and the Priestly Code), the thought itself is undoubtedly ancient, and must have exercised an influence on the development of the notion of holiness.

(3) The ethical sense of the divine holiness is most clearly to be discerned in some parts of the prophetical writings, particularly in those of Isaiah. To the prophets J″ was essentially a moral Being, 'of too pure eyes to behold evil' (Hab 1^{13}), and swift to resent and punish the iniquity of His people. And since holiness embraced every distinctive attribute of Godhead, it was to be expected that, in the light of this ethical conception of God, the word should take on the sense of moral perfectness, at least on its negative side of opposition to human sin. Accordingly, in Am 2^7 we find the holiness of J″s name set in contrast to the immoral practices of Canaanitish heathenism which had been introduced into the religion of Israel. It may be objected that in this instance the opposition to J″s holiness lies not so much in the immorality of the custom as in its association with the worship of strange gods. But, even if that be true, the significance of the allusion is hardly diminished. The fact remains that a rite consistent with the godhead of other deities was inconsistent with the holiness of J″, and the only reason that can be assigned for the difference is that J″s godhead or holiness included a moral element which placed a wide gulf between Him and the deities of the Semitic pantheon. In the teaching of Isaiah the thought of the divine holiness has a central importance which it possesses in that of no other prophet; and it is there also that the ethical aspect of the idea receives the fullest expression. In his inaugural vision the great fact impressed on his mind is the holiness of the God of Israel (Is 6^3), and this perception awakes in him the consciousness, not merely of creaturely infirmity, but of uncleanness in a moral sense, as adhering both to himself and his nation (v.^{5}). The connexion of holiness and morality is again expressed in a striking manner in the words of 5^{16}, where we read that 'the holy God shall sanctify himself in righteousness,' i.e. He shall show Himself to be holy by the exercise of punitive righteousness. But indeed Isaiah's whole conception of national sin as rebellion against J″ and ignorance of His character, and his demand that J″ should be 'held holy' by compliance with His revealed will (1^4 3^8 8^{13} 29^{23} etc.), imply a view of holiness which is profoundly ethical; and all this is embraced in the divine title which is continually on his lips, 'the Holy One of Israel.' There is, however, no passage of the OT where it can be supposed that moral purity exhausts the idea of holiness. It never appears detached from the underlying thought of majesty and power; it is, in short, an element of holiness as conceived by the prophets, but neither in their writings nor in any other part of the literature does it supersede the vaguer original meaning of the word. So in a later prophet the words, 'Thou that art of too pure eyes to behold evil,' etc. (Hab 1^{13}), are no doubt connected with the name 'my Holy One' in the previous verse, but at the same time they cannot be regarded as the complete equivalent of that phrase.

* The opinion that holiness was predicated of the gods as having their dwelling-place in heaven does not appear to be well founded.

There are some other applications of the word which fall to be mentioned here, although they can scarcely be said to throw any additional light on its meaning. (1) The expression Holy Spirit (wh. see), so frequent in NT, occurs in OT only 3 times (Ps 51^{11}, Is $63^{10.\ 11}$). In such a connexion 'holy' may mean much or little; it may be equivalent to 'divine Spirit' in any of the senses in which holiness is predicated of J″, or it may describe the Spirit as the source of moral purity in the life of the consecrated nation. It is, at all events, of some importance to observe that 'the divine Spirit is not called the holy Spirit in so far as it is the principle of cosmical life, but only in so far as it works in the Theocracy' (Oehler). (2) Angels are called 'holy ones' in Job 5^1 15^{15}, Ps $89^{6.\ 8}$, Dn 8^{13} etc., not on account of their superior purity (see Job 4^{18} 15^{15}), but as partaking of the divine nature ('sons of God'). (3) Lastly, heaven, as the dwelling-place of God, is frequently spoken of as a holy place (Hab 2^{20}, Jer 25^{30}, Is 63^{15}, Zec 2^{13}, Ps 11^4 20^{6} etc.).

III. Holiness of Men.—The OT applications of the word 'holy' to human persons are of two kinds. There is first an external holiness, which consists merely in consecration to religious functions, and does not differ materially from the holiness of things. In this sense the term is applied to several classes of persons in Israel. The degraded beings devoted to shameful practices in the Canaanitish sanctuaries were known as קְדֵשִׁים and קְדֵשׁוֹת ('holy men' and 'holy women'), in token of their dedication to the service of the god or goddess (Dt 23^{18} etc.). This, of course, is a heathen usage, which has nothing to do with the specifically OT idea of sanctity. Again, soldiers on a campaign are consecrated persons ($1\ S\ 21^{5.\ 6}$), war being a religious act initiated by sacred rites (Is 13^3, Jer 6^4 22^7, Mic 3^5 etc.). The Nazirites are holy during the period covered by their vow (Nu $6^{5ff.}$). An official holiness belongs to the priests and Levites, who are consecrated to J″ by special ceremonies (Ex $29^{1ff.}$, Lv $8^{12.\ 30}$ etc.), and whom Israel is enjoined to 'sanctify,' i.e. treat as sacrosanct persons (Lv 21^8). In a similar sense we are probably to understand the sanctity ascribed to the prophets ($2\ K\ 4^9$, Jer 1^5): when the great lady of Shunem speaks of Elisha as a 'holy man of God,' she is not thinking of the saintliness of his character; he is holy, simply as one who stands in a near relation to God. Finally, the attribute of holiness pertains to the whole people of Israel as a nation severed from the rest of mankind, and consecrated to J″ (Ex 19^6, Nu $16^{3.\ 5.\ 7}$, Dt 7^6 14^2 etc.), and hence inviolable (Jer 2^3). In this sense J″ speaks of Himself frequently as the 'sanctifier' (מְקַדֵּשׁ) of Israel (Ezk 20^{12} $37^{27f.}$, Ex 31^{13}, Lv $20^{7f.}$ etc.).

But this outward holiness implies, in the case of persons, the observance of certain rules, compliance with which constitutes sanctification in an active and sometimes an ethical sense. No doubt, each of the classes enumerated above was subject to prescribed rules of this kind, as was notably the case with the priests and Nazirites. But the most important developments of the idea are those connected with the application of the term 'holiness' to the religious community as a whole. J″ sanctifies Israel by choosing it from other peoples to be His familiar people, and by taking up His abode in its midst; but Israel is thus bound to sanctify itself, by conforming to the requirements that express J″'s holy will and nature. These requirements, as we have already seen, were mainly external and ceremonial, consisting in avoidance of occasions of physical defilement. But moral precepts are also included (Lv 19, etc.), and are expressly embraced in the formula, 'Be ye holy: for I am holy.' The holiness of Israel, in fact, had to be maintained by obedience to the entire Law of God (Nu 15^{40}); and, in so far as the Law contains a summary of moral duty, the conception of holiness has an ethical significance. It is true that the Law recognizes no distinction between the moral and the ceremonial, and to that extent its teaching is not truly ethical in our sense of the word. Still, where holiness is presented as an ideal to be realized in conduct, and where this ideal is connected with the essential holiness of God (as in the phrase just quoted), the notion is already charged with ethical meaning; and so in the spiritual religion of the Psalms the external element disappears, the conditions of entrance into J″'s 'holy place' being described in terms which are exclusively ethical (Ps 15. $24^{3ff.}$).

From a theological point of view, the chief interest of the OT doctrine of holiness lies in this progressive spiritualizing of the idea under the influence of an expanding revelation of God. Although the various steps of the process are obscure, the fact is certain that holiness did come to be conceived more and more as a moral quality. It is probable that the ethical aspect was first introduced in the application of the term to God, and thence transferred to the holiness He requires in His worshippers. In OT the development is arrested at a certain stage, because of the material associations with which the use of the word was invested. One step remained to be taken in order to reach the full Christian sense of holiness, and that was the abrogation of the ceremonial as a term of fellowship with God. When our Lord enunciated the principle that a man is defiled, not by what enters into him, but by what comes out of him, He raised religion to a new level, and made it possible to liberate the moral essence of holiness from the imperfections which clung to it throughout the older dispensation.

LITERATURE.—The modern discussion of holiness appears to start from a passage in Menken's Anleitung zum eigenenen Unterricht in den Wahrheiten der heil. Schr. (1805, Schriften, Bd. vi. pp. 46–53). His observations have little scientific value, but seem to have aroused interest by the paradoxical position, laid down with hardly an attempt at proof, that holiness means 'self-humbling love and grace' on the part of God.—Diestel's paper (in JDTh, 1859, pp. 3–63), though in some respects arbitrary and one-sided, is a far more adequate treatment of the subject. His chief results are these two: (1) that, in form, holiness is always a relative idea, Israel being holy as belonging to J″, and conversely J″ being holy as belonging to Israel, in the covenant relation; and (2) that the content of the notion has to be determined from the conditions of the covenant as laid down by the Law, the ruling principle of which Diestel finds to be 'normality of life.'—Baudissin's elaborate monograph (Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, 1878, ii. pp. 3–142) devotes considerable space to the criticism of these and other views of earlier writers. It contains an invaluable and apparently exhaustive collection of the OT material, and for thoroughness of treatment leaves nothing to be desired. The most important result, in the judgment of Nöldeke (LCBl, 1879, No. 12, col. 361 f.), is the conclusive demonstration that throughout the OT the ideas of holiness and purity remain distinct. HOLINESS IN NT.—The study of the NT conception of holiness must proceed mainly from a consideration of the following terms: ἅγιος, ἁγιασμός, ἁγιότης, ἁγιωσύνη. Besides this group of words denoting holy or holiness, we have in NT ἱερός, ὅσιος, σεμνός, ἁγνός, and their cognates. It is the word ἅγιος and its kindred terms which express the characteristic NT idea of holiness. In order to define and illustrate this idea it is necessary to examine the meaning and use of terms synonymous with ἅγιος, so that the significance of the latter may be set in the clearer light.

Etymologically, ἱερός is believed to signify vigorous or strong. The word thus naturally denotes, in classic usage, that which is associated with the gods, that which belongs to them, or that which is divine. It thus approaches θεῖος in meaning. The word is commonly applied, not to persons, but to things, which are ἱερά because they originate with the gods, belong to them, or are bestowed by them. The term is applied to men when it is desired to designate them as having special relation to the gods, or as being under their protection. Kings and persons who are initiated into the mysteries are sometimes called ἱεροί in this sense. The term ἱερός thus denoted an external rather than an internal and moral relation to the gods. It did not imply excellence. It meant sacred in the sense of inviolable, entitled to reverence, but did not bear the meaning which we attach to the terms morally pure and holy. While in NT the word has higher associations because of the circle of religious ideas with which it is there connected, it retains clear traces of its history. It emphasizes an outer rather than an inner and spiritual relation with God. The word occurs as an adjective but twice. In 1 Co 9[13] οἱ τὰ ἱερὰ ἐργαζόμενοι is a periphrasis for the priests. Τὰ ἱερά, res sacræ, are the rites of the Levit. cultus. These rites are sacred because their performance is an act of divine worship. In 2 Ti 3[15] (as also in Philo and Jos.) ἱερὰ γράμματα is the OT. These writings are regarded as ἱερά because divinely inspired and teaching divine truth. The use of words cognate with ἱερός in NT agrees with that of ἱερός. Thus ἱερεύς is a priest; ἱερόν designates the temple-enclosure; ἱερόθυτον (1 Co 10[28]) denotes something which has been offered in sacrifice; and ἱεροπρεπής (Tit 2[3]) means befitting sacred things or places, 'reverent in demeanour' (RV). It will be seen that this whole group of words designates ideas and relations which are more distinctively characteristic of OT than of NT, ἱερός in this sense having been taken over from the LXX, where it abounds in 1 Es and the Books of Maccabees.

The word ὅσιος means pious, godly. It is the nearest Gr. equivalent of the Lat. sanctus and of the Heb. חָסִיד. In its classic use it commonly denoted what was consecrated by law or custom, whether of the gods or of men. In NT, however, it has a distinctively religious significance, and means consecrated to God, pure, holy, pious. The NT use of ὅσιος, ὁσιότης may be seen in such passages as He 7[26], where Christ, as High Priest, is described as ὅσιος, ἄκακος, ἀμίαντος, κεχωρισμένος ἀπὸ τῶν ἁμαρτωλῶν; Lk 1[75], where the people of God are spoken of as serving Him ἐν ὁσιότητι καὶ δικαιοσύνῃ; and Eph 4[24], where the new man is said to be created according to God ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ καὶ ὁσιότητι τῆς ἀληθείας. In both classic and NT usage this group of words is commonly associated with δίκαιος and its cognates. In the LXX οἱ ὅσιοι τοῦ θεοῦ is a frequent designation of God's true worshippers. It will thus be seen that holiness, in the sense of ὁσιότης, includes especially what is designated by the words reverence, piety, Frömmigkeit.

Σεμνός properly means deserving of reverence or awe, and in classic usage is applied both to the gods and to men. It is even used of things, in the sense of grand, magnificent, impressive. In NT σεμνός denotes deserving of reverence, honourable. It is once applied to deeds, Ph 4[8] (RV 'honourable'), and three times to persons, 1 Ti 3[8. 11], Tit 2[2], in all of which cases RV renders grave. In like manner RV renders σεμνότης gravity in all three passages in which it occurs, 1 Ti 2[2] 3[4], Tit 2[7]. The word signifies something more than gravity; it suggests dignity or worth. It is obvious, however, that σεμνότης designates but a secondary aspect of the NT idea of holiness.

Ἁγνός, ἁγνότης mean pure, purity. In LXX these words refer to ceremonial purity. In NT they refer to freedom from moral faults in general, and esp. to freedom from carnal sins. In one passage ἁγνός is applied to God (1 Jn 3[3]). The characteristic use of the word is seen in passages like 2 Co 11[2], Tit 2[5]. Ἁγνός represents an aspect of holiness, but only in a limited and negative way. Even the idea of moral purity is inadequate to represent the full content of the Christian conception of holiness.

The characteristic NT word for holy is, as we have seen, ἅγιος. It is the nearest Gr. equivalent of the Heb. קָדוֹשׁ, and is the common rendering of that word in the LXX. It is probably from the same root as ἁγνός (Lat. sacer), and the fundamental meaning of the two words is nearly the same. Ἅγιος, however, which is a rare word in classic Greek, appears to have diverged from ἁγνός in the direction of a moral and religious conception of holiness. It is generally believed that the fundamental idea which underlies the word is that of separation, and that its moral signification therefore is: separation from sin, and so, consecration to God. The Christian use of the word lifted it into accord with the highest ethical conceptions, and gave it the idea of separateness from the sinful world, harmony with God, the absolutely good Being, moral perfection. Thus ἅγιος is, above all things, a qualitative and ethical term. It refers chiefly to character, and lays emphasis upon the demands which that which is sacred (ἱερόν) in the highest sense makes upon conduct.

It is necessary briefly to refer to the LXX use of this word, and to the circle of OT ideas which it represents. We find that ἅγιος is predicated of God as the absolutely perfect One, and of men and things so far as they are devoted to Him, and, as we may say, in some way identified with Him. Israel, e.g., was an ἔθνος ἅγιον because God's peculiar possession. Men are called upon to sanctify themselves, that is, to cleanse themselves from all defilement, to forsake sin, and to come into harmony of life with God. So men may sanctify things by regarding, treating, or using them as sacred, that is, by associating them with God's perfection. The basis of this demand upon men that they be holy is the obligation to be like God: 'Ye shall be holy: for I the Lord your God am holy' (Lv 19[2]). Now this holiness, as seen in OT, seems to wear a twofold aspect. It comprehends both 'the goodness and the severity of God.' It issues both in redemption and in judgment. These two aspects of the divine holiness appear continually in inseparable connexion and interplay. 'Holiness (in the OT) is the perfect purity of God, which in and for itself excludes all fellowship with the world, and can only establish a relationship of free, electing love, whereby it asserts itself in the sanctification of God's people, their cleansing and redemption; therefore "the purity of God manifesting itself in atonement and redemption, and correspondingly in judgment"' (Cremer, Bib.-Theol. Lex. s.v.).

It is evident that ἅγιος and its kindred words are best adapted to represent the NT idea. They express something more and higher than ἱερός, sacred, outwardly associated with God; something more than ὅσιος, reverent, pious; something more than σεμνός, worthy, honourable; something more than ἁγνός, pure, free from defilement. Ἅγιος is more positive, more comprehensive, more elevated, more purely ethical and spiritual. It is characteristically Godlikeness, and in the Christian system Godlikeness signifies completeness of life.

The words ἅγιος and ἁγιάζειν occur very frequently in NT. The three nouns (ἁγιασμός, ἁγιότης, ἁγιωσύνη), which are kindred to them, are not of frequent occurrence. The most common among these three nouns, ἁγιασμός, is found ten times (1 Th $4^{3.4.7}$, 2 Th 2^{13}, Ro $6^{19.22}$, 1 Co 1^{30}, 1 Ti 2^{15}, He 12^{14}, 1 P 1^{2}). In five instances it is rendered in AV holiness, and in five sanctification. In RV it is uniformly rendered sanctification. Ἁγιότης occurs twice (2 Co 1^{12}, He 12^{10}), and is rendered holiness in both AV and RV. Ἁγιωσύνη occurs three times (1 Th 3^{13}, Ro 1^{4}, 2 Co 7^{1}), and is tr. in both VSS holiness. Ἁγιότης (sanctitas), ἁγιωσύνη (sanctitudo), ἁγιασμός (sanctificatio), denote the quality, the state, the process, respectively (Lightfoot, Notes, p. 49). Ὁσιότης occurs twice (Lk 1^{75}, Eph 4^{24}), and is rendered holiness in both. AV renders εὐσέβεια (piety) in Ac 3^{12} holiness, RV godliness.

Let us next illustrate the use of the group of words under review, directing special attention to the fifteen passages in which the nouns denoting holiness are used. There does not appear to be anything distinctive in the use of the words by the different NT writers. We shall therefore have no occasion to treat the NT books separately. We find ἅγιος applied to God in Jn 17^{11}: 'Holy Father, keep them in thy name which thou hast given me,' etc., where God, as the One who is absolutely good—wholly separate from all that is sinful and wrong—is besought to guard from evil those whom He has given to His Son. The idea closely resembles that which is found in 17^{25}: 'O righteous (δίκαιος) Father, the world knew thee not, but I knew thee,' etc. The idea of God's righteousness here appears to be the quality which prevents Him from passing the same judgment upon Christ's disciples as He passes upon the sinful world. It is the equitableness of God. In both cases the attribute of God which is referred to is not the forensic or retributive element in the divine nature, but God's moral self-consistency, His justice to His own equity. In Rev 4^{8} God is addressed as 'Holy, Holy, Holy,' because He is worthy of all praise and honour. His holiness is His supreme and absolute excellence.

The term holy is constantly applied throughout NT to the divine Spirit. As proceeding from God, as the bearer of revelation, and as the mediator of spiritual life, the Spirit is pre-eminently holy. It is the special function of the Holy Spirit to make holy the souls of those in whom He dwells. This conception of the Spirit's nature and function is not prominent in OT, where the Spirit is scarcely more than a name for the power or presence of God. There He bestows strength upon heroes, skill upon artificers, and the knowledge of the divine will upon prophets. The designation of the Spirit as Holy accords entirely with the NT idea of the sanctifying function of the Spirit, and the hallowing of the people of God by inward consecration to Him. The Holy Spirit is conceived of as revealing the inner nature and essential goodness of God, and as accomplishing the transformation of men into His moral likeness. Hence the sin against the Holy Spirit represents the acme of wickedness. It is hatred of supreme and absolute goodness. It despises the perfect purity and unselfish love which dwelt in Him to whom God gave the Spirit without measure, and thus treats perfect goodness as if it were evil. Such a state of mind involves complete moral obduracy. In this, and not in the limitation of the divine mercy, lies the impossibility of its forgiveness. See further HOLY SPIRIT.

With special appropriateness is Christ, as the Son and Revealer of God and the Redeemer of mankind from sin, designated as holy. He is the fulfilment of the OT picture of the true and faithful servant of J". He is accordingly spoken of as God's 'holy servant' (ὁ ἅγιος παῖς, Ac 4^{30}), by whom He accomplishes His gracious, saving purposes. So evil spirits are represented as recognizing in Jesus 'the Holy One of God,' the long-promised Messiah, the Messenger of the divine mercy, and the Conqueror of Satan.

Christians are frequently designated as ἅγιοι, holy ones, saints. They are such as the elect or beloved of God, who by faith and love have entered into fellowship with Him, and who by obedience to His will and by purity of life have become conformed to the image of His Son. St. Paul speaks of believers as κλητοὶ ἅγιοι (1 Co 1^{2}), saints by a divine call, in the same sense as he speaks of himself as a κλητὸς ἀπόστολος (Ro 1^{1}), an apostle who became such by having presented to him, and by accepting, a divine commission. Esp. are men represented as holy when they have been made the special instruments of the divine will and have been taken into close fellowship with God in the work of revelation and redemption. In this sense the prophets are designated (acc. to the common reading) as 'holy men of God,' οἱ ἅγιοι θεοῦ ἄνθρωποι (2 P 1^{21}). In like manner, the 'holy prophets' declared the divine purpose to restore all things through the Messiah (Ac 3^{21}). So the 'mystery of Christ,' viz. that the gospel was for the Gentiles, was made known to God's 'holy apostles and prophets in the Spirit' (Eph 3^{5}).

In a secondary sense impersonal objects are spoken of as holy. The ways and means whereby God reveals and accomplishes His will are holy, because they are associated with Him who is pre-eminently holy and are instrumental in the sanctification of men. Thus the gracious call which God in the gospel addresses to men—inviting them to receive a wholly unmerited salvation—is a holy calling, κλῆσις ἁγία (2 Ti 1^{9}). The Messianic promise given in OT times was a holy covenant, διαθήκη ἁγία (Lk 1^{72}). The OT Scriptures are, by reason of the sacredness of their contents and their disclosure of the divine will and purpose, holy writings, γραφαὶ ἅγιαι (Ro 1^{2}).

We turn now to the group of nouns denoting holiness. Ἁγιασμός would properly denote the act of sanctifying, τὸ ἁγιάζειν, and something of this active meaning is preserved in 2 Th 2^{13}: 'God chose you from the beginning unto salvation in sanctification of the Spirit' (ἐν ἁγιασμῷ πνεύματος), that is, in sanctification wrought by the Spirit; cf. 1 P 1^{2}: 'in sanctification of the Spirit,' etc. The active force of the word may also be observed, although in a somewhat different form, in 1 Th 4^{3}: 'For this is the will of God, even your sanctification,' etc. The will of God is this: that He may accomplish your sanctification. In 1 Co 1^{30} Christ is called our 'sanctification,' in the sense that He is the cause or ground of our sanctification.

In most cases in NT, however, ἁγιασμός denotes the effect or result of ἁγιάζειν. (See, however, Sanday-Headlam's note on Ro 6^{19}). In 1 Th $4^{4.7}$ it denotes the sphere of holy action in opposition to the sphere of lustful desire. In Ro 6^{19} ἁγιασμός stands opposed to ἀνομία. These terms denote the ends to which the members are devoted in the sinful and in the Christian life respectively. In the latter the members are presented as servants to righteousness unto the end of sanctification (εἰς ἁγιασμόν). Similarly, in v.[22] Christians are said to have their fruit unto sanctification (εἰς ἁγ.), that is, to attain it as the result and reward of their life. In these passages from 1 Th and Ro, sanctification is particularly set in contrast to carnal lust, although its nature is not limited by that contrast. In 1 Ti 2[15] sanctification is contemplated as a virtue, or as the Christian's normal state, and is correlated with faith and love. In He 12[14] 'the sanctification' (the definite article used only here and in 1 Th 4[3]) is the Christian character, the goal of Christian effort, the preparation for the presence of God: 'Pursue after the sanctification without which no man shall see the Lord,' that is, enter into blessed fellowship with Christ.

Ἁγιότης is used (acc. to the most probable reading) in 2 Co 1[12] in ref. to St. Paul's manner of life at Corinth, to the uprightness of which his conscience bears witness. It is here correlated with the sincerity or purity (εἰλικρίνεια) which God effects by the Holy Spirit. Here holiness designates the life and character which the grace of God produces. In the one other passage where the word is used (He 12[10]) it is applied to God. Earthly parents, says the author, chasten their children with wrong or imperfect motives, or to secure some temporary good, but God chastens His children for their highest final good, that they may be 'partakers of his holiness' (εἰς τὸ μεταλαβεῖν τῆς ἁγιότητος αὐτοῦ), that is, that they may be transformed into moral likeness to Himself, and become partakers in His own eternal nature (cf. 2 P 1[4]). This passage carries us to a higher point than do those previously examined, in that it represents the holy nature of God as the type and goal of all perfection in man.

Ἁγιωσύνη is twice used of the moral purity, the God-like character, which the gospel requires and imparts: 1 Th 3[13] 'To the end he may stablish your hearts in holiness before our God,' etc., that is, in the possession of that holy life which will be acceptable to Christ at His coming; and 2 Co 7[1] 'Perfecting holiness in the fear of God,' that is, perfectly illustrating in character the holy life which comports with reverence for God. In Ro 1[4] the word occurs in a description which St. Paul is giving of the Son of God, 'who,' he says, 'was born of the seed of David according to the flesh, who was declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection of the dead.' Here the phrase κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιωσύνης stands in evident contrast to the phrase κατὰ σάρκα. The phrase probably means: the spirit of Christ, that is, His inner, essential life, which is characterized by holiness. If this is the meaning, then ἁγιωσύνης expresses the quality of Christ's spiritual nature. He is par éminence holy. He is in absolute accord with God.

We may sum up our results thus: In the absolute sense God alone is holy, and His holiness is the ground of the requirement of holiness in His creatures (1 P 1[16]). Holiness is the attribute of God, according to which He wills and does only that which is morally good. In other words, it is the perfect harmony of His will with His perfect ethical nature. But the divine holiness is not to be thought of as a mere passive, quiescent state. It is an active impulse, a forthgoing energy. In God's holiness, that is, in the expression of His perfect ethical nature, His self-revelation is grounded. Nay, creation itself, as well as redemption, would be inconceivable apart from the divine holiness, the energizing of God's absolutely good will.

By some theologians holiness and love are identified. More commonly they are sharply distinguished—holiness being regarded as the self-preservative or retributive attribute of God, and love as His beneficent, self-imparting attribute. To discuss this subject here would carry us too far. It seems clear, at least, from our investigation, that holiness and love represent closely kindred conceptions, and that there is an inner harmony between them. They are the two words which best express God's moral perfection, and the difference between them seems rather formal than real. At any rate, in their application to men, they seem to express, better than any other words, the highest aims of human life and the most comprehensive obligation of God's perfect law. HOLM TREE.—The name of this tree occurs in Is 44[14] RV as the equivalent of תִּרְזָה. The holm is prob. not the tree there intended (see CYPRESS).

It occurs also in Sus v.[58]. Two evergreen oaks, both growing in Pal. and Syria, Quercus Ilex, L., and Q. coccifera, L., are prob. included under the LXX πρῖνος, which is the orig. for holm tree. The former is a low tree, growing along the coast and the foot hills of the maritime ranges. The latter is one of the stateliest trees of the East. Its comus is often quite spherical, and sometimes 40 to 50 ft. in diameter. The trunk not infrequently attains a diameter of 6 ft. The leaf of both species is smaller than that of the holly, but resembles it in the fact that it is evergreen, of a rich glossy green, and usually with spiny teeth, though some of the varieties have nearly entire leaves. It is from the resemblance of its leaf to the holly (Old English hollen) that it obtained its name of holm. For the play on the words πρῖνος and πρίσαι see SUSANNA.

The holm oak is the tree, par excellence, around which are grouped the superstitions of the Orientals. One or more grand specimens are sure to be planted over the welys or tombs of the Moslem saints. Abraham's Oak is of this species. The dense mass of dark foliage gives to these fine old trees an aspect of solidity possessed by no others in the East. The Druses and other sects often hang bits of rag on their lower branches as a votive offering. A tree so decorated is called umm-esh-sheraṭit, i.e. mother of rags. Such trees have probably existed from time immemorial on the 'high places.' See OAK. G. E. POST.

HOLOFERNES ('Ολοφέρνης).—The arch-enemy of the Jews, assassinated before Bethulia (i.e. Jerusalem) by Judith, who thus saved her nation. In Jth 2^4 H. is called 'the chief captain of the army of Nebuchadnezzar.' In the Midrash he is called 'king of Javan,'* and takes the place of Nebuchadnezzar. It is obvious that no one in the days of the historical Nebuch. could have borne the name and played the part of H. as described in Judith. There was an Orophernes king of the Cappadocians in B.C. 158 ff., who was a friend of Demetrius Soter, and supported the latter in his unjustifiable claims as against Ariarathes V., king of the Cappadocians (Polyb. iii. 5. 2, ed. Schweighäuser). Hence the Jews might know about Orophernes as the friend of their great enemy, and might represent him as he is represented in Judith. This would make the date of the book about B.C. 150. See Hicks, Journ. Hellen. Studies, vi. 1885, pp. 261–274. The form 'Οροφέρνης is found on coins discovered at Pirene, and in two inscriptions found on amphora-handles (Knidos); see Dumont, Inscriptions céramiques, Paris, 1872, p. 329, No. 9, and p. 388, No. 7. The same form is given by late classical authors, e.g. Polyb. xxxii. 20. 4, xxxiii. 12. § 2, 3, 9; Aelian, Var. Hist. ii. 41, ed. Hercher; Diod. Sic. xxxi. cc. 32 and 34; fluctuating with 'Ολο- and 'Ολο-, e.g. Appian, Bell. Syr. p. 118, ed. Stephan. 1592; Diod. Sic. xxxi. 19. § 2, 7, ed. Müller. If 'Ολοφέρνης is the original form, ὁλο- will be Greek = 'destroying' (cf. ὁλοεργής), and -φερνης, Persian = 'brilliance, majesty,' cf. Pherendates, Pharnacos, Artaphernes; the root fra = 'shine.' The form 'Οροφ. will then represent the Persian pronunciation of the Greek 'Ολοφ. The aspirated 'Ολοφ is due to confusion with compounds in ὁλο-. The Vulg. form Holofernes is aspirated as in Hiob, Hesther, Hierusalem, etc.

Dante introduces Holofernes in Purgatorio xii. 59 as one of the instances of defeated pride in the Circle of the Proud. The following famous representations of Judith and Holofernes in art may be quoted: Botticelli, in the Uffizi, Florence (see Ruskin, Mornings in Florence, ch. 3); Michael Angelo, in the Sistine Chapel; Cristoforo Allori, in the Pitti; Paris Bordone; Guido, in the Spada Gallery, Rome; Donatello, statue in the Loggia dei Lanzi, Florence.

HOLON (חֹלוֹן).—1. A city of Judah in the Hebron hills, given to the Levites, Jos 15^{51} 21^{15}. In the parallel passage 1 Ch 6^{58} [Heb.^{43}] it is called Hilen. It is noticed with Debir, and probably lay W. or S.W. of Hebron. The ruin Beit Aûla, in the lower hills west of Hebron, would be a suitable site. See SWP vol. iii. sh. xxi. 2. A city of Moab near Heshbon, Jer 48^{21}. Its site has not been recovered. C. R. HOLYDAY.—'That kept holyday' is the tr^{n} in Ps 42^4 of חוֹגֵג, ptcp. of חָגַג 'to make a pilgrimage,' RV 'keeping holyday.' 'Holyday' also occurs in Col 2^{16} as the tr^{n} of ἑορτή, feast, RV 'feast day.' See FEASTS.

In both places AV of 1611 has two words, 'holy day' in Ps 42^4, 'Holy day' in Col 2^{16}; and it would be well, owing to the mod. associations of the word 'holiday,' to keep that form still.

HOLY SPIRIT.—In Christian theology the Holy Spirit is the third Person or eternal distinction within the Unity of God. The following article is an attempt to trace in the progressive revelation vouchsafed to Israel and to the Church the steps which have led to this conception. Our sources are the Old and New Testaments, and the intermediate Jewish writings which illustrate the effect of the OT revelation upon the Jewish people, and prepare us to understand the fuller teaching of the Gospel of Christ.

A. THE OLD TESTAMENT.—i. The word רוּחַ, in LXX πνεῦμα, but also ἄνεμος (about 50 times), θυμός (5 times), πνοή (4 times), ψυχή (twice), etc., belongs to a root רוּחַ flavit, spiravit, used only in the Hiph. (הֵרִיחַ olfecit, e.g. Gn 8^{21}). In OT רוּחַ signifies (1) the breath of the atmosphere, wind: Gn 3^8 (לְרוּחַ הַיּוֹם = LXX τὸ δειλινόν, Aq. ἐν τῷ ἀνέμῳ τῆς ἡμέρας, Symm. διὰ πνεύματος ἡμ.), Nu 11^{31}, Job 4^{15} 41^{16}, Jer 2^{24} 14^6; (2) the breath of man. Since the human breath is at once an indication of animal life, and a vehicle of thought and passion, the word is also used to represent (3) the principle of vitality, in the phrase רוּחַ חַיִּים (Gn 6^{17} $7^{15.\ 22}$), or absolutely, as in Gn 45^{27}, 1 K 10^5, Job 12^{10} 34^{14}, Ps 104^{29}, Ec 3^{19} 12^7; (4) the life of passion (Gn 41^8, Nu 5^{14}, 2 S 21^5, Pr 25^{28}), or of thought and will (Dt 34^9, Job 15^2 32^8, Jer 51^{11}); (5) the spiritual element in human nature (Nu 27^{16}, Ps 31^5, Ec 12^7); lastly, from the sphere of human nature the word (6) passes into that of the divine. In anthropomorphic descriptions of the life of God it retains its primary sense; God's displeasure is the רוּחַ אַפּוֹ (Ex 15^8, Job 4^9, Ps 18^{15}), His power in operation is the רוּחַ פִּיו (Ps 33^6, Is 11^4; cf. 2 Th 2^8). But the writers of the OT conceive also of a Spirit in God which bears some analogy to the higher life of man; the 'Spirit of Elohim' or 'of J"ⁿ' (רוּחַ אֱלֹהִים, רוּחַ יהוה, LXX πνεῦμα θεοῦ, πν. Κυρίου) is repeatedly mentioned in every part of the OT. In a few cases, it is true, this phrase may be interpreted of the wind which God sends on the earth (Ex 15^{10}, 1 K 18^{12}, 2 K 2^{16}, Is 40^7 59^{19}, Hos 13^{15}), or of the human breath or spirit as deriving its origin from God (Job 27^3; cf. Gn 2^7). But these are exceptions; in the great majority of passages the 'Spirit of God' is the vital energy of the divine nature, corresponding to the higher vitality of man.* This energy is usually presented in one of its relations to man or to the world, e.g. as a creative or vitalizing force (Gn 1^{2}, Job 26^{13}, Is 32^{15}), or as propagating or sustaining created life (Job 34^{14}, cf. 10^{12}, Ps 104^{30}); as the source of reason and intellect in man (Job 32^{8}), and in particular of special gifts and endowments (Gn 41^{38}, Ex 28^{3} $31^{3.6}$ 35^{31}), such as the artistic skill of Bezalel (Ex $36^{1ff.}$), the military tact of Joshua (Dt 34^{9}), the heroism of the Judges (Jg 13^{25} 14^{6} etc.), the wisdom of Solomon (1 K 3^{28}); as the well-spring of inspiration in the Hebrew lawgivers, poets, and prophets (Nu $11^{17.\ 25f.\ 29}$, 2 S 23^{2}, 1 K 22^{24}, Ezk 11^{5}, Dn $4^{8.\ 9}$ 5^{11}), and of moral purity and strength and penitence (Neh 9^{20}, Ps 51^{11}, Is $63^{10f.}$, Ezk $36^{26f.}$, Zec 12^{10}). Especially is the energy of the Divine Spirit connected with the mission and work of the Messiah (Is $11^{1ff.}$ $61^{1ff.}$), on whom, as the prophets foresaw, it was to rest in the fulness of strength and goodness.†

ii. These aspects of the working of the Divine Spirit must be separately examined.

(a) Creative and conservative Operations in Nature.—In the cosmogony of Gn 1 the Spirit of God broods—מְרַחֶפֶת—over the formless cosmic matter, before the cosmos begins to emerge out of chaos. The Greek versions render the verb by ἐπεφέρετο or ἐπιφερόμενον (Vulg. ferebatur), understanding by מְרַחֶפֶת ר' a wind sweeping over the abyss (cf. Ac 2^{2}). But the verb suggests another image, that of the bird brooding over her nest: see Delitzsch, ad loc., and cf. Dt 32^{11}; Chagigah, ed. Streane, p. 84; Basil. M. Hom. in Hexaem. 2, τὸ ἐπεφέρετο (φησὶν [Σύρος τις]) ἐξηγοῦνται ἀντὶ τοῦ Συνέθαλπε καὶ ἐζωογόνει τὴν τῶν ὑδάτων φύσιν κατὰ τὴν εἰκόνα τῆς ἐπῳαζούσης ὄρνιθος καὶ ζωτικήν τινα δύναμιν ἐνιείσης τοῖς ὑποθαλπομένοις. This metaphor suits the secondary rather than the primary meaning of רוּחַ; it is not the wind, but the divine energy that is regarded as vitalizing the germs which the Divine Word is about to call forth. This conception of the co-operation of the Spirit and the Word is 'specially characteristic of the OT' (Cheyne, Origin of the Psalter, p. 322; cf. Ps 33^{6}). It rests on the relation of the breath to the voice, but its significance is not limited by that analogy. The Breath of God vitalizes what the Word creates. Moreover, its vitalizing energy is continuous; it conserves, renews, or withdraws life, in the ceaseless processes of nature (Job 33^{4}, Ps 33^{6} 104^{30}). Thus the OT already justifies the epithet τὸ ζωοποιόν, applied to the Divine Spirit by the Church in the 'Nicene' Creed.

(b) Bestowal of intellectual gifts.—'The LORD God . . . breathed into [man's] nostrils the breath of life' (נִשְׁמַת־חַיִּים, πνοὴν ζωῆς), by virtue of which he 'became a living soul' (לְנֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה, Gn 2^{7}). This ἐμφύσησις (cf. Jn 20^{22}) represents the Breath of God as originating the personal life of man, together with the intellectual and spiritual powers which distinguish it from the life of the mere animal (מְפַחֶמֶת ר' Ec 3^{21}). As the sacred Books proceed, they reveal the same Force lying behind the special endowments which mark off man from man. The Divine Spirit is said to be 'in' (Gn 41^{38}, Nu 27^{18}) or 'upon' (Nu $11^{17ff.}$ 24^{2}) the man who possesses exceptional powers of any kind; he is what he is, because he is filled with the spirit of wisdom and understanding (πνεῦμα θεῖον σοφίας, Ex 31^{3}; πν. αἰσθήσεως, συνέσεως, Ex 28^{3} 35^{31}, Dt 34^{9}).

(c) Inspiration of the Prophets.—One gift stands out as pre-eminently due to the presence in man of the Spirit of God. The 'prophet' (נָבִיא, LXX mostly προφήτης; on the etymology of the Heb. word see W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, p. 390 f.), or 'seer' (לֹאֶה), as he was called till after the age of Samuel (1 S 9^{9}), was in an especial sense the man of the Spirit (אִישׁ הָרוּחַ, ἄνθρωπος ὁ πνευματοφόρος, Hos 9^{7}), Vulg. vir spiritualis. It has been said that 'the ideal of the OT is a dispensation in which all are prophets' (W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} p. 291, citing Nu 11^{29}); and the title of prophet is given to Abraham (Gn 20^{7}) and Moses (Dt 18^{15}), while it is withheld from Balaam, in whom, though 'the Spirit of God came upon' him (Nu 24^{2}), the sacred writers recognize a diviner (τὸν μάντιν, Jos 13^{22}) rather than a true seer. The true prophet is one who is lifted up by the Spirit of God into communion with Him, so that he is enabled to interpret the divine will, and to act as a medium of communication between God and men. The prophetic gift belonged to the nation, as the elect people; but it was realized in its highest degree only by those whose characters and lives fitted them for personal intercourse with God. The professional prophet seems sometimes scarcely to have risen above the level of μαντική (1 S $10^{5f.}$ $19^{20f.}$); the change of 'heart' promised to Saul ($10^{6.\ 9}$) is clearly not of a moral or spiritual kind. On the other hand, the prophets who taught Israel and Judah from the 8th cent. onwards have left us the clearest evidence of a genuine inspiration in the elevation and penetration of their teaching, and the revelation of a spiritual religion which their writings contain. No other national literature presents such a phenomenon. It is attributed by the prophets themselves to the Spirit of God; cf. e.g. 2 S 23^{2} (where see Driver's note), Ezk 2^{2} $3^{12.\ 14}$ etc., Mic 3^{8}, and the frequent appeals to a divine source, such as the repeated כֹּה אָמַר יהוה of Is, and נְאֻם יהוה in Jer.

(d) Anointing the Messiah.—The Davidic King, in whom the elect nation was to find its crown and consummation, must, as the first Isaiah foresaw (Is 11^{2}), receive all the gifts of the Divine Spirit in their fulness: 'the spirit of wisdom and understanding (intellectual gifts), of counsel and power (practical powers), of the knowledge and fear of J'' (religious endowments). In the strength of this abiding presence (ἀναπαύσεται ἐπ' αὐτὸν πνεῦμα θεοῦ) the Second David will show Himself to be the perfect King. It is remarkable that Deutero-Isaiah foretells a similar equipment of the 'Servant of the LORD,' the ideal Israel. 'I have put my Spirit upon him' is J''s assurance (42^{1}), and the Servant answers, 'The LORD God hath sent me, and his Spirit' (48^{16}, cf., however, Delitzsch, ad loc.); 'the Spirit of the LORD God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek' ($61^{1ff.}$). The ideal Prophet no less than the ideal King needs the fulness of the Spirit, and, when He comes, shall receive it. If, as some think (Kirkpatrick, Doctrine of the Prophets, p. 400), the prophet himself and not the Servant of J'' is the speaker in the last passage, the ultimate reference is still to the highest fulfilment of the prophetic office (Lk 4^{21}). The Spirit is the χρίσμα which makes the Christ (מָשַׁח יהוה אֹתִי).

(e) Moral and religious Elevation.—The ethical side of the Spirit's work comes into view in the teaching of the psalmists and prophets. In Ps 51^{11} the Spirit is described as רוּחַ־קָדְשְׁךָ, LXX τὸ πνεῦμά σου τὸ ἅγιον, i.e. the energizing principle of the divine holiness (Cheyne, Origin of the Psalter, p. 322; on the idea of 'holiness,' see Kirkpatrick, Doctrine, etc. p. 173 f.),—a title found again in Is $63^{10.\ 11}$. In the Psalm this Divine Spirit of holiness is apparently regarded as imparting to the individual Israelite dispositions which may bring him nearer to the character of God, the 'clean heart'

* 'Is it, in fact, the divine working rather than the divine nature that the Hebrew Scriptures regard as spiritual' (W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, p. 61).

† 'The Holy Spirit' is not an OT expression, and 'His' or 'Thy Holy Spirit' occurs only in Is $63^{10.\ 11}$, Ps 51^{11}.

and 'steadfast spirit'; in the prophetic passage it is represented as having dwelt in the elect nation from the days of the Exodus (cf. Neh 9^{20}, Hag 2^{5}), and as grieved by their rebellions against its guidance. Nor was the moral guidance of the Spirit limited to Israel, if we may adopt the common interpretation of Gn 6^{3}, which represents the Spirit of J" as judging, ruling, and working in men before the Flood; but the sense of יָרוֹן is uncertain (Oxf. Heb. Lex. p. 192), and the ethical application is at least doubtful (Delitzsch, ad loc.). It is certain, however, that the prophets foresee a large extension of the moral operations of the Divine Spirit in the days of the Messianic kingdom (Jer $31^{31ff.}$, Ezk $36^{26f.}$), and the prophecy of Joel (2^{28}) speaks of an outpouring of the Spirit 'upon all flesh,' which, although it is conceived under the image of a general bestowment of the gift of prophecy, pointed, in St. Peter's judgment (Ac $2^{16f.}$), to the Pentecostal effusion, which brought with it the setting up of the kingdom of God in the hearts of men of all nations.

A difficulty arises from the mention in the historical books of an 'evil spirit sent by or proceeding from J"' (Jg 9^{23}, 1 S 16^{14} [יי׳ מֵאֵת], 18^{10}, 1 K $22^{21f.}$ [וַיֵּצֵא הָרוּחַ, יי׳ ר׳ שֶׁקֶר נָתַן], 2 Ch $18^{20ff.}$), and even of an 'evil spirit of God' (1 S 19^{9} LXX πνεῦμα θεοῦ πονηρόν). Schultz (OT Theol. ii. 205, 270) contends that the Spirit is in all cases the same, the Spirit of God working good or evil according to the character of the man on whom it operates. But it is incredible that the sacred writers intend to identify the 'good Spirit' of God (Ps 143^{10}) with the power which inspired Saul with jealousy and the prophets of Ahab with lying words. The evil spirit is from God and is God's, inasmuch as it is His creature and under His control; but it is not His personal energy. As Wellhausen (on 1 S 16^{14}) points out, the expression רוח יהוה is apparently limited to the good Spirit, which is the operative presence of J" Himself.

iii. 'The Spirit of God' as revealed in the OT is 'God exerting power' (A. B. Davidson on Ezk 36^{27}). On this account it is invested with personal qualities, and personal acts are ascribed to it. If the truth, mercy, and light of God are partly hypostatized by the Psalmist (Ps 43^{3} 57^{3} etc.; see Cheyne, Origin, etc. p. 322), the Spirit of God, the principle of life which resides in the depth of the Divine Nature, and represents the Divine presence in the world and in man, is necessarily regarded as quasi-personal; it broods, rules, speaks, guides, quickens, because it is the living energy of a personal God. The Spirit of J" is personal, inasmuch as the Spirit is God (Ps 139^{7}, Is $63^{9.\ 10}$). There is, besides, a quasi-independence ascribed to the Spirit, which approaches to a recognition of distinct personality (cf. e.g. Is 48^{16}), especially in passages where the Spirit and the Word are contrasted (Schultz, ii. p. 184). But the distinction applies only to the external activities of these two divine forces; the concept of a distinction of Persons within the Being of God belongs to a later revelation.

iv. It may be asked whether a progress can be observed in the OT doctrine of the Spirit. On the one hand, certain points are clear from the first: the Pentateuch in its oldest parts reveals the Spirit of God as the source and support of the higher life in man, and as endowing him with intellectual gifts, and in particular with the gift of prophecy. All this belongs to the teaching of JE, while P adds that the Spirit at the first vitalized the cosmos. Even in pre-exilic times the Spirit is revealed as the quasi-personal energy of God in man and the world. The greatest prophet of the 8th cent. already recognizes the office of the Spirit as the Anointer of the Messiah (Is $11^{2ff.}$). But as the revelation proceeds, the ethical character of the Spirit's influence on man comes more distinctly into view. The higher view of prophecy, as contrasted with mere soothsaying, appears first in Deuteronomy (see Driver on Dt 18^{9-22}); and it is to the period of the Exile and the days that followed it that we must probably attribute the thought of the Spirit as the regenerating and directing force in human nature, and of its operations as about to be extended to men who lay beyond the circle of kings and prophets, and beyond the fold of Israel (for the date of Ps 51, cf. W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2}, p. 440; Kirkpatrick, Psalms, ii. p. 284; and for the date of Joel, see Driver, Camb. Bible, Joel and Amos, p. 11 ff.).

B. The Apocrypha of OT and other Jewish Literature.—i. In the non-canonical literature of Palestine, references to the Divine Spirit are rare, and when they occur are little else than echoes—sometimes broken and imperfect echoes—of the canonical teaching. The religious man is filled with the spirit of understanding (Sir 39^{6}; cf. Is 11^{2}); on the ungodly God sends the spirit of error (Ps–Sol 8^{15}; cf. Is 19^{14}). The youth Daniel, seized by righteous indignation at the miscarriage of justice in the case of Susanna, is represented as having his holy spirit (τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον παιδαρίου) stirred within him by the act of God, or as suddenly endowed with the spirit of wisdom by the angel of the Lord (Sus ^{45}, Theod., LXX). The son of David is to be mighty in the Holy Spirit (δυνατὸν ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ, Ps–Sol 17^{42}); but, as the Cambridge editors of the Psalms of Solomon point out, there is in this no approach to a belief in a personal Spirit of God, although the use of τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον and πν. ἅγιον (first in Ps 50 [51]^{13}, Is 63^{11}, LXX) is interesting as an anticipation of NT phraseology. The above list nearly exhausts the references to the Holy Spirit in the Palestinian books. The growing angelology of the Pharisees (see Edersheim, Life and Times, ii. p. 748) may possibly have obscured the biblical conception of the Divine Spirit as the operative force in nature and in man: thus in the Book of Enoch ($60^{12f.}$, ed. Charles, p. 156) the powers of nature are represented as wielded by created spirits, amongst whom they have been distributed; God is the 'Lord of Spirits,' but of a ruling Spirit of God no mention is made. To the later Jews the Holy Spirit was chiefly the spirit of prophecy (Cheyne, Origin, p. 333); they recognized that David spake by the Holy Spirit (Mk 12^{36}), while they attributed the works of Christ to the operation of a πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον (Mk 3^{30}). Of the inspiration of Scripture they entertained the strongest belief; although the Torah possessed unique authority, all the books of the Canon were sacred (αἱ ἱεραὶ βίβλοι, τὰ ἱερὰ βιβλία, Josephus, Philo; see the reff. in Ryle, Canon of the OT, p. 291); it was realized that the prophets were taught by a divine afflatus (Jos. c. Ap. i. 8, τῶν προφητῶν τὰ μὲν ἀνώτατα καὶ παλαιότατα κατὰ τὴν ἐπίπνοιαν τὴν ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ μαθόντων; cf. Ant. IV. vi. 5, VI. viii. 2). But when prophecy ceased, it seemed as if the presence of the Divine Spirit had been suspended or withdrawn.

ii. At Alexandria, on the other hand, the old consciousness of the perpetual activity of the Spirit of God survived, associating itself with the philosophical thought of Hellenism and growing under its influence into new forms of belief. The Book of Wisdom recalls the teaching of the OT as to the omnipresence of the Spirit (1^{7}, πνεῦμα Κυρίου πεπλήρωκεν τὸν κόσμον, 12^{1} τὸ γὰρ ἄφθαρτόν σου πνεῦμά ἐστιν ἐν πᾶσιν), its conserving and sustaining power in nature (1^{7} τὸ συνέχον τὰ πάντα), its special relation to man, as the author of his spiritual nature (15^{11}), and of his intellectual endowments and religious knowledge (7^{7} ἐπεκαλεσάμην καὶ ἦλθέν μοι πνεῦμα σοφίας, 9[17] βουλὴν δέ σου τίς ἔγνω, εἰ μὴ σὺ ἔδωκας σοφίαν καὶ ἔπεμψας τὸ ἅγιόν σου πνεῦμα ἀπὸ ὑψίστων;). This connexion of Wisdom with the Spirit appears in the canonical books, but in Alexandrian Jewish thought it is carried further. The Spirit is sometimes identified with Wisdom (1[5f.] ἅγιον γὰρ πνεῦμα παιδείας . . . φιλάνθρωπον γὰρ πνεῦμα σοφία . . . ὅτι πνεῦμα Κυρίου, where the linking of the clauses seems to leave no doubt as to the author's meaning; cf. 9[17]), sometimes regarded as its indwelling power (7[22f.] ἔστιν γὰρ ἐν αὐτῇ πνεῦμα νοερόν, ἅγιον, μονογενές . . . παντοδύναμον, παντεπίσκοπον). The Alexandrian doctrine of the Spirit finds its completion in Philo. The Spirit of God, he says, is ἡ ἀκήρατος σοφία ἧς πᾶς ὁ σοφὸς εἰκότως μετέχει (Gig. 5 f.). Indivisible in itself, it can be distributed and communicated like fire from torch to torch. In a sense the Spirit comes to all men, since even the worst of men have their moments of inspiration, their glimpses of better and higher things; with a few, the wisest and the best, the divine afflatus abides, and they become the 'hierophants' and instructors of their kind (Gig. 12). Philo's conception of the prophet reverts largely to the Platonic ἐνθουσιασμός (Tim. 71 D). The prophet is simply the interpreter of the divine voice, and so long as he is under divine influence he cannot exercise his reason, for he has made over the citadel of his soul to the Divine Spirit, which is in full possession of it (De spec. legg. 8, καθ' ὃν χρόνον ἐνθουσιᾷ . . . μετανισταμένου μὲν τοῦ λογισμοῦ καὶ παρακεχωρηκότος τὴν μὲν ψυχῆς ἀκρόπολιν, ἐπιπεφοιτηκότος δὲ καὶ ἐνῳκηκότος τοῦ θείου πνεύματος: cf. Quis rer. div. her. 53, and other passages quoted by Sanday, Inspiration, p. 74 f.). This mechanical inspiration was shared, according to Philo, even by the Alexandrian translators of the OT (Vit. Mos. ii. 7, καθάπερ ἐνθουσιῶντες προεφήτευον). Of the ethical aspect of the Spirit's work in man, Philo has little to say, except that its function is to promote clearness of mental vision and capacity for the intellectual knowledge of God, and that it fulfils this mission either by purifying and elevating, or, as in the case of the prophet, by superseding the natural faculties. Of the Spirit as restoring the moral nature of man we hear nothing; the writings of Philo contain no reference to Ps 51[10f.] or Ezk 36[26] (cf. Ryle, Philo and Holy Scripture, p. 291 ff.). The omission may be partly due to the circumstance that he employs himself chiefly about the Pentateuch, but it is more probably to be traced to the predominance of the intellectual interest in Alexandrian thought.

C. The New Testament.—i. The NT adopts the phrases used in reference to the Divine Spirit by the Greek translators of the OT. Thus we find in the NT as in the OT the terms τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον (πνεῦμα ἅγιον), τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ, or πνεῦμα θεοῦ, πν. Κυρίου, or simply τὸ πνεῦμα, or in certain contexts the anarthrous πνεῦμα. But they are used in quite different proportions: thus τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον (πν. ἅγ.), found in the Greek OT only in Ps 51 and Is 63, occurs in the NT between 80 and 90 times, while τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ (πν. θεοῦ, Κυρίου), the normal expression in the LXX, is comparatively rare in NT. Moreover, the writers of the NT employ phrases which are unknown to the LXX; the Spirit of God is further defined as the 'Spirit of the Father' (Mt 10[20]), 'the Spirit of his Son' (Gal 4[6]), the 'Spirit of Jesus' or 'of Christ' (Ac 16[7], Ro 8[9], Ph 1[19], 1 P 1[11]). In a few instances the plural is used to denote the various gifts or μερισμοί (He 2[4]) of the one Spirit; e.g. 1 Co 14[32], Rev 1[4] 4[5] 5[6] 22[6]. New attributes are assigned to the Spirit, corresponding to new gifts bestowed upon men; we read not only of the spirit of wisdom (Ac 6[3. 10]), but of the spirit of truth (Jn 14[17] 15[26] 16[13]), of life (Ro 8[2]), of grace (He 10[29]), of sonship (τῆς υἱοθεσίας, Ro 8[15]). Above all, the Spirit receives a personal name, which it shares with the Son of God in His historical manifestation (Jn 14[16] ἄλλον παράκλητον; 14[26] 15[26] 16[7] ὁ παράκλητος). These facts warn us that in passing from OT to NT we may expect a fuller theology of the Spirit.

ii. The new light which is thrown upon the subject by the Christian revelation is largely historical. (a) The gospel history opens with an outburst of prophecy. As the moment of the Incarnation drew near, men and women in Israel found themselves lifted up by the Spirit into new regions of thought and endowed with new powers of expression. The movement began in the family of a priest. A child was born of whom it was foretold that he should 'be filled with the Holy Spirit from his mother's womb' (Lk 1[15. 80]); and the inspiration was shared by his parents (Lk 1[41. 67]). Others were touched by the same current of divine energy—Simeon, to whom there came an oracular warning from the Holy Spirit of the presence of the infant Christ (Lk 2[25f.] πνεῦμα ἦν ἅγιον ἐπ' αὐτόν, καὶ ἦν αὐτῷ κεχρηματισμένον ὑπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος, κ.τ.λ.); Hannah, the daughter of Phanuel, who was accounted a prophetess (προφῆτις, Lk 2[36]). Such a revival of prophetic gifts had not occurred since the days of Ezra and Nehemiah; even the Maccabæan age had looked for it in vain (1 Mac 4[46] 14[41]).

(b) The new prophecy proclaimed the advent of the Messiah, partly preparing His way, partly welcoming and announcing Him when He came. But the chief outpouring of the Spirit was on the Messiah Himself. It fulfilled itself in two miraculous events—the Conception and the Baptism; the first introductory to the human life of the Christ, the second to His ministry and Messianic work.

(a) Two Gospels relate in independent yet not inconsistent narratives the miracle of the Conception and Virgin Birth (see Gore, Dissertations, p. 36 f.). In both it is ascribed to the Holy Spirit (Lk 1[35], Mt 1[18. 20]). Both contexts are conceived in the spirit of the OT and belong to the earliest age of Christianity, when the fullest teaching of the gospel had not yet been assimilated. We shall therefore probably be right in interpreting πνεῦμα ἅγιον here in its OT sense, as the power of God in active exercise, although we may believe that the Church has rightly identified this power with the personal Holy Ghost revealed by Christ. It is not without significance that in both Gospels the power which wrought the Conception is described as πνεῦμα ἅγιον rather than as πνεῦμα θεοῦ or Κυρίου. The Holy Spirit sanctified the Flesh which it united with the Word (Lk 1[35] διὸ καὶ τὸ γεννώμενον ἅγιον κληθήσεται). Not only was 'the new departure in human life,' which began with the birth of the Second Adam (Gore, Diss. p. 65), fitly preceded by a directly creative act, but the new humanity was consecrated at the moment of its conception by the overshadowing of the Divine Spirit. The Conception was therefore truly 'immaculate'; that which was conceived, although true flesh, was free from the taint of human corruption. It is worth while to notice, in passing, that the Gospels do not hint at an immaculate conception of the mother of the Lord; the special illapse of the Spirit is limited, so far as we can learn, to the conception of her Son. (On the miraculous conception as an article of the Christian faith the reader may consult Pearson, On the Creed, art. iii., and, on the early history of the doctrine, the present writer's Apostles' Creed, iv.).

(β) The Holy Spirit did not leave the sacred humanity which it had sanctified in the moment of conception; the childhood of Jesus was filled with a strength and wisdom which were the marks of a special grace (Lk 2[40] τὸ δὲ παιδίον . . . ἐκραταιοῦτο πληρούμενον σοφίᾳ, καὶ χάρις θεοῦ ἦν ἐπ' αὐτό; cf. v.[52]). But in or about His thirtieth year (ἦν . . ὡσεὶ ἐτῶν τριάκοντα) a stage was reached when a new illapse of the Spirit on the Second Adam became necessary. The first had sanctified His humanity, the second was to consecrate His official life. It came in connexion with the baptism of John. With the majority of the religious Israelites of His generation, Jesus went to be baptized. As He rose from the Jordan, the sign was given by which the Baptist knew Him to be the Messiah (Jn 1^{33}); John saw the Spirit descend in the form of a dove and rest upon Him. Mr. F. C. Conybeare (Expositor, IV. ix. p. 455) cites Philo to show that the dove was the accepted symbol in Alexandrian thought of the divine reason or wisdom, and concludes that the evangelists have converted a metaphor into a fact. But the evangelists—the Synoptists in any case—were strangers to Alexandrian symbolism, and they limit themselves to what they believed to be matters of fact. In this case the fact depends on the eye-witness of the Baptist, attested by his disciple, St. John. The evangelists, however, guard against the impression that the Spirit assumed a material form (Mt ὡσεὶ περιστεράν, Mk, Lk, Jn ὡς π.); even St. Luke's σωματικῷ εἴδει does not involve this inference. The appearance, whether real or subjective, was doubtless symbolical, but the symbol rests on the OT. It carries our thoughts back to the birdlike motion attributed to the Spirit in Gn 1^{2}. At the baptism of Jesus the Spirit of God brooded a second time over the waters, to vivify a new creation by resting on the new Head of mankind. If the symbolism of the dove is to be pressed, it may be taken to indicate the character of the Lord's ministry and of the kingdom of heaven (Mt 10^{16}).

The illapse at the baptism was regarded by the first generation as the anointing of the Christ (Ac 10^{38} ἔχρισεν αὐτὸν ὁ θεὸς πνεύματι ἁγίῳ καὶ δυνάμει). In the historical books of the OT מָשִׁיחַ, LXX ὁ χριστός, is the title of the priest (Lv $4^{3.\ 5.\ 16}$ 6^{15}), and the king (1 S 12^{3} etc.), who were admitted to their respective offices by the ceremony of unction. In the Psalms and Prophets the title is specially given to the Davidic king (Ps 2^{2} 17^{54} 19^{6} etc.), or to a king raised up by God for a certain work (Is 45^{1} τῷ χριστῷ μου Κύρῳ), or to Israel regarded as the servant of the Lord, or to a prophet who speaks in His name (Is 61^{1}). But when the form of the Second David took shape in the inspired thought of the Prophet and the expectations of the Jewish people, it was to the future king of Israel that the name was usually applied. The Psalms of Solomon already speak of 'the Lord Christ' (17^{36} $18^{tit.}$, see Ryle and James, note on 17^{36}), and the Gospels show that at the time of the advent the Christ was expected both by Jews (e.g. Jn 1^{20}) and Samaritans (Jn 4^{25}). The Jewish Messiah, however, was chiefly the anointed king; the conception of Messiah as the Prophet was less distinct, and that of a Christ-Priest (ἱερεὺς ὁ χριστός, Lv $4^{5.\ 10}$ 6^{22}) entirely wanting, until it presented itself to the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (Stanton, Jewish and Christian Messiah, p. 293 ff.). Yet the Church has rightly seen that the work to which the Messiah was anointed was sacerdotal and prophetic as well as regal. The baptism, with the descent of the Spirit, was the consecration of Jesus to the Messianic office in all the fulness of its functions and powers. Some of the Fathers find the moment of the Messianic unction in the miraculous Conception (so Gregory of Nazianzus expounds Ps 45^{7}, and see Aug. De Trin. xv. 46, cited by Mason, Baptism and Confirmation, p. 94), but the earlier interpretation fixes upon the Baptism: see Iren. III. ix. 3, 'Verbum Dei . . qui est Jesus . . qui et assumpsit carnem et unctus est a Patre Spiritu, Jesus Christus factus est'; cf. Jerome on Is 61.* The Gnostic schools exaggerated the importance of the Baptism, confusing the descending Spirit with the pre-existent Christ and ignoring the miraculous Conception. But if the Incarnate life began with the overshadowing of Mary, the official Messianic life dates from the Baptism (cf. Pearson, art. ii.). (γ) From that moment Jesus began His Christ-work (Lk 3^{23} ἦν Ἰ. ἀρχόμενος), and in the oldest record of the ministry it is regarded as the ἀρχὴ εὐαγγελίου (Mk $1^{1.\ 9}$). Henceforth His life is full of the manifested workings of the Spirit, in whose energy the evangelists find the source of the teaching, miracles, and entire ministry of the Christ (Mk 1^{12}, Lk $4^{1.\ 14}$, Mt 12^{28}, Ac 1^{2}). Some of these revealed relations between the Holy Spirit and the ministry of Christ are of special interest. Immediately after the baptism the Spirit impelled Him to meet the Tempter in the wilderness (Mt, ἀνήχθη ὑπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος; Mk, τὸ πνεῦμα αὐτὸν ἐκβάλλει). The conquest of evil being at once the first responsibility of the Second Adam, and the first step in the redemption of the race, it was the first work of the Spirit in the Christ. The Spirit of God in man was shown to be the power by which the spirit of evil is to be overcome: 'every victory won' is 'His alone.' To the Holy Spirit also our Lord attributes His power to cast out unclean spirits from the possessed (Mt 12^{28}). We may extend the saying to His other miracles (cf. Jn 14^{10} ὁ δὲ πατὴρ ἐν ἐμοὶ μένων [i.e. by the Spirit] ποιεῖ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ). When in the 5th cent. Nestorius unduly pressed this point, Cyril of Alexandria guarded the doctrine of the Incarnation by insisting that the Spirit by which Christ wrought was His own, and not an imparted power, foreign to His personal life (Anath. 9). Nevertheless, the truth remains that the Spirit, who is one with the Son in the Divine Unity, was imparted to His humanity, and strengthened it with supernatural power. The same is true of Christ's teaching; the Lord Himself ascribes it to the anointing Spirit (Lk $4^{18ff.}$). As the supreme prophet He spoke in the power of the Spirit, not at intervals as other prophets, but whenever He opened His lips to teach. Yet behind the human faculties which were guided by the Spirit, was the eternal Word in personal fellowship with the Father; His formula is not that of the old prophets, 'Thus saith the Lord,' but one which expressed personal authority, 'Verily I say unto you.'

(c) The Spirit descended on the Second Adam to abide (Jn $1^{32.\ 33}$; contrast Gn 6^{3} LXX). The illapse was not a momentary act, but a new departure in human life, the beginning of a permanent indwelling of the Spirit in man. The 'Gospel of the Hebrews' has rightly seized upon this point: 'descendit fons omnis spiritus sancti et requievit super eum et dixit illi: Fili mi, in omnibus prophetis expectabam te ut venires et requiescerem in te; tu es enim requies mea.' But the Baptist's testimony reaches further. The Spirit became immanent in the Sacred Humanity, that it might be communicated through the Christ to mankind. Jesus was baptized with the Spirit, that He might baptize the world therewith (Jn 1^{33}; cf. Mt 3^{11}, Mk 1^{8}, Lk 3^{16}). The experience of the first generation of believers showed that this hope was realized; Christians shared Christ's unction (1 Jn 2^{20}), and the unction abode in them, as it abode in Christ (v.[27]). This conviction was expressed in the early use of unction in connexion with Christian baptism (Tert. De bapt. 7; Cypr. Ep. 70; Cyr. Hier. Cat. myst. ii.).

Two historical events mark the extension of the Messianic unction to the Church. (α) On the night that followed the Resurrection Christ communicated the Spirit to the apostles (Jn 20^{22} ἐνεφύσησεν καὶ λέγει αὐτοῖς Λάβετε πνεῦμα ἅγιον). The act which accompanied the gift clearly looks back to Gn 2^{7}; a new spirit was breathed into humanity by the risen Lord. He began with the apostles, quickening them by communicating His own Spirit, that they might be prepared to carry on His work (καθὼς ἀπέσταλκέν με ὁ πατήρ, κἀγὼ πέμπω ὑμᾶς). The gift 'answers to the power of the Resurrection' (Westcott, citing Godet): it is primarily the quickening of the spiritual life of the apostles, but it is conferred with special reference to the work which lies before them. There is therefore no necessity to interpret λάβετε as if it were λήμψεσθε (Theodore of Mopsuestia), and to refer it to the Pentecostal effusion. The apostles received on Easter night the first-fruits of the new life of the Spirit secured to the Church by the Lord's Resurrection, and were thus consecrated and endowed for their great ministry. Their successors were, potentially at least, included in the gift, and the Western Church of the Middle Ages rightly saw in the words Accipite Spiritum sanctum the promise of all ministerial power (Hooker, Eccles. Pol. v. lxxvii. 5).

* Pearson points out that the two views are not necessarily inconsistent, referring to the double unction received by David (1 S 16^{13}, 2 S 2^{4}, 5^{3}).

(β) If the Resurrection brought the quickening power of the Spirit to the Eleven and to those who should succeed them in the ministry of the word, the Ascension was followed by the outpouring of the fulness of the Spirit on the Church (Ac $1^{5.8}$ $2^{1ff.}$). As at the baptism of the Christ and the consecration of the apostles, the descent of the Spirit was accompanied by external signs. The dove did not reappear, nor was the breath of Christ felt, but the sound of a great gale (ἦχος ὥσπερ φερομένης πνοῆς βιαίας) fell upon the ear, and tongues of flame, darting hither and thither and finally resting on the heads of all, appealed to the eye. The symbolism of the wind had been explained by our Lord (Jn $3^{7.8}$); the fire would remind the apostles of the prediction of the Baptist (Mt 3^{11} etc.). Every detail had its significance. The sound of the rushing wind seemed to fill the house, for the new life was to permeate the whole world. The tongues of fire were self-distributing, and none was left without his portion, for the Spirit divideth to every man as it wills (1 Co 12^{11}), and all believers are made to drink of the same Fountain (ib. ^{13}). The gift was at once collective and individual; it was for the whole body, and for each member.

Both from the promise of Christ and from the event, it is clear that the Pentecostal gift marked the beginning of a new era in the history of the Spirit's relations to mankind. The 'dispensation of the Spirit,' which began at the Pentecost after the Crucifixion, was so great an advance on all earlier manifestations that St. John does not hesitate to deny that there had been any gift of the Spirit before it (Jn 7^{39} οὔπω γὰρ ἦν πνεῦμα: see Westcott ad loc., and cf. Ac 19^{2}). The new manifestation differed from the old, not in degree only, but in kind; before the Incarnation the Spirit had no abiding place in man; since Pentecost the presence of the Spirit is immanent in the Church (Jn 14^{16}; cf. Cyril. Alex. on Jn 7^{39} τὴν ὁλοσχερῆ καὶ ὁλόκληρον κατοίκησιν ἐν ἀνθρώποις τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος σημαίνειν αὐτὸν ὑποτοπήσωμεν). The coming of the Spirit corresponds to the coming of the Son, mutatis mutandis. The Son came to unite Himself to human nature, the Spirit came to inhabit it. The Son came to tabernacle amongst men, the Spirit to dwell in them. But with each coming a divine mission began which marks a new departure in God's dealings with mankind.

(γ) The coming of the Spirit, like the coming of the Son, manifested itself at first by supernatural signs. To regard the gifts of tongues as unhistorical (Zeller, Weizsäcker), is permissible only to those who deny the possibility of the miraculous. That the fact is recorded by so careful a historian as Luke, writing within half a century of the event, and with opportunities of investigating the truth of the story which reached back at least twenty years further, may lead us to hesitate before we assent to these views. The γλωσσολαλία of Ac 2 may have been, like the wind and the fire, rather a sign of the Spirit's coming and a symbol of His work, than a gift intended to supersede the acquirement of foreign tongues, or even an actual assistance to the apostles in their subsequent preaching. But if we may trust the primitive fragment appended to St. Mark's Gospel, the Lord Himself had promised His disciples some manifestation of this kind ('Mk' 16^{17}); and one of St. Paul's undoubted Epistles leaves no doubt that some form of the manifestation existed in the Church of Corinth (1 Co 12^{28} $13^{1.3}$ $14^{2ff.}$). Further, we have the witness of Irenæus (ap. Eus. HE v. 7) that he had himself heard the gift exercised in its Pentecostal form (πολλῶν ἀκούομεν ἀδελφῶν . . παντοδαπαῖς λαλούντων διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος γλώσσαις). The gift was, however, singularly open to abuse, and St. Paul seems to have felt that it had nearly fulfilled its purpose, and might soon disappear (1 Co 13^{8}). Prophecy, another Pentecostal gift, if less novel and impressive, fills a larger place in the early history of the Church. On the day of Pentecost, St. Peter claimed that the words in which Joel foretold a great revival and extension of prophecy in the latter days had been fulfilled by the coming of the Spirit (Ac $2^{16f.}$). Prophets accordingly arose in the Apostolic Church (Ac 11^{27} 13^{1} 15^{32} 19^{6} 21^{9}), and took rank next after apostles (1 Co 12^{28}, Eph 2^{20} 3^{5} 4^{11}), in some localities surviving as an order into the second or third generation (Didache, 10–13). The new prophecy surpassed in St. Paul's esteem all other spiritual gifts, because of its ethical value (1 Co $14^{1.3.4}$). The NT prophet was the inspired teacher of the first age: if he left no literary remains which can be compared with the writings of the Hebrew prophets, it is difficult to exaggerate his importance in the infancy of the Church, when the local bishops or presbyters were as yet but little qualified to instruct their congregations in the mystery of the gospel, and the apostles' writings were as yet incomplete or imperfectly circulated. But the institution, as St. Paul saw (1 Co 13^{8}), lacked permanence, and it was gradually superseded, notwithstanding the Montanist reaction, by the local ministry, strengthened by the growth of the Episcopate.

One invaluable monument of the spiritual gifts of the first generation has survived to our own time. It was promised that the Holy Spirit should bring to the remembrance of the apostles the words and acts of Christ, and that He should lead them into the whole cycle of Christian truth. The Gospels witness to the fulfilment of the first of these promises; the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse correspond to the second. The literature of the first generation, preserved in the Canon of the NT, bears the impress of an inspiration which we miss when we pass to the Epistles of Clement and 'Barnabas.' It is a standing proof of the reality of the miracle of Pentecost that the first age of the Church should have produced a series of writings which, in the elevation of their spiritual tone and the fruitfulness of their teaching, remain absolutely alone. Side by side with this monument of the Spirit's work must be placed another—the Christian Society, or Catholic Church. As the idea of the Church rose before the mind of St. Paul, he saw in its external form a body which the Spirit of God animated and made one (1 Co 12^{13}, Eph 4^{4}). History has proved his words true. The vitality of the greatest and oldest community in the world witnesses to the divine power which brought it into being. The Church on her part has marked her sense of her dependence on the Spirit by the order of her creed: she believes in her own permanence and life, because she believes in the Holy Ghost. Credo . . in Spiritum sanctum, sanctam Ecclesiam.

iii. We turn now from the historical facts connected with the coming of the Spirit to the teaching of Christ and the apostles in reference to the nature and work of the Holy Spirit.

(α) (a) With one conspicuous exception, hereafter to be stated, the teaching of Christ upon this subject, so far as it is reported by the Synoptists, goes but a little way beyond that of the OT. He recognizes the inspiration of the OT Scriptures (Mt 22^{43}, Mk 12^{36}, Lk $24^{25f.\ 44}$) and His own Messianic unction (Lk 4^{18}, Mt 12^{28}); to ascribe His works to Beelzebul is to blaspheme the Spirit, and therefore to commit an 'eternal sin' (Mk 3^{29}). This saying, viewed in the light of its context (Mt 12^{32}), attributes Deity to the Holy Spirit, but does not on that account exceed the limits of the OT revelation (see above, p. 404). Occasionally, the Synoptic Gospels represent our Lord as looking forward to a fuller coming of the Spirit. The apostles will be inspired to defend themselves before the world (Mt 10^{20}); nay, the Holy Spirit will be given by the Father in heaven to all who ask Him for the gift (Lk 11^{13}). A remarkable reading in St. Luke's recension of the Lord's Prayer gives the petition, ἐλθέτω τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμά σου ἐφ' ἡμᾶς καὶ καθαρισάτω ἡμᾶς (Chase, The Lord's Prayer, etc., 24 f.; Resch, Agrapha, p. 398); but it is valuable only as showing the interpretation which the Church put upon the opening clauses of the Prayer.

(β) The Fourth Gospel, however, relates a series of conversations running through the course of our Lord's ministry, which reveal entirely new views of the Spirit's relation to the individual life, to the Church, and to God. The conversation with Nicodemus (Jn 3^{5-8}) asserts the principle of the new birth, tracing the beginnings of the spiritual life in men to the Spirit of God, and apparently connecting the birth of the Spirit with the future sacrament of Christian baptism. Similarly, the discourse of Jn 6 speaks of the spiritual food of the new life, which was to be imparted in the mystery of Christ's body and blood. In the conversation with the woman of Samaria (Jn 4^{10}), and the proclamation at the Feast of Tabernacles (Jn $7^{37f.}$), the Lord directs attention to Himself as the Fountain of the Spirit, from which believers should continually receive, and in turn communicate, fresh supplies of the water of life. The language is mystical, but the evangelist was able after the event to find its fulfilment in the dispensation of the Spirit (Jn 7^{39}, Rev 22^{17}). But the fullest and clearest revelation was reserved for the last discourse on the night before the Passion (Jn $14^{16.\ 17.\ 26}$ 15^{26} $16^{7.\ 13}$). It opens with the promise, 'I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Paraclete, to be with you for ever, the Spirit of truth' (cf. v.^{26} ὁ δὲ παράκλητος, τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον, where the identification is complete). The Holy Spirit, then, was to be Christ's substitute and representative on earth, a vicaria vis (Tertullian, Præscr. 13); and the work assigned to Him is that of an advocate (on παράκλητος see Westcott's detached note, and Lightfoot's early work, On a Fresh Revision of the NT^{2}, p. 50 f.). No function more characteristic of personal life could have been attributed, and Christ speaks accordingly of the Spirit as ὁ παράκλητος, not as τὸ παράκλητον,—a choice of gender which is emphasized by the repeated use of the masculine pronoun (ἐκεῖνος μαρτυρήσει . . ἐκεῖνος ἐλέγξει . . . ἐκεῖνος ἐμὲ δοξάσει.) But the personality of the Deputy is in fact essential to the Lord's reasoning; no impersonal influence could supply the lack of personal guidance and probation which the apostles would feel when the Lord was taken from them.* It is therefore futile to compare His mode of speaking in this passage with the prosopopœia by which in the OT and Apocrypha the wisdom of God is described as a personal (female) agent. Further, it cannot be maintained that Christ is speaking in Jn 14–16 merely of a new operation of divine power in man (cf. Ps 139^{7}), or of His own Spirit as perpetuating itself in the lives of His disciples. For He proceeds to distinguish the coming Paraclete both from the Father and from Himself: 'the Father will give you another Paraclete . . . the Father will send [him] in my name . . . I will send him from the Father . . . the Spirit of truth which proceedeth from the Father.' The differentiation is perfect; the Spirit is not the Father, nor is He the Son; as a Person, He is distinct from both. Again, we are permitted to learn something as to His relation to both. He is sent by both, but He is sent by the Son from the Father; He proceeds from the Father (παρὰ τοῦ πατρός). Although this is scarcely equivalent to the ecclesiastical phrase ἐκ τοῦ πατρός (see Westcott, ad loc., and on the origin of the later phrase, cf. Hort, Two Dissertations, p. 86 f.), the words used by Christ teach implicitly that the Spirit possesses an eternal relation with the Father upon which His temporal mission rests (cf. Jn $16^{27.\ 28}$ with 1^{14}, and Westcott's notes).

The Lord proceeds in the same great discourse to shadow forth the work to which the new Paraclete was about to be sent. His mission would be primarily to the disciples and the Church (Jn $14^{16.\ 17}$), in the way of fellowship (μεθ' ὑμῶν), presence (παρ' ὑμῖν), and indwelling (ἐν ὑμῖν); and this threefold relation was to be permanent (εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα), not, as Christ's historical manifestation, transient (Westcott). His functions would be (1) to carry on the teaching work of Christ, partly by quickening the memories of Christ's immediate followers (Jn 14^{26}), partly by guiding them into new truth, till all had been learnt (Jn 14^{26} 16^{13}), and revealing the new order (Jn 16^{13} τὰ ἐρχόμενα ἀναγγελεῖ ὑμῖν); (2) to glorify the Son, as the Son glorifies the Father, by revealing the Son to the Church in the fulness of the divine life (Jn $16^{14.\ 15}$). But the Spirit would also have a mission to the world, although it could not discern or recognize Him (14^{17} οὐ θεωρεῖ αὐτὸ οὐδὲ γινώσκει). He would co-operate with the Church in bearing witness to Christ (Jn $15^{26.\ 27}$), and His witness would carry the force of an irresistible conviction (Jn 16^{8} ἐλέγξει τὸν κόσμον) concerning the great facts of human sin, divine righteousness, and the process of judgment by which, from the Advent onwards, the victory of righteousness is being determined.

(γ) The crowning revelation followed the Resurrection, and is recorded by St. Matthew alone (28^{19}). The disciples had been taught that the Divine Spirit is a living Person, and that He is not to be identified with either the Father or the Son. From the formula of baptism they now learnt that the three Persons are comprehended under One Name; the Spirit is one with the Father and the Son in the Unity of the Divine Life. The words justify the place which has been assigned to the Holy Ghost in the creeds and the worship of the universal Church (Basil, Ep. ii. 125, δεῖ γὰρ ἡμᾶς βαπτίζεσθαι μὲν ὡς παρελάβομεν, πιστεύειν δὲ ὡς βαπτιζόμεθα, δοξάζειν δὲ ὡς πεπίστευκαμεν). But they also foretell the new relation which under the gospel was to subsist between the human spirit and the Spirit of God. To be baptized 'into the Name . . . of the Holy Ghost' is to be placed in a position of lifelong dependence upon the Divine Spirit, and consecration to the service which He inspires.

* When Beyschlag (NT Theology, Eng. tr. ii. p. 279) writes, 'The notion of the Holy Spirit as a third Divine personality . . . is one of the most disastrous importations into the Holy Scriptures,' he assumes that this idea has been imported, and that his own construction of the Lord's words ('just a pictorial personification') is convincing and even necessary. Against these assumptions must be set (1) the plain and natural interpretation of Christ's words, and (2) the judgment of the Christian Society, in which, according to Christ's promise, the Spirit dwells.

(b) From the moment of the Pentecostal descent the presence of the Paraclete entered as a fact into the daily life of the Christian society. (a) The apostles realized at once that the promise of Christ had been fulfilled, and that a new dispensation had begun (Ac $2^{33.\ 38f.}$). As the years went on, they were able to interpret from their own experience the details of Christ's teaching (cf. Ac 5^{32}, 1 Jn 5^{6} with Jn 15^{26}; Ac 9^{31} with Jn 14^{16}; 1 P 4^{14}, Ja 4^{5} with Jn $14^{16.\ 17}$). They realized that as apostles they were specially endowed with the Spirit of God; to practise a deception upon them in their apostolic character was to attempt to deceive the Holy Spirit, and therefore to lie to God (Ac $5^{3.\ 4.\ 9}$); when they and other officers of the Church took counsel on matters of discipline, the Holy Spirit shared their deliberations and their judgment (Ac 15^{25}); to them, as apostles, belonged the power of imparting the Holy Spirit to the baptized by the laying on of their hands (Ac $8^{15f.}$ 19^{6}, cf. He 6^{2}); individually, they were conscious of receiving direct communications from the Holy Spirit (Ac 11^{12} 13^{2} $16^{6.\ 7}$). But they recognized also that the gift belonged to the whole Church and to every member of it (Ac 2^{28} 10^{44-47} $11^{15.\ 16}$ 13^{52} $15^{8.\ 9}$). This fact was evidenced, not merely by miraculous manifestations (Ac 10^{46} 19^{6}), but by the new life of the Christian brotherhood. Miracles might have chiefly attracted attention in the first days, but even then the practical wisdom and joyful spirit of the common Christian life were seen to be fruits of the Spirit of Christ (Ac 6^{3} 13^{52}); and the maturer experience of the Apostolic Church realized that the Holy Spirit is the source of Christian holiness (1 P 1^{2}), the inspirer of prayer (Jude ^{20}), the means of an abiding union between Christ and Christians (1 Jn 3^{24} 4^{12}), the pledge of future glory in the presence of God (1 P 4^{14}).

(β) It is, however, to the Epistles of St. Paul that we must turn for the fullest treatment which the doctrine of the Spirit receives within the limits of the NT. Not that St. Paul sets himself to construct a philosophy of religion in which the relation of the Holy Spirit to God, to the Church, and to the human soul receives scientific treatment. He treats the whole subject incidentally and in connexion with his argument, or with the practical interests of the communities he is addressing. But he treats it with an insight, a freshness, and a precision due partly to his unique experience, partly to the intensity of his interest in the gospel and its workings upon human nature. There is a manifest progress in the apostle's handling of this subject which corresponds to the progress in his own life and work. In the earliest group of Epistles (1 and 2 Th) he scarcely exceeds the usual teaching of the first generation. He connects the gift of the Holy Spirit with spiritual power (1 Th 1^{5}) and joy (v.^{6}), with moral purity (1 Th 4^{8}) and religious consecration (2 Th 2^{13}); he offers practical guidance in reference to the miraculous χαρίσματα, warning believers against indiscriminately accepting all prophetic utterances on the one hand, and despising them all upon the other, and thus quenching the heavenly fire (1 Th $5^{19f.}$, cf. 2 Th 2^{2}). One interesting verse shows that he recognized in human nature an element corresponding to the Divine Spirit, and fitted to be the sphere of His operations (1 Th 5^{23} ὑμῶν τὸ πνεῦμα). The next group of letters (Ro, 1, 2 Co, Gal) carries us into the heart of his teaching on this subject, and we find ourselves in the midst of what is largely a new revelation. In these Epistles, St. Paul, starting with his conception of the human spirit (Ro 1^{9}, 1 Co 2^{11}, Gal 6^{18}), sometimes places the Spirit of God in sharp contrast with the spirit of man, whilst in other places he exhibits the two in close correspondence and co-operation. Instances of the former point of view will be found in Ro $8^{16.\ 26}$, 1 Co l.c., Gal 4^{6}. In such passages the distinct personality of the Divine Spirit comes strongly into view; the Spirit of God bears witness with the spirits of men (Ro 8^{26}), helps our infirmity, and makes entreaty for us with sighs too deep for words (ὑπερεντυγχάνει στεναγμοῖς ἀλαλήτοις, Ro 8^{26}), calling from the depth of our hearts upon the Father (Gal 4^{6}, cf. Ro 8^{15}); while at the same time He abides within the life of God, searching the depths of the Divine Nature and counsels, even as the human spirit is privy to the inmost thoughts of man (1 Co 2^{11}). The Spirit of God is, from St. Paul's point of view, uncreated and divine, for it is internal to the Essence of God. Where the Spirit dwells and works, God dwells and works (1 Co 3^{16} 6^{19}, 2 Co 3^{16}); it is by the Spirit that God is immanent in men. Yet the identification is not so complete as to exclude a true distinction between the Spirit and other Persons in God. The Holy Ghost is the Spirit of Him that raised up Christ from the dead (Ro 8^{11}), i.e. the Father; He is also the Spirit of Christ (Ro 8^{7}), not merely because He anointed the Messiah, but on account of His personal relation to the Son of God (Gal 4^{6}); He is the Spirit of the Son. Lastly, the three Persons are named in the same sentence as distinct hypostases (2 Co 13^{14}). In a few passages the Spirit of Christ in St. Paul appears to mean either our Lord's human spirit (Ro 1^{4} κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιωσύνης: see Sanday-Headlam, ad loc., and Westcott on He 9^{14}), or His pre-existent nature (2 Co 3^{17} ὁ δὲ κύριος τὸ πνεῦμά ἐστιν), or His risen life (1 Co 15^{45} ὁ ἔσχατος Ἀδὰμ [ἐγένετο] εἰς πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν); in other contexts the Holy Spirit is identified with Christ, because it is through the Spirit that the ascended Lord dwells in the Church and operates in believers (Ro $8^{9.\ 10}$). But the ambiguity rarely occurs; in the great majority of cases the distinctness of the Persons is clearly seen, and the reader can discriminate between the spiritual nature of Christ, and the Spirit who anointed Him and is one with Him in the unity of God.

But by far the larger number of St. Paul's references to the Spirit in these Epistles are concerned with His operations on the spirit of man. Living in an age of physical manifestations, the apostle does not ignore the miraculous gifts (Ro 12^{6} $15^{18.\ 19}$, 1 Co 12. 14, Gal 3^{5}), and in one place (1 Co l.c.) he treats of these at length; they, too, are χαρίσματα (Ro 1^{11} 12^{6}, 1 Co 1^{7}, cf. Lightfoot, Notes, etc. p. 148 f.), but not the chiefest or best (1 Co 12^{31} 13^{1}), or the most abiding. The permanent results of the Spirit's coming are faith, hope, and love (1 Co 13^{13}); its normal fruits are the virtues which make up the fulness of the Christian life (Gal $5^{22.\ 23}$). The Holy Spirit consecrates even the human body which has received the sacramental pledges of His presence, and has thus become the temple of God (1 Co 3^{16} 6^{19}); and He will hereafter raise it up in the likeness of Christ's resurrection (Ro 8^{11}), a spiritual body (1 Co 15^{42-44}), not liable to corruption or death. But His special sphere is the human spirit. Here His indwelling already works a new life, answering to the life of the Risen Christ (Ro 8^{2} 10^{13}). This life of the Spirit in man is pre-eminently a life of sonship towards God; those who follow it possess the privileges of sons in the divine family (Ro 8^{14}); they are joint heirs of the Heir of all things (Ro 8^{17}, cf. Mt 21^{38}, He 1^{2}), brethren of the First-born of God (Ro 8^{29}). If the sonship is secured by the Incarnation and the Resurrection, it is manifested and sealed by the gift of the Spirit, who is the πνεῦμα υἱοθεσίας (Ro $8^{15.\ 16}$, Gal 4^{4-6}). He creates in the adopted sons a character corresponding to their new relation to God and to Christ (Ro $8^{29.\ 30}$), by a renewal of the mind which works a transformation in their lives (Ro 12^{2} μεταμορφοῦσθε τῇ ἀνακαινώσει τοῦ νοός), and has the effect of engraving the divine will, once written on tables of stone, upon hearts of flesh which will retain the impression and translate it into human life (2 Co 3^{3}). Yet all these operations of the Spirit are but the foretaste of greater things to come. The gift of the Spirit already received by the Church is the ἀπαρχή (Ro 8^{23})—the first-fruits of the harvest yet to be reaped; the present indwelling of the Spirit in the heart is the ἀρραβών (2 Co 1^{22} 5^{5})—the first instalment of the fuller life, and the earnest that it is to follow (on the word ἀρρ. see Lightfoot, Notes, p. 323). Of the Spirit's future work the resurrection of the body will form a true part, for the reanimation of man's physical nature is at once a proper function of the 'Giver of life' (Ro 8^{12}), and the manifestation of our adoption into the divine family (Ro 8^{3}). But the resurrection itself is but a fresh departure in the history of the race; beyond it there lies an immeasurable life of progress unfettered by sin and death, 'the liberty of the glory of the sons of God' (Ro 8^{21}); and of this also St. Paul regards the Holy Spirit as the motive power.

In some of these contexts it is not easy to determine whether by πνεῦμα the apostle means the Spirit of God in man, or the spirit of man under the influence of the Spirit of God. The question arises especially in passages which contrast the Spirit with the flesh (Ro $8^{4ff.}$, Gal 5^{16}). The σάρξ is human nature on its weak and mortal side; is then the πνεῦμα, which is opposed to it, the same nature in its victory over death and sin? Lightfoot (on Gal 5^{17}) is disposed to reject this view: 'Throughout this passage,' he writes, 'the πνεῦμα is evidently the Divine Spirit, for the human spirit in itself and unaided does not stand in direct antagonism to the flesh.' This is, of course, true; but the objection does not apply to the interpretation which regards πνεῦμα as the human spirit influenced by and so far identified with the Spirit of God. On the whole this interpretation seems preferable, although it is clear that in both places the apostle's thought passes at times from one meaning of the word to another, refusing to be bound by an absolute rule (cf. Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. 196). A somewhat similar antithesis of πνευματικός and ψυχικός (1 Co 2^{14}, cf. 15^{44}) presents the same difficulty. The ψυχικός is under the control of the ψυχή, or lower rational nature; in the πνευματικός the πνεῦμα, the higher nature, the understanding and the will guided by the Spirit of God, has the ascendant. Here, again, we cannot exclude the thought either of the Divine Spirit or the spirit of the man; the two are regarded as in their operation one, and the one term covers both, although the human spirit is in the foreground of the thought. Similarly, in the antithesis of πνεῦμα and γράμμα (Ro 2^{29} 7^{6}, 2 Co 3^{6}), the heart of the contrast lies in the opposition of the external to the spiritual; and while πνεῦμα points to the action of the personal Spirit, who is the Giver of spiritual life, its precise meaning must be determined by the context. In the two former passages the reference seems to be to the spirit of man under divine influence; in the latter, to the new life of the Spirit which characterizes the gospel as compared with a dispensation of external law. Even the law has its spiritual element, for it was written by the finger of God (Ro 7^{14} ὁ νόμος πνευματικός ἐστιν), and its righteous judgments find an echo in the life of the spiritual man (Ro 8^{4}); but, considered as a mere edict, it stands in direct opposition to the Spirit (Gal 5^{18}), whose sphere is in the heart of the inner man; and he who is guided by the Spirit is emancipated from the external control which he no longer needs.

When we pass from the Epistles of the third missionary journey to those of the Roman imprisonment and the later 'pastoral' Epistles, we find the apostle's point of view somewhat modified. The intensity of his interest in the individual life has now been supplemented by a new interest in the unity and catholicity of the Church (cf. Hort, Romans and Ephesians, p. 128 ff.; Ecclesia, p. 135 ff.). He touches on the relations of the Spirit to the individual with a freshness of conception which shows that he is as keenly impressed as ever with their primary importance (Eph $1^{13.\ 14}$ 4^{30} $6^{17.\ 18}$, Ph 1^{19}, Col 1^{7}, 2 Ti 1^{14}); yet it is as the Spirit of the universal Church that he now specially delights to contemplate the Holy Ghost. To some extent this position had been occupied in 1 Co, but there 'he is dealing with the Ecclesia of a single city, . . . in the Epistle to the Ephesians he is dealing with the universal Ecclesia' (Hort, p. 141). The Spirit is in these later Epistles the bond of Catholic unity (Eph $4^{3.\ 4}$, cf. 2^{18}, Ph 2^{1}), the source of ministerial gifts (Eph 4^{7-12}, 2 Ti $1^{6.\ 7}$) and sacramental grace (Tit 3^{5}). Thus the teaching of the earlier Epistles finds its complement in that of the later, where it appears that the same divine gift which sanctifies and perfects the individual member of Christ, is the bond of corporate unity and the source and support of the common life which animates the whole body of the Church.

(γ) One book of the NT remains. The Apocalypse returns to the standpoint of the OT when it represents the Holy Spirit in the light of the Spirit of prophecy (Rev 1^{10} 2^{7} etc., 4^{2} 14^{13} 19^{10} 22^{6}). Yet incidentally it takes up St. Paul's later view. What the Spirit says, He says to the Churches (Rev $2^{7.\ 11.\ 17.\ 29}$ $3^{1.\ 6.\ 13.\ 22}$). For each of the Churches He has a separate message (Rev 1^{4} 3^{1} 4^{5} 5^{6}); the sevenfold gift of God (Rev 1^{4} 3^{1} 4^{5} 5^{6}) fulfils its work in each Christian brotherhood as in each Christian soul under different conditions, and with partial and fragmentary results varying according to the measure in which it is bestowed, and the manner in which it is received. To the universal Church the Spirit bears another relation: He co-operates with it in its witness to Christ; His voice is joined with that of the bride in calling for the bridegroom's return (Rev 22^{17a}). Yet in this book of world-wide and time-long interests the need of the individual is not overlooked, and the last mention of the Spirit in the Apocalypse refers to it (Rev 22^{17b} ὁ διψῶν ἐρχέσθω· ὁ θέλων λαβέτω ὕδωρ ζωῆς δωρεάν).

Summary.—It may be well briefly to summarize the results of this examination of the teaching of the Old and New Testaments upon the subject of the Holy Spirit.

The first chapter of Genesis represents the Divine Spirit as co-operating with the Divine Word in the ordering of the cosmos; the last chapter of the Apocalypse represents Him as speaking in the Universal Church. There are few of the intermediate books which contribute nothing to the doctrine of the Spirit. In every section of the Canon He fills a prominent and important place.

If it be asked what the Bible teaches with regard to the essential nature of the Holy Spirit, the answer is on one point explicit and unanimous. The Holy Spirit is, in the strict sense of the word, divine. No biblical writer yields any support to the Arian conception of a created Intelligence above the angels but inferior to the Son, to whom the name 'Spirit of God' is improperly applied.

But to the further inquiry, whether this Divine Spirit is a person, the reply, if on the whole decisive, does not come with equal clearness from the earlier and the later books. The Old Testament attributes personality to the Spirit only in so far as it identifies the Spirit of God with God Himself, present and operative in the world or in men. But the teaching of Christ and of the apostles, whilst accentuating the personal attributes of the Spirit, distinguishes the Spirit from the Father and the Son. The baptismal formula comprehends the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit in the Unity of the Name which consecrates and claims for itself the whole life of man.

On the office and work of the Holy Spirit the Canon throws fuller light, for here a more precise knowledge is necessary to the well-being of the Church. But here again the revelation is progressive, corresponding in its growth to the growing needs of men. The Spirit appears first in connexion with the cosmogony of Genesis, and the writers of the Old Testament frequently refer to His work in sustaining and renewing physical life. But the Hebrew Canon attributes to Him also the endowment of human nature with intellectual and spiritual gifts, and especially regards Him as the source of the great gift of prophecy. It speaks of Him as the author of moral purity and religious consecration. Lastly, it foretells the coming of an ideal King, a perfect Servant of God, in whom the Spirit should rest in His fulness, and an extension of the Spirit's gifts in the last days to the whole nation and to the world. At this point the New Testament takes up the thread of the revelation. The Synoptic Gospels show how the ideals of the Old Testament were fulfilled in the life and ministry of Jesus Christ. The Fourth Gospel predicts the mission of the Spirit to the Church; the Acts and Epistles relate the fulfilment of His mission in the experience of the Apostolic Church. We are permitted to see how it has changed the whole spiritual order, raising a new Israel out of the old, transforming an elect nation into a Catholic Church, pouring new life into the body of the disciples, sanctifying individual wills, carrying conviction to the world, and guiding believers into the fulness of the truth. In St. Paul's writings the biblical doctrine of the operations of the Holy Spirit reaches its completion. The apostle sees in the Spirit of Christ the source of the vital unity which inspires the Church, the quickening and compacting power of the new creation. But he teaches with equal clearness that the Spirit has come to regenerate and restore the personal life of each of the baptized, dwelling in the body as His temple, identifying Himself with the human spirit in its struggle with the flesh and its striving after God, until He has perfected the nature which the Son of God redeemed and has raised it to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

HONEST, HONESTY.—These words have greatly deteriorated in the three centuries that lie between us and the issue of AV. What they mean now we know; then they meant something nearly approaching the meaning of the Latin words from which they come. Honestus (from honos, 'honour') had two meanings in Latin: (1) 'Regarded with honour,' 'honourable'; (2) 'Bringing honour,' 'becoming,'—and those are just the meanings of 'honest' as it is used in AV. The word had at the time a special, one might almost say technical, meaning when used of women: it meant 'chaste.' Thus in his chapter in The Profane State (v. 1. p. 359) on 'The Harlot,' T. Fuller speaks of her crisping and curling and the like, and then adds, 'I must confesse some honest women may go thus, but no whit the honester for going thus.' And this is of course his meaning in The Holy Warre (ii. 46, p. 106), 'Thus Jerusalem, after it had fourscore and eight yeares been enjoyed by the Christians, by Gods just judgement was taken again by the Turks. What else could be expected? Sinne reigned in every corner; there was scarce one honest woman in the whole citie of Jerusalem.' And this meaning occurs once in AV, 2 Es 16^{49} 'Like as a whore envieth a right honest and virtuous woman,' though the adj. so tr[d] is so general a one as idoneus, 'proper.' With that exception 'honest' means either (1) honourable, or (2) becoming.

Neither adj., adv., nor subst. occurs in OT, a fact not without significance in comparing the OT ethics with that of Apocr. and NT. The commonest word tr[d] 'honest' is καλός, which means 'seemly' or 'becoming,' but with an ethical content enabling it to describe such character or conduct as deserves respect or esteem. So To 5^{13} 7^{7}, Wis 4^{12}, 2 Mac 6^{23}, Lk 8^{15}, Ro 12^{17}, 2 Co 8^{21} 13^{7}, 1 P 2^{12}. RV retains 'honest' in To 5^{13} 7^{7}, Lk 8^{15}; gives 'honourable' in Wis 4^{12}, Ro 12^{17}, 2 Co 8^{21} 13^{7}; 'his excellent education' for 'his most honest education' in 2 Mac 6^{23}; and 'seemly behaviour' for 'honest conversation' (ἀναστροφὴ καλή) in 1 P 2^{12}. In Sir 29^{14} the adj. εὐσχήμων, 'decorous,' is tr[d] 'honest' (omitted in RV); and in 29^{14} ἀγαθός, 'good' (as RV); while, lastly, in Ph 4^{8} the word is σεμνός, for which we scarcely have an equivalent adj. (RV 'honourable,' RVm 'reverend').*

These two meanings of 'honest' may be illustrated thus: (1) Honourable, Ac 17^{12} Wyc. 'And sotheli manye of hem bilevyden, and of hethen wymmen honeste (some MSS 'honest heithen wymmen'), and men not fewe'; Ru 1^{22} Cov. 'There was a kinsman also of the kynred of Eli Melech Naemis huszbande, whose name was Boos, which was an honest man'; North, Plutarch, p. 894, 'Now as the Rhodians were desirous to be ridde of this warre, and that Demetrius also was willing to take an honest occasion to do it, the Ambassadours of the Athenians came happily to serve both their desires.' T. Fuller (Holy Warre, v. 7, p. 239) speaks of 'terms honest and honourable'; and Rutherford (Letters, No. 56) says, 'There is no quarrel more honest or honourable

* The best rendering, says Vincent (Intern. Crit. Com.), is 'venerable' (as AVm), if divested of its conventional implication of age. And he notices that Matthew Arnold (God and the Bible, p. xxii) suggests 'nobly serious,' as opposed to κοῦφος, 'lacking intellectual seriousness.' 'Honest' is Tindale's word, whom all the VSS follow; Wyc. has 'chaste,' Ellicott chooses 'seemly.' See also J. A. Clapperton in Preacher's Magazine, viii. 457.

than to suffer for truth.' (2) Becoming: Tindale, Pent., Prologe, 'And beholde how righteous, howe honest and howe due a thinge it is by nature that every man love his brother unfaynedly even as him selfe, for his fathers sake.' So Is 52^{1} Cov. 'Put on thine honest rayment o Ierusalem, thou citie of the holy one'; and Golding, Calvin's Job, p. 571 (on $32^{11\text{-}22}$), 'There is a certaine honest comelinesse to be kept.'

The adv. honestly is the tr^{n} in Sir 22^{9} of ἐν ἀγαθῇ ('If children live honestly,' ἐν ἀγαθῇ ζωῇ); in 2 Mac 12^{43} and He 13^{18} (Amer. RV 'honourably') of καλῶς; and in Ro 13^{13}, 1 Th 4^{12} of εὐσχημόνως, 'decorously (Amer. RV 'becomingly').

The subst. honesty occurs only in 1 Ti 2^{2} 'that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty' (ἐν πάσῃ εὐσεβείᾳ καὶ σεμνότητι, RV 'in all godliness and gravity'). For the Eng. word cf. Joy, An Apology to W. Tindale (Arber's ed. p. 19), 'Tindale shulde have goten hym more honesty and lesse shame yf he had writen once lesse to the reader'; and North, Plutarch, p. 852, 'The great force of Demosthenes eloquence . . . did so inflame the Thebans courage with desire of honour, that it trode under their feete all maner of considerations, and did so ravish them with the love and desire of honesty, that they cast at their heeles all feare of danger.' J. HASTINGS.

HONEY.—See FOOD, vol. ii. p. 37^{b}.

HOODS is AV tr^{n} in Is 3^{23} of an article of female attire, designated by the Heb. term צְנִיפוֹת. RV has turbans, and there can be little doubt that this is the correct rendering, and that it might have been introduced into the text of RV in Job 29^{14} and Is 62^{3} (AV, RV 'diadem'), as well as in Zec 3^{5} (AV, RV 'mitre'). The derivation from zānaph gives the meaning of something wrapped round, as the similar Arab. liffeh, 'turban-band,' is taken from laff, 'to wrap round.' In the East the head-covering is usually a protection against heat rather than against cold. The habit of keeping the head always covered makes it sensitive to cold, and during a time of severe weather Orientals cover their heads with shawls, after the manner of hoods, but it is not a permanent article of dress. See DRESS, vol. i. p. 626^{b}.

G..M. MACKIE.

HOOK represents various words in both Heb. and Arab., and sometimes the meaning is very different from what is usually understood by the Eng. word hook. 1. The hooks (וָוִים) used in the tabernacle (Ex 26^{32} etc.) are, in the Arab. VS, tr. by a word (ruzaz) which means a hook or ring with a spike for being driven into wood. 2. In 2 K 19^{28}, Is 37^{29}, Job 41^{2}, Ezk 29^{4}, the Arab. VS has ring (khazâmet) as tr. of חַח or חוֹחַ. The ring meant in these passages is one which is put in the nose of a wild animal to bring it under control. In Syria gipsies frequently lead bears about among the villages by means of ropes fastened to rings inserted in the cartilage of the nose. In Ezk 38^{4} חַח is tr. in Arab. shakîmat, the bit of the bridle of a horse. 3. In Ezk 40^{43} שְׂפָתַיִם (gutters?) is tr. in Arab. maâzîb. 4. Pruning-hooks (מַזְמֵרָה, Arab. manâjil), Is 2^{4} 18^{5}, Mic 4^{3}, Jl 3^{10}. In Syria pruning-hooks are somewhat like the reaping-hooks or sickles used in England, only very much smaller. The handle is of steel, and of the same piece as the blade. It is hollow, and, when the pruning-hook is used to cut down thorns, a long stick is thrust into the hollow handle. 5. Fish-hooks (סִיר, צִנָּה Am 4^{2}, חֲכָה Job 41^{1}, Is 19^{8}, Hab 1^{15}; ἄγκιστρον, Mt 17^{27}). 6. Flesh-hooks (מִזְלָג or [מִזְלָגָה] Ex 27^{3}, Nu 4^{14}, 1 S $2^{13.14}$; Arab. minshal), with two or three prongs for lifting meat out of a pot.

HOOPOE (דּוּכִיפַת dûkhîphath, ἔποψ, upupa, AV lapwing).—This bird is mentioned only in the list of unclean birds (Lv 11^{19}, Dt 14^{18}). It is generally admitted that the hoopoe, Upupa epops, L., is the bird intended. It migrates to Egypt and the Sahara in the winter, but returns to Pal. and Syria at the beginning of March, and spreads suddenly over the whole country. The Arabs call it hudhud from its cry. Its Gr. and Lat. names are derived from its habit of inspecting the ground. The head of the hoopoe is depicted on the Egyptian monuments. It was supposed by the ancients, as also the modern Arabs, to search the ground for hidden wells and springs. This opinion is based on its habit of bending its head downwards, and alternately erecting and depressing its crest. The Arabs say that it reveals these secrets. In reality it is seeking its food, which consists of small insects and worms. It resorts to dunghills, finding it easy to dig out the insects from the dung. But this is by no means its exclusive source of supply. Perhaps it was this habit which caused it to be regarded as unclean in the Mosaic law. It is not now considered unfit for food. It is often shot, or caught on bird-lime, and sold with other game birds. Tristram says that the Arabs call it the 'doctor bird.' Its general colour is russet, but the wings and tail are black, with white bars. The feathers of the crest are 2 in. long, and black-tipped. It is as large as a thrush. G. E. POST.

HOPE.—AV tr^{n} of the following Heb. and Gr. words:—

1. בָּטַח (vb.), בֶּטַח (noun), Job 6^{20}, Ps 16^{9} (לָבֶטַח correctly tr^{d} by RV 'in safety'); cf. מִבְטָח Jer 17^{7}, בִּטָּחוֹן Ec 9^{4} (elsewhere only 2 K 18^{19}=Is 36^{4}). The vb. בָּטַח (root perh.='repose oneself on') is very common in OT. AV generally tr. by 'trust.' 2. פֶּטֶל (from root='thick,' 'fat') Job 8^{14} 31^{24}, Ps 78^{7}. It is best tr^{d} 'confidence' (so AV, RV in Pr 3^{26}, its only other occurrence in this sense). The form פַּסְלָה occurs Job 4^{6}. 3. מַחְסֶה Jer 17^{17}, Jl 3^{16} (better RV 'refuge'; so frequently in Pss). 4. תִּקְוָה, מִקְוָה Ezr 10^{2}, Job 4^{6}, etc. (the root קוה is the frequent 'wait for (on) J"' of OT). 5. 6. Practically synonymous with this are יחל (vb., Niph., Pi., Hiph.), תּוֹחֶלֶת (noun), Job 6^{11}, Ezk 13^{6}, Ps 31^{24} and oft., Pr 13^{12}, and שִׂבֶר (vb.), שֶׂבֶר (noun), Ps $119^{116.166}$ 146^{5}, Est 9^{1}, Is 38^{18} (root meaning 'look closely at,' Neh $2^{13.15}$). 7. חוּל (root='writhe'), 'wait anxiously,' La 3^{26} (cf. Gn 8^{10} [?], Jg 3^{25}, Mic 1^{12}, Job 35^{14}, Ps 37, Est 4^{4}).

In NT the noun is ἐλπίς and the vb. ἐλπίζω, always of favourable expectation (contrast ἐλπὶς πονηρά of LXX, Is 28^{19}). In He 10^{23} 'the profession of our faith' should be 'the confession of our hope' (τὴν ὁμολογίαν τῆς ἐλπίδος).

The second in St. Paul's triumvirate of graces (1 Co 13^{13}) has attracted less attention than its companions. With respect to the nature of hope in general, faith is its inseparable condition; in He 11^{1} 'foundation' might almost be substituted for 'assurance.' But its distinctive feature is desire of future good. Hope may accordingly be defined as desire of future good, accompanied by faith in its realization. The object both of faith and of hope is something unseen. Faith has regard equally to past, present, or future, while no doubt in Scripture referring mainly to the future (see, however, He 11^{3}). Hope is directed only to the future. Expectation differs from hope in referring either to good or evil things, and therefore lacks the element of desire.

In the nature of things the grace of hope is peculiarly prominent in OT. That was the time of promise and prophecy, ours is the time of fulfilment (Mt 13^{17}). Everything then had a forward look. The Heb. golden age lay in the future. The pious Hebrew was a minor (Gal 4^{3}). It is quite in keeping with the old economy that the element of faith or confidence which is latent in hope was especially active. In OT Luther often renders 'hope' by 'trust.' It is often hard to say whether faith or desire is most prominent (Ps 38^{15} 78^{7} etc.). 'These all died in faith' is almost equivalent to 'These all died in hope' (He 11^{13}). They 'endured as seeing him who is invisible' (v.^{27}). It is often said that the hope of OT believers was directed less to spiritual than to temporal good, such as health, riches, victory; but this is only partially true. Spiritual aspiration cannot well be purer or stronger than in passages like Ps 63^{1} 17^{15}; and temporal good is not forbidden to Christian hope (Mt 6^{33}). Heb. hope, no less than Christian, was set on God (Ps $33^{18.\ 22}$ 42^{11} etc.). Jeremiah beautifully addresses J" as 'the hope of Israel' (14^{8} 17^{13}). If in NT St. Peter is the apostle of hope,—not so much because of frequent express references (1 P $1^{3.\ 13.\ 21}$ 3^{15}) as from the general strain of his teaching,—in OT Jeremiah may be called the prophet of hope for the same reason ($17^{7.}$ 50^{7}); his hope was deeply spiritual in nature ($31^{33f.}$, He 10^{16}).

In NT hope is wider in range, more definitely spiritual in contents, and is attended with greater certainty. It is a 'better hope,' because grounded on 'a better covenant which hath been enacted on better promises' (He 7^{19} 8^{6}). The blessings it seeks are not limited to the future life, but include all that is promised to faith in the present life. Or, to speak more correctly, distinctions of present and future are often ignored in Scripture. The divine promises and Christian aspiration refer to both (1 Co 2^{9}, Ph 3^{12-14}). Still, the perfect blessings of the future life are often definitely referred to, giving peculiar magnificence to Christian hope (Ro 5^{2} $8^{21.\ 23}$, Tit 2^{13} etc.). If St. Peter is the apostle, St. Paul is the theologian of this grace. Very significantly, as the prophets make J" the ground of human hope, St. Paul makes Christ the ground (1 Co 15^{19}, 1 Ti 1^{1}, Col 1^{27}). More specifically, Christ's resurrection is the irrefragable seal of hope (1 Co 15, 1 P 1^{3}); hence it is a 'living hope.' Christian hope accompanies a state of peace with God, is attested by experience, and certain of glorious fulfilment because arising out of a sense of God's fatherly love to us (Ro 5^{1-5}). It is equally with faith a factor in the process of salvation (Ro $8^{24f.}$). It is a spring of ceaseless joy (Ro 5^{3} 12^{12}). Its object is salvation or eternal life, or the glory of God (Tit 1^{2} 3^{7}, 1 Th 5^{8}, Ro 5^{2}). Its expression is patient doing and suffering (1 Th 1^{3}, He $6^{11f.}$ 12^{1}). Hope is aptly called 'an anchor of the soul,' staying it amid the buffetings of earthly change (He 6^{19}). St. Paul puts the final honour on this grace by placing it above faith, and only below love (1 Cor 13^{13}). Like its sister graces, it continues in the future life, because the bliss of that life is capable of endless increase. When God is called 'the God of hope,' it must be as the author, not the subject of hope (Ro 15^{13}). St. John has only one reference to hope, describing it as a motive to personal sanctification (1 Jn 3^{3}). 'Fulness of hope' (He 6^{11}) accompanies 'fulness of faith' (10^{22}) and 'fulness of understanding' (Col 2^{2}). Hope stands sometimes for its object (Eph 1^{18}, Col 1^{5}, Tit 2^{13}).

HOPHNI (חָפְנִי, B Ὀφνεί, A Ὀφνί; the meaning 'fighter' suggested by Gesenius [Thes. p. 506] is very doubtful), and Phinehas, 'the two sons of Eli, priests unto the LORD at Shiloh' (1 S 1^{3}).* They are described as 'men of Belial (i.e. worthless, unprincipled men) who knew not the LORD, nor the due of the priests from the people' (1 S $2^{12f.}$ RVm, following the reading of the Versions and most moderns). The particular sin of which the sons of Eli were guilty lay in their abuse of their privileges as priests, in that they claimed more than the customary share of the sacrifices, and further insisted on having it when, and as, they pleased, so that 'men abhorred the offering of the LORD' (see Driver, Deut. p. 216; Wellhausen, Proleg. pp. 68, 153 f.). The further charge of licentiousness which is brought against them (1 S 2^{22b}) is most probably due to a later editor; the clause is wanting in the LXX, and is omitted by Wellh., Budde, Driver, and Klostermann. The mild rebuke of their father had no effect on their evil practices, and, in consequence, a curse is pronounced against the house of Eli, first by an unknown prophet (1 S 2^{27-36}), and afterwards by the youthful Samuel (1 S $3^{11-14.\ 18}$). In accordance with the sign given in the former prophecy, Hophni and Phinehas both perished in the battle with the Philistines at Aphek, whither they had accompanied the ark of God (1 S 4^{11}; in 4^{4} read 'and the two sons of Eli, H. and P., were with the ark of the covenant of God').

The history of the house of Eli which is given in 1 S 1–4 clearly belongs to the later (E) of the two documents from which the books of Samuel (see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF) are mainly compiled; but it is probable that the narrative has in parts been expanded (esp. in 1 S 2^{27-36}*) by a later Deuteronomistic editor.

HOPHRA (Heb. חָפְרַע; LXX Οὐαφρῆ; Herod. Ἀπρίης; Manetho Οὐαφρις).—The Egyptian original, whence the other forms were derived, is W'ḥ-ib-r' (see p. 656[a] note, vol. i. of this DB). The name of this king—the fourth of the 26th or Saite Dynasty—occurs but once in the Bible (Jer 44^{30}); yet his influence upon Jewish history was considerable. He was the son and successor of Psammetichus II, and reigned from 588 to 569. Although Hophra-Apries is mentioned on numerous Egyptian monuments, there is an almost complete dearth of native documents from which to reconstruct his history. Material, however, for the two chief episodes of his reign is supplied, on the one hand by the contemporary prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and on the other by Herodotus, who visited Egypt not much more than a century later.

The constant ambition of the Saite Pharaohs was the recovery for Egypt of her ancient position of suzerainty in Asia. In this none of them had hitherto been more than temporarily successful; the Syrian conquests of Necho had been cancelled by the revival of Babylonian power under Nebuchadrezzar, while in the next reign—that of Psammetichus II—we hear of no campaigns except in Nubia. But, on the accession of Apries, an Asiatic policy became again the king's main interest. A favourable opportunity seemed to be offered by a return to power of the patriotic faction in Judah, and the consequent revolt of Zedekiah. The Babylonian force sent to punish this display of independence was compelled, by the appearance in the south of an Egyptian army, to desist from the siege of Jerusalem (586). The check, however, was but momentary. Apries does not appear to have ventured a battle, and the Jews once more learned the value of Egypt's friendship. While their Egyptian allies withdrew, Jerusalem fell, and the Babylonians wreaked their vengeance on

* Possibly, the account here given is incomplete. Wellhausen (Büch. Sam. 35) points out that the sons of Eli are mentioned before he himself has been introduced. Thenius and Klostermann insert 'Eli and' with the LXX; more probably we should read simply 'and Eli, priest unto the LORD, was there' (Budde, Richter u. Samuel, p. 196)

* The text of this section is in considerable confusion, and the meaning can be extracted only with difficulty. The two events which are foretold are: (1) the almost entire destruction of Eli's house (v.^{31}, referring to the massacre of the priests at Nob, 1 S 22^{17-20}); (2) the raising up of a faithful priest (v.^{35}, referring to the appointment of Zadok in the place of Abiathar, the great-great-grandson of Eli, by Solomon, 1 K 2^{27}). The sign given in attestation of the prophecy (v.^{34}) is the death of Hophni and Phinehas in one day. See Wellhausen, Der Text der Bücher Sam. p. 48 f.; Driver, Heb. Text of Sam. p. 32 f.; Budde, op. cit. p. 199 f.

the nation. Nevertheless, the succeeding years of anarchy and bloodshed in Judah induced many of the remaining inhabitants to quit their homes and fly to Egypt for protection. Apries received them and settled them in the frontier fortress of Daphnæ (Tahpanhes, Tell Defeneh), in the eastern Delta, the station of one of the mercenary corps of Ionians and Carians who formed at the time the strength of the Egyptian armies. Certain remains of buildings on this site have been identified with the pavement, etc., referred to by Jeremiah (43[9]), who himself shared the Egyptian exile of his countrymen.

The much discussed inscription, in which some have recognized a reference to Nebuchadrezzar's punitive expedition to Egypt and to the reign of Apries, more probably relates merely the repression of some internal revolt (see Æg. Zeitschr. 1884, 87, 93); while the cuneiform fragment, claimed as corroborative evidence for the same event, can be so regarded only on the hypothesis — otherwise unsupported — of a temporary co-regency of Apries and Amasis, since the war it relates appears to have been directed against the latter king. It is curious, though scarcely important, that a tradition of Nebuchadrezzar's invasion should have survived even into Mohammedan times.*

The event of the reign, of which we hear most from Herodotus, is a campaign, undertaken later than those in Syria, in response to an appeal by the Libyans for help against the encroaching Greeks of Cyrene. The expedition was unsuccessful, and the consequent national resentment led to the deposition of Apries in favour of I'hms-Amasis, one of his generals, by whom he and the Greek mercenaries were defeated at Momemphis. Apries, detained for a time in captivity, was eventually given over to popular vengeance and strangled.

HOR (MOUNT) (הֹר הָהָר, Arab. Jebel Haroun, 'Aaron's Mount').—1. A mountain named as a stage in Israel's journey to Canaan (Nu 20[22] 21[4] 33[37], Dt 32[50]), and as the place of Aaron's death (Nu 20[23. 25. 27] 33[38. 39. 41], Dt 32[50]) (all P). The modern Jebel Haroun is identified with the closing scene of Aaron's life both by situation and by tradition. Mount Hor is stated to be situated 'by the border of the land of Edom' (Nu 20[23]); Eusebius states that 'Mons Hor, in quo mortuus est Aaron, erat juxta urbem Petram' (Onomasticon), which is the case with J. Haroun, as Petra lies at its eastern base; and Josephus affirms that Aaron's death occurred on a high mountain enclosing Petra (Ant. IV. iv. 7). Tradition concurs, and amongst the Arab inhabitants J. Haroun is held sacred as the sepulchre of Aaron, and a small mosque marks the site. It is fair to add that the identity of Hor with Jebel Haroun is disputed by Ewald, Knobel, Dillm. (on Nu 20[22]), Sayce (HCM 265), Buhl (Gesch. d. Edomiter, 11 f., Lex., 'Ganz falsch die spätere Tradition'), and esp. Trumbull (Kadesh-barnea, 128 ff.).

Description.—On approaching the saddle, or watershed, of the Wady el-Arabah from the south, the almost unbroken range of the Edomite mountains opens out to the eastward at Wady Abu Kuseibeh, disclosing a wide valley, at the head of which is J. Haroun, standing out conspicuously amidst an assemblage of broken ridges tumultuously thrown together, and constituting the frontiers of Mount Seir. The mount rises with a bold and precipitous front facing the west, flanked by two lofty bastions of sandstone standing erect on the granitic pedestal, and from its base stretches a wide and gently sloping plain, also enclosed by lesser heights, upon which we can well picture to ourselves the Israelitish host encamped during the solemn period of Aaron's ascent, and in full view of the summit of the mount which was to be his tomb; or (as it is in the narrative) 'in the eyes of all the congregation' (Nu 20[27]). Here also we may suppose they camped while Moses sent an ambassage to the king of Edom across the intervening pass to ask permission to march through his territory (Nu 20[14ff.]). The summit of the mount is marked by a little white mosque supposed to cover the tomb of the high priest, and from this point the ridge descends gradually eastwards until it breaks off in the line of cliffs which enclose the quadrangle of Petra, and the channel for the Wady Musa which flows through the city (see Petra). The mount is quite inaccessible directly from the west, owing to its precipitous face in this direction; but the summit is gained by ascending from the pass leading into Petra, called the Wady Haroun, which runs along the southern flank of the mount. The elevation of the summit is about 4780 feet above the Gulf of Akabah, or 6072 feet above the surface of the Dead Sea,* and from this point an extensive and remarkable view is obtained when the atmosphere is clear—towards the south, west, and north. In the first direction, the eye follows the range of lofty and rugged heights down along the side of the Arabah towards the Red Sea; in the second, it looks across the wide plain of the Arabah to the white cliffs which bound the Badiet et-Tih (Wilderness of Paran), and across this arid tableland itself for many miles towards the horizon; and towards the north, the deep hollow of the Ghôr may be faintly discerned, with the broken slopes of the hills of Southern Palestine bounding the view in that direction. Turning to the east, the observer marks the white crest of the Arabian Desert plateau, sloping steeply downwards into the deep hollow of the Wady Musa, in which lies, almost hidden from view amongst its red-faced cliffs and precipices, Petra, the ancient capital of Edom. Such was the scene which met the eyes of Aaron ere they closed for ever. His body is supposed to have been laid in a sepulchre immediately below the crest of the mount, and over it stands the little white mosque, conspicuous from afar: a token of the sacred character of the spot in the eyes of the wild inhabitants.

Geology.—Mount Hor is formed of reddish sandstone and conglomerate ('Nubian sandstone' of Russegger) of Cretaceous age; the beds rising in a precipitous wall of natural masonry tier above tier, and presenting a bold front towards the west. These huge beds of sandstone compose the upper part of the ridge to a depth of about a thousand feet from the summit, where they rest on a solid foundation of granite and porphyry of great geological antiquity, associated with which, in some way not very clear, are masses of agglomerate, beds of ash and dykes of igneous rock, all of volcanic origin, but of an age anterior to the Cretaceous sandstone. This latter formation dips towards the east, and gradually descends in the direction of the Wady Musa, where it forms the cliffs which surround the city of Petra. Along the flanks of the escarpment of the Arabian Desert to the eastward the sandstone formation passes below the white marls and limestones of Upper Cretaceous age, which form the surface of the plain at a level of over 5000 feet above the sea.†

2. Another mountain called by the same name (Nu 34[7. 8]) was to be the northern limit of the inheritance of the tribes of Israel, which was to extend from the shore of the Great Sea (Mediterranean) eastward along the border of Mount Hor unto the entering in of Hamath (Syria and the Lebanon). If Hôr be an archaic form of har, Mt. Hor signifies some conspicuous height among lesser heights; and when we come to apply this meaning to the region of the Lebanon, we cannot remain long in doubt as to the special mount indicated. Among all the mountains on the borders of Syria and Palestine, Mount Hermon is pre-eminently the most conspicuous and important, owing to its enormous mass and great elevation, which reaches 10,000 feet above the level of the sea. On this ground we may identify this second Mount Hor with Hermon, although Porter (Five Years in Damascus[2], 333), followed by Neubauer (Géog. du Talm. 9), Furrer (ZDPV viii. 27), and Buhl, prefer Jebel Akkar, a N.E. spur of Lebanon.

LITERATURE.—Mount Hor in Arabia Petræa has been visited by Burckhardt, Léon de Laborde, the Expedition sent out by the Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund in 1883–84, by Lartet under the Expedition of the Duc de Luynes in 1880, by Professor Palmer and Dean Stanley. The principal references to authorities are the same as those under the head of SELA or PETRA. E. HULL.

HORAM (הוֹרָם), king of Gezer, came to the relief of Lachish when it was besieged by Joshua, but was defeated and slain (Jos 10^{33}).

HOREB.—See SINAI.

HOREM (חֹרֶם).—A city of Naphtali in the mountains, Jos 19^{38} (see Dillm. ad loc.). The name means 'consecrated' (cf. Sabæan prop. names חרם, חרמאל, Halévy, Étud. Sab. 471, 504). It is prob. to be identified with the modern Ḥûrah west of Kedesh-naphtali. See SWP vol. i. sh. iv.

C. R. CONDER.

HORESH.—In 1 S 23^{15} (cf. $^{16.\ 18}$) David is found 'in the wilderness of Ziph in a (the) wood' (בַּחֹרֶשָׁה, where בְּ and ה locale are combined; LXX ἐν τῷ Καιμῆ, implying a reading בְּחָרָשָׁה; see Driver, Text of Sam. ad loc.). The word ḥôresh means 'wooded height' in Is 17^{9}, Ezk 31^{3} (if the text in these two passages is correct; see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.), 2 Ch 27^{4}, and this is probably its meaning in 1 S, although some would make Horesh a proper name, as in RVm (see Stade, Gesch. i. 245). J. A. SELBIE.

HOR-HAGGIDGAD (הֹר הַגִּדְגָּד).—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites, mentioned only Nu $33^{32.\ 33}$. The Heb., which means the hole or cavern of Gidgad, indicates the character of the locality, and suggests the land of the Horites, or its neighbourhood. The LXX translates τὸ ὄρος Γαδγάδ, reading הַר 'a mountain.' See BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN, GUDGODAH, and EXODUS, § iv.

A. T. CHAPMAN.

HORI (חוֹרִי).—1. A son of Seir, Gn 36^{22}=1 Ch 1^{39}. As Dillmann remarks, the national name appears here as a clan name. 2. The father of Shaphat the Simeonite spy, Nu 13^{5}.

HORITES (חֹרִי, AV sometimes Hori, Horims).—The predecessors of the Edomites in the country of Seir. They were there as early as the time of Abraham (Gn 14^{6}). J" destroyed them before the sons of Esau, and gave the latter their country (Dt $2^{12.\ 22}$). There was, however, such a mingling of the family of Esau and his Horite (in Gn 36^{2} read Horite for Hivite) connexions, that the Horite name and descent was preserved (Gn 36, esp. vv.$^{20.\ 21.\ 29\text{-}30}$). They are not explicitly said to be rephaim, as are the Emim and the Zamzummim, in Dt $2^{10f.\ 20f.}$, but from what is there said it is natural to infer that they were. Except in Dt 2^{12}, they are spoken of as 'the Horite,' using the gentilic noun in the sing., a form of speech that is never used of the other giant peoples; but this can be accounted for by the fact just mentioned, that, in their mingling with their conquerors, the H. name and descent had been preserved, so that, in the time of Moses and later, they were properly a people, and not merely a race of subordinate men, as in the case of the Anakim and others.

The name Horite is supposed to mean 'cave-dweller' (see Driver, Deut. p. 38). On the theory that the Horites were rephaim, this fact is of interest in its bearing on the character of the rephaite civilization; but they did not always remain cave-dwellers. See GIANTS, REPHAIM, and cf. Hommel, AHT 263 f. W. J. BEECHER.

HORMAH (חָרְמָה, Ἑρμά, Ἀνάθεμα).—After the return of the spies, an attempt to go up into the S. of Judah was repulsed by the Canaanite and Amalekite (the Amorite according to Dt), who drove the Israelites to Hormah (Nu 14^{45}, Dt 1^{44}). In this passage of Nu, Hormah occurs with the def. art., and the rendering of Dt 1^{44}, preferred by critics (following LXX, Syr., Vulg.), is 'from Seir to Hormah' (see Driver, ad loc.).

The Canaanite king of Arad (Nu $21^{1\text{-}3}$) fought against Israel when in the neighbourhood of Mt. Hor, and took some of them prisoners. Thereupon Israel vowed that if the Lord would give them victory, they would place the Canaanite cities under the ban. The place was accordingly named Hormah. According to Jg 1^{17}, Judah and Simeon utterly destroyed Zephath and called it Hormah. If the events of Nu 21^{3} happened immediately after the attack of the king of Arad, it would seem that the Israelites conquered at that time some portion of the S. of Judah, and in that case a way would have been open for an advance northward. The generally received view seems therefore probable, that Nu 21^{3} describes what took place at a later period, and Jg 1^{17} supplies further details.

Hormah is mentioned, Jos 12^{14}, along with Arad as one of the 31 royal cities taken by Joshua, in 15^{30} as 'one of the uttermost cities . . . toward the border of Edom in the South,' and in 19^{4}, 1 Ch 4^{30} as part of the inheritance of Simeon. In 1 S 30^{30} it occurs after the cities of the Kenites (cf. the same connexion in Jg $1^{16.\ 17}$).

The position of Hormah depends upon that assigned to Kadesh, and two identifications have been proposed: that of Robinson, who identifies it with es-Sufah, a pass through the mountains on one of the roads from Petra to Hebron; and that of Rowlands and Palmer, who propose Sebaita as its site, in the Wady el-Abyadh, about 25 miles in N.N.E. direction from 'Ain Kadis. Both identifications are made with Zephath, which is mentioned only Jg 1^{17}, and assume that the old Canaanite name has survived—an assumption not without difficulty, in face of the evidence of the OT that the place was known as Hormah. Either site is appropriate according to the theory adopted as to the position of Kadesh. If the identifications of Ziklag and Jerahmeel (1 S 30^{29}) be accepted as being in the neighbourhood of Sebaita, they would increase the probability in favour of that site. Its distance from Arad may be urged as an objection, but we do not know the extent of the territory belonging to the king of Arad, nor does it state in Nu $21^{2.\ 3}$ that the cities were in his territory. See Robinson, BRP[2] ii. 181; Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, 374 ff.; and art. KADESH.

HORN (קֶרֶן, κέρας) has, besides its usual meaning, three other significations in the Bible. 1. A kind of bugle or cornet (from L. cornu) for military purposes (Jos 6^{5}), which see under TRUMPET. 2. An emblem of strength or power derived from the offensive weapons of some animals. As the word is always used in the sing., it is very likely that the special animal from which this use of it came was the one-horned rhinoceros, or the fabulous unicorn which still appears on the insignia of British arms. This emblematical sense of power is the principal use made of this word in both OT and NT. Thus the horn is said to be 'exalted' (Ps 89[17]) when the figure represents the show of great power, or 'broken' (Jer 48[25]) when the idea is that of its destruction. The same metaphor is sometimes used in the sense of arrogance: 'Lift not up the horn . . . speak not with a stiff neck' (Ps 75[4. 5] RV); compare the contrary expression of humiliation: 'I have sewed sackcloth upon my skin, and have laid my horn in the dust' (Job 16[15] RV). Another form of the figurative sense is when it represents kings (in the Books of Dn and Rev), who wielded the power of a whole nation. There is no real connexion between any of these metaphoric uses and the Ashteroth-karnaim—the two-horned Astarte (Gn 14[5])—who, in Phœn. mythology, was the goddess of the Moon, and on whose head the crescent is represented in some of her statues. Alexander the Great is also called in the Koran (18. 82), and by Arab. writers, 'the two-horned,' most probably in reference to the two rams' horns seen in some of his coins curling backwards above his ears, which he adopted in honour of Ammon the Egyptian god, to whom the ram was sacred. An equally erroneous idea has been long entertained about the silver horn worn on the head by women of the Lebanon about fifty years ago, which was simply an exaggerated piece of head-dress for supporting the veil to cover the head and face, and had no reference to symbolized power. See DRESS in vol. i. p. 627[a], where the horn is figured. 3. The horns of the altar were four projecting points on its corners—sometimes seen on heathen structures of this kind. They were probably ornamental, but among the Jews they were smeared with the blood of sacrificial victims (Ex 29[12]), and may have been used for binding the animal until the time came for its slaughter (Ps 118[27], where, however, the text is corrupt). Criminals enjoyed immunity of danger to their lives from an avenger so long as they took hold of these horns (1 K 1[50]), just as in the Middle Ages Christian churches and altars were resorted to for the same purpose. See ALTAR, vol. i. p. 77[a].

J. WORTABET.

HORNET (צִרְעָה ṣir'âh, σφηκία, crabro).—The hornet is mentioned thrice in the Hex. (Ex 23[28], Dt 7[20], Jos 24[12]). The first two passages contain the general promise that God would send the hornet before the Isr. to drive out their enemies. In the last it is said that God did send the hornet before them to drive out the two kings of the Amorites. (For two here we should certainly read twelve. So LXX, δώδεκα. See Dillm. ad. loc.). We have no details of a pest of hornets in Scripture. It is, however, not impossible that such a pest may have aided in the work. Other insects, as ants and locusts, have, at times, vast desolating power. The author of Wisdom (12[8-10]) takes the passage literally. Hornets multiply at times in large numbers, and there are records in profane history of plagues of them. There are four species in the Holy Land, two of which construct nests of papier maché in bushes and trees, and two underground or in cavities of the rocks. Their sting is exceedingly painful, and that of large numbers at once may be fatal (cf. Driver on Dt 7[20]). Many have thought that the meaning of hornets in these passages is figurative, and equivalent to the 'terror' (Ex 23[27]). They argue from the Lat. æstrus, a gadfly, which, from the terror and madness it inspired in cattle, gave its name to those mental conditions. Whether we adopt the literal or the metaphorical sense, the object is to represent that the agency of apprehension and terror prepared the way for the unparalleled victories of the Israelites (Gn 35[5], Dt 32[25], Jos 2[11], Ps 44[3. 6]).

HORONAIM (חוֹרֹנַיִם, חֹרֹנַיִם, perh. 'the two hollows'). —A city of Moab, whose site has not been recovered with certainty. It is mentioned in Is 15[5], Jer 48[3] (in both 'the way to H.,' דֶּרֶךְ ח׳) 48[5] ('the descent of H.,' מוֹרַד ח׳) 48[34]. Also on the Moabite Stone (ll. 31, 32) it occurs as חורנן, i.e. prob. חוֹרֹנַן Ḥoronên: 'Chemosh said unto me, Go down, fight against Ḥoronên; and I went down.' The language here, compared with that of Jer 48[5], has led some to find its site to the south of the Arnon, at some inconspicuous ruins mentioned by de Luynes in the neighbourhood of the Wady ed-Derâ'a (see Buhl, GAP 272 f.).

In Jos 10[10. 11] the LXX Ὡρωνείν implies a reading חרנים, which ought prob. to be read also in 2 S 13[34] (see Well. and Driver, ad loc.). In these passages, of course, the reference is to the two Beth-horons.

J. A. SELBIE.

HORONITE (הַחֹרֹנִי, ὁ Ἀρωνεί, Neh 2[10. 19] 13[28]).—A title given to Sanballat, the opponent of Nehemiah. The name probably denotes an inhabitant of Beth-horon, a town on the borders of Ephraim, about 18 miles N.W. of Jerus. (Jos 10[10] 16[3. 5] etc.). Some scholars (so Gesen.) have derived the title from Horonaim, a town in S. Moab (Is 15[5], Jer 48[3. 5. 34]), pointing to the close connexion of Sanballat with Tobiah the Ammonite; but see Neh 4[2].

H. A. WHITE.

HORROR has greatly strengthened its meaning since it came into the Eng. language. The Lat. word horror (from horrere, to stand on end) is used primarily of the bristling of hair, etc., and secondarily of the fear which causes the hair to stand on end. Now the meaning is expressed thus: 'Horror is that very strong and painful emotion which is excited by the view or contemplation of something peculiarly atrocious in the conduct of another; by some vice which exceeds the usual extravagance of vice; enormities that surpass the bounds of common depravity.' This intensity of meaning has been gained gradually. Even in AV of 1611 'horror' means no more than 'dread.' It occurs in Gn 15[12] 'An horror of great darkness fell upon him' (אֵימָה חֲשֵׁכָה גְדֹלָה 'a terror, a great darkness'); Ps 55[5] 119[53], Ezk 7[18], 2 Mac 3[17] 'For the man was so compassed with fear and horror of the body' (φρικασμός, RV 'a shuddering'). Cf. Melvill, Diary, p. 144 'Ther was na thing behind bot bitter teares and heavie lamentation, partlie for the present lose, bot mikle mair for the esteat that was till ensew upon the Kirk, quhilk everie an apprehendit in graitter and graitter missour of horrour and feirfulness.' Bp. Hall, speaking of the angel's visit to Zacharias (Works, ii. 3), says, 'It was the weaknesse of him that served at the Altar without horror, to be daunted with the face of his fellow servant.'

Horrible is that which causes great fear: Ps 11[6] 'Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire, and brimstone, and an horrible tempest' (רוּחַ זְלָעָפוֹת, RV 'burning wind'; King 'scorching blast'), 40[2] 'He brought me up also out of an horrible pit' (מִבּוֹר שָׁאוֹן, AVm 'a pit of noise,' RVm 'a pit of tumult or destruction,' LXX ἐκ λάκκου ταλαιπωρίας, so Vulg. 'de lacu miseriæ,' and Dou. 'the lake of misery'); Jer 5[30] 18[13] 23[14], Hos 6[10] (all 'a horrible thing'='a thing to be dreaded'); 2 Es 11[45] 15[28] (both 'horribilis'), 15[34] ('horridus'); Wis 3[19] (χαλεπός, Vulg. 'dirus'), 8[15] (φρικτός, Vulg. 'horrendus'), 11[18] 'shooting horrible sparkles out of their eyes' (δεινοὺς σπινθῆρας, Vulg. 'horrendas scintillas'), 16[5] 'horrible fierceness' (δεινὸς θυμός, Vulg. 'sæva ira'), 17[5] 'that horrible night' (τὴν στυγνὴν ἐκείνην νύκτα, Vulg. 'illam noctem horrendam'), 18[17] 'visions of horrible dreams' (φαντασίαι ὀνείρων δεινῶν, Vulg. 'visus somniorum malorum'), 19[17] 'compassed about with horrible great darkness' (ἀχανεῖ σκότει, Vulg. 'subitaneis tenebris'). In every case the word means 'to be dreaded,' 'dreadful'; the element of loathing does not enter.

And so with horribly, Jer 2[12], Ezk 32[10] 'be horribly afraid'; Wis 6[5] 'Horribly and speedily shall he come upon you' (φρικτῶς, Vulg. 'horrende'). Cf. He 10[31] Rhem. 'It is horrible to fal into the handes of the living God'; and Defoe, Crusoe, p. 590, 'Never Tyrant, for such I acknowledged myself to be, was ever so universally beloved, and yet so horribly feared by his subjects.'

J. HASTINGS.

HORSE.—Four Heb. words are used for horse, and one, or perhaps two, for mare. 1. אַבִּיר 'abbîr. This word means strong or valiant, and is applied metaphorically to the h. (Jer 8[16] AV, RV 'neighing of his strong ones'), 47[3] 'the stamping of the hoofs of his strong horses' (RV 'of his strong ones'), 50[11] 'bellow as bulls' (AVm 'neigh as steeds,' RV 'neigh as strong horses').

2. פָּרָשׁ pârâsh. The orig. signification of this word is horseman or cavalier (cf. Arab. fâris), as distinguished from the rider of an ass or a camel. It signifies, secondarily, a riding horse, such as is used in war. In this sense it corresponds to the Arab. faras, which, however, is generic for all horses. The reason why the Hebrews designated by pârâsh only cavalry mounts is that civilians did not use horses for riding. Only two clear instances are given in OT of any person, not of military rank, riding a horse,—that of Mordecai (Est 6[9. 10]), who rode the king's horse (סוּס, not פָּרָשׁ) as a special honour; and that of the 'posts on horseback, riding on swift steeds' (סוּסִים Est 8[10]). In the obscure passage (Is 28[23]), so differently tr[d] in AV and RV, it is not certain whether the horses (פָּרָשָׁיו) were harnessed to the cart, or ridden or driven. When the peaceful mission of Christ is announced (Zec 9[9]), although he is heralded as a king, it is said that 'he is just, and victorious (lit. saved); lowly, and riding upon an ass,' i.e. is not like military conquerors, who ride horses. Then to illustrate the character of this reign it is said (v.[10]), 'I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse (ṣûs) from Jerus.,' i.e. where all is peace the horse is not needed any more than the chariot (see ASS). It is easy in many cases to determine from the context whether pârâsh is to be tr[d] horse or horseman. Thus 'twelve thousand pârâshîm' (1 K 4[26]) plainly refers to cavalry horses as distinguished from chariot horses, and not to 'horsemen,' as in AV and RV. It is clear that the people of the house of Togarmah (Ezk 27[14]) traded, not in 'horsemen,' as in AV, but in cavalry horses, 'war horses,' RV. It is the 'war horses' that run (RVm Jl 2[4]), not the 'horsemen' (text AV, RV). In the pursuit of Saul 'the chariots and the horsemen (בַּעֲלֵי פָרָשִׁים, owners of horses) followed hard after him' (2 S 1[6]). On the other hand, pârâsh (2 S 8[4], Jer 4[29]) can refer only to the 'horsemen.' The 'pârâsh' (Nah 3[3]) who 'lifteth up,' RV 'mounting,' marg. 'charging,' must be the horseman. Sometimes neither the horse nor his rider seems specially designated, and in these cases pârâsh corresponds to cavalry (Ex 14[9. 17. 18. 23. 26. 28], Hab 1[8]). In other cases pârâsh will apply to either the horse or his rider. Thus (1 S 8[11]) וּבְפָרָשָׁיו may be 'for his war horses,' as has just before been said 'for his chariots,' or 'to be his horsemen,' as in text AV, RV; and צֶמֶד פָּרָשִׁים (Is 21[7]) may mean a 'couple of horsemen,' or a pair of horses, or 'horsemen in pairs,' or a 'pair of horsemen,' or horses in pairs (cf. AV with RV text and marg.).

3. סוּס ṣûs. This word is often used for chariot horses (Ex 14[9] etc., Jos 11[4], 1 K 4[26], Jer 50[37], Ezk 27[14]). It is used even more freq. for riding horses, esp. war horses (Gn 49[17], Est 6[9. 10], Job 39[19-25], Jer 6[23] 8[16], Hab 1[8], Zec 1[8] etc.). In not a few cases it seems general for horses (Dt 17[16], 1 K 18[5] etc.). In one it seems to refer to a hunter (Job 39[18]).

4. רֶכֶשׁ rekhesh. This word is used in three places, in all of which RV renders it by 'swift steeds' (Est 8[10. 14], AV 'mules'; 1 K 4[28], AV 'dromedaries,' marg. 'mules' or 'swift beasts'; Mic 1[13], AV 'swift beast'). In the last it clearly refers to a chariot horse.

5. רַמָּךְ rammâk. This word, rendered AV 'dromedaries' (Est 8[10], RV 'stud'), is Pers. ramah, 'flock' or 'herd.' See DROMEDARY.

6. סוּסָה ṣûṣâh, ἡ ἵππος, equitatus. AV (Ca 1[9]), following Vulg., renders this word 'a company of horses,' RV 'a steed,' marg. 'the steeds.' These renderings would make the point of similarity between the bride and the horses their triumphant march. Others would make סְסָתִי = my mare. It is difficult, if this rendering be adopted, to see what is the connexion between this word and the expression 'in the chariots of Pharaoh,' which immediately follows.

It may seem strange that the Isr., who certainly knew the horse well in Egypt (Gn 47[17]), and who came into a country, many of the tribes of which had large numbers of war horses, should not have adopted and used so noble an animal. The explanation is to be sought in the pastoral habits of the Isr., inherited from their patriarchal ancestors, and continued through the period of their residence in Egypt. These habits led them to seek first the conquest of the hill-country of Canaan. This country is not adapted for the movements either of cavalry or chariots, and the aborigines of these regions seem not to have had horses. But when the Isr. came into the plains of N. Pal. they at once encountered large numbers of chariots and horsemen, but, acting under the command of God, who delivered them into their hands, they houghed the horses and burned the chariots (Jos 11[4-9]). The fact that the Phil. plains had chariots and horses (Jg 1[19]) prevented the early conquest of that region. An encounter, 150 years later, in the plain of Jezreel, resulted in another overthrow of the chariots. The Isr., entrenched in their hills, were slow in adopting cavalry and chariots. The Arabs of that day do not seem to have used the horse. In the account of the great raid of Zebah and Zalmunna (Jg 7. 8) no mention is made of horses. David began their use by reserving 100 of the chariots of N. Syria, with their horses (2 S 8[4]). Solomon increased this force by importations from Egypt, at a fixed price of 150 shekels for a cavalry horse, and 600 for a chariot and its three horses (1 K 10[28. 29]). He had 12,000 of the former and 1400 chariots, which, at three horses to a chariot, would make 4200 (cf. 1 K 10[26] with 4[26], where 40,000 should read 4000). When the kingdom was divided, the ten tribes, which held the plains of N. Pal., had many chariots. When nearly all their chariots and horses were taken in the great overthrow by the Syrians (2 K 13[7]) they never recovered from the blow. The small number of chariots possessed by the Judæan kingdom led to a constant reliance on Egypt for chariots and cavalry in the encounters with Syria and Assyria. Against this the prophets inveighed (Is 31[1], Ezk 17[15] etc., cf. Dt 17[16]). The cavalry and chariots of Assyria were esteemed the most formidable in the world, and are often mentioned in the prophets (Hab 1[8], Nah 3[2] etc.). The Jews brought back 736 horses from Babylon (Neh 7[68]). Horses were regularly employed in war in Pal. down to late Roman times. There was a chariot road to Egypt in the days of the apostles (Ac 8[28]), and there are abundant evidences of the use of these formidable engines of war in the cities E. of the Jordan, in the pass by the Nahr el-Kelb near Beirût, and in many other places in the land. It is probable that the present breed of Arabian horses are descendants of the very fine stock for which Assyria was famous. White horses (Rev 6^2 $19^{11.\ 14}$) were ridden by conquerors. Horses and chariots were dedicated to the sun by idolatrous kings (2 K 23^{11}). Horses had halters (Is 30^{28}) and bridles (Ps 32^9). The bridles were decorated with bells (Zec 14^{20}; Layard, Nin. ii. 29, 275). The horses were often not shod, hence the hardness of their hoofs (Is 5^{28}). Chariots and horses had rich trappings (Ezk 27^{20}). Saddles were rare (Layard, ii. 357).

HORSE GATE.—See Jerusalem.

HORSELEECH (עֲלוּקָה 'ălûḳah, βδέλλα, sanguisuga).—The obsolete Heb. root עָלַק corresponds to the Arab. 'aliḳa, which means to hang to. The Arab. generic name for leeches is 'ălaḳ, and for an individual 'ălaḳah. If we regard the creature intended as one of the annelids, 'ălûḳâh should be rendered leech rather than horseleech. Of the annelids found in Syria and Pal. the medicinal leech, Hirudo medicinalis, Sav., and the horseleech, Hæmopis sanguisorba, Sav., are the most common. There are also species of Bdella, Trochetia, and other genera of leeches, in the stagnant waters. They cling to the feet and legs of those who wade into such waters. They also infest the fountains and pools, and the watering-troughs of cattle, and attach themselves to the throat or nostrils of beasts and men. The tenacity with which they adhere is such that they must sometimes be pulled apart in order to detach them. The pertinacity with which they suck quite justifies the expression 'the 'ălûḳâh hath two daughters, Give, Give' (Pr 30^{15}). It is, however, possible that the allusion may be to the 'ălûḳ of the Arabs, the ghûl or female spectre, which they allege sucks blood like the vampire, and feeds on the flesh of the dead (see Wildeboer, ad loc.).

HORSELITTER.—Only 2 Mac 9^3 (φόριον [=φορεῖον], which is tr^{d} 'litter' in 3^{27}), RV 'litter' (which see). The word is used in Malory's Morte Darthur (Caxton's text) several times. Thus i. 3, 'So it was done as Merlin had devised, and they carried the king forth in a horse-litter with a great host towards his enemies'; and x. 37, 'Then came queen Morgan le Fay to Alisander, and bad him arise, and put him in a horse-litter: and gave him such a drink that in three days and three nights he waked never but slept.'

HORTICULTURE.—See Garden.

HOSAH (חֹסָה 'refuge'). — A Levitical doorkeeper of the temple, whose station was by the 'gate of Shallecheth,' 1 Ch 16^{38} $26^{10.\ 11.\ 16}$. See Genealogy, III. 39.

HOSAH (חֹסָה).—A city of Asher, apparently south of Tyre, Jos 19^{29}. The site is doubtful.

HOSANNA.—An acclamation used by the people on the occasion of our Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem. It occurs six times in the Gospels: twice (Mk 11^9, Jn 12^{13}) it stands absolutely, twice (Mt $21^{9.\ 15}$) it is followed by the dative ('to the Son of David'), and twice (Mt 21^9, Mk 11^{10}) by the adjunct 'in the highest'. The circumstance that in all three Gospels the words 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord,' from Ps 118^{26}, follow it, has given rise to the assumption that it is borrowed from the preceding verse of that psalm, which begins with 'ānnāh J" hoshî'āh nā, i.e. 'save, pray' (Sept. σῶσον δή). This v.^{25} of the psalm, according to the ritual of the temple, is said to have been repeated once on each of the first six days of the joyous Feast of Tabernacles during the solemn procession around the altar of burnt sacrifice and seven times on the seventh day (John Lightfoot, The Temple Service, etc., ch. xvi. § 2; De Sola and Raphall, Eighteen Treatises from the Mishna, 2nd ed., tr. Succah, ch. iv. § 5; M. Schwab, Le Talmud de Jérus. traduit, vol. vi. 33). This seventh day thus came to be called the 'Great Hosanna' (Buxtorf, Lex. 992) or 'Hosanna Day' (Zunz, Gottesdienstliche Vorträge, u.s.w. 2te Aufl. p. 395 n.; Dalman, Gram. d. jüdisch-palästin. Aramäisch, p. 198), and the name was transferred not merely to the prayers of the occasion, but also to the branches of palm trees and willows (Lv 23^{40}) which were carried and waved on that festivity. Similarly, in Christian usage, Palm Sunday, to which our Lord's entry has given name, has in certain periods and regions been called 'Hosanna Sunday' or 'Day of Hosannas,' or simply 'Osanna'; and the term has been applied to the 'Sanctus,' 'Tersanctus,' or 'Triumphal Hymn' (as it is variously called) sung by the people at the conclusion of the 'Eucharistic Preface' in all liturgies (C. E. Hammond, Liturgies Eastern and Western, 1878, p. 381; Bingham, Antiq. xiv. 2, 5); and later the extended use of the word gave rise, especially in the languages of Southern Europe, to such verbs as hosannare, oisisannare, etc., together with corresponding adjectives (see Ducange, Gloss. med. et. infim. Latin., ed. Favre, iii. 167 f.).

How the Hebrew term hos(h)î'āna—employed by Luther not only in his translation of the NT, but even in some editions of his translation of the Psalms (see Bindseil and Niemeyer's ed.), and adopted at first by Tindale in his NT of 1525 (ed. E. Arber, 1871)—became changed into hosana (-anna), those who hold this opinion are not quite agreed. Jerome, in his reply to the inquiry of Damasus about the meaning of the term (Opp. i. 375 ff., Ep. xx. in Migne, Patrol. Lat. xxii.), lets fall in one place the conjecture that the shorter form is an ignorant corruption (cf. Origen on Mt. l.c., ed. Lommatzsch, iv. 58). The more common supposition regards it as having arisen by syncope or contraction (Jerome as above; Levita, Tishbi, s.v.; and the commentators generally); or as a supposed Aramaic form (there is no root יְשַׁע in Aram.) of the verb with the pronominal suffix (meaning 'Save us.' See Kautzsch, Gram. des Bib.-Aram. 1884, p. 173, and, against this, Dalm. l.c.).

But though the words 'Blessed is he that cometh,' etc., are indubitably borrowed from Ps 118, and though vv.$^{22f.}$ of that psalm receive express Messianic reference both from our Lord (Mt 21^{42}, Mk 12^{11}, Lk 20^{17}) and St. Peter (Ac 4^{11}, 1 P 2^7), it may be doubted whether the rejoicing multitudes in the evangelic story were consciously indebted to the psalm or its use at the Feast of Tabernacles either for the cry 'Hosanna' or the festive demonstration with palm and other branches. To find the explanation of either word or act in the psalm and its use, involves the NT interpreter in grave embarrassments. The language of the psalm is supplicatory, that of the Gospels is jubilant. The psalmist's petition looks towards himself and those whom he represents (the English Pr. Bk. even follows the Vulg. in inserting the object 'me': Salvum me fac, 'Help me'); the Hosanna of the Gospels finds its expressed object in 'the Son of David.' This aspect of the case makes equally against discovering the original of our term in the Aramaic אוֹשַׁעְנָא 'Save us.' The obvious incongruity between the supplicatory sense and the tone of the narrative has driven expositors to jejune and far-fetched explanations: some, for example, by transposing the Greek, have extorted the rendering '(Saying) to the Son of David, Oh save'; or, by arbitrarily changing υἱῷ to υἱέ, 'O Son of David, save.' Others, resorting to the secondary sense of Hosanna, have taken the shout to mean 'Triumphal palms to the Son of David' (cf. Syr. Philox.). The phrase 'in the highest' also has been made to signify 'O thou that dwellest in the heavens,' or 'May our cry be ratified in heaven,' or 'taken up by the angels,' etc. The inappropriateness of finding an echo of the psalmist's supplication in the Hosanna of the Gospels is made only the more evident by adducing the ceremonies of the Feast of Tabernacles. For that feast occurred in the autumn; the triumphal entry in the spring. Consequently, some critics (e.g. Wünsche, Erläuterung der Evang. aus Talmud u. Midrasch, p. 241 n.) have felt compelled to assume that the Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles have been confounded in the Gospels, or that a usage of the latter festival has been arbitrarily transferred to the former. Nor is the difficulty relieved by the fact that shouts of joy and waving of palms had become usual at the Feast of Dedication as well as at the Feast of Tabernacles (2 Mac $10^{6.7}$). For as the Feast of Dedication occurred only two months later than the Feast of Tabernacles (cf. Jn 10^{22}), the chronological discord is thereby only slightly abated.

This extension of the jubilant usages of the Feast of Tabernacles, however, does seem to point in the right direction, and to set us free to follow the plain contextual indications of the evangelists' narrative. According to those indications, it is most natural to regard the word Hosanna, as respects its form, as neither syncopated nor contracted, but the shorter Hiphil imperative with the appended enclitic (הוֹשִׁיעָ־נָא; cf. Ps 86^{2}, Jer 31^{7}). For this form there is distinct Talmudic warrant (Dalman, Grammatik des jüdisch-palästi. Aramäisch, p. 198; Levy, Neuhbr. u. chald. Wörterbuch, i. 461; Schindler, Lexicon Pentaglot. ed. 1653, col. 819). As respects its force, we must, for the same contextual reasons, assume that it had already lost its primary supplicatory sense and become an ejaculation of joy or shout of welcome. As a quaint writer somewhat plumply puts the matter, 'It was a kind of holy hurrah'; and the 'Hosanna in the highest' corresponded roughly to our 'three times three.' Cf. the analogous Greek and Roman exclamations 'Ἰὴ παιάν,' 'Io triumphe, terque quaterque.' The waving of palms, etc., and strewing of the way with garments and branches find abundant precedents in ancient usage, including the Jewish: 2 Mac $10^{6.7}$ 14^{4}, 1 Mac 13^{51}, 2 K 9^{13}; Jos. Ant. XIII. xiii. 5; see Wetstein, Nov. Test. Græc. i. 460 f.; Keim, Jesu von Naz. iii. 89 n. 4 (Eng. trans. v. 107 n. 2); Schoettgen, Horæ Hebr. etc. on Mt 21^{8}. The general use of the palm among the Jews on joyous occasions is attested by extant coins: F. W. Madden, Coins of the Jews, Lond. 1881, p. 73.

This ejaculatory interpretation of Hosanna finds some confirmation in the post-biblical history of the word. Not without significance is the circumstance that down to quite modern times it was simply transliterated in versions of Scripture, not translated. The Anglo-Saxon versions seem to be the first to render it 'Hail' (see S. C. Malan, The Gosp. of St. John trans. from the eleven oldest versions, etc., 1862; J. Bosworth, Gothic and Anglo-Saxon Gospels, 1865). Yet Ciasca in his Latin version of the Arabic text of Tatian's Harmony renders it Laus, Gloria, and the Armenian Vulgate, Blessing (see Hill, S. Ephraem's Gospel Commentary, 1896, p. 110). The Didaché (10. 6) and the Apostolic Constitutions (8. 12, al. 13, p. 259, 17, ed. Lagarde; cf. 7. 26, p. 209, 26) attest its early liturgical use in churches of heathen origin; compare its doxological use, too, in the account by Hegesippus (in Euseb. HE II. xxiii. 14) of the martyrdom of James the brother of the Lord. Although it is correctly interpreted (σῶσον δή) in the Gospel of Nicodemus, ch. i. (ed. Thilo, p. 510 ff.; Gesta Pilati, A. c. i. 4, p. 210, ed. Tdf.), yet even Clement of Alex. (Pædag. I. v. 12) says it is equivalent in Greek to φῶς καὶ δόξα καὶ αἶνος, and the diversity of opinion on this point in intelligent Christian circles appears sufficiently in the correspondence between Damasus and Jerome referred to above. By the 10th cent. so thoroughly has its etymological meaning become obscured that Suidas or his annotator (see Gaisford's ed. vol. ii. col. 2794 b) can define it εἰρήνη καὶ δόξα, and add, 'Some say it signifies σῶσον δή; incorrectly.' Especially instructive are the comments of Augustine (in his Doctrina Christiana, ii. 11, Migne, xxxiv. col. 42, and Tract. in Johan. li. 2, Migne, xxxv. col. 1764): he says explicitly that the word is nothing more than an interjection of admiring joy, a term expressing an emotional mood, not a connected thought; and he contrasts it with 'Amen' and 'Hallelujah,' the intrinsic meaning of which evidently in his day still clung to them. The contrast he draws finds illustration in pseudo-Justin in the 5th cent. in his Responsio ad Quæst. 50 (Otto, Corp. apol. christ. ed. 3, vol. v. p. 74), where 'Hallelujah' is correctly interpreted 'Sing praise to the Eternal,' but 'Hosanna' is said to mean 'Transcendent majesty.' The practice of employing the phrase 'Hosanna in the highest' as a glad greeting—deprecated by Jerome on Mt 21^{15} (Opp. vii. col. 152, Migne, Patrol. Lat. xxvi.)—appears as late as A.D. 570, in the Itinerary of Antoninus (ed. Gildemeister, Berlin, 1889, § 40).

LITERATURE.—The discussions of the term are numerous, and widely scattered in commentaries and exegetical works. Specimens of the older may be seen in the Critici Sacri; in Poole's Synopsis; in Lampe on Jn 12^{13}; J. C. Wolf, Curæ, etc., on Mt 21^{9}, where numerous reff. are given. Worth consulting, also, are the 7th ch. of Gabriel Groddeck's essay on the Feast of Tabernacles in Ugolini's Thesaurus, etc. vol. xviii. p. 534 ff., and the note in F. B. Dach's ed. (1726) of the treatise Succah, ch. iv. § 5, p. 331 ff. Special essays on the word (or the triumphal entry) by Bindrim (1671), Winzer (1703), Zopf (1703), Nothdurfft (1713), Bucher (1728), Wernsdorf (1765), J. C. Pfaff (1789), J. M. H. Harras, J. G. Rau, Sauerbrei, J. G. Walch, and others, are catalogued; but they have not been accessible to the present writer.

i. NAME AND LIFE OF THE PROPHET.—The prophet Hosea (Heb. הוֹשֵׁעַ 'salvation,' Gr. Ὡσηέ, Lat. Osee, so AV Ro 9^{25}), whose name is identical with the original name of Joshua (Nu 13^{8}), and with that of the last king of Israel (AV Hoshea 2 K 15^{30}), was certainly a native of the Northern Kingdom, the condition and destiny of which he has in view throughout his prophecy. The references in the prophecy to Judah, though pretty numerous, are more incidental, and Jerusalem is nowhere mentioned.* Israel is 'the land' (1^{2}), its king is 'our king' (7^{5}), and it is 'the house of Jehu' on which the blood of Jezreel shall be visited, and 'the kingdom of the house of Israel' that shall be made to cease (1^{4}). It is the localities of the Northern Kingdom that are familiar to the prophet, Gilead and Tabor (5^1 6^8 12^{11}), Gibeah (5^8 9^9 10^9), Gilgal (4^{15} 9^{15} 12^{11}), Jezreel ($1^{4.5.11}$ 2^{22}), Ramah (5^8), Shechem (6^9), and particularly Bethel (4^{15} 5^8 $10^{5.8.15}$ 12^4) and Samaria (7^1 $8^{5.6}$ $10^{5.7}$ 13^{16}). In like manner it is the internal condition of Israel and the state of parties there to which allusion is made: the neglect and selfishness of the priests ($4^{5ff.}$ 5^1 8^{11}); the heathenish revelry of the people at the feasts (2^{13} 9^1), and their immoralities at the high places ($4^{13.14}$ 6^{10}); and the conspiracies, bloodshed, and anarchy that followed the death of Jeroboam—'all their kings are fallen' (7^7 13^{11}).*

* References to Judah are: $1^{7.\ 11}$ 3^{5} 4^{15} $5^{5.\ 10.\ 12-14}$ $6^{4.\ 11}$ 8^{14} 10^{11} 11^{12} 12^{2}. A number of these passages appear to disturb the connexion, and have been thought later insertions or alterations of the text.

Little is known of the prophet's history. His father was named Beeri (1^1), and he represents himself as taking to wife a woman called Gomer, who became the mother of several children, to whom he gave symbolical names prophetical of the destiny of his country (ch. 1). The rather obscure passage 9^8 may imply that he and others were exposed to persecution—'as for the prophet, the snare of a fowler is on all his ways, and enmity in the house of his God.' Whether the words of the previous verse, 'the prophet is a fool, the man of the spirit is mad,' be contemptuous language used by the people (2 K 9^{11}, Jer 29^{26}), to which the prophet replies: Yes, 'because of the multitude of thine iniquity, and the great enmity'; or whether the words be those of the prophet himself, expressing the distraction to which he was driven by the wickedness and hostility of the people Jer $23^{9ff.}$), is rather uncertain.

There is nothing to indicate with any certainty to what rank of life the prophet belonged. Duhm (Theol. d. Proph. 130 f.) has argued that he was probably a member of the priestly class, on account of his frequent references to the priests ($4^{6ff.}$ 5^1 6^9), to the Torah of God (4^6 8^{12}), to 'unclean things' (9^3, cf. 5^3 6^{10}), to 'abominations' (9^{10}), and to persecution 'in the house of his God' ($9^{7.8}$). He was certainly a man sufficiently educated to follow and estimate the politics of his country, whether at home or abroad (7^{1-11} $5^{13f.}$), and to pass judgment on the course the national history had taken from the beginning. If any inference could be drawn from the figures and comparisons in which the prophecy is so rich, it would be that the prophet, like Amos, belonged to the country rather than the city. Such images are: (a) those from wild beasts, the lion, panther, and bear (5^{14} 6^1 11^{10} $13^{7.8}$), and other creatures of the field, as the wild ass (5^9), and birds (7^{11} 9^{11} 11^{11}), and from the snares and pits employed in trapping them ($5^{1.2}$ 7^{12} 9^8). (b) Those from agricultural life, e.g. from stubborn cattle (4^{16} 9^{15}), the yoke and ways of easing it (11^4), harnessing, threshing, plowing, and harrowing ($10^{11ff.}$); from the operations of the husbandman, as sowing and reaping: 'sowing the wind' (8^7), 'sowing righteousness' ($10^{12ff.}$); from the corn floor (9^1 13^3), and the like. And in general (c) the imagery reflects country life, e.g. references to the vine and fig and the time when their fruit is choice (9^{10} 10^1), to the furrows of the field (10^4 12^{12}), the poppy (10^4), thorns and thistles (10^8), nettles (9^6), reeds (13^{15}), cf. the images in $2^{21ff.}$ $14^{5ff.}$); to the rains of the various seasons, the winter, early and latter rain (6^3 10^{12}), to the morning cloud and the early dew (6^4 13^3), to the swollen country brooks—'like a splinter on the face of the water' (10^7), and to the hot desert wind that smites the vegetation and leaves the fountain dry (13^{15}). Hosea is the only writer before Deut. (19^{14} 27^{17}) who refers to the removal of boundary stones in the fields (5^{10}). Whether this imagery warrants any conclusion regarding the prophet's position in life or not, it is evidence of a fine poetic sensibility, of profound sympathy with nature and love of creature life. The prophet lives in the things that are around him, sympathizing with the life in everything and feeling its charm. It is characteristic of his images that they are painted in a word and never developed. Those of them that refer to human life have usually something pathetic in them: Ephraim's decadence among the nations is like grey hairs coming up on the head of one old before his time (7^9); in his inability to grasp the crisis now come upon him, and use it as the entrance upon a larger life, he is like the child that dies on the threshold of birth (13^{13}). In His guidance of His people God has been like one that teaches a child to go (11^3). Ephraim must bring out his children to the murderer; more merciful would it be if God would deny them children, giving them a miscarrying womb and dry breasts (9^{11-14}). The pleasant homes of Ephraim shall be overgrown with nettles, his children shall be wanderers among the nations, and a foreign land shall bury them ($9^{6.17}$).

Jewish writers identify Beeri the father of Hosea with Beerah, a Reubenite prince carried captive by Tiglath-pileser (1 Ch 5^6). According to Christian tradition the prophet was of the tribe of Issachar, and from a place called Belemoth or Belemon (Baalmoth, Ephrem Syrus in Knobel, Prophetismus, ii. 154; the form Belemon has been compared with a place Balamon [RV], near Dothan, mentioned in Jth 8^3). A Jewish legend (in Carpzov, Introd.) states that the prophet died in Babylon, and was carried to Galilee and buried in Safed (Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, 227). According to another tradition he was a native of Gilead, and the grave of Nebi Osha (prophet Hosea) is shown near es-Salt (Baedeker, Palest. 337).

ii. THE PROPHET'S TIME.—Chs. 1–3 contain references to events and prophecies of the time of Jeroboam II., though written later; while much in chs. 4–14 reflects the period of disorder that followed his death. The chronology of the period is obscure. The annals of Tiglath-pileser state that Menahem paid tribute to Assyria in 738 (2 K 15^{19}); this must have been towards the end of his reign (said to have lasted about ten years, 2 K 15^{17}); and as his two predecessors reigned only 7 months in all, Jeroboam's death must have occurred c. 746–745. Hosea's ministry therefore began some time previous to this date (1^4). The prophet's career probably closed before 735–734, the date of the Syro-Ephraimitic invasion of Judah, as he makes no allusion to this event, nor yet to the deportation of northern Israel by Tiglath-pileser in 734. Gilead is still an integral part of Israel (5^1 6^8 12^{11}), and Assyria is not spoken of as an enemy but as a delusive support (5^{13} 7^{11} 8^9 $12^{1.2}$ 14^3). The title 'king Jareb' (LXX Ἰαρείμ) given to the king of Assyria (5^{13} 10^6) remains obscure. (See JAREB.) Not less obscure is 10^{14} 'as Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel.' If Shalman were a shorter form of Shalmaneser, reference might be to Shalmaneser III. (783–773), though the period of his reign is rather remote. Others consider* that Shalmaneser IV. (727–722) is referred to, and regard the words as a later gloss. Nothing is known of any operation of Shalmaneser IV. against a place Beth-arbel, and it is by no means certain that Shalman is a contraction for Shalmaneser.* Even if the word 'Judah' be genuine in 5^{13} (which there may be some reason to doubt, as it is not repeated in the parallelism), the passage does not say that Judah had recourse to Assyria for help as Ephraim did, and contains no allusion to the appeal of Ahaz to Tiglath-pileser. The reference to the kings of Judah in the heading (1^1) is no doubt from the hand of a later editor (cf. Is 1^1, Mic 1^1). The first part of the title, 'The word of the LORD which came to Hosea, the son of Beeri,' may be older; at any rate the name Beeri is historical. The name 'Jeroboam' may be an inference from 1^4 'the house of Jehu,' and be due to the hand which inserted the names of the kings of Judah. If this is not the case, the title must be restricted to chs. 1–3; but there is little probability that these chapters were put out or ever existed separately. Chs. 1–3 appear rather an introductory programme to 4–14, expressing the principle or essential conception of the prophet's teaching, and showing how it was symbolized in his personal experience. Though referring to events in the early part of the prophet's career, chs. 1–3 contain the result of reflection on his whole history and teaching, and in date of composition may be the latest part of the book. The only thing that might seem opposed to this conclusion is the fact that in chs. 1–3 there is no reference to the dynastic revolutions often alluded to in chs. 4–14. But chs. 1–3 are meant to present the prophet's fundamental conception, which is that of the conjugal tie between J" and Israel, and Israel's unfaithfulness to this tie; and this unfaithfulness, which is a state of the mind, 'a spirit of whoredom,' is most conspicuous in the cultus (though cf. 3^4 'without king,' etc.).

Hosea may have heard Amos, he must at least have heard of him and of his teaching, but there is hardly any trace in his book of the earlier prophet's influence. Such parallels as have been cited are entirely inconclusive, e.g. the following (the passages from Amos are placed second): 4^3, 8^8; 5^5, 8^7; 5^7, 7^4; 9^3, 7^{17}; 10^4, 6^{12}; 10^8, 7^9; 12^8, 8^5; $12^{10f.}$, $2^{10f.}$. Ch. 4^{15} is certainly an echo of Am 5^5, but the verse is in disorder, and its originality doubtful. In other places Bethaven for Bethel (5^8 10^5) may be uncertain, as copyists sometimes made the change (e.g. LXX has Bethaven in 12^4). Ch. 8^{14} ends with a favourite refrain of Amos, but the words are suspicious.

* Whether such forms as תִּרְנִיל 11^3, קָאם 10^{14}, אַיֵּה where? 13^{14} be examples of northern dialect may be doubtful.

iii. The Prophet's Book.—The book has two divisions, chs. 1–3 and chs. 4–14. Chs. 1–3 set forth the history or parable of the prophet's marriage to a woman who became unfaithful, with the moral of the story, which is the love-relation of J″ to Israel, and Israel's unfaithfulness to this relation. The story is told in chs. 1. 3, the exposition of it is given in ch. 2. In chs. 1–3 the prophet has abstracted from his prophetic speeches and career the essential conception of his teaching and set it as a kind of programme at the head of his book. Chs. 4–14 are more a reflection of his prophetic ministry as it was actually exercised, though the chapters have also been written or redacted under the influence of his fundamental idea (cf. for evidence chs. 4–6).

A. First Division.—Chs. 1–3.—'In the beginning when J″ spake to Hosea, J″ said to Hosea, Go, take a wife of whoredoms, and children of whoredoms. And he went and took Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim.' A 'wife of whoredoms' does not mean a woman already a sinner; nor yet a woman with a propensity to unchastity, a sense which the words could not bear. A 'wife of whoredoms' is explained by 'children of whoredoms.' The children did not yet exist; they were born in the prophet's house, for Hosea did not marry a woman with a family; and in like manner the woman when taken was not yet that which she afterwards became. If the events be real, the words are written from a much later period in the prophet's history. Looking back on his experiences with Gomer, and all that he had suffered and learned through them, Hosea felt that his impulse to take this woman to wife was the beginning of J″'s speaking to him (cf. Jer 32^8). Whether the events were real or not, chs. 1–3 were probably written at a late period of Hosea's life.

Gomer bare a son, and the Lord said, 'Call his name Jezreel, for I will visit the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu' (1^4). The blood of Jezreel refers to the murder by Jehu of all the descendants of Ahab and the whole house of Omri (2 K 10). The name Jezreel is used merely to recall the deed of blood. It is an ominous sound, a knell rung in the ears of Jeroboam and the nation to awaken the sense of guilt and the presentiment of retribution. Again, Gomer bore a daughter, and the Lord said, 'Call her name Lo-ruhamah ('unpitied'), for I will no more have pity on the house of Israel' (1^6). Finally, she bore a son who was called Lo-ammi ('not-my-people'), 'for ye are not my people, and I will not be your God' (1^9). The three names suggest the three successive steps in the destruction of the inhabitants of the land: Jezreel calling to remembrance the blood that lies on the land; Lo-ruhamah pointing to a condition of Israel, when, no more pitied by J″, she shall be delivered over to calamity and her enemies; and Lo-ammi indicating that the people shall be driven out of Canaan, the house of J″, and go into exile.

Ch. 3 attaches itself to ch. 1^{1-9}. The last symbolical word in ch. 1 was Lo-ammi, pointing to a divorce by J″ of His people, or at least a casting of them out of His house. Ch. 3 continues the history. 'And the Lord said unto me,—

Again, go love a woman, loved of a paramour and an adulteress,

As J″ loveth the children of Israel, though they turn to other gods.'

The woman whom Hosea is bidden again go love is of course the same woman Gomer of the first chapter. She is a woman loved of a paramour and an adulteress. The word Lo-ammi (1^9) suggests the unrecorded step in the history: the woman had fled or been driven from the prophet's house and become the slave-concubine of another. He is bidden renew his love to her. So he acquired her again to himself for a small price (that of a slave, Ex 21^{32}), returning to her in mind, but deferring for a long time to return to her in union (3^3). The explanation is added: 'The children of Israel shall remain many days without king, and without sacrifice,' etc. The Lord's love continues with His people, whom He shall keep in long restraint and discipline in exile, till their mind change and they seek Him. Ch. $2^{2ff.}$ is the exposition of this history: (1) Israel's whoredoms with the baals (the calf images, which are no God, 8^6), vv. $^{2-5}$; (2) her perplexities when 'unpitied,' vv. $^{6-13}$; (3) her exile and discipline in the wilderness, vv. $^{14-18}$; and (4) her change of mind and new espousals and obtaining of mercy for ever, vv. $^{19-23}$. Though ch. 3 be appended somewhat loosely, it supplies an essential step in the story, and its contents are drawn into the exposition ch. 2^{14-23}.

The Marriage of Hosea.—Various opinions have been held on this subject. 1. It has been supposed that Hosea allied himself with a woman already known as a sinner, with the view of reclaiming her. It is very difficult to believe either that the prophet should do such a thing, or that he should represent himself as commanded by God to do it. It is a different thing when he seeks to reclaim the woman afterwards (3^1), and represents his efforts to do so as the command of God, because she was then his wife. Moreover, the representation that the woman was already a sinner when taken to wife does not suit the symbolism. It is the view of the prophet and all the early prophets that Israel was pure in the first time of her union to J″, and only corrupted herself later. The Lord says, 'I found Israel like grapes in the wilderness,' a figure suggesting His delight in her (9^{10}); and in Jer 2^2 He says, 'I remember of thee the kindness of thy youth, thy bridal love, how thou didst follow me in the wilderness.' Though this view was formerly advocated, and deserves mention because supported by Pusey, it has probably few adherents now.

2. It has been maintained by many that the whole story is an allegory. Neither the arguments for this view nor those against it are of much force. (1) It is argued that prophets often represent themselves as commanded to perform actions which, from the nature of the case, could not really have been performed (Ezek $4^{2ff.}$). The actions were ideal; their meaning was easily seen when they were described; and they had no existence except in the idea and the description. All this is true; but it is equally true that prophets, particularly in early times, did sometimes perform real actions having a symbolical meaning (1 K 22^{11}, Jer 28^{10}). (2) The fact that the names of the children, Jezreel, Lo-ruhamah, and Lo-ammi, are significant makes neither for nor against the allegorical interpretation. Real children might have been given symbolical names, as was the case with Isaiah's sons (7^3 8^1). On the other hand, no symbolical meaning has been discovered for the name of the mother, Gomer. (3) The argument of Ewald, and others after him, that the prophet would have made himself ridiculous if he had published such a pitiful narrative about himself all the while that his wife was virtuous and his domestic relations happy, has little force. If his hearers understood that he spoke a parable, they would not have given a thought either to himself or his wife, but have attended only to the moral of his tale. (4) The statement so often repeated, that there is nothing to suggest that the prophet is not narrating an actual history, will not be acquiesced in by everyone. When it is said, 'Go, take a wife of whoredoms, for the land committeth whoredom against the Lord' (1^2); and then, 'Again go love a woman, an adulteress, as J″ loveth the children of Israel, while they turn to other gods' (3^1), the first impression produced by the words is that the actions commanded were not real, but meant merely to clothe an idea. Cf. the exposition $2^{2ff.}$.

3. It is held by many that a certain substratum of fact underlies the prophet's narrative. The chief arguments for this view are, first, that it is more in harmony with the realism of ancient prophecy to suppose that Hosea alludes, however reservedly, to a fact, than that he is putting forth a mere literary fable; secondly, that no symbolical meaning can be discovered in Gomer-bath-Diblaim, which must therefore be the name of an actual person; and thirdly, that we have thus an explanation of the origin of the prophet's central conception of the love-relation of J″ to His people and their unfaithfulness. The conception was suggested by the prophet's own experiences. Some such miserable history as he narrates had befallen him. His wife had gone astray, sharing the common corruption of morals about her. What had happened to him was not an individual case. It was not individuals that were corrupt, the corruption was general—Israel was corrupt. And meditating on his history he saw in it a reflection of the history of J″ and His people, of His love and Israel's insensibility to it. And reflecting further on it, the conviction forced itself upon him that it was not an accident or a misfortune that had brought him through such painful experiences, it was God's providential way of revealing to him His own heart towards His people—his impulse to take this woman to wife was the beginning of J″'s speaking to him (1^{2}).

The attempt to fit this theory into the prophet's life is not without difficulty. (1) The prophet's taking Gomer to wife was due to his own natural impulse; it was not till much later that he concluded that the impulse had been prompted by God. The same must be said of his return in love to her after she had left his house (ch. 3): it was due to his own unchanging affection; and it was only later reflection that led him to interpret his own act as the command of God. (2) But now, these events must have covered a good part of the prophet's life. The birth and weaning of three children, according to the habits of Heb. mothers, would occupy 6 to 10 years; and when to this is added the time during which the woman was away from the prophet's home and under the protection of another, and the time occupied in recovering her, it will appear that not much short of the whole prophetic life of Hosea is covered. (3) It is of some consequence to ask, When did his wife's infidelity become known to the prophet? Wellhausen, who claims to have given the cue to the interpretation both of Kuenen and W. R. Smith, argues, and surely rightly, that it was not till after the birth of his first child. But if so, it was not his misfortunes that gave Hosea his prophetic word. Israel's apostasy was plain to him, and he foreshadowed her doom in Jezreel, the name of his first child, before any misfortunes overtook him. At most, his misfortunes may at a later time have given a complexion to his prophetic thoughts. (4) Wellh. (followed by Nowack) appears to think that Gomer's unfaithfulness was discovered before the birth of the other two children. There is really no evidence on the point. There is certainly none in the names of the children, for Lo-ruhamah and Lo-ammi are names having a purely objective reference to the impending fate of Israel; there is not the slightest evidence that they express any feeling on the part of the father toward the children, or any dislike of them as of doubtful parentage. It is hard to believe that Hosea would have continued to retain an adulteress in his house. It is said that 'he concealed the shame of their mother and acknowledged her children as his own, hiding his bitter sorrow in his own heart' (W. R. Smith, Prophets, 179, cf. 183). If he concealed the shame at the time, he certainly took effectual pains to proclaim it to all the world soon afterwards. It would be more natural to suppose that it was only after all the children were born that the woman's character was revealed to the prophet, either through her desertion or in some other way, and that then for the first time he could use the bitter words, 'a wife of whoredom and children of whoredom.' Even the passage 4^{14} leaves any other view improbable.

It is not of much consequence for the interpretation of the prophet's book whether we suppose his marriage real or parabolical. In any case his conception of the relation of J″ to Israel is clear. If the story is a parable, it evidently helped Hosea's mind in conceiving the divine relation to imagine a human analogy to it. And many scholars have felt that it helped them to realize his idea and how he reached it to suppose the story historical:—to fancy a man of the prophet's depth and sensitiveness of nature united to a light woman, who could not even understand a mind and love like his; his anguish and desolateness on discovering how things were; and yet, amidst whatever inward struggles, his patience and self-forgetfulness, and the unchanging trueness of his affection, which could not let his wife go, but sought her out in order to recover her from her evil. Such a history of his own, it is thought, helps to explain the colour which he has thrown over the relation of J″ to His people—the human and moral and personal colour which he gives to the relation.

One or two general considerations may be stated. (1) Israel's unfaithfulness and declension must have been patent to Hosea apart from any history of his own, as it was to Amos and to Elijah a century earlier. And J″'s constant goodness must have been equally patent, as it was to Amos (2^{9-11}) and to Isaiah (1^{2}). And the fatal issues of the people's ingratitude must have also been clear. These general truths needed no particular history of his own to impress them on Hosea. (2) It is not therefore these ideas of the relation of J″ to Israel that are peculiar to Hosea, but the conception of the marriage tie under which the relation has been brought. Wellhausen considers the conclusion 'unavoidable' that something in the prophet's experience must have suggested this new idea (Kl. Proph. p. 105). But there was little in it new. It was customary to regard the community or land as mother of the inhabitants; to regard the god as the 'baal,' i.e. lord or husband of the land; and also to regard the inhabitants as his children (Nu 21^{29}). It therefore 'lay very near to think of the god as the husband of the worshipping nationality or mother land. It is not at all likely that the conception was in form original to Hosea or even peculiar to Israel' (W. R. Smith, Proph. 171; cf. RS 92 ff.). The idea was so current that Hosea makes Israel express it, 'I will return to my first husband' (2^{7}), and again, 'Thou shalt no more call me my baal' (2^{16}). It did not therefore need any experiences of the prophet's own to suggest this idea to him. (3) What is strange rather is that he did not reject the idea, considering its associations. He has retained it, and what is new in him lies in this, that he lifts the conception of the marriage relation of God and people out of the nature-sphere, to which it originally belonged, into the moral sphere, and gives it developments of surprising depth and tenderness. No one will affirm that domestic experiences of his own were necessary to this, and no one need deny that they might have been helpful. Even on the latter supposition, it must have been some higher influence that enabled him to make the transition from his own history to that of God and the people, for it was not just every good man with a bad wife in Israel that perceived in his own experiences a reflection of the history of God with His people, and forthwith became a prophet. (4) The question is not without wider connexions. There may be a risk of attributing too much to circumstances and too little to mental idiosyncrasy in the prophets, and of forgetting that they had stable convictions regarding God, and were not dependent on incidents for their ideas of Him. Hosea's conception of God is very unlike that of Amos, but every line of his book proves that he was very unlike Amos in type of mind. There may also be a risk of allowing our general views of the stage of religious development reached by Israel in this age to modify our particular views of Hosea's teaching. If we suppose that Hosea is the first to reach the profound thoughts of the spirituality and love of God which he sets forth, we shall welcome any incident or occasion in his life which just at this time suggested such thoughts. But his allusions to the history of Israel do not suggest that he came with an idea of God learned from some other source which he read into the history. He does not read the love of God into the history, he reads it out of it. It is the history that has taught him what J″ is (9^{10} $11^{1ff.}$ $12^{9ff.}$ $13^{4f.}$).

B. Second Division.—Chs. 4–14.—Attempts have been made to divide these chapters into sections illustrating particular ideas, but without success. Ewald found three sections—first, the arraignment, 4^{1}–6^{11a}; second, the punishment, 6^{11b}–9^{9}; and third, retrospect of the earlier history, exhortation, and comfort, 9^{10}–14^{10}. Driver (LOT[6] 303) finds the thought of Israel's guilt to predominate in 4–8; her punishment in 9^{1}–11^{11}; while both ideas are combined in chs. 12. 13, with a glance into the brighter future in ch. 14. But in truth the passage is scarcely divisible; it consists of a multitude of variations all executed on one theme, Israel's apostasy or unfaithfulness to her God. This unfaithfulness is a condition of the mind, 'a spirit of whoredoms,' and is revealed in all the aspects of Israel's life, though particularly in three things: (1) The cultus, which, though ostensibly service of J″, is in truth worship of a being altogether different from Him; (2) the internal political disorders, the changes of dynasty, all of which have been effected with no thought of J″ in the people's minds; and (3) the foreign politics, the making of covenants with Egypt and Assyria, in the hope that they might heal the internal hurt of the people, instead of relying on J″ their God. The three things are not independent, the one leads to the other. The fundamental evil is that there is 'no knowledge of God in the land,' no true conception of Deity. He is thought of as a nature-god, and this conception exercises no restraint on the passions or life of the people; hence the social immoralities and the furious struggles of rival factions; and these, again, lead to the appeal for foreign intervention. The prophet sometimes couples (1) and (2) together, as in $8^{4ff.}$, and sometimes (2) and (3), as in 5^{13} 12^{1}. Chs. 4–13 are one long indictment of Israel and threat of punishment; a few passages illustrating the unchanging love of J″ at the beginning (9^{10} 11^{1}), and all through the people's history ($11^{3.4}$, cf. 2^{8}), only throw their unfaithfulness into deeper shadow.*

(1) The Cultus.—Chs. 4–6 are mainly devoted to the cultus, though it is often alluded to all through the chapters ($8.$ 9^{1} $10^{1.6.8}$ 11^{2} 13^{2}). The term 'whoredom' is specially applied to the cultus. The idea may have been suggested by the gross immoralities practised at the sanctuaries ($4^{13.14}$), or it may be a corollary from the conception of the marriage relation of J″ to Israel. The cultus is whoredom or unfaithfulness, because, whatever be the name which the people give the god they serve, he is another than J″. There is 'no knowledge of God in the land'; under the name of J″ they are worshipping a baal. The feasts of J″ are 'the days of the baals' (2^{13}), the local Jehovahs are baals. They are not the true husband of Israel, but 'her lovers' or paramours; she goes after them and forgets J″ ($2^{5.13}$). Israel is a harlot, following her 'lovers' for the hire which they give her on all the corn-floors (9^{1} 2^{5}). The judgment of Hosea is that the genuine Israelitish spiritual conception of J″ has been changed, and another conception substituted for it. He goes further, and asserts that the people are not unconscious of the change: 'I will return to my first husband' (2^{7}, cf. 5^{15} $6^{1ff.}$). The conception of J″ that has taken the place of the true idea of Him is that of a local nature-god, from whom nothing higher is expected than the fruits of nature (2^{5} 9^{1}), and who seeks nothing in return but such nature gifts (5^{6}). But this is not J″. He desires piety (or goodness, חֶסֶד), not sacrifices (6^{6}); He has no pleasure in the flesh which they sacrifice and eat (8^{13}). His service is that of the mind and life. Such has been their God from the land of Egypt (12^{9} 13^{4}), who has continuously spoken to them by His prophets, for by a prophet J″ brought up Israel from the land of Egypt, and by a prophet was he preserved; and He has multiplied visions ($12^{9f.13}$). The ritual cultus, because of the perverted notion that it is what J″ desires, is 'sin' (4^{8}): Ephraim multiplies altars to sin (8^{11} 10^{8}). And it is the priests, whose office it was to instruct the people in the true knowledge of God, who are responsible for the people's ignorance. They themselves have rejected knowledge (4^{6}). For interested reasons they foster the people's propensity to sensuous service: 'They feed upon the sin of my people'—the sacrificial cultus (4^{8}). And it is in vain that J″ writes or might write moral Torahs ever so many, revealing the 'knowledge' of Him; they are accounted a foreign thing (8^{12}). A 'spirit of whoredom' possesses the people. Their mind is wholly away from J″ as He truly is.

Hosea's judgment is that the religion of Israel has become Canaanitized; it is the old native gods that are worshipped, though under the name of J″. The Dionysiac revelry at the feasts is not Israelitish, it is that of 'the peoples,' the heathen (9^{1}). He hardly ascribes real existence to the baals, it is a distinction of conceptions of J″ which he draws. As for the 'calves,' he will not allow that they have any relation to J″—'a workman made it: it is no god' (8^{5}). Its wooden kernel shall become splinters, and its gold hull shall be a present to king Jareb (8^{5} 10^{6}). With mock sympathy he describes the people and priests of Samaria as 'mourning' over its fate (10^{5}), and makes merry over the spectacle of human worshippers kissing calves! (13^{2}). But though the loss of 'knowledge of God' be the worst form of Israel's declension and the source of all other forms of it,—for religion ramifies into all the channels of life, and the nature-god instead of restraining human passions is rather served by the indulgence of them ($4^{2.13.14}$),—Hosea sometimes suggests a broader ground for Israel's corruption. It was due to their entrance upon the Canaanite civilization: 'according to the goodness of his land they made goodly images' (10^{1} 4^{11} 11^{2} $13^{2.6}$). In their whole mind the people has become Canaanitized: 'He is Canaan; the balances of deceit are in his hand' ($12^{7f.}$). Not till all the forms of Canaanitish life be swept away (2^{3}) and Israel have again to go through the wilderness will she learn to know J″ as the chief good, and respond to Him as in the days of her youth ($2^{14.15}$ 12^{9}, cf. Jer 2^{2}). See iv.

(2) The Internal Misrule.—Whether Hosea directly calls the internal political condition 'whoredom' is not quite certain. He does so name the external politics: making alliances abroad is 'hiring loves' (8^{9}). And there was no reason why he should not have given the same name to the internal politics, for 'whoredom' is less particular actions than a state of the mind, indifference to J″. In 8^{4} 'setting up kings' and making images are coupled together, and perhaps called 'their two transgressions' (10^{10}). The term 'to be unfaithful' (בגד) appears used both of political and religious defection (5^{7} 6^{7}, possibly 10^{9} for 'stood'). The term 'adulterers' (7^{4}) hardly refers to political immorality, but J″ complains of the people that 'they have departed from him' and 'speak lies against him' (7^{13}), that they surround Him with lies and deceit (11^{12}), and multiply lies and violence (11^{7} 12^{1} 13^{16}). They are untrue to J″; they make and unmake kings, with no regard to Him or the principles of His religion: 'They have set up kings but not by me, princes and I knew it not' (8^{4}); 'all their kings are fallen, there is none among them that calleth upon me' (7^{7}). The 'pride' (גְּאוֹן) of Israel, i.e. his self-confidence and indifference to J″, testifieth to his face (5^{5} 7^{10}).

The picture which the prophet draws of the internal condition of the kingdom in his day is a terrible one. Jeroboam, who is supposed to have died c. 746–5, was succeeded by his son Zechariah, who, after a reign of six months, was assassinated by Shallum. The murderer was able to maintain himself no more than a month, when he was attacked and slain in Samaria by Menahem. In all likelihood Menahem would have shared the same fate at the hand of some other conspirator but for the assistance of Pul, king of Assyria, to whom he paid 1000 talents of silver that his hand might be with him to confirm the kingdom in his hand (2 K 15^{19}). As an Assyrian vassal (5^{13} 7^{11} 8^{9} 12^{1}) Menahem was able to maintain himself for some years against other factions, which probably sought the help of Egypt (7^{11} 8^{13} $9^{3.6}$ 11^{5}). Under the long and successful reign of Jeroboam the country had advanced greatly in material prosperity. There were ample resources in the land to nourish the various factions, and they struggled with one another with a fury which the prophet can compare to nothing but the raging heat of an oven, though the figure contains the darker trait of a long-sighted policy which suppressed the fire till the time came to let it blaze out (7^{4-7}). Society appears completely dissolved: there is nothing but 'false swearing, and murder, and stealing, and committing adultery,' and one deed of blood follows on the heels of another (4^{2}). The prophet alludes to incidents which would be understood by his hearers, though they are obscure to us. We cannot identify that scene of revelry and possibly regicide which signalized 'the day of our king' (7^{5}); nor tell why Gilead (Gilgal?) is said to be 'tracked with blood' (6^{8} 12^{11}); nor why it is said that 'all their wickedness is in Gilgal' (9^{15}); nor what is meant by 'transgressing the covenant,' nor what there refers to (6^{7}); nor explain the allusion, 'the company of priests murder in the way to Shechem' (6^{9}); nor what is meant when the rulers and priests are charged with being 'a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread on Tabor' (5^{1}). These and other allusions, such as to 'the days of Gibeah' (9^{9} 10^{9}), are obscure, but they indicate that internal convulsions were breaking the nation to pieces (5^{10} $7^{1.9}$ 8^{8}).*

* How entirely threats pervade chs. 4–13 may be seen from these passages: $4^{16ff.}$ 19 $5^{5.8.9.10}$ $7^{12.16}$ $8^{1.3.5.6.13}$ 9^{1-6} $9^{7.11.15.17}$ 10^{1-8} 10^{9-15} $11^{5.6.7}$ $12^{2.9.14}$ 13^{1-4} 13^{5-8} 13^{9-11} $13^{12f.}$.

When Hosea assails 'king and princes,' he is scarcely condemning monarchy in principle as a form of government incompatible with the idea of the theocracy. His judgment is practical and historical, not theoretical. As a matter of history, and particularly in the prophet's day, the monarchy has failed to secure the peace and well-being of the people: 'Where now is thy king that he may save thee, and thy princes that they may deliver thee?' (13^{10}). It has, on the contrary, been the constant source of faction and anarchy. It is the motives and methods of setting up and deposing dynasties that Hosea condemns, of which the revolution of Jehu is an example (1^{4}). It is true that in his picture of the final condition of Israel (2^{18-23} 14) the king finds no place; but this is due to his personification of the community, and his thinking not of its form but of its mind. Following the Targum, some scholars interpret 'the days of Gibeah' (9^{9} 10^{9}) of the election of Saul; but though Saul belonged to Gibeah he was not made king there, but at Mizpah according to one tradition (1 S $10^{17ff.}$), or at Gilgal according to another (1 S 11^{15}). Hosea speaks of the days of Gibeah as signalized by some crime (10^{9}), though the story of Jg 19 ff. scarcely corresponds to his allusions. At any rate, his reprobation of 'king and princes' must not be read as merely a condemnation of the 'schism' of the North; his idea is much wider and more general. He is weary of Politics. His ideal is already that of the Church of God.

(3) External Politics.—Reliance on foreign help is also 'unfaithfulness' to J'' (8^{9}). The love of J'' elevates the subject of it into a personality. Corresponding to His mind there must be another mind, with a sense of benefit and capacity for affection. And when Israel leans on foreign powers, this reveals not only distrust of J'', but alienation of mind from Him, and dissatisfaction with the whole range of affections and duties which the relation to J'' imposes.

To the prophet the issue of all this is certain: J'' will drive Israel out of His house (9^{15}). Hosea has no clear idea of the instrument or means of Israel's destruction. It is 'the sword' (7^{16} 11^{6}), the 'enemy' (8^{3} $5^{8.9}$); or it is natural, internal decay ($7^{8.9}$ 9^{16}), the moth and rottenness (5^{12}), Israel shall be made to go through the wilderness (2^{14}); but they shall also eat unclean things in Assyria (9^{3} 8^{9}); and again, Egypt shall gather them, Moph shall bury them (9^{6} 7^{11} 8^{13} 9^{3} 11^{5}); and again, they shall be wanderers among the nations (9^{17} 10^{10}). The question sometimes put, whether it was the prospect of national overthrow that impressed upon the prophets the national sin, or the sin that led them to forecast the overthrow, receives a ready answer so far as Hosea is concerned. He perceives that apostasy from J'' contains destruction in it (7^{13} 13^{9}?), that moral law operates as infallibly as natural law: 'they have sown the wind and reap the whirlwind' (8^{7}), 'ye have plowed wickedness, ye have reaped iniquity' (10^{13}; cf. on the other hand 10^{12}); unchastity tends not to increase but to childlessness ($9^{10ff.}$ 4^{10}); Egypt and Assyria whose help they seek shall swallow them up.

iv. Some General Ideas.—(1) God and Religion.—J'' is God: 'there is no knowledge of God' has for parallel 'they do not know J''' (5^{4}, cf. 2^{20}). His nature as revealed in Israel's history is Love. It was in love that He redeemed them from Egypt: 'when Israel was a child I loved him' (11^{1}); and He has an emotional delight in the object of His love (9^{10}). His love has followed Israel all through their history ($11^{3.4}$ 7^{15}); even His chastisements are not without love—'I will speak to her heart' (2^{14} 3); and their restoration and everlasting peace will be due to His love (14^{4} $2^{18ff.}$ cf. $11^{8ff.}$). J'' is spiritual, and religion is piety ($6^{4.6}$): it is a state of the mind, not external service. It is partly this feeling of the inwardness of religion that leads to the prophet's personification of the community. He thinks of the community as a personal mind, an individual soul, in its relation to God and in His relation to it, with all the mutual, mystical interchange of thoughts and affections towards each other of the two minds. And it was in the wilderness at the Exodus that this true religious relation was perfectly realized, when Israel possessed nothing, through no medium, but mind to mind. And it is in the wilderness that it shall be perfectly realized again, when Israel, destitute of all sacramental tokens of J''s favour, land, corn, and wine, shall feel that she possesses Himself, and shall respond as in the days of her youth (2^{15}). Such a surprisingly inward conception of religion implies two things: first, that the commonplaces of Israel's faith must have been long familiar, such as J''s redemption of His people, His constant goodness, the freeness of His choice of them, and the moral nature of His whole relation to them (cf. reference to covenant 8^{1} and fatherhood 11^{1}), together perhaps with the consciousness on Israel's part that it had declined to a lower stage of religious life than it once occupied (2^{7}). And secondly, that the prophet transcends the stage of religion reached in OT times, and anticipates a more perfect future. In his day the religious unit or subject was the community, but his personification of the community as an individual soul implies that his conception of religion requires a true personal subject—that only the individual mind can be truly in religious communion with God.

(2) The People.—The history of the patriarchal age and of the Exodus might almost be constructed out of Hosea's allusions. This history is his Bible, where he finds the texts of his homilies. Israel is to him a moral person, and it is not so much her actions as her mind towards J'' that he has regard to. He has, however, the idea that a course of conduct leads to a state of mind in which amendment is hopeless; as, on the other hand, the state of mind reveals itself in all manner of insensate actions—'Ephraim is joined to idols: let him alone' (4^{17}); 'my people ask counsel at their stocks, for a spirit of whoredom causeth them to err' (4^{12} $5^{3.4}$). They have better moments when the thought of a return to J'' fascinates them ($6^{1ff.}$); but it is a passing emotion like the morning cloud, a dramatic ideal which they have not depth and earnestness to realize ($7^{14.16}$). J'' is at His wits' end with them (6^{4}). On account of his conception of Israel as a moral person, Hosea draws no distinction between classes among the people. It is Israel His spouse whom J'' drives out of His house, and it is she whom He again betrothes to Himself for ever (2^{19} 14). Hosea confines his eschatology to the destiny of Israel; the nations find no place in his picture of the end. It was the Assyrian empire that brought the idea of the world, the nations, before the prophets' minds, and Hosea had probably passed away before Assyria closely touched on Israel. His prophecy ends with the prediction of the restoration, the holy beauty and eternal endurance of God's people: 'they shall bloom like the lily, and cast forth their roots like Lebanon' (14^{5}).

Comparisons of one prophet with another are usually unjust to one of the two compared. Amos' mind is filled with great general ethical principles, valid eternally and enforcing themselves universally whether in heaven or on earth; Hosea starts from a religious relation of J'' and people, historically formed, the mutual, mystical intimacies of which engross his thoughts. It is less in ideas than in apt terms to express them that the prophets advance on one another. Am. speaks of the goodness of J'', Hos. first calls it 'love'; Am. inculcates compassion, 'humanity,' Hos. first finds the right word for this (חֶסֶד 4^{1}). On the other hand, while Hos. laments the want of trust in J'' revealed in the foreign alliances of Israel, it is Isaiah that first uses the positive word 'faith' (7^{9}). And again, though Hos. expresses the idea of the 'new covenant' when he speaks of J'' betrothing Isr. again to Himself (2^{19}), it is Jer. that coins the right phrase.

v. Integrity and Text.—Jerome already described Hosea's style as commaticus—consisting of short clauses. His fondness for asyndetous construction gives a monotonous, dirge-like music to his verses—'the days of visitation are come; the days of recompense are come' (9^{7}); 'Egypt shall gather them, Moph shall bury them' (9^{6}). He little addresses the people; rather, turning his face away from them, he speaks of them to himself in shuddering disjointed monologue. A number of passages have been regarded by recent scholars as interpolations, particularly those referring to Judah (see i. note*), and those describing the material blessings of Israel restored ($2^{16ff.}$ 14; for list of passages athetized by various scholars see Driver, LOT[6] 306). Reference to Judah in itself need not excite suspicion any more than Isaiah's references to N. Israel. The abruptness of some of the references is strange (5^{10}), though the general unconnectedness of Hosea's style must be considered. Ch. 1^{10}–2^{1} is either a later amplification of something briefer, or it is wholly late; its right place seems after 3^{5}. Nowack goes to an extreme in his excision of passages: $2^{6.7}$ are supported by $5^{6.15}$ $6^{1ff.}$; 2^{14} by 12^{9}, and 2^{20} by 4^{1} 5^{4}; and in many other cases the reasons urged for excision appear inadequate.

The Text of Hosea has been imperfectly handed down. A multitude of passages are corrupt, some incurably, e.g. $4^{4.18}$ (in v.[19] read the last word altars), $5^{2.7.11}$ (צו), 6^{7} 7^{4} 8^{10b} (LXX 'and they shall cease a little from anointing king and princes'—though the ironical 'a little' is unnatural), 8^{13} (הבהבי), 9^{8} 9^{13} 10^{9} 11^{3} (read אקחם and זרועתי), $11^{6.7.12}$ and others.

HOSEN is AV translation in Dn 3^{21} of פַּטְּשִׁיהֶן,* which is probably better represented by RV 'tunics' (Siegfried-Stade and Strack [the latter doubtfully], Rock; RVm has 'turbans'). RV has 'hosen' in the same verse and in v.[27] as tr[n] of סַרְבָּלֵיהֶן (AV both times 'coats'; Siegfried-Stade, Unterkleider; Strack says 'an article of dress, probably trunk-hose' (Pluderhosen)). See, further, art. Dress in vol. i. p. 625[b].

The Eng. word 'hosen' is the plu. of a Teut. word 'hose' (of which the root is unknown) denoting a covering for the leg, 'breeches,' 'trousers.' Hose is also used for the plu., but the sing. occurs in Shaks. (Taming of the Shrew, v. i. 69, 'A silken doublet! a velvet hose! a scarlet cloak!') and elsewhere. The 'doublet' for the body, and the 'hose' or 'hosen' for the legs, were the necessary articles of male attire in Shakespeare's day; the cloak being needful for full dress or for cold weather, as Merry Wives, III. i. 47, 'In your doublet and hose, this raw rheumatic day!' The hosen generally covered the feet as well as the legs; and when the coverings of legs and feet were afterwards separated, they were called respectively 'upper stocks,' and 'nether stocks' or 'stockings.' By and by both 'hosen' and 'stockings' were restricted to the covering of the feet. Coverdale (from whom comes 'hosen' in Dn 3^{21}) intended to denote the long Eastern trousers. J. Hastings.

HOSHAMA (הוֹשָׁמָע, abbrev[n] or textual error for יְהוֹשָׁמָע 'J'' hath heard').—A descendant of David, 1 Ch 3^{18}. See Genealogy.

HOSHEA (הוֹשֵׁעַ 'deliverance' represented by Ausi on the Assyrian monuments, LXX Ὡσῆε, Syr. ܗܘܫܥ) was the son of Elah. The accession of this king of Israel took place in the twelfth year of king Ahaz according to the biblical chronology, 2 K 17^{1}. But this scheme it is impossible to maintain in its integrity [see art. Chronology of OT], as it is inconsistent in some details with itself (see Stade, GVI 88 ff., 558 ff.; Wellhausen, Prolegg. zur Gesch. Isr.[2] 285 ff.). It is also inconsistent with the date of the Assyrian inscriptions, mainly established by the Eponym Canon (Schrader, COT ii. pp. 161–195, 320 ff.). According to the annals of Tiglath-pileser III. (3 Rawl. 10, No. 2, line 28), Peḳah, king of Israel (bît Humri), was slain, and Hoshea ascended the throne as the nominee of the Assyrian conqueror in the same year. The original passages may be found in transcribed form in Schrader, COT i. p. 247, KIB ii. p. 32. The biblical narrative describes Hoshea, the son of Elah, as a conspirator against Peḳah, whom he slew. On the other hand, it seems fairly clear, from the annals of Tiglath-pileser, though the text is mutilated in many portions, that we should render 'Peḳah I slew, Hoshea I appointed . . . over them.' But there is no real contradiction between this statement and that of Scripture. Hoshea was the head of an Assyrian party in Samaria,* whereas Peḳah represented a policy of resistance to the encroachments of Assyria. This policy underlies his attack on Ahaz in concert with Rezin; see Cheyne's remarks (Comment. on Isaiah), introductory to Is 7. There are significant passages in the oracles of the contemporary prophet Hosea in which Ephraim is compared to a silly dove hovering between homage to Egypt and homage to Assyria (Hos 5^{13} 7^{11}). This theory of Ephraim's shifting foreign policy affords a very probable explanation of the course of events. Accordingly, Hoshea made himself the facile instrument of Assyrian power, which in 733 was threatening the very gates of Samaria. It is also probable that from the commencement of his reign (B.C. 732), down to the death of Tiglath-pileser (727), he paid tribute to Assyria like Jehu and Menaḥem before him. This may be clearly inferred from the mutilated conclusion of the inscription already quoted, and it is in consonance with the statement in 2 K 17^3. But we also learn from this verse that soon after the accession of Tiglath-pileser's successor, Shalmaneser (Shulmânu-asharidu) IV., the payment of the annual subsidy ceased. Probably, the Ephraimite king expected that the death of Assyria's energetic ruler, Tiglath-pileser, the combatant king (Jareb [?]) of Hosea's oracles, would bring the Palestinian states some respite. In our opinion, Isaiah's beautiful poem, 9^{7}–10^{4} $5^{25\text{-}30}$, belongs to this time† (B.C. 726). The language of the opening verses which describe 'Ephraim and the inhabitants of Samaria saying in pride and exaltation of heart "bricks have fallen, but with hewn stone will we build; sycomores have been hewn down, but with cedars we will replace them,"' clearly suggests that Ephraim at this period was beginning to recover in a material sense from the disastrous effects of the invasion of 734–732.

The new political developments that arose in Samaria were doubtless anxiously watched from the banks of the Nile. Palestine was of great strategic importance to Egypt. For the possession of Samaria, Ashdod, Jerusalem, or Lachish by the ever-encroaching Assyrian power would be a menace to security on the Nile. During the preceding decades Egypt had been weakened by intestine divisions, but now it had passed under the hands of an energetic Ethiopian ruler Shabaka‡ (Meyer, Gesch. des alten Ægyptens, pp. 343 f. 346). Henceforth Egypt sought to confront Assyria by supporting the Palestinian and Hittite states. Hoshea of Israel and Hanno of Gaza were sustained in this policy of resistance to the Ninevite power by promises of aid by the Egyptian monarch. After the death of Tiglath, the Egyptian party and policy, which opposed Assyrian domination, were in the ascendant at Samaria, just as we find in later times took place in Jerusalem (comp. Is 20. $30^{1\text{-}5}$ $31^{1\text{-}3}$). But bitter experience was destined in the coming years to prove that the Egyptian power was a broken reed. Within the next fifteen years Samaria, Gaza, and Ashdod were in succession fated to discover that Egypt's 'strength was to sit still,' and a terrible overthrow was to overtake them from the arms of Assyria through the procrastinating impotence of their South-western ally.

The cessation of tribute by the king of Israel, which had hitherto been paid annually, was the first serious indication to the Assyrian monarch that Ephraim was preparing to throw off his yoke. In the summer of the year B.C. 724 the armies of Assyria were directed against the Israelite capital. Hoshea at once endeavoured to avert disaster by gifts to the Assyrian monarch, but Shalmaneser had by this time discovered that Hoshea was playing a double part. Perhaps the Assyrian troops intercepted the emissaries which the latter was despatching to the king of Egypt. At this point it is by no means easy to discover the precise order of events narrated in 2 K $17^{3ff.}$. Fritz Hommel (Gesch. Babyl. u. Assyr. p. 675) thinks that a decisive battle was fought before the walls of Samaria, in which king Hoshea was taken prisoner. The biblical statements (v.[4]) would seem to warrant this view. It would somewhat simplify the chronological problem and allow nine years for the reign of Hoshea (Tiele, Bab.-Assyr. Gesch. i. p. 232 ad fin.).* But it is by no means certain that the capture and imprisonment of the Israelite king did not take place after the final overthrow of Samaria.

Shortly before this time the prophet Hosea uttered his last oracles. The final four chapters evidently belong to the closing years of the Northern kingdom. The shadows of the last overwhelming calamity rest on the prophet's soul. There is indescribable pathos in these closing appeals. J" pleads with Ephraim (11^{7}): 'My people are bent to backsliding from me [?] . . . How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I abandon thee, Israel? How shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim? Mine heart is turned within me, my compassions are kindled together.' But, alas! Israel's doom is irrevocable. 'The iniquity of Ephraim is bound up, his sin is laid up in store. . . . Samaria shall bear her guilt, because she hath rebelled against her God: they shall fall by the sword, their infants shall be dashed in pieces' (13^{12} 14^{1}).

At nearly the same time Isaiah delivered his oracle against Ephraim ($28^{1ff.}$): 'Woe to the crown of pride of the drunkards of Ephraim and to the fading flower of his glorious beauty, which is on the summit of the fertile valley of them that are overcome with wine. Behold, the LORD hath a mighty and strong one; as a tempest of hail, a destroying storm, a tempest of mighty waters overflowing, shall he cast down to the earth

* Comp. Winckler, Gesch. Israel's (Theil i.), p. 180, and Geschichte Babyloniens u. Assyr. p. 230 ff.

† Cheyne, Dillmann, and Duhm would place it some nine years earlier, i.e. shortly before the Syro-Ephraimite war; but it is not easy to see what substantial grounds exist for placing it so early. If we take the Assyrian invasion of 734 as the historic background, the refrain becomes doubly significant, and the graphic description of the advancing Assyrian hosts in Is $5^{26\text{-}28}$ (forming, as Dillmann rightly considers, a natural pendant or conclusion to the poem) seems to be based on a vivid and not too remote historic experience. 9^{11} remains obscure, whether we accept the earlier or later date; and even when we regard the Hebrew text as sound (certainly doubtful in the opening part of the verse), the phrase 'enemies of Rezin' would be thoroughly intelligible under the historic conditions which we have suggested.

‡ The ordinary identification of the סוא (wrongly pronounced Sô by the Massoretes) with this Ethiopian ruler can hardly be maintained. LXX Σηγωρ; Lucian, ed. Lagarde, reads, πρὸς Ἀδραμελεχ Αἰθιοπα τὸν κατοικοῦντα ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ. In line 25 of the Khorsabad inscr. of Sargon mention is made of Sibi, tartan or generalissimo of the Egyptian forces who co-operated with Ḥanunu (Hanno) of Gaza in resisting the arms of Assyria. In all probability, we ought to identify this Sibi (properly Sib'i) with the סִבְאֶ (as we should pronounce it) of the Hebrew text. But this personage was not the supreme king of Egypt or Pharaoh. This is clear from the same passage in Sargon's inscription, for in line 27 this monarch is referred to under his usual title Pir'u as quite a distinct personage from Sibi. It is this Pharaoh whom we may identify with Shabaka or Sabaco. The Assyrians were quite able to pronounce this name, as the great Rassam cylinder (Rm), col. ii. 22, testifies, where it occurs in the form Shabakû. See Winckler, Untersuch. zur altorient. Gesch. p. 92 ff. On the complex text of 2 K $17^{1\text{-}6}$ see AT-liche Unters. p. 15 ff.

* Fritz Hommel in his Gesch. Bab. u. Ass. pp. 964 ff. 669 ff. places the overthrow of Peḳah in 733, but in his art. ASSYRIA (wh. see) places it two years later. This appears to be too late, though exact chronological sequence in the events of Tiglath pileser's campaigns (734 ff.) is difficult to attain. See Winckler, Gesch. Babyl. u. Assyr. p. 230.

violently. The crown of pride of the drunkards of Ephraim shall be trodden under foot.'

The fulfilment of these prophecies of doom followed swiftly. We know that in the year 724 Samaria was invested by the Assyrian armies. Towards the end of the siege (B.C. 722) Shalmaneser died. Meanwhile, the beleaguered inhabitants were anxiously expecting a relieving force to arrive from the banks of the Nile, which should divert the forces of Assyria and raise the siege of the hard-pressed city. But a fatal paralysis seemed to hamper the movements of Egypt. Time went on—more than two years elapsed—and no relieving force appeared. The numbers of the garrison were doubtless thinned by constant battles with the besiegers, and by the ravages of grim famine. Sargon (Šarrukinu), in all probability a usurper, and certainly an able Assyrian general, succeeded to the throne of Assyria in B.C. 722. The siege was pressed on with vigour under this energetic commander. Egypt's procrastination was now Israel's ruin, and the fatal end was at hand. It is summarized in barely two ruthless lines of the great Khorsabad inscription (lines 23 and 24): 'Samaria I besieged, I captured. 27,290 of her inhabitants I carried away. 50 chariots I collected from their midst. The rest of their property I caused to be taken (?). My viceroy I placed over them, and imposed the tribute of the previous king.'

From 2 K 17^6 we learn that the inhabitants were deported to Eastern localities in or near Babylonia (see Schrader, COT ii. p. 267 ff.), while Babylonian inhabitants were settled in the districts of Canaan vacated by the exiled Israelites (v.^{24}). Illustrative passages confirming these facts may be found in the annals of Sargon.

And so the curtain falls upon the remarkable and chequered history of the kingdom of the Ten Tribes. Respecting king Hoshea, we do not know whether he survived the tragic close of the kingdom which he ruled, or suffered the barbarous tortures too frequently inflicted on Assyrian captives. About his personal character we know little. We may infer that it lacked decisive energy and lofty patriotism. Beginning his reign as a mere puppet in Assyria's hands, he shaped his career as an opportunist. He was too astute to offend any national susceptibilities by abandoning the worship of J", too cautious and politic to play the rôle of a purist in religious practices. Indeed an accurate historic treatment of Israel's religious history may esteem it highly improbable that such a course, forestalling the reformation of the 7th cent., could ever have entered into Hoshea's thoughts. Whether amid the syncretic tendencies in the traditional religious practices which then prevailed he was at all influenced by the teachings of the contemporary Ephraimite prophet Hosea towards higher ideals, is a question suggested, but suggested only, by the clause (17^2), that though he committed evil it was not 'as the kings of Israel who were before him.' The impartial historian will not judge this last king of Ephraim too severely, but will unhesitatingly admit that he lived in times of direst difficulty and peril, when nothing but miraculous divinely guided statesmanship, like that of Isaiah, could have saved the realm from overwhelming disaster.

OWEN C. WHITEHOUSE.

HOSPITALITY, HOST.—No customs have taken a deeper and more permanent hold on the mind and life of the Orient than those which gather round the reception and entertainment of the guest. Few legal enactments, by whatever sanctions enforced, have met with such hearty and universal obedience as the unwritten laws of hospitality. The main practices evidently originated amid nomadic conditions. When applied to the more settled order of village or town, they were of necessity more or less modified. In modern times the influence of the tourist, and the growing usages of the West, have done much to corrupt the old simplicities. Yet in many towns and villages, remote from the annual streams of sightseers and pilgrims, and the encroachments of civilization, the traveller will find hospitable and generous welcome, and an aversion to anything like payment. Even in such centres as Safed and Tiberias, one or two wealthy men keep open house for all-comers, where friend and foe are alike free to enjoy food and shelter for the night. In the villages, where poverty reigns supreme, a guest-chamber, usually the best room in the place, is often attached to the sheikh's dwelling; and there the stranger is provided for at the cost of the community. The desert Arabs, however, have preserved almost unchanged through four millenniums the customs presented in the scriptural pictures of patriarchal life.

Among the nations of antiquity the virtue of hospitality was highly esteemed. In the Egyptian Book of the Dead, in the Hall of two Truths, the god who tests the spirits thus speaks in commendation of one who has passed the judgment: 'The god has welcomed him as he wished. He has given food to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, clothing to the naked.' The Greeks thought that any stranger-guest might be a god in disguise; and the hospitable entertainment of helpless strangers, not self-declared enemies or robbers, was well-pleasing to Ζεὺς ξένιος, under whose protection they were. The ties established by hospitality were hereditary on both sides. The Romans regarded any violation of the rights of hospitality as a crime and impiety; while the Sibylline books declared that the age of the Messiah, when the happiest conditions for humanity would be realized, should witness the triumph of faith, love, and hospitality.

Turning to the Arabs, among whom are best reflected the immemorial usages of the East, we find that among them a man's hospitality is largely the measure of his reputation. 'A close fist and a narrow heart,' they say; and the niggardly soul shall not hold rule over them. To be described as 'a man of much ashes,' is a coveted distinction; the heap of ashes by his tent indicating the extent of his cooking for the entertainment of guests. 'A man whose dogs bark loudly' is one held in esteem; the dogs guiding the wanderer who might not otherwise find his dwelling. The sheikh's tent always stands in the camp nearest the travelled way, to offer first welcome to the approaching stranger. His superior position must be vindicated by superior liberality. Ibn Rashîd, in Hâyil, who exercises a somewhat uncertain sway over the wandering tribes of central Arabia, entertains at least 200 guests daily; and every stranger in Hâyil is invited to his table. The name of this ruler is accordingly highly honoured. But the poorest man will not turn the needy away. The guest, indeed, is often regarded as a benefactor, whose arrival affords his host the opportunity of honourable service.

Baitî baitak, 'my house is yours,' is part of the hospitable salutation with which the guest is welcomed. The phrase survives in the towns and cities most influenced by Western civilization; only, however, as an expression of courtesy. In remote villages, and in the desert camps, it is a simple statement of fact. As the proverb has it, 'The guest while in the house is its lord.' The present writer has been frequently thus promoted to the lordship of a house of hair, the owner waiting without until the guest bade him enter, and standing up until invited to recline on his own cushions. The stores, be they small or plentiful, are equally at the guest's command. The best of everything is placed before him; and whatever he may desire will be procured if the possibility exists. No sacrifice is too great to be made for the comfort of the guest: many will not stop even at the honour of wife and daughter (cf. Gn 19^8, Jg 19^{24}). No man is demeaned by any service to his guest, even by pouring water on feet and hands, and waiting on him at meat. As one said, 'I am the slave of my guest as long as he is with me, but save in this there is no trace of the slave in my nature' (Ḥamâsa, p. 727, quoted by W. R. Smith, RS^{2} p. 68).

There are certain well-understood provisions for preserving the honour of the host, which all guests are expected to observe. No pains should be spared to reach the resting-place before sunset. The proverb runs, 'He who arrives after sundown goes supperless to bed.' The reason being that this leaves the host too little time to prepare such a repast as his own credit requires. The law may not be enforced; but, while shelter may be demanded, in such a case there is no obligation to give food. This explains the seeming lack of hospitality in the parable (Lk 11^{5-9}). Again, the guest is careful not to eat all that is brought to him, especially if his host be a poor man; somewhat must be left over, as evidence that he has had enough, and more than enough. Usually, supplies are too liberal to permit of complete consumption; but when a large company settles on a man for the night there is need for care, that he be not put to shame. Clean dishes would 'blacken his face' in presence of his guests. It is his pride to furnish over and above necessities. Yet, again, it is permissible to manifest great satisfaction with the fare whilst partaking. In drinking coffee, e.g., pleasure is fittingly expressed by drawing in the liquid with considerable noise, smacking of the lips, etc. Such visible tokens of appreciation greatly delight the host. But the offer of anything in payment would be taken as an insult. The Arab eats not in the morning; the guest departs with a simple 'good-bye.' He has had no more than his right; and presently his host will enjoy like treatment at his or some other brother's hands. The recognition of this obligation to the needy stranger must often have been the very condition of life to wanderers in waste lands.

That the guest is inviolable is one of the first principles of Arab hospitality. To be safe, the stranger needs but enter the tent, or only touch a tent rope; then, even if he be an enemy, no hand will be raised against him. The homicide may claim the rights of sanctuary from the slain man's next-of-kin himself, the avenger of blood, on whom lies the chief obligation of revenge. And as the duty of vengeance belongs to all the family or tribe of the murdered man, so protection granted by one is binding upon all. To slay an enemy in battle, or when meeting him in the open field, is esteemed an act of true and valorous manhood; to fall upon one seeking shelter in his tent, would stain an Arab's name with everlasting dishonour. To injure the guest is the mark of deepest depravity. The Arabs of el-Lejâ are held in reprobation as the greatest of rascals; it is said of them that 'they will even murder the guest.' An Arab tradition points to the reputed site of Sodom as the place where stones rained down from heaven upon the people who abused 'some travellers seeking hospitality there.' In Mal 3^5 the LORD is announced as a swift witness against such as turn aside the stranger in judgment.

But the ties of hospitality receive a more weighty sanction when a meal is partaken of in common. For an Arab to injure one who has eaten with him from the same dish, would be equivalent to lifting his hand against his own flesh and blood. They are 'brothers of the bread,' pledged by this act to do each other no harm, and also actively to promote each other's safety to the full extent of their ability. This obligation, however, lasts no longer than they may be supposed to retain the food thus eaten in their bodies; and the limit usually recognized is thirty-six hours. But constant repetition of eating and drinking in common may give permanence to the bonds. W. R. Smith (RS^{2} p. 270 f.) quotes several illustrations of the length to which these ideas are sometimes carried. Zaid al-Khail, a famous warrior in the days of Mohammed, refused to slay a vagabond who had stolen his camels because the thief had surreptitiously drunk from his father's milk-pail before the theft. In Amthâl of Mofaḍḍal al-Ḍabbi, a man claims and obtains help of Al-Ḥârith in recovering his stolen camels, because the water which was still in their stomachs when they were taken from him had been drawn with the help of a rope borrowed from Al-Ḥârith's herdsmen. On the other hand, after the battle of Coshâwa, a captive refused to eat the food of his captor, who had slain his son, and thus kept alive his right of blood revenge.

The protection of the stranger may anticipate his arrival at the tent of his host. It is not uncommon for one in danger to shelter himself under the name of some powerful chief, whose dakhîl he claims to be. It is then the duty of all to assist him in reaching his protector's dwelling: any injury done to him is regarded as an outrage upon the honour of the man who, his name thus invoked, has become the stranger's patron and avenger. Thus are deliverance and safety found in 'the name of the LORD' (Pr 18^{10}, Jl 2^{32}, Ac 2^{21}, Ro 10^{13} etc.).

The guest may claim entertainment for three days and three nights; and for so long the host may require him to stay. This latter right, although seldom exercised, is always acknowledged. Should the stranger remain beyond this period, he may be put to some useful work—a provision, probably, against idlers and hangers-on. Permanent abode in the dwelling of his host (Ps 23^6) the guest may secure only by becoming identified with the family through marriage or adoption. See GER.

The religious significance and origin of these customs is suggested by the name universally given to the stranger entertained. He is 'the guest of God,' daif Ullah, that is, one for whom loyalty to God demands hospitable treatment. The Arab is himself a sojourner with God, under the blue canopy of His mighty tent. All that comes to him, whether by robber raid or natural increase of his flocks, he takes as the gift of God, the Generous and Bountiful; in the stranger whom night-fall brings to his tent, he sees a fellow-guest, to be treated according as God has dealt with himself. The spirit in which the obligation is accepted is well expressed in the proverb, 'He who has bread is debtor to him who has none'; which, in turn, suggests comparison with Ro 1^{14}.

The rights of asylum, associated with temples and holy places, are survivals from the times when, by retreat to the sanctuary, direct appeal was made for the protection of the deity there worshipped; and in certain temples these refugees, guests receiving the gods' hospitality, were organized for service. Ezekiel (44^7) denounces this practice, which had obtained a hold even in Jerusalem; and the Phœnician inscription at Larnaca affords evidence of its existence among surrounding nations. With the movement of the peoples, there grew up the idea that in migrating to any country it was wise to submit to the god of the land, and to claim his protection, since only by his favour, and as his guests, might they continue to dwell there. This was the relation in which Israel stood to God. All directions for the generous treatment of the poor and the stranger are based upon recognition of this fact (Ex 22^{21} 23^{9}, Lv $19^{33.34}$ 25^{23}, Dt 10^{19} 14^{29} 15^{7}, 2 Ch 7^{20}). To use the stranger ill was to insult the god on whose hospitality he was thrown. See GER.

The ties established between host and guest by eating together carry us back to the days when all worshippers of a god were believed to partake with their deity in the sacrificial feast. Traces of this idea are found in Lv 3^{1-9} with 7^{15} and Dt 27^{7}. Admission to this meal signified acknowledgment of the bond between the one so admitted and the god, and therefore that of brotherhood in the common faith. This involved sacred obligations of mutual help and protection. And it is interesting to note that the animal killed by the Arab for the entertainment of his guest still bears the ancient name dhabîḥah, 'sacrifice'; and to the feast thus provided every member of the tribe may come freely, uninvited, as a simple matter of right (RS 236, 247, 266, 439).

These considerations cast over the customs of hospitality the spell of antiquity and of religious sanction, than which nothing could more powerfully affect the mind of the Orient. This influence is seen in the practice of sealing friendship in a common meal, e.g. Gn 26^{30}, and esp. 31^{54}. Israel was thus beguiled into a covenant with the Gibeonites (Jos 9^{14}), which held good notwithstanding discovery of their deceit. The bitterness of the Psalmist's lot is accentuated by the fact that one who had eaten of his bread lifted up the heel against him (Ps 41^{9}). Old Testament illustrations of ancient hospitality are found in Gn 18^{1-8} 19^{1-3}, Ex 2^{20}, Jg 13^{15}, Ps 23^{5}; Rahab received the reward of hospitality in the safety of herself and her relations (Jos 2). The outrage on hospitality committed by the inhabitants of Gibeah was terribly avenged (Jg 20).

There are two apparent violations of hospitality mentioned with approval. One is the case of Joab, who claimed asylum in the tent of the LORD, and who was slain there by Solomon's order. But Joab had put himself beyond the pale of this benign law by his own breach of its most solemn obligations (1 K 2^{31-33}). The other is that of Jael, who drove the tent-peg through the head of her sleeping guest. It may be taken as evidence of the fearful degeneracy and lawlessness of these times, that this dastardly action finds honourable mention in a song of praise. But, while applauded in the excitement of triumph by those whom it so largely helped, the deed was one which, in calm judgment, would be pronounced infamous.

In the NT the customs of hospitality are recognized as binding (Lk 7^{44-46}). It is commended and enjoined as a Christian virtue (Ro $12^{13.20}$, 1 Ti 3^{2}, Tit 1^{8}, He 13^{2}, 1 P 4^{9}); and, affording a curious parallel to the passage quoted above from the Egyptian Book of the Dead, the exercise of hospitality is taken as affording the evidence on which final judgment is based (Mt 25^{35} with 10^{40} and Jn 13^{20}).

Host occurs but twice in our Eng. Bible, Lk 10^{35} and Ro 16^{23}. In the former case it stands for πανδοχεύς, the keeper of an inn or place of entertainment, where all were received on an understanding as to payment. The πανδοχεῖον or πανδοκεῖον might be a simple khân, or a place affording accommodation to travellers. From this we have the modern Arabic funduḳ, used for 'inn' or 'hotel.' ξένος in Ro 16^{23} is used in classic Greek for the 'guest-friend,' i.e. any citizen of a foreign State with whom one has a treaty of hospitality for self and heirs, confirmed by mutual presents and an appeal to Ζεὺς ξένιος. In this sense both parties are ξένοι' (Liddell and Scott). While mostly denoting the receiver of hospitality, it was also used for the entertainer; and in that sense it is employed here. The generous hospitality of Gaius, not limited to St. Paul, but extended to 'the whole Church,' marks him out for special honour.

W. EWING.

HOST.—Hostis, in classical Lat. 'an enemy,' came to mean 'the enemy's army,' and then, in mediæval Lat., 'an army' simply. This was its meaning when taken into Eng. from Old Fr. host; and this is its meaning always in AV, where it occurs as tr. of all the usual Heb. words for 'army.' Tindale uses it specially for the army in camp, Lv 9^{11} 'the flesh and the hyde he burnt with fyre without the hoste.' J. HASTINGS.

HOST OF HEAVEN, THE (צְבָא הַשָּׁמַיִם).—An expression occurring several times in the OT, and denoting most frequently the stars, but sometimes angels. The word 'host' is the ordinary Heb. word for army; and its use implies that those whom it characterizes are conceived partly as numerous, and partly as forming a regularly organized body, obedient to the commands of its lord or head.

A. As applied to the stars, it (1) denotes them (often coupled with the sun and moon) as objects of religious veneration, Dt 4^{19} 17^{3}, Zeph 1^{5}, Jer 8^{2} 19^{13}, 2 K 17^{16} $21^{3.5}$ $23^{3.5}$ (2 Ch $33^{3.5}$); so also Ac 7^{42}. It appears from these passages that the idolatrous worship of the heavenly bodies—though there are traces of it previously*—first became prominent in Israel in the 7th cent. B.C.: it was patronized by Manasseh, who 'built altars for all the host of heaven in the two courts' of the Temple (2 K 21^{5}); it is mentioned in Dt as a form of idolatry which might prove specially seductive to the Israelite; according to Jer 19^{13}, Zeph 1^{5}, it was carried on upon the roofs of houses. Josiah, in his reformation, destroyed the altars built by Manasseh in the Temple, burnt the vessels used in the rites, and put down the priests who took part in them (2 K $23^{3.5.12}$). From the terms of 2 K 23^{12} 'the altars which were on the roof of the upper chamber of Ahaz,' taken in conjunction with what is stated in Jer 19^{13}, Zeph 1^{5}, it is difficult to avoid the inference that, though the 'host of heaven' itself is not expressly mentioned, the worship had in fact been introduced into Judah before Manasseh by Ahaz. This systematic worship of the heavenly bodies was in all probability imported from Assyria and Babylonia, where there was a deeply rooted popular belief in the power of the stars to rule the destinies of individuals and nations, and where from a remote antiquity the events which had been observed to follow from given celestial phenomena had been tabulated for future reference (above, vol. i. p. 194; Sayce, Hibb. Lect. 396–403).

* Proper names, as Beth-shemesh, En-shemesh, and (probably) Jericho imply an ancient worship of the sun and moon: see also Am 5^{26} (c. 750 B.C.); and (under Ahaz) Is 17^{8} ('sun-pillars,'—though some scholars think this and the preceding word a later addition): 2 K 23^{11} 'the horses which the kings of Judah had given to the sun' and 'chariots of the sun' (though, the kings not being specified, the date when these were introduced is uncertain). 2 K 17^{16}, also, attributes the worship of the 'host of heaven' to the people of the northern kingdom; but the statement (which occurs in a Deuteronomic passage) may be only a rhetorical generalization.

Ahaz and Manasseh were both addicted to heathen observances, and both were also vassals of Assyria;* so that there is no difficulty in understanding their readiness to patronize Assyrian superstitions.†

The expression (2) denotes the stars as witnessing, in virtue of their apparently countless numbers, and the order and regularity of their appearance, to J'''s creative and administrative power. So Jer 33[22] (as innumerable), Is 34[4] (as dependent for their existence upon J'''s will, and so as mouldering away in the day of His wrath); and 'their host' in Is 40[26] ('that bringeth out their host by number; he calleth them all by name . . . not one is lacking'), 45[12] ('I have stretched out the heavens, and all their host I have commanded'), Ps 33[6], Gn 2[1] (where 'their host' is referred to 'earth' only zeugmatically), Neh 9[6a] ('thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, and all their host'). The expression also denotes the stars in Dn 8[10] (as audaciously assailed by the 'little horn' [Antiochus Epiphanes]), God being (v.[11]) their 'captain' or 'prince.'

B. 'Host of heaven' denotes celestial beings in attendance upon J'', in 1 K 22[19]=2 Ch 18[18] (Micaiah's vision), and Neh 9[6b]; probably in Dn 4[35 (32)] (where the Aram. טֵיל is the word which in the Targ. regularly corresponds to צְבָא in this expression): and so also in Lk 2[13]. 'All ye his hosts' in Ps 103[21], and 'all his host' (Kerê, 'hosts') in Ps 148[2], are meant, probably, in the same sense. J'''s celestial attendants are alluded to frequently elsewhere, though not under this name, as Ps 29[1] 89[5-7], Is 6, Job 1[6] 2[1] 5[1] 15[15] 21[22b] 38[7], Dn 7[10] (see further ANGEL, vol. i. p. 95); and the term 'host' designates them, like the stars, as an organized body. For passages in which they are spoken of in terms suggestive of an army, see Gn 32[2] (a 'camp'), Jos 5[14f.] ('captain of J'''s host'), 2 K 6[17], Ps 103[20], and Jl 3(4)[11] ('mighty ones,' or warriors), Job 25[3] ('troops' or 'bands').

An ambiguous position is taken by Is 24[21], where mention is made of the 'host of the height' (sc. of heaven), whom J'' will 'visit' (punish) in the day of judgment on the world which the (post-exilic) prophet depicts. This expression is understood by Delitzsch to refer to angels (the allusion being taken to be to a germinal form of the doctrine, which was afterwards more fully developed, of patron-angels, presiding over the different nations of the earth);‡ but others (as Oehler, AT Theol. § 196; Schultz, OT Theol. ii. 228; Baudissin, Sem. Rel.-gesch. i. 121–123; Dillm., Duhm, Cheyne;§ cf. LXX) think the stars are intended.

The question arises, in what relation these two senses of the expression 'host of heaven' stand towards each other. Of course the connexion may be a merely verbal one: angels and stars were equally pictured by the Hebrews as forming a 'host'; both belonged to the heavens; and both were accordingly called independently by the same name. Nevertheless, it is the opinion of many scholars that the connexion between the two senses is closer than this. Ewald (Lehre von Gott, ii. 294 f.) suggested that the stars were regarded as the 'visible image,' or counterpart, of the host, or army, of angels, by which J'' was conceived to be surrounded. Stade (Gesch. ii. 236–238) supposes that the divinities, whom the heathen nations, and the unspiritual Israelites, supposed to inhabit the heavenly bodies, and whom they venerated accordingly, were harmonized with monotheism by being incorporated into the ranks of the angels, as subjects of the supreme God: the 'host of heaven,' originally denoting these divinities, became thus the name for the countless ministers of the heavenly King. Others remind us that the stars, moving (as it seemed) in the heaven with surprising order and regularity, were regarded by the Greeks and other ancient nations as animate beings;* and suppose that this facilitated their being called by the same name as angels. Thus Montefiore (Hibb. Lect. 429) writes: 'The stars, to the Jews, no less than to the Greeks, animate beings, become a portion of the heavenly host which attended Yahweh on high'; cf. Baudissin, l.c. p. 120 (Hebrew popular belief regarded the stars as animated beings, similar to angels). In estimating this last view, it should, however, be remembered that there is no passage in the OT which actually speaks of the stars as animated, or distinctly identifies them with angels; for the poetical passage in Jg 5[20] (the stars from their courses fighting against Sisera) is no evidence of the former belief; and the fact that in Job 38[7] 'morning stars' stand in poetical parallelism with 'sons of God' does not prove that the poet treated them as identical. No doubt, in a later age, the stars were treated as conscious beings, and even sometimes identified with angels (as Enoch 18[12-16] 21[1-6], where seven stars are represented as bound in a prison-house of fire, for disobedience in not rising at their appointed time, just as angels themselves are in 21[7-12]; and Rev 9[1. 11], where the star which falls from heaven and receives the key of the abyss, is called the 'angel' of the abyss): but it is a question how much such passages prove for the beliefs of the 8th or 7th centuries B.C. Our knowledge of the origin and history of the expression 'host of heaven' is too imperfect to enable us to pronounce with any confidence upon these theories; but, so far as we can judge (1 K 22[19]), it seems to have been first applied to denote angelic beings. Whether its application afterwards to the stars was connected merely verbally with this usage, or whether it was facilitated by one or other of the considerations just alluded to, cannot be definitely determined; at the same time, we may at least agree (cf. above, vol. i. p. 95[b]) that the movements and appearance of the stars may well have suggested to the Hebrews, as they did to other ancient nations, the idea that they were animated, and that hence a tendency may have arisen—though how far it was consistently carried out we do not know—to place them in the same class, or even to identify them, with angels, who also formed an order of heavenly beings, regarded by the Hebrews as in a special degree the ministers and instruments of Divine Providence (cf. Dillm. AT Theol. 320).

HOUSE (בַּיִת [etym. uncertain; Ges. derives from a root='spend the night'], οἶκος, οἰκία, domus).—This article deals with the fixed dwellings of man in Syria and Egypt, exclusive of tents and temporary dwellings, which are treated of under other headings (CAVE, PALACE, TEMPLE, TENT); but, in a hot climate, where life is spent in a great measure in the open air under the shade of trees, rocks, and in booths in connexion with permanent habitations, it is not practicable entirely to divide the several subjects. It will be found that the difference to be met with in the habits of the people is not so much between those who live in permanent and in temporary dwellings, as between those who live in fixed abodes and in movable habitations.

The dwellers in towns and villages have fixed abodes, though often of a very frail character; while the nomadic tribes, roving over the country in quest of pasture for their herds and flocks, require habitations which, though they can be readily packed up and carried away, are often of a very permanent texture.

Permanent fixed dwellings existed from the very earliest times (Gn 4^{17} $10^{11f.}$ [both, however, prehistorical] 12^{15} [Hyksos period ?]), and in the days of Abraham cities of considerable antiquity were already in existence in Palestine and Egypt ('Now Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt,' Nu 13^{23}, which, however, may refer only to the rebuilding by Ramses II., cf. Sayce, HCM 190 f.). Evidence to the same effect is supplied by the Babylonian (Nippur) and Egyptian discoveries as well as by Bliss's excavations at Lachish.

Although the family of Lot, on separating from Abraham, dwelt in the cities of the plain (Gn 13^{12}), yet the Hebrews throughout their sojourn in Canaan, until going down into Egypt, were dwellers in tents (Gn 13^{18} 26^{25} 31^{33} 35^{21}): in Egypt they lived in houses (Ex $12^{7.27}$), and on entering the Promised Land, after forty years' camping in the wilderness, took possession of the towns and cities built by the Canaanites (Dt $6^{10f.}$): they thus had no opportunity of establishing any distinctive style of architecture, as did the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Greeks, and there is no class of buildings which can be described as characteristically Hebrew, unless perhaps the synagogues, which do not appear to have been numerous in Palestine till after the time of John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135). The houses of the Hebrews, therefore, were the houses of the people of the land where they dwelt, and we have thus to seek for them in Syria and Egypt.

We have the following records for our use, viz.: The pictures on the monuments of Egypt and Assyria, the ruins remaining on the ground, the descriptions given in the Bible and by early writers, and the modern dwellings themselves.

In drawing inferences as to the arrangements of houses in ancient times from the system adopted in modern dwellings, we must make due allowance for the more jealous seclusion of Moslem women at the present day, and also for the present method of sitting with the legs tucked up, which necessitates taking off the out-door shoe. There was far more social equality of the two sexes among the Hebrews in ancient times than there is now among the Moslems. This affected all the household arrangements, and did not require the careful seclusion of the women's apartments, which complicates the construction of modern houses. Hebrew women, instead of being immured in a harem, mingled freely with the other sex in carrying out their social duties. They attended the flocks (Gn 29^6), prepared the meal (Gn 18^6), invited guests (Jg 4^{18}), and even on occasion criticized the conduct of their husband (1 S 25^{25}). They conversed with strangers in a public place with propriety (Gn 24^{24} $29^{9f.}$), and took part in public affairs of any special kind (1 S 18^6, which would suggest that they sat in an agora). This freedom of action naturally influenced the arrangements of the apartments in the house, and caused them to differ from those of the present day. The custom of sitting on a divan with the legs tucked up instead of sitting on a chair or stool also affects greatly all household arrangements, even to ceremonials and cleanliness, as may be seen at present in the life of the Chinese, who use chairs, and the Japanese, who sit on divans or couches. Another matter not to be lost sight of in considering the nature of the houses in early days, is the patriarchal customs of the Hebrews, and the improbability of their having many wants, accustomed as they were to living so much in tents.

The houses of the poor in early days must always have been of a very primitive character. Very often they were built of clay (mud or sunburnt brick), 'whose foundation is in the dust'; 'which are ready to become heaps'; 'by slothfulness the roof sinketh in, and through idleness of the hands the house leaketh' (Job 4^{19} 15^{28}, Ec 10^{18}, Is 9^{10}). These houses, as at the present day, were of a very unstable description, and if not instantly attended to were liable to be overthrown by heavy rainfall, hailstorm, and strong winds (Ezk $13^{10f.}$). Another inconvenience of mud houses is their liability to be 'dug through' or broken into by thieves (Job 24^{16}, Mt 6^{19} 24^{43}).

In other instances houses might be built of stone with plaster (Lv $14^{40f.}$) and mortar (Ezk 13^{11}), and wood of sycomore, holm tree (but see HOLM) and the oak (Is 9^{10}). These stone houses were also very insecurely built; the mortar, frequently made with mud and slime instead of burnt limestone, becomes as slippery as soap during heavy rains, and whole villages have been known to be overthrown in one night during bad weather (Land and the Book, ii. 57). In some parts of the country, however, the houses are very carefully built of squared stone throughout, owing to the total absence of wood; and those houses do not readily decay, Mt 7^{24} (Buckingham, Arab Tribes, 180, 326).

In the fenced cities the houses forming the walls are necessarily built solidly, 'great, and fenced up to heaven' (Dt 1^{28}), but those within the city do not differ materially from those in villages, except that for want of space the roofs are made more use of, and there are two storeys and often a court within the house. These houses, whether of mud or stone, are also very insecurely built, and are constantly falling down.

The people congregated, as they still do, for safety in villages and towns, and did not build isolated houses in the fields. The houses of the poor are quadrangular, usually of one storey in villages, and containing but one apartment, in which in cold weather the cattle also are housed; the portion for the use of the family being raised on a dais some 2 ft. or more above that where the cattle are herded. On this raised platform are the beds, chests, cooking utensils (1 S 28^{24} (?)). The light comes through the door, and when there are windows they are merely apertures raised some height above the ground, sometimes with wooden gratings. There is no chimney, and the smoke from the fire finds its way out through the holes in the building.

The roofs are usually flat, except where no wood is to be obtained. They are formed of rough rafters or boughs of trees with brushwood laid across, and over all a plaster of mud, rolled flat in showery weather with a stone roller. Upon the roofs are often temporary erections of straw or boughs of trees, for sleeping under, though in dry climates the roof is generally used without any covering except a quilt. It was prescribed by Dt 22^{8} that a parapet (EV 'battlement') should be erected round the roof, for the protection of those using it for recreation or other purposes. A stairway outside the house frequently gave access to the roof without the necessity of passing through the house. This arrangement is probably alluded to in our Lord's words, 'Let him that is on the housetop not go down nor enter in to take anything out of his house' (Mk 13^{15}). Rahab hid the spies 'with the stalks of flax which she had laid in order upon the roof' (Jos 2^{6}); Peter 'went up upon the housetop to pray' (Ac 10^{9}). For similar uses of the roof cf. Jg 16^{27} (where see Moore's note), 1 S $9^{25f.}$, 2 S 11^{2} 16^{22}, Is 22^{1}, Jer 19^{13}, Zeph 1^{5}, Neh 8^{16}.

A considerable amount of discussion has been occasioned by the narrative of the healing of the paralytic (Mt $9^{2ff.}$, Mk $2^{3ff.}$, Lk $5^{18ff.}$), and the means adopted by his four friends to bring him into the presence of Jesus. Both Mark and Luke imply that the sick man's bearers first made their way to the roof, which would be readily accessible by an outside stairway or a ladder. Their further proceedings are described thus in Mk 2^{4} 'they uncovered the roof where he was, and when they had broken it up, they let down the bed whereon the sick of the palsy lay' (ἀπεστέγασαν τὴν στέγην ὅπου ἦν, καὶ ἐξορύξαντες χαλῶσι τὸν κράβαττον, κ.τ.λ.); in Lk 5^{19} 'They let him down through the tiles with his couch into the midst before Jesus' (διὰ τῶν κεράμων καθῆκαν αὐτὸν σὺν τῷ κλινιδίῳ, κ.τ.λ.). It is not quite clear whether Jesus was teaching in the 'upper room' of a house with more than one storey, or on the ground floor of a one-storeyed house, or, as some think, in a gallery outside the house. In any case there would have been no difficulty either in getting rid of the covering of the roof or making an opening in the battlement that surrounded it. For a full discussion of the meaning of the passage the reader may refer to such works as Gould (on Mk 2^{4}) and Plummer (on Lk 5^{19}), both in Internat. Crit. Comm.; Bruce (on Mk 2^{4}) in Expositor's Gr. NT; Thomson, Land and the Book (1880), p. 358; Tristram, Eastern Customs, 34 f.

In the villages there is usually a court attached to the house, in which the cattle, sheep, and goats are penned; and in towns they are all brought within the walls and penned in courts and cellars belonging to the houses.

The monuments of Assyria and Egypt represent the houses much as they appear at present (Layard, Nineveh; Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians).

In examining the ruins of ancient cities east of the Jordan, one is much struck with the prominence of the temples and the complete effacement of the private dwellings, showing that the latter were built of materials that have readily decayed. This had been noticed elsewhere; and even at Athens in the time of Pericles, foreigners were struck by the contrast between the splendour of the public buildings and the mean dwellings of the common people (Thuc. ii. 14, 65; Dicaearch, Stat. Græc. p. 8).

The most striking peculiarity in the aspect of houses at the present day is their blank and desolate appearance from the outside: streets 8 ft. or less in width, houses 40 to 60 ft. high, with blank stone walls and little ornament of any kind, except the door and the projecting window over it, all peeping into which is jealously guarded against by the wooden lattice which fills up the window aperture; it is pierced with holes, and often elaborately carved. The doorways and the doors are often highly ornamented (Is 54^{12}, Rev 21^{21}) and enriched with arabesques, and have sentences from the Korân inscribed on them (cf. Dt 6^{9}). The doors are usually of hard wood, studded with iron nails or sheeted with iron, opening inwards, and furnished with bars and bolts. They are fastened with wooden locks, and wooden keys are required, often of enormous size, large enough for a stout club (Is 22^{22}; Land and the Book, i. 493). There is an opening in the door to insert the hand and key from the outside, the lock being on the inside (see below, Lock and Key). On entering the gate there is usually a porch or vestibule with a long stone bench for the doorkeeper and servants, where the master of the house receives visits and transacts business (Gn 19^{1} 23^{10} 34^{20}, Job 29^{7} may serve to illustrate this custom, although in these passages it is the gate of a city, not the door of a house, that is referred to). This porch is separated from the chambers within by a twisted passage, so that a view inside cannot be obtained from it. The house is built round one or more courts according to the wealth of the family, each room opening into the court, and seldom one into the other; there is a verandah round the court. In the larger houses at Damascus there are often several courts, all fitted up with great magnificence, the floors paved with marble, the walls lined with faïence, the ceilings have carved ornaments and tracery and are painted in gay colours, and ornamented wooden screens separate the several chambers.

In towns there are generally two or more storeys, and on each floor the chambers open on to a common balcony running round the inside of the court, with a staircase open to the sky, usually in a corner of the court.

The passage from the entrance doorway leads into the court, which is usually paved with marble or flagging, and may have in the centre a well (2 S 17^{18}) or a fountain, with citron and orange trees around, and overhead an awning may be stretched to keep off the sun.

As it is customary for the married sons to remain under their parents' roofs and bring up families, a house may often have forty or fifty inmates exclusive of the servants and slaves.

Opening into the first court on the ground floor, in smaller houses, are the principal apartments, the women's apartments being either in an inner court or on the floor above; but in larger houses where there are several courts, the first floor of the first court is used for the reception rooms, one large chamber being specially reserved for entertaining guests, who are treated with great honour (Lk 22^{12}, Ac 1^{13} 9^{37} 20^{8}). In addition to the guest-chamber of the house, in every village or encampment there is a public guest-room for entertainment of strangers, kept up at the expense of the inhabitants (cf. Gn 18^{1}, Ex 2^{20}, Jg 13^{15} $19^{17f.}$). In wealthy houses the principal reception chamber opening into the first court is highly ornamented, paved with marble, with a fountain, and at the farther end the floor is raised and called the liwan, with a divan running round the sides, formed of mattresses and cushions covered with carpets. The ceilings and walls are elaborately ornamented and brilliantly painted (Jer 22^{14} of a palace).

Moslems drop the slipper or shoe at the door when they enter an inner room or step on to the liwan. And this is necessary both for comfort and cleanliness, as they sit with their feet tucked under them; but it would not be safe to assume that this custom prevailed among the Hebrews in early days in private life, though it was their custom so far as sacred ground was concerned (Ex 3^{5}, Jos 5^{15}, Lk 7^{38}). There is no clear indication of the Hebrews before the Captivity having used a divan on a raised liwan, and the words signifying 'seats' in the Hebrew do not throw much light on the subject. The ancient Egyptians are shown in one picture squatting on the ground at dinner (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 58, 181). A bas-relief on the walls of Khorsabad represents the guests seated on high chairs at a festival (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 411).

The inner courts are often planted with fine trees, and the interior walls, verandahs, and staircase clothed with vines and creepers.

Ewald (Geschichte^{2}, iii. 451, 602) suggests that the 'armōn, 'keep,' of a palace was the harem or women's apartment, the most securely guarded portion of Eastern houses; but Gesenius (Lex.) says, 'None of the ancients rendered the word "women's apartment," as very many of late have done, after J. D. Michaelis,' and gives the meaning as 'fortress,' 'palace' (so Oxf. Heb. Lex., and Siegfried-Stade). The harem of the king of Persia is spoken of in Est 2^{3}, and also the chamberlain, keeper of the women. It is also probable that king Solomon, after his foreign marriages, kept a harem at Jerusalem; but this was not part of the life of the Hebrews. And the customs of Moslems regarding the seclusion of women can throw little light upon the customs of people among whom the sexes were on almost equal terms.

The doors of the inner court are not usually furnished with locks and bolts, and a curtain is often all that separates it from the outer court, the idea being that all is private within the outer gate or outer court (Dt 24^{10}, Ac 10^{17} 12^{13}).

The upper rooms of the house are called the 'ăliyah, which is also the Hebrew word (עֲלִיָּה) for upper chamber. Thomson (Land and the Book, i. 235) states that in northern Syria this is the most desirable part of the establishment, is best fitted up, and is still given to guests who are to be treated with honour. The women and servants live below, and their apartment is called 'arḍiyeh, or ground floor; in common parlance beit, or house. Every respectable dwelling has both winter and summer house, beit shatawy and beit seify. If these are on the same floor, then the exterior and airy apartment is the summer-house, and that for winter is the interior and more sheltered room (2 K 4^{10}, Jer 36^{22}, Am 3^{15}; see Driver's note). In the Lebanon the upper rooms are used in summer and the lower rooms in winter. In some parts of the country where the cold in winter is severe, vaults under ground are used during the cold weather. With regard to the use of the roof of the house, the 'housetop,' see ROOF.

The only mention of cooking-places is in Ezk 46^{23} (the temple). The kitchens would probably, as with the Romans and Greeks, have had a hearth, with stone divisions for resting the pots on. There were no other fireplaces (Jer 36^{22} RV). It is supposed that there were no chimneys, but a smoke-hole is spoken of (Hos 13^{3}; see Window), and it is difficult to understand how the smoke could be got rid of in two-storeyed buildings without chimneys of some kind.

Leprosy of houses (Lv $14^{34.55}$) is described by Gesenius as probably a nitrous scab; Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 518) alludes to leprosy in garments and in buildings as phenomena not only unknown, but utterly unintelligible at this day.

In considering the household arrangements of the Hebrews, the gradual advance of civilization and luxury must not be forgotten, and the probability that even the rich in early days lived with a roughness of surroundings which would be considered as squalor in later days. The influence of the Greeks and Romans on the customs of Palestine and the East has also to be considered. In the very earliest days of the entry of the Hebrews into the Promised Land, the Philistines from Caphtor (which is generally identified with Crete) were in possession of the lowlands of Judah; from B.C. 332 to B.C. 63 Palestine was more or less directly under Greek influence, and from the latter date for many centuries it was directly under Roman influence. The customs of the people have therefore been influenced by Egypt, Assyria, Syria, Persia, Greece, and Rome; and though the dwellings of the poor may have been little affected by these influences, there can be no doubt that those of the rich would have reflected the feelings of the masters of the day. 'How apt we all are to look at the manners of ancient times through the false medium of our everyday associations! How difficult it is to strip our thoughts of their modern garb, and to escape from the thick atmosphere of prejudice in which custom and habit have enveloped us! and yet, unless we take a comprehensive and extended view of the objects of archæological speculation, unless we can look upon ancient customs with the eyes of the ancients, unless we can transport ourselves in the spirit to other lands and other times, and sun ourselves in the clear light of bygone days, all our conception of what was done by the men who have long since ceased to be must be dim, uncertain, and unsatisfactory, and all our reproductions as soulless and uninstructive as the scattered fragments of a broken statue' (Niebuhr, Kleine Schriften, p. 92).

Chamber (bed-, guest-, inner, upper).—When a particular apartment of a house is alluded to, the word 'chamber,' 'parlour,' or 'closet' is generally used in AV, the word 'room' being used in a general sense, 'Is there room in thy father's house for us?' 'We have room to lodge in' (Gn 24^{23}), except in three instances in the NT (Mk 14^{15}, Lk 22^{12}, Ac 1^{13}).

The word 'closet' occurs only once in the OT (Jl 2^{16}), where it is used for the nuptial tent (see Driver, ad loc.), as is the word 'chamber' in Ps 19^{5}. It is used twice in NT, where it represents ταμεῖον,

'store-house' or 'closet' (Mt 6^6, Lk 12^3). The word 'parlour' is used only three times. In Jg $3^{20f.}$ the summer parlour (עֲלִיָּה) of Eglon means the roof-chamber, raised above the flat roof at one corner or upon a tower-like annexe to the building (Moore). In 1 Ch 28^{11} RV 'the inner chambers' (חֲדָרִים) is tr^{d} 'inner parlour' in AV. In 1 S 9^{22} 'parlour' is used for לִשְׁכָּה, which signifies a room in which the sacrificial meals were held (see Driver, ad loc.). In RV it is tr^{d} 'guest-chamber.'

There are thus only three Hebrew words used in connexion with chambers of houses. 1. חֶדֶר a chamber: Job 9^9 37^9 ἀποθήκη, cubiculum; inner chamber: Gn 43^{30}, 1 K 20^{30} 22^{25}, 2 K 9^2, 1 Ch 28^{11}, 2 Ch 18^{24}; bed-chamber: 2 S 4^7 13^{10}, 2 K 6^{12}, 2 Ch 22^{11}, Ec 10^{20}; women's apartment: Ca 1^4 3^4; bridal-chamber: Jg 15^1 16^9, Jl 2^{16} (chamber); store-house: Pr 24^4.

2. עֲלִיָּה (ὑπερῷον, cœnaculum), an upper chamber on the roof of a house: Jg $3^{20ff.}$ (Eglon), 2 K 1^2 (Ahaziah), 4^{11} (Elisha), 23^{12} (Ahaz).

3. לִשְׁכָּה (κατάλυμα, triclinium), a sacrificial dining-room: 1 S 9^{22}; used in later times for the chambers in the Temple Court in which the priests lived: Jer $35^{2.4}$, Ezk 40^{17} etc.

In the smaller houses there were probably no bedrooms, and in houses generally all rooms could be used for sleeping in, as is the case at the present day; but the inner chambers appear to have been more particularly set apart for sleeping, or were used as closets in which the bedding was kept (2 S 4^7, Ec 10^{20}; Jos. Ant. XII. iv. 11; 2 K 11·). The furniture of a chamber for sleeping in is given (2 K 4^{10}) as 'a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick'; its position in a retired portion of the house is indicated in Ex 8^3, 2 K 6^{12}, and other passages. Joash and his nurse were hidden in a chamber for the beds (2 K 11^2, 2 Ch 22^{11}), probably a closet for the bedding. In the poorer class of houses the place set apart for laying down the beds was often merely a portion of the common room devoted to daily avocations, with the floor somewhat raised, or else a room in which the family all slept together (Lk 11^7). The constant reference to chambers for withdrawing to and inner chambers among all classes, shows that it was usual to have more than one room in the house, except with the very poor. Houses were often two storeys in height, and the upper chamber or 'ălîyah was used for withdrawing to or sleeping in (Jg 3^{20}, 2 K 4^{11}). The chamber from which Ahaziah fell through the lattice was of this nature. Altars appear to have been erected in these upper chambers on the roof (2 K 23^{12}).

Doorway (פֶּתַח 'opening,' 'entrance'), Door (דֶּלֶת).—The doorway of the house differs from the gate of the city (שַׁעַר, πύλη, porta) in that the first was for private and the latter for public purposes. When דֶּלֶת is used of the gate of a city, it appears to differ from שַׁעַר, which denotes the whole structure, including posts, open space, etc., in being restricted to the actual door which swings on its hinges (Oxf. Heb. Lex.).

The doorway consisted of three parts:—The threshold or sill (סַף, which is used in some cases for door, 2 K 12^9 22^4, Jer 35^4), the two side posts (מְזוּזוֹת), and the lintel (מַשְׁקוֹף), Ex $12^{7f.}$. The door itself was of wood, stone, or metal, according to circumstances. Wooden and metal doors have disappeared; but in Asia Minor, and east of the Lake of Gennesaret, stone doors exist to the present day in situ, the stone hinges resting in the sockets (Burckhardt, Syria, p. 58).

These doors were often made with two leaves, and had bolts and bars (Jg 3^{23} 16^3, Neh 3^3 7^3, Ca 5^5). See Bar, Bolt, Key.

The doorways were often highly ornamented and enriched with tracery (Is 54^{12}, Rev 21^{21}), and inscribed with sentences of Scripture in accordance with the Mosaic Law, 'Thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates' (Dt 6^9 11^{20}). In Moslem countries the same practice exists at the present day. The mĕzûzâh, the distinctive mark of a Hebrew habitation, is a kind of amulet like the phylacteries, and consists of a tube of vellum, inside of which are scrolls with various scriptural texts. These at the present day are hung up inside the doorway on the doorpost. Inside the doorway was a bench for the doorkeeper and servants, and there the master of the house sat and transacted business.

The door could be broken in readily. 'They pressed, and came near to break the door' (Gn 19^9). The willing bondman was received into the household by having his ear thrust through with an awl into the door (Ex 21^6, Dt 15^{17}). The inner chamber in Amnon's house had a door with a bolt (2 S 13^{17}).

Bar (בָּרִיחַ).—(1) A cross-beam, a bar which was passed from one side to the other through the rings of the several boards of the holy tabernacle, which were thus held together (Ex $26^{26f.}$ 35^{11} $36^{31f.}$, Nu 3^{36} 4^{31}). (2) A bolt or bar for shutting a door of a gate or house.

The bar was used principally at night time (Neh 7^3, Rev 21^{25}), as it is at the present day, to keep the door closed. It was made of wood or iron (Is 45^2), and was inserted into sockets in the gateposts or doorway of houses (Ovid, Amor. i. 6). The door could not be opened until the bar was removed. Chamber doors were sometimes barred as well as bolted (2 S 13^{17}; Eurip. Orest. 154 b). The first mention of the use of bars with gates is in the account of the taking of the cities of Og king of Bashan by Moses (Dt 3^5). Samson carried away the gates of Gaza, posts, bars, and all (Jg 16^3). In the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem in the time of Artaxerxes, both bars and bolts of the gates of the city are mentioned (Neh $3^{3f.}$).

In the Bible, bars are mentioned in connexion with city gates only, and not with reference to houses. In Jon 2^6 the term is used in a metaphorical sense.—'The bars of the earth' (pictured as a house out of which Jonah is shut—Oxf. Heb. Lex.). The gates of Damascus, Jerusalem, and other walled cities in the East are closed at night and barred.

Bolt or lock (בְּרִיחַ, from the root בָּרַח, to fasten with a bolt, or to bind sandals to the feet).—In Dt 33^{25} this word (in the form כְּבָרָח) is given as 'bars' (RV) or 'shoes' (AV, RVm), κλεῖθρον, sera. The idea of binding and loosing with a key appears in Mt 16^{19} 'I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.'

The bolt or lock is referred to in connexion with the doors both of city gates and of houses; but in the two instances in which the Heb. word is tr^{d} 'lock' in AV, it is given as 'bolt' in RV (Ca 5^5, Neh $3^{3f.}$). It does not appear that city gates and palaces which had both bars and bolts would require the bolt to be opened with a key, both because they were not opened from the outside, and because guards were present to protect them from being opened by unauthorized persons (Neh $3^{3f.}$ 7^3).

The bolt was shot into a socket made to receive it in the threshold on the inside of a gate or doorway. In the Pompeian doorways two holes in the sill correspond to the two bolts of the leaves of the doors (Gell, Pompeiana, 2 ser. vol. i. p. 167); in doorways with a single leaf the bolt would shoot into a socket in the doorpost. In the Odyssey (i. 442, iv. 802, xxi. 6, 46–50) the door was drawn to with a silver ring and the bolt fastened with a thong; to open the door from the outside the thong of the ring was loosed, and the 'well bent key' (of brass with an ivory handle) was put in, and by means of it the bolt was struck back. By degrees improvements were made in bolts until locks and keys of very advanced design came into existence, among the Greeks and Romans. In Jg $3^{23f.}$ an account is given of a door which could be locked by means of a key from inside or outside. Ehud locked the doors of Eglon's summer parlour, and Eglon's servants, after waiting for their master to open the doors from the inside, took a key and opened them from the outside. In Ca $5^{4.5}$ reference is made to the hole in the door through which the hand was put in with the key in withdrawing the bolt; the handles of the lock (AV) or bolt (RV) are also mentioned. 'My beloved put in his hand by the hole in the door.' In Dt 33^{25} bars or bolts are spoken of as of iron and brass. Reference to the bolting of an inner chamber is made in the account of Amnon and Tamar (2 S $13^{17f.}$). Ancient Egyptian doors, with two leaves, had central bolts and bars (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 15).

Key (מַפְתֵּחַ, from the root פָּתַח, 'open,' κλείς, clavis). This instrument to open a lock or withdraw a bolt is mentioned only once in its literal sense (Jg $3^{25f.}$). In other instances the term is used figuratively (Is 22^{22}, Lk 11^{52}, Mt 16^{19}) as a symbol to denote power and authority delegated to a steward, chamberlain, or minister, 'And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder; and he shall open and none shall shut: and he shall shut and none shall open.' Merchants and others at the present day in Palestine and Egypt are accustomed to carry large keys of wood or iron over their shoulders, if too long to hang at the girdle. Thomson (Land and the Book, i. 493) mentions the enormous wooden keys used in Palestine; in some cases almost a load to carry.

The lock or bolt for magazines, houses, and garden gates is made of wood and hollowed out, about 2 ft. long for a gate and 6 to 9 in. long for a chamber door. It slides through a groove in a piece of wood attached to the door, and shoots into a socket in the doorpost or sill. When the bolt is shot, some pins in the groove drop into corresponding holes in the bolt, and it cannot be withdrawn without an instrument to force up these pins out of the holes and pull the bolt back. This instrument is called the key, and consists of a piece of wood furnished with a number of pins in exactly the same position (reversed). It is introduced into the hollow bolt, and, raising the groove pins, it draws back the bolt. Unless these pins exactly fit, the bolt cannot be released (Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 42).

In some cases doors were sealed with clay. Job 38^{14} 'It is changed as clay under the seal.' At Athens a jealous husband sometimes sealed the door of the woman's apartment (Aristoph. Thesm. 422). The king sealed with his own signet the stone brought to the den of lions into which Daniel was cast (Dn 6^{17}). The sepulchre of our Lord was made sure by sealing the stone at the door (Mt 27^{66}).

Hinge (צִיר).—In early days doors were poised, not hung, on hinges (Pr 26^{14}); that is to say, hinges were door-pivots let into sockets in the threshold and lintel on which the door swung. Remains of stone doors with the hinges or pivots attached are found in various parts of Syria and Egypt and Asia Minor.

The Greeks and Romans used hinges for doors like those now in use in Europe; four hinges of bronze are preserved in the British Museum.

Knock (דָּפַק).—There is no mention of a knocker having been affixed to doors, as with the Greeks and Romans. In Jg 19^{22} the word (מְהַתְדַּפְקִים) is used of beating violently (till they were tired) against a door. In Ca 5^{2} we hear of the beloved knocking (דֹּפֵק) at the door. At the present day one stands on the outside of the house and knocks, and calls loudly (Mt 7^{7}, Lk 12^{36} 13^{25}, Ac 12^{13}, Rev 3^{20}).

Window (חַלּוֹן, θυρίς).—The Hebrew word is derived from the root חָלַל 'pierce.' This word appears to be used generally where the windows of houses are referred to, which originally were but openings pierced in the walls, without shutters. The word casement in Pr 7^{6} (AV) appears as lattice in RV, being the tr^{n} of 'eshnâb. The windows in Daniel's chamber, open towards Jerusalem (Dn 6^{10} [Heb. ^{11}]), represent an Aram. word (כְּרִין) whose derivation is quite uncertain (the root כוא means to burn). The words (מְחַוֵּה אֶל־מְחַוֵּה) tr^{d} 'light over against light' (1 K $7^{4.5}$) are derived from חָזָה 'see.' The meaning of שְׁקָפִים and שְׁקָף in same verses tr^{d} 'windows' in AV is uncertain. There are three words signifying 'lattice-' or 'net-work' filling up the aperture of a window. 1. אֲרֻבָּה. It is used to denote the smoke-hole of a room (Hos 13^{3}); the windows of a dove-cote (Is 60^{8}); and the aperture of the window as being closed with lattice-work and not with glass. It is also used for the 'windows of heaven' (Gn 7^{11} 8^{2}, 2 K $7^{2.19}$, Is 24^{18}, Mal 3^{10}). 2. חַרַכִּים (Aram.) lattice-work or net-work of a window, Ca 2^{9} (only), 'He glanceth through the windows.' 3. אֶשְׁנָב (of doubtful etym. synonymous with חַלּוֹן), lattice through which the cold air passes (?). Jg 5^{28} 'The mother of Sisera looked down (see Moore) through the lattice'; Pr 7^{6} 'In at the window of my house I looked forth through my casement' ('lattice' RV) [all].

There is another word tr^{d} 'lattice,'—שְׂבָכָה, lattice- or net-work, which is principally used with reference to the lattice- or net-work surrounding the capitals of the columns (1 K $7^{17f.}$), but it is also used for the lattice or balustrade in the upper chamber of Ahaziah in Samaria through which he fell; this word has probably no connexion with window.

At the present time in Eastern towns there is usually a large window prominently projecting over the doorway into the street, and fitted with lattice-work, which is opened only upon the occasion of high ceremonies. It is probable that in early days also one or perhaps more windows of the palaces and larger houses opened into the street, as there is constant reference to windows opening into the street or into the city wall. In the houses of the poorer classes, however, it is doubtful whether any windows existed, and what did exist were only apertures to admit light and let out the smoke. At the present day in the houses in the Lebanon the walls of the rooms are perforated with small openings (in addition to the windows), which let in light and air. Where there are courts, however, there are windows opening inwards. Among the Greeks, windows were not uncommon (Aristoph. Thesm. 797). The Romans had few windows, the bedrooms being lighted from the principal apartments, and the rooms on the upper floor only being lighted from the street (Juv. iii. 270). In Pompeii it can be seen how very few houses have windows opening on to the streets, and even in these cases the sills of the windows are over 6 ft. above the footway, and are very small, about 3 ft. by 2 ft.

The discoveries at Pompeii prove that glass was used for windows under the early emperors, as glass windows have been found in several of the houses; glass may therefore have been in use in Palestine in the houses of the wealthy at an earlier date. Pliny (c. 70 A.D., HN xxxvi. 45) states that windows were made of mica, from countries near Palestine, viz. Cyprus and Cappadocia.

The references in the Bible to windows to look out from are almost all in connexion with palaces.

'Abimelech king of the Philistines looked out at a window' (Gn 26^{8}). The mother of Sisera looked forth through a window (Jg 5^{28}). 'Michal the daughter of Saul looked out at the window' (2 S 6^{16}). 'Jezebel looked out at the window' (2 K 9^{30}). In the following cases, however, there are windows in houses of the less opulent classes—Rahab the harlot let the spies down through a window on the town wall of Jericho (Jos 2^{15}); Elisha when sick in his own house directed king Joash to 'open the window eastward' (2 K 13^{17}); St. Paul at Damascus was let down by the wall in a basket through a window (2 Co 11^{33}); Eutychus, asleep on the window-seat of an upper chamber at Troas, fell down from the third storey, ἀπὸ τοῦ τριστέγου (Ac 20^{9}). Windows are spoken of (Jer 22^{14}) in connexion with a wide house and spacious chambers, ceiled with cedar and painted with vermilion. It is threatened (Jl 2^{9}) that locusts shall enter in at the windows like a thief. The pelican and the porcupine singing in the windows is a sign of desolation (Zeph 2^{14}).

HOW.—1. How is sometimes used for 'that,' introducing a dependent sentence which states a fact, without reference to the manner of it. Thus 1 S 2^{22} (RV 'how that'), 1 Ch 18^{9} 'Now when Tou king of Hamath heard how David had smitten all the host of Hadarezer king of Zobah' (RV 'that'); especially in NT (Gr. ὅτι), Lk 1^{58} 21^{5} ('And as some spake of the temple, how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts'), Jn 4^{1} 12^{19} 14^{28}, Ac 14^{27} ('they rehearsed all that God had done with them, and how he had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles,' RV 'how that'), 20^{35}, Gal 4^{13}, Philem 19, Ja 2^{22} ('Seest thou how faith wrought with his works,' RV 'Thou seest that'), Rev 2^{3}. Cf. Shaks. Tit. Andron. II. iii. 207—

> 'Now will I fetch the king to find them here,
> That he thereby may give a likely guess
> How these were they that made away his brother.'

2. Still more frequently we find 'how that' where mod. usage would use 'that' alone. Ex 9^{29} 'that thou mayest know how that the earth is the LORD'S' (כִּי, RV 'that'), 10^{2}, Dt 1^{31}, Jos 9^{24}, Ru 1^{6}, 1 S $24^{10.\ 18}$, 2 S 18^{19}, 1 K 5^{3}, 2 K 9^{25} etc., and esp. in NT (again for ὅτι). The older versions have this form yet oftener, as in Tindale, Gn 20^{13} 'This kyndnesse shalt thou shewe unto me in all places where we come, that thou saye of me, how that I am thy brother'; Mt 6^{18} 'that it appere not unto men howe that thou fastest'; Jn 9^{18} 'But the Jewes dyd not beleue of the felowe, how that he was blynde and receaved his syght.'

Howbeit (=nevertheless, notwithstanding) is common. In writers of the period 'howbeit' sometimes stands for 'notwithstanding that,' 'although,' as Melvill, Diary, p. 371, 'the King sattelit and dimitted us pleasandlie, with many attestationes that he knew nocht of the Papist Lords' hom-coming till they war in the countrey; and whowbeit the esteates had licenced them to mak thair offers, they sould nocht be receaved till they tham selves war furthe of the countrey again.'

Howsoever is once found with its parts separated, 2 S 24^{3} 'how many soever they be.' Cf. Knox, Hist. p. 30, 'how suspitious and infamous so ever they were.' Howsoever means either 'in whatever way,' Zeph 3^{7} 'howsoever I punished them'; or 'come what may' (rather more than 'nevertheless') Jg 19^{20}, 2 S $18^{22.\ 23}$. J. HASTINGS.

HOZAI (חוֹזַי) is given as a prop. name in RV of 2 Ch 33^{19}, where AV and RVm give 'the seers.' AVm has Hosai, LXX τῶν ὁρώντων. The latter may have read חֹזִים, which appears to be supported also by the Syriac. If we retain the MT, the tr. of RV seems the only defensible one; but perhaps the original reading was חוֹזָיו 'his seers' (so Kittel in Haupt, ad loc.). J. A. SELBIE.

HUCKSTER.—Huckster is properly the fem. of 'hawker,' but the distinction between the Anglo-Sax. fem. termination -ster and the masc. term. -er was early obliterated. The root of the word is held by Skeat to be Du. hucken, to stoop (under a load). The huckster has always been distinguished from the merchant as a retailer of small wares, a pedlar; and the word has from very early times carried a certain opprobrium. Thus Sir T. Moore, Workes, p. 1304, 'To shewe him selfe a substanciall merchaunt and not an hukster, he gently let them have it even at their owne price'; and Glanvill, Vanity of Dogmatizing, Pref., 'Therefore I seek no applause from the disgrace of others, nor will I huckster-like discredit any man's ware, to recommend mine own.' The word occurs in Sir 26^{29} (and in the heading to the chapter) 'A merchant shall hardly keep himself from doing wrong; and an huckster shall not be freed from sin' (κάπηλος, which occurs elsewhere in LXX only Is 1^{22}, and not at all in NT, though the vb. καπηλεύω is found in 2 Co 2^{17}, EV 'corrupt,' RVm 'make merchandise of'). Here the κάπηλος stands parallel to the ἔμπορος, and the charge of not being without sin applies equally to both. The sentiment is in accordance with Rabbinic notions. See Edersheim's note. J. HASTINGS.

HUKKOK (חֻקָּק).—A place near Tabor on the west of Naphtali, Jos 19^{34}. It is the present village Yâkûk (but see Dillm. Josua, ad loc.), near the edge of the plateau to the N.W. of the Sea of Galilee, between Tabor and Hannathon, marking the border of Zebulun and Naphtali, Jos 19^{14}.

LITERATURE.—SWP vol. i. sh. vi.; Guérin, Galilée, i. 354 ff.; Robinson, BRP^{2} iii. 81 f.; Asher, Benj. of Tudela, ii. 421, where R. Parchi locates the tomb of the prophet Habakkuk at Yâkûk. C. R. CONDER.

HUKOK (חוּקֹק) of 1 Ch 6^{75} [Heb.^{60}] is a textual error for Helkath (which see) of Jos 21^{31}.

HUL (חוּל).—The eponym of an Aramæan tribe (Gn 10^{23}) whose location is quite uncertain. The various attempts that have been made to establish its identity will be found in Dillmann, who does not consider that any of them has been successful.

HULDAH (חֻלְדָּה 'weasel' (?); for bearing of this name on Totem theory, see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 90, 101, 103).—A prophetess who lived during the reign of Josiah. All we know concerning her is recorded in 2 K 22^{14-20} (reproduced almost verbatim in 2 Ch 34^{22-28}). She is described as the wife of Shallum 'the keeper of the wardrobe,' who dwelt in the second quarter (mishneh) of the city. See COLLEGE. In spite of our scanty information, she must have had a well-recognized standing as a prophetess, for it was to H. that the messengers of Josiah betook themselves when they were sent to 'inquire of the Lord.' The king's alarm at the contents of the book found in the temple by Hilkiah was only partially allayed by the answer of H., which was in many points far from reassuring, although Josiah on account of his personal piety was to escape the worst of the coming evils. J. A. SELBIE.

HUMILITY (עֲנָוָה, ταπεινοφροσύνη; on the special Christian sense of the latter and on its relation to πραότης, see Trench, NT Syn.^{8} 142 ff.).—In one aspect the whole Bible may be viewed as a revelation of the character of God, and the divine love of humility is a feature of that character which is traceable throughout. In Ps 18[35] 113[6] the virtue of humility is attributed to God Himself, who humbleth Himself to behold the things that are in heaven and earth; and recent advances in our knowledge, both of the infinitely great in heaven and of the infinitely little on earth, have deepened our wonder at God's providence, at the contrast of His greatness and His minute care for the least of His works (cf. Mt 10[29. 30]). But, after all, our words 'great' and 'little' can have no direct significance to Him who is absolute and eternal; and, while in men different qualities often stand out sharply distinct, in the transparent simplicity of the divine character we at once see through the humility to the love which underlies it; so that on both grounds it seems unnatural to us to dwell upon 'the great God's great humbleness,' in distinction from the love that moved Him to create, and to deign to take notice of that which He created.

But when we turn to consider the Bible record of God's dealings with the moral natures of men, there is scarcely any divine characteristic so marked as that which is expressed in the words, 'Surely he scorneth the scorners, but he giveth grace to the lowly' (Pr 3[34]=Ja 4[6]), and 'Thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy: I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones' (Is 57[15]). From Babel (Gn 11[4]) to Nebuchadnezzar (Dn 4[30. 37]), from the song of Hannah (1 S 2[3]) to the Magnificat (Lk 1[51]), the lessons of history and the insight of the prophet have taught that 'pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall' (Pr 16[18]), while 'blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth' (Ps 37[11]= Mt 5[5]). Especially is the duty of humility enforced in Ps and Pr and in some of the Prophets. For though God is known to bless the humble, yet the sense of His special favour is apt to beget pride, and therefore the Deuteronomist and Ezekiel are led to insist on the utter absence of merit in Israel; and to explain that God's choice of His people was not determined by any good qualities in them on which they should pride themselves (Dt 7[7] 8[17. 18] 9[4-7] 26[5] 32[10], Ezk 16, where Jerus. is charged with having used God's gifts to minister to her own vanity, cf. Ro 11[17-24]); while Amos protests that other races besides the children of Israel are equally the objects of God's providence, 9[7-10].

So far, the Bible idea might not seem to be very far removed from the familiar conception of Herodotus and the Greek tragedians, that God looks askance as with envy on human presumption, and even on innocent success. Yet the Bible at least dwells rather on God's love of the lowly than on His hatred of the proud, and there is no sign of His displeasure at mere prosperity. But our sense of the contrast between the Greek idea and that of the Bible will be deepened if we consider the relations of humility to other virtues.

(1) Humility towards God is based on truth. It is the simple recognition of facts as they really are —see Ro 12[3]. No man can dare to boast before God (Ps 143[2], 1 Co 1[29]), and whatever of merit or success he has he owes to God's bounty (1 Co 4[7]). Hence walking humbly with God is put by Micah (6[8]) as a climax after doing justly and loving mercy. Pride comes from forgetting God and forming false judgments on oneself or others from the world's standpoint, e.g. Dt 8[17. 18], Is 10[12-15], Lk 17[10] 18[10-14], 2 Co 10[12]. (2) From man's dependence upon God follows the principle that there can be no true advance without readiness to receive grace, i.e. humility. God demands of man that he should humbly ask for help, that he should open his mouth wide that God may fill it. St. Paul attributes the Jews' failure to their not subjecting themselves to this condition (Ro 10[3]). Abraham is an example of the humility whose prayer God hears (Gn 18[27-32]). (3) As sons who owe all to their Father, men are bound to obey, and humility is thus closely connected with obedience. The command to perform acts, even those which to the natural man seem foolish, is the test of the humility and faith which God will bless: thus Naaman (2 K 5[13]). Similarly, circumcision is, in metaphor, connected with humility (Lv 26[41], Dt 10[16] 30[6]). (4) In 2 Ch 32[26] 33[12] 34[27] repentance and conversion are identified with humbling oneself. God sends chastisements to humble men and bring them to a better mind (Ps 119[75], La 3[33] עָנָה, the same root as is commonly used for humble); but man can refuse to learn the lesson (Ex 10[3], 2 Ch 36[12. 13]). Fasting as a self-imposed chastisement is often connected with humility (1 K 21[27. 29], Ezr 8[21] etc.).

Humility as regards one's fellow-men fills a much smaller space, especially in OT, than humility towards God. It was often inculcated by Christ (Mt 18[1-4] 20[25-28]); and St. Paul connects it directly with love (1 Co 13[4]), while jealousy and envy, sins which have their root in pride, are reckoned among the manifest works of the flesh (Gal 5[20. 21]). So in Ph 2[3-5] he condemns faction and vainglory, and commends the 'lowliness of mind' in which each counts 'other better than himself; not looking each of you to his own things, but each of you also to the things of others.' Such a 'mind' conforms to the pattern of the humility of the Son of God, who emptied Himself and became incarnate.

We can only touch lightly on the humility of Christ, which was shown in His earthly life from beginning to end. He abhorred not the Virgin's womb, and the lowly circumstances of His birth have ever been the theme of Christian artists and poets. The humility of the thirty years' subjection to His parents, and of the three years of unceasing toil, privation, and opposition, was crowned when He endured the cross, despising shame (He 12[2]). We may notice specially His praying (Lk 9[18] etc.), His admitting weariness, distress, and pain (Jn 4[6], Mk 14[34], Jn 19[28]), and the solemn words and acts by which He inculcated humility (Mt 11[29] and Jn 13[12-16]). At the same time, He asserted His authority (e.g. to forgive sins, to judge men, to found an undying Church); He proclaimed Himself as the only way to God, etc. (Jn 14[6]); He claimed that He alone knew the Father of right (Mt 11[27]). And He felt and expressed burning indignation at bigotry, hypocrisy, and blind self-complacency. St. Paul followed His example, and in him too we see that humility is compatible with righteous indignation, and even with just and true self-assertion.

It is worth observing also that St. Peter, who was at first the type of self-reliant boldness (Mt 16[22] 26[33-35]), is afterwards particularly careful to dwell on the need of humility (1 P 2[13. 17. 20] 3[4. 8] 5[3. 5. 6]).

HUNGER.—See FOOD.

HUNTING (צוּד, θηρεύειν, ἀγρεύειν, venor, capio, capio venatione, capio prædam, 'to hunt'; צַיִד, צֵידָה, 'hunting,' 'venison'; צַיָּד, θηρευτής, venator, 'hunter'; חַיָּה, θηρίον, especially in חַיַּת הָאָרֶץ, τὸ θηρίον τῆς γῆς, τὸ θηρίον τὸ ἄγριον, bestia terræ, agri, etc.).

When the earliest extant documents originated, the Israelites had not only passed out of, but had entirely forgotten that Israel ever passed through, that stage in the development of primitive tribes at which men's chief business and resource is hunting. Adam (Gn 3^{17}) and Cain (4^{2}) cultivate the soil, and Abel is a shepherd (ib.). Israel, in the persons of Isaac and Jacob, is contrasted with the hunting tribes, Ishmael, the 'archer' (Gn 21^{20} E), and Esau, the 'cunning hunter' (Gn 25^{27} J); it is Nimrod, the founder of Assyria, who is 'a mighty hunter before J"' (Gn 10^{9} R). Hebrew, however, preserves a trace of the hunting stage of primitive society. צֵידָה ṣêdâh, by etymology 'hunting' or 'game,' and so used in Kethîbh of Gn 27^{3}, is regularly used for provision (Gn 42^{25} etc.); thus suggesting a time when game was the ordinary food.

Moreover, in historic times, hunting was neither a common nor a favourite occupation in Israel. The account of Jacob and Esau shows that the Israelites were not addicted to hunting. Other references to hunting are general and casual; no actual hunt is ever mentioned. The references to lions, leopards, bears, etc. etc., and the lists of clean and unclean animals (Dt 14), show that both big and small game were abundant. But the only instances we meet with are where a shepherd or wayfarer has to defend himself or his charge; cf. the supposed fate of Joseph (Gn 37^{33}), Samson (Jg 14^{6} 15^{4}), David (1 S 17^{34-37}), Benaiah (2 S 23^{20}, apparently something more than an act of self-defence), the unnamed prophet of 1 K 13^{24}; cf. also Is 5^{29} 31^{4}, Am 3^{12}. On the other hand, the allusions in Lv 17^{13}, 1 S 26^{20} 'as when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains,' Job 10^{16} 38^{39} 41^{26}, Pr 12^{27} etc. etc., show that the Israelites were familiar with hunting; and the gazelle (צְבִי) and the hart (אַיָּל) are referred to as ordinary articles of diet (Dt $12^{15.\ 22}$), and are mentioned with the roebuck (יַחְמוּר 1 K 4^{23}) as part of the provision made for Solomon's table. Bows and arrows (Gn 27^{3}), slings (1 S 17^{40}), nets (Job 19^{6}, Ps 9^{15}, Is 51^{20} etc.), snares and traps (פַּח Am 3^{5}, מוֹקֵשׁ Am 3^{5}), cf. the group of terms in Job 18^{8-10}, were used to catch game, especially wild birds. Also pits (פַּחַת Is 24^{17}, שַׁחַת Ps 35^{7}) were dug as traps for larger animals; and sometimes a net was concealed (Ps 35^{7}) in such a pit. The few references to hunting furnish us with names of some of the animals hunted and instruments used, but afford scarcely any data as to details in the nature of the instruments or the methods of hunting.

The comparative indifference of the Israelites to hunting is the more striking when we remember how devoted Egyptian and Assyrian kings and nobles were to the pursuit; their monuments depict many hunting scenes. It is true that our Hebrew documents probably come from the central districts at a time when they were too densely populated for much sport. We might hear more of hunting if we had earlier writings from the frontier lands south of Judah and east of Jordan.

In the Apocrypha we read in Sirach of a decoy partridge in a cage (11^{30}), of a gazelle taken in a snare (27^{20}), and of the use of game for food (36^{19}).

Jos. (Ant. IV. viii. 9) refers to hunting dogs, which are never mentioned in OT, and tells us that Herod the Great was a mighty hunter (Ant. XV. vii. 7, XVI. x. 3; BJ I. xxi. 13).

NT only uses a few metaphors borrowed from hunting (e.g. Lk 11^{54} θηρεῦσαι; Lk 21^{35}, Ro 11^{9}, 1 Ti 3^{7} 6^{9}, 2 Ti 2^{26}, παγίς; Mt 22^{15} παγιδεύειν). See, further, NET, SNARE, and the articles on animals.

HUPHAM (חוּפָם, LXX omits), Nu 26^{39}. — See HUPPIM.

HUPPAH (חֻפָּה 'canopy,' 'chamber').—A priest of the 13th course, 1 Ch 24^{13}. See GENEALOGY.

HUPPIM (חֻפִּים, perh. 'coverings').—The head of a Benjamite family, his precise parentage being obscure, Gn 46^{21} P, 1 Ch $7^{12.\ 15}$, Nu 26^{39} (Hupham) P.

HUR (חוּר).—1. (Ὦρ) mentioned with Aaron as the companion of Moses during the battle between the Israelites under Joshua and the Amalekites (Ex $17^{10.\ 12}$). He was also with Aaron while Moses ascended Mt. Sinai (Ex 24^{14}; all E).

2. (Ὦρ) a Judahite, the grandfather of Bezalel the chief artificer of the Tabernacle (Ex 31^{2}= 35^{30} 38^{22}; all P). The Chronicler traces back his descent through Caleb and Hezron to Perez (1 Ch $2^{19.\ 20.\ 50}$ 4^{1-4}, 2 Ch 1^{5}), while Josephus (Ant. III. ii. 4, vi. 1) makes this Hur the husband of Miriam and identical with Hur No. 1 above.

3. (Οὖρ) one of the five kings of Midian, who, with Balaam, were slain by the Israelites under Phinehas after the 'matter of Peor' (Nu 31^{8}). The incident is referred to in Jos 13^{21}, where the kings are described as 'chiefs' (נְשִׂיאִים) of Midian, and 'princes' (נְסִיכִים) of Sihon, king of the Amorites.

4. According to the Hebrew, an Ephraimite, the father of one of the twelve officers of Solomon who 'provided victuals for the king and his household every month' (1 K 4^{8}, where RV reads BEN-HUR). Klostermann (in loc.) restores 'Azariah, the son of Zadok the priest (from v.^{2}), in Beth-horon in the hill-country of Ephraim.' He appeals to B and Luc. Βαιώρ, which he regards as an error for Βαιθώρ=Beth-horon (בֵּית־חוֹרוֹן, corrupted in the Hebrew to בֶּן־חוּר; A Βὲν υἱὸς Ὦρ). The further reading of A (Βεέν) he takes as presupposing בחן, in itself a corruption of הַכֹּהֵן=the priest. K.'s conjectural emendation of the text is very ingenious, but can hardly be considered as probable. No doubt the text is corrupt, and it seems probable that the name of the officer in question has been lost.

5. (LXX omits) The father of Rephaiah, who ruled over half the district of Jerusalem and assisted Nehemiah in repairing the walls (Neh 3^{9}).

HURAM (חוּרָם).—1. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8^{5}). See GENEALOGY. 2. 3. See HIRAM.

HURI (חוּרִי).—A Gadite, 1 Ch 5^{14}. See GENEALOGY.

HUSBANDRY.—The 'husband' is originally the 'master of the house' (Icel. hús, a 'house,' and búandi, 'inhabiting'), but the word is used in AV only in the mod. sense of a married man. See FAMILY, MARRIAGE.

So a husbandman is a householder, as Mt 20^{1} Wyc. 'The kyngdam of hevenes is lic to an husbond man' (Tind. and all others 'householder'), but in AV it always means a tiller of the ground, a farmer. Then 'husbandry' is first the occupation of a husbandman, 2 Ch 26^{10} 'he had much cattle, both in the low country and in the plains: husbandmen also, and vinedressers in the mountains, and in Carmel: for he loved husbandry' (אַדָמָה, lit., as AVm, 'ground'); 1 Es 4^{6} 'Those that are no soldiers, and have not to do with wars, but use husbandry' (γεωργοῦσιν τὴν γῆν); Sir 7^{15} 'Hate not laborious work, neither husbandry' (γεωργίαν). But, secondly, in 1 Co 3^{9} 'husbandry' is used figuratively in the sense of 'that which is cultivated': 'ye are God's husbandry' (θεοῦ γεώργιον, lit., as RVm, 'God's field'). The first meaning is common. Thus Shaks. As You Like It, II. iii. 65—

> 'But, poor old man, thou prun'st a rotten tree,
> That cannot so much as a blossom yield,
> In lieu of all thy pains and husbandry.'

Golding, Justine, fol. 181, 'The women have all the doyng in houskeping and husbandrie, and the men geve themselfs to warre and robbyng.' The second meaning is rare, being in 1 Co 3^9 an adaptation of the word to suit the Gr., as Shaks. uses 'husbandry' of the product of husbandry in Henry V. v. ii. 39—

> 'Alas! she hath from France too long been chased,
> And all her husbandry doth lie on heaps,
> Corrupting in its own fertility.'

HUSHAH (חוּשָׁה, Ὡσάν), the son of Ezer, the son of Hur (see Hur 2), and therefore of the tribe of Judah. Probably H. represents the name of a place, otherwise unknown, in Judah (1 Ch 4^4). See Hushathite.

HUSHAI (חוּשַׁי, Χουσεί, Chusai).—An Archite (2 S 15^{32} $17^{5.\ 14}$), i.e. a native of 'the border of the Archites' (Jos 16^2) to the W. of Bethel. See Arbite. He is further described as 'the friend of David' (רֵעַ דָּוִד 15^{37}), while at 2 S 16^{16} the two titles are united. It is probable, therefore, that the LXX is right in reading 'the Archite, the friend of David,' at 2 S 15^{32}, though its rendering ὁ ἀρχιέταιρος represents a strange combination of the gentilic name (in a Græcized form) and ἑταῖρος, the whole='chief companion.' At the rebellion of Absalom he was induced by David to act as if he favoured the cause of the king's son. By so doing he was enabled both to defeat the plans of Ahithophel and to keep David informed (by means of Ahimaaz and Jonathan, the sons of Zadok and Abiathar the priests) of the progress of events in Jerusalem (2 S 16^{16}–17^{23}). He is probably to be identified with the father of Baana, one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers (1 K 4^{16}). G. Buchanan Gray (Hebrew Proper Names, p. 323) suggests that חוּשַׁי may be a parallel formation to אֲבִישַׁי (Abishai), the א being dropped as in חִירָם, חִיאֵל.

HUSHAM.—A king of Edom, Gn $36^{34.\ 35}$ (חֻשָׁם)= 1 Ch $1^{45.\ 46}$ (חוּשָׁם).

HUSHATHITE (חֻשָׁתִי; B ὁ Ἀσταρωθεί, Ἀνωθειτης, Ἀθεί, Θωσαθεί, Ἰσαθεί; A Ἀουσαστωνθεί, Ἀσωθειτης, Ἰαθεί (א ὁ Ἀσωθι), Οὐσαθι), probably=an inhabitant of Husha. This description is applied to Sibbecai (wh. see), one of David's 'thirty' heroes (2 S 21^{18}= 1 Ch 20^4, 2 S 23^{27}=1 Ch 11^{29} 27^{11}). In the latter passage of 2 S the Hebrew reads מְבֻנַּי (Mebunnai), but a comparison with the parallel lists makes it clear that we must read Sibbecai as in 21^{18} (סִבְּכַי). B A read ἐκ τῶν υἱῶν (=מִבְּנֵי); but many MSS have Σαβουχαί, Luc. Σαβενί. In 1 Ch 11^{29} 27^{11} the gentilic name appears as Hushshathite (הַחֻשָׁתִי).

HUSHIM (חֻשִׁים).—1. The eponym of a Danite family, Gn 46^{23}, called in Nu 26^{42} Shuham. In 1 Ch 7^{12} Hushim seems to be a Benjamite, but it is possible that for 'sons of Aher' we should read 'sons of another' (אַחֵר, not a proper name), i.e. Dan (so QPB, ad loc.). See further Genealogy, VIII. 6 note. 2. The wife of Shaharaim the Benjamite, 1 Ch 8^8 (חוּשִׁים) 8^{11} (חֻשִׁים). J. A. Selbie.

HUSKS (κεράτια).—These are the pods of the Carob Tree, Ceratonia Siliqua, L., the kharnûb or kharrûb of the Arabs. It is a fine tree with a hemispherical comus, often 40 ft. in diameter. The foliage is dark, glossy evergreen. The leaves are pinnate, of three to four pairs of oblong, obtuse to retuse, or obovate leaflets, 2 to 3 in. long, and 1½ to 2 broad. The tree is dicœcious. The flowers are in short racemes, the staminate reduced to five stamens on a top-shaped calyx. The pods are from 5 to 10 in. long, 1 to 1½ broad, and ¼ to ⅓ of an in. thick. They consist of a leathery case, enclosing a sweet pulpy substance, in which the seeds are embedded. This pulp is edible and nutritious, and often eaten by the poorer people. The pods are ground and boiled, in order to extract the saccharine substance, which has the colour and consistence of treacle, and is used as food. The name St. John's Bread, applied to these pods, is from a tradition that they were the locusts which that prophet ate in the wilderness (Mt 3^4, Mk 1^6). But this tradition is contrary to the text of the Gospels. There are also no carob trees in the wilderness. There can be no doubt as to the possibility of the prodigal son eating the pods (Lk 15^{16}).

HUZZAB (הֻצַּב).—A word of uncertain meaning, which occurs only in Nah 2^7. It may be taken either as a verb or a noun. Gesenius adopts the former of these alternatives, connects the word with the preceding verse, and translates, 'the palace is dissolved and made to flow down' (הֻצַּב being Hoph. of יָצַב, unused in Qal=flow). Others make it Hoph. of נָצַב and tr. 'it is decreed' (RVm). Far better suited to the context is the interpretation followed in the text of both AV and RV, which finds in H. a reference to the Assyr. queen. It may be questioned, indeed, whether the Massoretic vocalization of the word is correct. Both Luther and Wellhausen content themselves with the simple rendering 'die Königin'; Kautzsch leaves the clause untranslated, holding that the text is corrupt, and that הצב represents a noun with the article, which is intended to be a designation of the queen of Assyria. Wellhausen (Klein. Prophet. 32, 158) suggests that Assyriology may yet clear up the question. The LXX ἡ ὑπόστασις gives us no help (cf. Nowack and A. B. Davidson, ad loc., also the latter and Cheyne in Expos. Times, vii. 568, viii. 48). J. A. Selbie.

HYACINTH.—See Jacinth.

HYÆNA (צָבוּעַ [prob. textual error for צָבֹעַ ṣâbhôa', ὕαινα]. Ẓâbhûa' is almost identical with the Arab. ḍab' [pl. ḍubu'], which signifies a hyæna).—This animal is quite common in all Syria and Palestine. Its den is often in a rock-hewn tomb or a cave. It freq. exhumes the bodies of the dead, and devours them. It breaks or gnaws the bones of its hideous meal to extract the marrow. It will, when pressed by hunger, attack large animals, and even men. The passage in which ẓâbhûa' occurs (Jer 12[9]) is a part of a series of images illustrating the state of God's heritage. If it be rendered 'mine heritage is to me the ravenous hyæna (although ה in הַעַיִט is generally taken as interrogative); birds of prey are against her round about; go ye, assemble all the beasts of the field, bring them to devour,' the picture is that of a collection of the hyæna, jackals, foxes, vultures, ravens, and crows around a carcase. The meaning then would be that the chosen people have become ravenous beasts and birds, which are assembled to devour the prey they have slain. But even if ה be taken as the article, it is difficult to regard צְבוּעַ as other than predicate. Another objection to translating הַעַיִט צְבוּעַ the ravenous hyæna, is that עַיִט is always in OT employed for birds of prey (Gn 15[11], Job 28[7], Is 18[6] 46[11], Ezk 39[4]). But it may mean a ravenous beast as well as bird, the root signifying 'one that rushes' on its prey (cf. Arab. saba'a, to ravin). If we tr. the first 'ayiṭ beast and the second bird, we have a play on language conformable to Oriental taste. The tr[n] 'speckled bird' (AV, RV and the majority of modern commentators) is derived from the root צבע 'dye' (cf. Jg 5[30] צְבַע 'dyed stuff'). Siegfried-Stade (s. עַיִט) suggest the emendation צְבֻעָה טָרְפָה 'torn by the hyæna.'

The expression 'Valley of Zeboim' (1 S 13[18]) means Valley of Hyænas. G. E. Post.

HYDASPES (Ὑδάσπης). — The name of a river mentioned along with the Euphrates and the Tigris (Jth 1[6]), and in such a context as to imply that it must be sought for on the Babylono-Median frontier. Probably, however, there is a confusion with the Hydaspes in N.W. India, a circumstance which, considering the unhistorical character of the Bk. of Judith, is not to be wondered at. Hydaspes (for Vitasta) is an assimilation to the Eranian personal name Hudhâspa, 'possessing well-equipped horses' (Diod. II. vi. 1; Heliodor. 106, 17; Pseudo-Callisth. II. x. 2; Horace, Sat. II. viii. 14). Of course no river could possibly be called by such a name, and it is simply a mistake of Strabo or his authorities when the Vitastā (the modern Bêhat or Jalam) appears in his pages as the Hydaspes. F. Hommel.

HYMENÆUS (Ὑμέναιος).—A false teacher of the time of St. Paul. His name occurs twice in the Epp. to Timothy, but there only in the NT. On the first occasion he is mentioned along with Alexander (see Alexander, No. 4) as having 'made shipwreck concerning the faith,' and in consequence both have been 'delivered unto Satan, that they might be taught not to blaspheme' (1 Ti 1[19. 20]). On the second occasion he and Philetus (which see) are characterized as 'men who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already, and overthrow the faith of some' (2 Ti 2[17. 18]). Mosheim, indeed, and others have held that two different persons must be referred to, on account of the milder terms of condemnation used in the second passage. But these arise naturally from the fact that in the first case it is the man's diseased moral state which is in view, a state requiring for its amendment the severest personal treatment; while in the second the apostle is thinking rather of the doctrinal error into which H. had fallen.

This error is described generally as 'saying that the resurrection is past already,' and in the absence of further particulars it is impossible to determine the full extent of the heresy. But it seems most probable that H. had yielded to what we know to have been a very prevalent Gnostic tendency, springing from an undue contempt for the body, namely, denying the resurrection in its literal sense, and attaching to the word only a spiritual meaning. Everything in Scripture, according to this view, that referred to a future state of being, in so far as it involved a bodily resurrection, was explained or allegorized away, and stress was laid only on the resurrection of the soul from sin, regarding which it could be said that it was 'past already.' The deadly danger of this error is shown by the apostle's description of it as 'a gangrene,' which, if not at once destroyed, would spread and corrupt the whole community; and in support of this prediction, and as helping further to define the erroneous character of H.'s teaching, commentators generally adduce from the Fathers such passages as Irenæus, Hær. II. xxxi. 2, where certain heretics are described as holding 'that the resurrection from the dead is simply an acquaintance with that truth which they proclaim,' and Tertullian, de Resurr. 19, where we read of some 'who distort into some imaginary sense even the most clearly described doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, alleging that even death itself must be understood in a spiritual sense. . . . Wherefore that also must be held to be the resurrection, when a man is reanimated by access to the truth, and having dispersed the death of ignorance, and being endowed with new life by God, has burst forth from the sepulchre of the old man.'

With regard to the sentence of condemnation passed upon H., considerable difference of opinion has prevailed. By the 'delivering unto Satan,' or more literally 'the Satan' (τῷ Σατανᾷ), 'the Evil One in his most distinct personality' (Ellicott, in loc.), some have understood simply excommunication from the Church. But in the parallel passage 1 Co 5[5], 'delivering unto Satan' seems to be distinguished from excommunication in itself, which is denoted by 'taking away' or 'putting away from among you' (cf. v.[5] with vv.[2. 13]). Others in consequence refer the words rather to the infliction of some bodily loss or suffering, such as we find, for example, in the case of Job. But this does not meet the full and authoritative nature of the apostle's language, 'Whom I delivered (παρέδωκα) unto Satan.' It is best, therefore (with Meyer, Ellicott, and others), to combine both interpretations, and to understand by the expression the highest form of excommunication, by which the condemned person was not only cut off from all Christian privileges, but subjected besides to some bodily disease or death. It was a sentence apparently which on account of its awful nature was not pronounced by the Church, but only by an apostle (cf. the somewhat analogous cases of Ananias and Sapphira Ac 5, and Elymas Ac 13[11]), though in certain circumstances the apostle could empower others to pass sentence for him (1 Co 5[3. 4]). It is further of importance to observe that both here and in 1 Co 5[5] the remedial intention of the punishment is emphasized. In the latter case the flesh is destroyed, 'that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus'; while H. and his companion were delivered to Satan, not for their final destruction, but that 'they might be taught (παιδευθῶσιν in NT sense of teaching by disciplining or chastening) not to blaspheme.' [See further Church, vol. i. p. 432; Curse, p. 534[b]; and in addition to the commentators, cf. Suicer, Thesaur. ii. p. 940, and Bingham, Antiq. XVI. ii. 15].

G. Milligan.

HYMN IN NT (for OT see Poetry and Song).—The use of hymns among Christians was common from the first existence of the Church, both in public worship and in private life (1 Co 14[15. 26], Eph 5[19], Col 3[16], Ja 5[13], Ac 16[25]), such hymns being treated not only as the natural expression of religious emotion, but also as a method of instruction

(διδάσκοντες καὶ νουθετοῦντες ἑαυτοὺς ψαλμοῖς, Col l.c.). The fullest description of them is the triple division into ψαλμοί, ὕμνοι, ᾠδαὶ πνευματικαί (Eph-Col). Of these ψαλμός is properly 'a song with musical accompaniment,' and doubtless includes the OT Psalms: ὕμνος, a song in praise of God or of 'famous men' (cf. Sir 44[1] πατέρων ὕμνος), such as that in Ac 4[24-30]; ᾠδὴ πνευματική, any song on a spiritual theme, such perhaps as Eph 5[14]. But the distinction is not technical, and cannot be pressed rigidly, for ὕμνος is used of the Psalms of David (Ps 71[20], Jos. Ant. VII. xii. 3), and both ὕμνος and ᾠδή occur frequently in the titles of those Psalms [see Trench, NT Syn. s.v.; Ltft. on Col 3[16]].

Such Christian hymns would naturally be either direct importations from the services of the Jewish Temple and Synagogue, or the fresh utterances of Christian inspiration influenced in form by these Jewish models (cf. He 2[12]; Philo, in Flacc. 14, de Vit. Cont. §§ 3. 10. 11; Driver, LOT[6] pp. 359–367; Edersheim, The Temple, its ministry and services, pp. 56, 143). A reference to a purely Jewish hymn is found in Mt 26[30], probably the latter half of the Hallel, Pss 115–118, used in the paschal services; but an entirely different hymn, professedly Christian, yet of a strong Gnostic tinge, and undoubtedly spurious, will be found attributed to our Lord on this occasion in the Acta Johannis, c. 11 (Texts and Studies, v. 1), and fragments of it are discussed by Aug. Ep. iv. 237, §§ 4–8.

The fresh utterances of Christian inspiration often fell into an exalted and poetic form of expression which make it difficult to draw the line between prose and poetry. Thus the enthusiastic acclamation of the crowd (Mt 21[9]=Mk 11[9], Lk 19[38]), the thanksgiving of the Church on the release of the apostles (Ac 4[24-30]), the hymn of the love of man (1 Co 13) and of the love of God (Ro 8[31-39]), the praise of God's blessings in Eph 1[3-14] with the triple refrain εἰς ἔπαινον τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ ([5. 11. 14]); even the Lord's Prayer itself, in the more elaborate form given by Mt 6[9-13] 'with its invocation, its first triplet of single clauses with one common burden expressed after the third but implied with all, and its second triplet of double clauses variously antithetical in form and sense' (see WH, ii. pp. 319, 320),—all these have a quasi-rhythmical structure which only just falls short of the level of poetic hymn.

In other passages we have probably fragments from hymns already in use in the Church, e.g. Eph 5[14] (perhaps a baptismal hymn addressed to the new convert), 1 Ti 3[16], which should be arranged in two strophes, each containing three lines; perhaps 1 Co 2[9], and the half-stereotyped doxologies of 1 Ti 1[17] 6[16], 2 Ti 4[18], Rev 4[8. 11] 5[9. 12. 13] 7[10-12] 11[15. 17. 18] 12[10-12] 15[3. 4] 19[1. 2. 5-8]. Finally, the most elaborate structure is to be found in the Evangelical Canticles given by St. Luke, viz.:—

(a) 1[46-55]. The Magnificat, based very largely upon the language of the OT, especially of the Song of Hannah (1 S 2[1-10]), and falling naturally into four strophes (i.) [46-48], (ii.) [49. 50], (iii.) [51-53], (iv.) [54. 55] (Plummer, ad loc.).

(b) 1[68-79]. The Benedictus, modelled upon the language of the OT prophets and upon the eighteen Benedictions used in the Temple service. This falls into two halves[*] ([68-75. 76-79]), the first half containing three strophes ([68-69. 70-72. 73-75]), and the second only two [76-77. 78-79] (Plummer, ad loc.; Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, i. p. 158).

(c) 2[14]. The Gloria in Excelsis. In this the clauses are carefully balanced, whether arranged in a double or triple form. It was early used in the Church as a morning hymn (Apost. Const. vii. 47), and is found in a collection of hymns at the end of the Psalter in Codex Alex. of the LXX. It was also incorporated in the Latin Liturgies; but from very early times it existed in a double form; for while the morning hymn seems always to have read εὐδοκία, the text of St. Luke and the translation of the Latin Liturgies support εὐδοκίας (Plummer, ad loc.; WH, ii. App. 52–56).

(d) 2[29-32]. The Nunc Dimittis: falling into three strophes [29. 30-31. 32], and early (Apost. Const. vii. 48) used as an evening hymn (Plummer, ad loc.).

HYPOCRITE.—The ὑποκριτής is primarily 'one who answers,' ὑποκρίνεται; and hence (1) 'an interpreter,' and (2) 'an actor.' This is the commonest meaning in classical Greek (Aristoph. Plat. Xen. etc.). The use of the word for 'a pretender,' 'hypocrite,' is not classical. On the other hand, the word is never found in biblical Gr. of an actor on the stage. It means either 'one who acts a false part in life,' i.e. one who pretends to be pious when he is not, or (even worse than this) 'one who is utterly bad,' whether he acts a part or not. In Job it is twice used in the general sense of 'impious'; βασιλεύων ἄνθρωπον ὑποκριτὴν ἀπὸ δυσκολίας λαοῦ (34[30]); and ὑποκριταὶ καρδίᾳ τάξουσιν θυμόν (36[13]). In Pr 11[9] and Is 33[14] Aq. Sym. and Theod. have ὑποκριταί, where in the LXX we have ἀσεβεῖς. The same is true of Aq. and Theod. in Job 15[34], where in the LXX we have ἀσεβής; and Aq. has it Job 20[5], where παράνομος is the tr. in LXX. In AV of OT 'hypocrite' occurs in Job 8[13] 13[16] 15[34] 17[8] 20[5] 27[8] 34[30] 36[13], Pr 11[9], Is 9[17] 33[14], and 'hypocritical' in Ps 35[16], Is 10[6]—in all these instances as a misrendering of חָנֵף 'godless' or 'profane,' the rendering of RV. So also 'hypocrisy' in AV of Is 32[6] is correctly rendered by RV 'profaneness' (חֹנֶף).

In NT, although the meaning of 'pretending to be religious and devout' prevails (Mt 6[2. 5. 16] 7[5] 15[7] 23[13-29], Mk 7[6], Lk 6[42] 13[15]), yet the more general meaning sometimes occurs. In Mt 24[51] 'shall cut him asunder and appoint his portion with the impious' makes better sense than 'with the hypocrites'; and here Lk has 'with the unfaithful,' μετὰ τῶν ἀπίστων (12[46]), instead of μετὰ τῶν ὑποκριτῶν. In Lk 12[56] this general meaning is perhaps as suitable as the other. Comp. Mk 12[15] with Mt 22[18] and Lk 20[23]; where Mk has ὑπόκρισιν, Mt πονηρίαν, and Lk πανουργίαν, which does not prove that the three terms are equivalent, but is some evidence that ὑπόκρισις may mean 'wickedness' (Hatch, Biblical Greek, p. 92). The term includes dissimulatio (Gal 2[13]) as well as simulatio; and concealment of convictions was common among opponents of the gospel.

Hypocrites are compared to 'whited sepulchres, outwardly beautiful, but full of uncleanness' (Mt 23[27]); to 'the tombs which appear not,' and which defile all who come in contact with them, without their being aware of them (Lk 11[44]); and to leaven (Lk 12[1]). And hypocrisy is condemned, not merely as a gross form of deceit, but as folly, for it never succeeds. Sooner or later the inevitable exposure comes, and the hypocrite is unmasked (Lk 12[2. 3]).

HYRCANUS, AV HIRCANUS (Ὑρκανός).—The son of Tobias, 'a man in very high place,' who had money deposited at Jerus., in the temple treasury, at the time of the visit of Heliodorus (2 Mac 3[11]). Jos. speaks of 'the sons of Tobias' as supporters of Menelaus (Ant. XII. v. 1); also of H. the son of a farmer of the revenue named Joseph, who was the son of Tobias and nephew of Onias II. But it is doubtful whether we should, with Rawlinson (Speaker's Comm.), identify this H. with the person mentioned in 2 Mac.

The name seems to be a local appellative. Its use among the Jews is perhaps to be explained from the fact that Artaxerxes Ochus transported a number of Jews to Hyrcania (cf. Schürer, HJP I. i. 273 f.). H. A. WHITE.

HYSSOP.—The problem in regard to this plant has been much complicated by attempting its solution first in OT. The difficulties will greatly lessen if we approach the question first from the NT side. The word occurs twice in NT. Once in a recital of the ordinances of the first covenant, the author of the Ep. to the Heb. summarizes the sprinklings of blood and water by means of a wisp of scarlet wool and hyssop (He 9^{19}), as these had been laid down in various places in the Pentateuch. Here it is clear that he adopts the rendering of the LXX ὕσσωπος. The other passage (Jn 19^{29}) says that 'they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth.' Here the evangelist alludes to a plant, known to his readers by the name by which he called it. He is not quoting a passage from the OT, but recording a new fact. What was this plant? Here again the problem has been complicated by assuming that κάλαμος, in the parallel passages (Mt 27^{48}, Mk 15^{36}), is the same as ὕσσωπος. In these passages it is said that, after filling the sponge with vinegar, 'they put it on a reed (καλάμῳ), and gave him to drink.' Now, the meaning of κάλαμος is indubitably a reed or cane, not a rod or stick, as some would have it. The word has in it no suggestion of hyssop, and would not have been so understood by the readers of Mt and Mk. It is therefore an unwarrantable assumption that reed and hyssop are the same (although it is fair to add that the present writer has against him, on this point, almost all modern commentators, who hold that Mt and Mk's περιθεὶς καλάμῳ and Jn's ὑσσώπῳ περιθέντες are identical in meaning). Admitting their diversity, the passages are easily harmonized by noting that St. John mentions both the articles used to mitigate the thirst of our Saviour, but omits telling how they 'put it to his mouth.' It is clear that this could not have been done by the hand alone. Mt and Mk omit the hyssop, but mention the reed by which the sponge, vinegar, and hyssop were 'put to his mouth.'

The word ὕσσωπος appears to have been used by the Greeks, with some latitude, for plants of the Labiate Family, much as we use the words marjoram, thyme, mint, sage, and hyssop itself. Several different genera were doubtless included. The genus Hyssopus is of modern creation, and none of the species grow wild in Sinai, Pal., or Syria. There are, however, several species of marjoram which grow wild, and are known under the Arab. name sa'tar, which according to high rabbinical authority was the hyssop. We are inclined to think that it was from one of these, probably Origanum Maru, L., that the hyssop of Jn was taken. This plant, the leaves and heads of which have a pungent, aromatic flavour, has been used from remote antiquity as a condiment. Its powder, sprinkled over bread, is eaten largely in Bible lands at the present day. Like the peppermint, it tastes at first hot, but this is followed by a cooling, refreshing feeling, and a flow of saliva which quenches thirst. The addition of this substance to the vinegar or sour wine on the sponge would be eminently suited to the purpose of moistening and cooling the mouth of the parched sufferer on the Cross.

We are now in a position to ask whether the plants known to the Arabs as ṣa'tar suit the requirements of OT hyssop. Hyssop is mentioned alone in connexion with the sprinkling of the passover (Ex 12^{22}), 'and ye shall take a bunch of hyssop and dip it into the blood that is in the basin, and strike the lintel,' etc.). This species of Origanum is eminently adapted for this purpose. It has straight, slender, leafy stalks, with small heads. Several of these stalks grow from one root, so that the hand could enclose and break off, at one effort, a suitable bunch or wisp for sprinkling. In certain of the sprinklings, as in leprosy (Lv 14), there was added to the bunch some cedar wood (prob. a twig of Juniperus Phœnicea, L., or one of its congeners), scarlet, and a living bird. 'Purge me with hyssop' (Ps 51^{7}) no doubt refers to such ceremonial purification, as the succeeding clause, 'wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow,' refers to the ceremonial washing which followed the cleansing of the leper. It is a gratuitous assumption here to attribute to the hyssop medicinal virtues of a detergent sort. It was not used internally, but for sprinkling. A similar bunch, with the exception of the bird, was thrown into the fire which consumed the red heifer (Nu 19^{6}).

This species suits well 'the hyssop that springeth out of the wall' (1 K 4^{33}). It grows in clefts of rocks, in chinks of old walls, and on the terrace walls throughout the land. Thus it will be seen that it suits perfectly all the requirements of OT as well as of NT. Thymbra spicata, L., has been suggested, but it is a plant not found in the desert or the interior.

Royle proposed as the equivalent of אֵזוֹב 'êzôbh, the Heb. original of ὕσσωπος, the caper, Capparis spinosa, L. His argument was based on the supposed etymol. resemblance between אֵזוֹב and Arabic 'aṣaf, one of the two Arab. names for the caper. It is fatal to this theory, however, that it does not explain the passage in Jn. It is improbable that St. John would have written ὕσσωπος if he had meant κάπαρις, the well-known Gr. name of the caper. These words are never interchangeable. Nor could St. John have been biassed, as the writer of He 9^{19}, by a LXX rendering, for, as above pointed out, he was narrating, not quoting. In order to strengthen his etymol. theory, Royle assumes that ὕσσωπος and κάλαμος were the same, and shows how a stick, 3 or 4 ft. long, could be obtained from the caper, suitable for the purpose for which the reed was used. But, even if it were possible philologically to apply the term κάλαμος to a rod from the caper, any one familiar with the mode of its growth would be likely to reject this plant. The branches of the caper are slender, straggling, and usually beset with hooked prickles. They are eminently unsuitable for the purpose described. On the other hand, the reed, a general term for the straight, stiff, hollow stems of the larger grasses, as Arundo Donax, L., and Saccharum Ægyptiacum, L., would precisely suit the narrative, and was doubtless then as now used to tie things to, in order to hand them up. A further objection to Royle's theory is, that the caper would have been wholly unsuitable to make a bunch. Its branches are straggling, prickly, noli-me-tangere, with large, stiff leaves and flowers 3 in. broad. It is impossible for us to think that such an intractable plant should have been selected for sprinkling. Finally, the etymology is weak, even for the OT 'êzôbh, which is composed of the radicals aleph, zayin, and beth, while 'aṣaf is composed of alif, ṣod, and fê. For the passage in John it has been shown above that the etymol. argument not only fails to confirm the claims of the caper, but is wholly fatal to them. The Arabic zûfa is etymol. much nearer to 'êzôbh, and zûfa is doubtless the same as ṣa'tar. G. E. POST.

IADINUS (A Ἰάδινος, B -ει-, AV Adinus), 1 Es 9[48]. —One of the Levites who taught the people the law of the Lord after the return under Ezra. The name corresponds to Jamin in Neh 8[7] (om. LXX), who with the other persons there mentioned is distinguished from the Levites.

IBHAR (יִבְחָר '[God] chooses'; 2 S 5[15], B Ἐβεάρ, A Ἰεβάρ; 1 Ch 3[6] 14[5], B Βαάρ, A Ἰεβαάρ; Jebahar, Jebaar), one of David's sons, born at Jerusalem: his name occurs in all three lists immediately after that of Solomon and before that of Elishua. According to 1 Ch 3[6] he was the son of a wife and not of a concubine; otherwise he is unknown alike to history and to tradition. It is noteworthy that in the Peshiṭta to 2 S 5[15] his name is given as יוחבר (Juchabar), a form which occurs elsewhere as the equivalent of Jochebed (Ex 6[20], Nu 26[59] יוֹכֶבֶד) and of Ichabod (1 S 4[21] אִי כָבוֹד): in 1 Ch the form given (יחבר) agrees with that of the MT. IBLEAM (יִבְלְעָם).—A town belonging to West Manasseh, Jos 17[11] (JE; wanting in the LXX, see Budde, Richt. u. Sam. 13 f.), Jg 1[27]. It is mentioned also in 2 K 9[27] in connexion with the death of king Ahaziah, who fled by the way of Beth-haggan (En-gannim [?]; 'the garden house' AV, RV), and 'the ascent of Gur, which is by Ibleam.' The biblical data seem to be well satisfied by the modern ruin Bel'ame, some 13 miles E. of N. of Samaria, more than half-way to Jezreel. Conder (SWP ii. p. 98) prefers Yebla, N.W. of Beisan, while Wilson and others favour Jelame, 3½ miles S. by W. from Zer'in (Jezreel).

In 2 K 15[10] קִבְּלֵי־עָם (AV, RV 'before the people') should certainly be emended to בְּיִבְלְעָם ('in Ibleam'; so Siegfried-Stade, Oxf. Heb. Lex. etc., following Luc. ἐν Ἰεβλαάμ). Gath-rimmon (wh. see) of Jos 21[25] is a scribal error for Ibleam. It is the same place which is called in 1 Ch 6[55] [Eng.[70]] Bileam (wh. see).

IBZAN (אִבְצָן, meaning doubtful, cf. אֶבֶץ a town in Issachar, Jos 19[20], Ἀβεσσάν), one of the Minor Judges, following Jephthah, Jg 12[8-10]. He came from Bethlehem, probably the Bethlehem in Zebulun (Jos 19[15]), 7 miles N.W. of Nazareth. He had 30 sons and 30 daughters, an evidence of his social importance, and arranged their marriages. He judged Israel 7 years, and was buried at Bethlehem. Nothing is said of Ibzan's exploits, and his name does not occur elsewhere; but, on the analogy of other Minor Judges, Tola, Jair, and Elon, we may suppose that he represents a clan, with numerous branches and alliances. See Moore, Judges, p. 271 n. According to Jewish tradition, Ibzan was the same as Boaz (Talm. B. Baba Bathra, 91*a* and comment.; Rashi, Comment. on Jg 12[8f.]). G. A. COOKE.

ICHABOD (אִי כָבוֹד; B οὐαὶ βαρχαβώθ; A οὐαὶ χαβώθ; Ichabod), son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli. His mother died in giving him birth, overwhelmed by grief at the news of the sudden death of her husband and her father-in-law. The name is usually explained as 'inglorious' (from אִי, the ordinary negative in Ethiopic and Phœnician [cf. Job 22[30]], and כָּבוֹד 'glory'), in accordance with the meaning suggested by 1 S 4[21] ('The glory is departed from Israel'; B omits). Possibly, Ithamar (אִיתָמָר) and the Zidonian Jezebel (אִיזֶבֶל 1 K 16[31] etc.) are words of the same formation, cf. Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, p. 246 n. The rendering of the LXX points to a different interpretation (אִי being treated as = אַיֵּה; in 1 S 14[3] LXX has Ἰωχαβήλ). J. F. STENNING.

ICONIUM (Ἰκόνιον), an ancient city near the borders of Lycaonia and Phrygia, still retains its ancient name in the form Konia, and is at present the terminus of a railway that extends from the Bosphorus southwards. Its situation, amid luxuriant orchards at the western edge of the vast plains of central Asia Minor, level and uncultivated, watered by a stream which issues from the hilly region on the west, and loses itself in the plain after making this part of it a garden, is strikingly like that of Damascus (though hardly equal to it in beauty); and this has made the city always a centre of life and the most important in the district. It is commonly described by the ancient writers as a city of Lycaonia, e.g. Cicero, Fam. xv. iv. 2; cf. III. v. 4, vi. 6, xv. iii. 1; Att. v. xx. 2; Strabo, p. 568; Pliny, NH v. 25 (95); Stephanus Byzant. s.v., and many others. It is not consistent with its Lycaonian character that Ac 14[6] represents Paul and Barnabas as fleeing from Iconium into Lycaonia; but the discrepancy is one of those unstudied touches which prove the originality and accuracy of the narrative. The author conceives that, in traversing the 18 miles separating Iconium from Lystra, the apostles crossed the frontier and entered Lycaonia. Now, Xenophon (Anab. I. ii. 19) describes Iconium as the easternmost city of Phrygia; and immediately on leaving it, he entered Lycaonia. The evidence of other visitors or natives proves that the Iconians always considered themselves to be by race Phrygians and not Lycaonians. Stephanus quotes a legend about a king Annakos of Iconium, on whose death followed the Deluge, which destroyed the whole population; and his subjects are called Phrygians in the legend. Pliny, NH v. 41 (145), gives a list of famous Phrygian cities, and among them is Conium: the list contains several which had disappeared in Pliny's time, and is doubtless taken from some older Greek writer. In A.D. 163, at the trial of Justin Martyr, one of his associates named Hierax described himself as a slave from Iconium of Phrygia. Firmilian, bishop of Cæsareia Capp., who attended the council of Iconium, describes it as a city of Phrygia (Cyprian, Epist. 75, 7). Iconium does not on its coin boast itself as a member of the Koinon Lycaoniæ, which was formed soon after A.D. 137. Though claiming Phrygian stock, Iconium (like most cities of Asia Minor) loved to connect itself with Greek legend, deriving its name from the image (εἰκών) of Medusa, brought there by Perseus (Eustath. ad Dionys. Per. 856), or from the clay images of men made by Prometheus there after the Flood to replace the drowned people (Steph. Byz.).

Iconium, as a rule, shared the fate of Lycaonia (wh. see). Ruled by the Seleucid kings of Syria in the 3rd cent., it was assigned to the Pergamenian kings in B.C. 190, but was never actually made part of their kingdom, and probably passed soon after under the power of the Galatæ, forming part of the Tetrarchy Proseilemmene, which was transferred from Lycaonia to Galatia (Pliny, NH 25 (95); Ptolemy, v. iv. 10), probably about 164 (Studia Biblica, iv. p. 46 ff.; see GALATIA, p. 87). Then, along with Galatia,* it probably passed to the Pontic kings not later than B.C. 129; but it was set free during the Mithridatic wars. Its lot is uncertain, until in B.C. 39 Antony gave it to Polemon along with Cilicia Tracheia.† In 36 Antony transferred it to Amyntas, who was at the same time made king of Galatia. At his death, in B.C. 25, it was incorporated in the Roman empire as part of the Province Galatia. Under Claudius it was honoured with the name Claudiconium (probably in compensation for the bestowal of the name Claudioderbe on the frontier city Derbe). Under Hadrian it was constituted a Roman colony with the title Colonia Aelia Hadriana Iconiensium.‡ It seems to have remained during the 2nd and 3rd cents. part of the Province Galatia (Ptol. v. 4. 12),§ whereas Lycaonia was made part of the triple Province Cilicia-Isauria-Lycaonia, probably in 137. About 295 Diocletian constituted southern Galatia with parts of the surrounding country into a new Province Pisidia, of which the capital was Antioch, and Iconium the second metropolis (μετὰ τὴν μεγίστην ἡ πρώτη, Basil, Epist. 8 (137 Mi.)), while eastern Lycaonia was perhaps still united with Isauria Provincia; hence Ammianus describes Iconium as a city of Pisidia (xiv. 2). But about A.D. 372 it became the metropolis of a new Provincia Lycaonia, extending from the shores of Karalis and Trogitis (Bey-Sheher and Seidi-Sheher Lakes) to the western end of Ak-Göl near Cybistra. This arrangement lasted till the end of the Byzantine Provincial system, and is found in all Notitiæ Episcopatuum.

Iconium, like most of Asia Minor, was several times overrun by the Saracens, but its fate is hardly alluded to by historians. It shared in the recovered prosperity of the reviving Byzantine empire, till it was overrun by the Seljuk Turks in 1070, and passed by treaty into their hands, probably in 1072. Though John and Manuel Comnenus approached Iconium more than once (Nicet. Chon. pp. 42, 72; Cinnam. p. 42), and Frederick Barbarossa occupied it in 1190, it remained a Turkish city permanently (the Christian population being permitted to reside in the large village Tsille, 6 miles N.). Konia was the capital of the Seljuk empire, and is still capital of a vilayet.

Being an important commercial city situated on one of the great routes between Cilicia and the west, Iconium was naturally a centre for Jewish settlers, Ac 14[1]; but the only memorials of the colony are CIG 9270, and perhaps 3995*b*, 3998, 4001*b* (Jewish-Christian ?). Lystra is only 18 miles S.S.W. from Iconium, and hence the character of an inhabitant of Lystra was naturally well known among the Iconians (Ac 16[2]), for Lystra, though in the same district as Derbe (Ac 14[6] 16[1]), was actually much closer to Iconium.

Christianity was introduced into Iconium by St. Paul and St. Barnabas on their first missionary journey (Ac 14[1ff.]), and the city was visited on the second journey (16[2ff.]). St. Paul's sufferings and difficulties there are mentioned 1 Ti 3[11]. The interesting legend of St. Thekla is connected with these visits: the legend as we have it was composed by a presbyter of Asia about the middle of the 2nd cent., but contains some details that go back to the 1st cent.; and it probably rests on a historical basis. It rightly traces St. Paul's journey from Pisidian Antioch along the 'Royal Road' (i.e. Imperial Highway) that connected Antioch the military centre with the garrison city Lystra, relating how on the way (probably not far from Selki-Serai) he was induced by Onesiphorus to diverge from that road and go across the hill-country to Iconium. It tells that queen Tryphaina (of Pontus) had estates somewhere in this neighbourhood; and this may well be true, as she was granddaughter of Polemon, who formerly possessed Iconium: it rightly makes her a relative of the Roman emperor (Claudius). On this legend see Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelgesch. ii. p. 424 ff.; Zahn, GGA, 1877, p. 1307 ff.; Ramsay, Church in Rom. Emp. pp. 31 f. 380 ff. (with many other authorities there quoted).

According to the North-Galatian theory, nothing else is recorded in NT about Iconium. On the South-Galatian view, soon after St. Paul's second journey, it was visited by Jewish emissaries (coming doubtless from Jerusalem), who persuaded the Iconians that St. Paul was not a real apostle of God, but the mere messenger of the superior apostles, and that the keeping of the whole Jewish law was incumbent on all zealous Christians (urging that St. Paul by circumcising Timothy had practically become a preacher of circumcision, Gal 5[11]). St. Paul, learning this defection, wrote the Epistle to the Galatians, probably from Syrian Antioch (Ac 18[22]; or, according to Zahn and Rendall, from Corinth), and soon afterwards visited Iconium again on his way to Ephesus. The Iconian church was evidently thoroughly reconciled to the Pauline teaching, remained in communication with St. Paul during his stay at Ephesus (1 Co 16[1]), and joined in the contribution which he organized among all his churches for the benefit of the poor Christians in Jerusalem. St. Peter's first Epistle was addressed to it among others.

According to legend, Sosipater (Ro 16[21]; Sopater of Berœa, Ac 20[4]) was first bishop of Iconium; Terentius or Tertius (Ro 16[22]) succeeded him. Cornutus or Coronatus, a martyr bishop (12 Sept. sub Perennio præside), is perhaps historical. Celsus, bishop earlier than c. 260, is mentioned by Eusebius (HE vi. 19) as permitting a qualified layman Paulinus to do church work. Nikomas, bishop about A.D. 264 and 269, is also mentioned by Euseb. (vii. 28). A council was held in Iconium about 232 (Cyprian, Epist. 75, 7). Numerous Christian inscriptions are found in the country round Iconium, some of which are probably of the 3rd cent., showing that Christianity spread comparatively early round the city as centre (see GALATIA, p. 88). A monastery τῶν Γαλατῶν in the neighbourhood of Iconium is mentioned by Gregorius Magn. (Dial. iv. 38, p. 441). St. Chariton, a native of Iconium, is said to have been arrested under Aurelian and released, and afterwards to have founded several monasteries in Palestine.

‡ Some writers erroneously regard the bestowal of the title Claudiconium as implying that it was made a colony by Claudius.

§ Ptolemy does not here mention Iconium (which, in v. vi. 16, he puts in Cappadocia by a pure blunder); but he gives Lystra, Antioch, and Apollonia in Galatia, and à fortiori Iconium must have been in that province. Firmilian, l.c., mentions Galatia and (the triple Province) Cilicia as most closely connected with Iconium.

IDALAH (יִדְאָלָה).—A town of Zebulun, named between Shimron and Bethlehem (Jos 19^{15}). The site is uncertain.

IDBASH (יִדְבָּשׁ).—One of the sons (acc. to LXX) of Etam, 1 Ch 4^{3}. The MT is undoubtedly corrupt. See Genealogy.

IDDO.—1. אִדּוֹ (? ארד 'strength') Ezr 8^{17} 'The chief, at the place Casiphia,' who provided Ezra with Levites and Nethinim. The text implies that I. was himself one of the Nethinim, but it is impossible that the head of a Levitical seminary should have belonged to the lowest order of ministers. Read, with Ryle, 'unto Iddo and his brethren (i.e. Levites) and the Nethinim.' 1 Es $8^{45.\ 46}$ has 'Loddeus the captain who was in the place of the treasury . . . Loddeus and to his brethren and to the treasurers in that place,' connecting the name Casiphia with keseph 'silver' (so LXX ἐν ἀργυρίῳ τοῦ τόπου). It must have been near Babylon, and can have no connexion with the Caspian Mountains or Caspiæ Pylæ. 2. (יְדוּ 'beloved') 1 Ch 27^{21} son of Zechariah, captain of the half tribe of Manasseh in Gilead, perh. = No. 4. 3. Ezr 10^{43} (יְדוּ Kethib RV, יַדַּי Kerê, RVm Jaddai, AV Jadau, 1 Es 9^{35} Edos) one of those who had taken strange wives. 4. 1 K 4^{14} (עִדָּא 'timely,' Ges.) father of Abinadab, who was Solomon's commissariat officer in Mahanaim in Gilead (see No. 2). 5. (עִדּוֹ) 1 Ch 6^{21} a Gershonite Levite called Adaiah in v.^{41}. 6. A seer (ḥozeh) and prophet (nabi) cited by the Chronicler as an authority for the reigns of (a) Solomon, 2 Ch 9^{29} (Kethib יְעָדִי Jedai, Kerê יְעַדּוֹ Jedo, LXX Ἰωήλ) 'the visions of I. the seer concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat'; (b) Rehoboam, 2 Ch 12^{15} (עִדּוֹ) 'the history of I. the seer after the manner of (or, in reckoning the) genealogies'; and of (c) Abijah, 2 Ch 13^{22} (עִדּוֹ) 'the midrash of the prophet Iddo.' The first passage cited is probably the ground of the tradition adopted by Jos. (Ant. VIII. viii. 5) and Jerome (Qu. Heb. in 2 Ch 9^{29} 12^{15} 15^{1}) that the prophet who denounces Jeroboam in 1 K 13 was named Jadon or Jaddo. Jerome also identifies Iddo with Oded. 7. עִדּוֹ Zec 1^{1} (עִדּוֹא Zec 1^{7}, Ezr 5^{1} 6^{14}) 1 Es 6^{1} Addo. Grandfather (father acc. to Ezr) of the prophet Zechariah; possibly of the same family as No. 2. 8. עִדּוֹא Neh $12^{4.\ 16}$ (in v.^{16} Kethib has עַדָּיָא) one of the priestly clans that went up with Zerubbabel.

IDOLATRY.—The idolatry of Israel, in ordinary usage, is held to include two forms of aberration from true religion. The more heinous type was the worship of alien or fictitious divinities, best described as heathenism (Götzendienst); the less heinous was the worship of the God of Israel by the mediation of images (Bilderdienst). The particular problems arising under these two heads being dealt with in separate articles (see Ashtoreth, Baal, Calf, Ephod, etc.), the main object here must be to indicate the general drift and features of the protracted conflict between the religious ideals and the popular religious tendencies which are mirrored in the OT.

Idolatry (εἰδωλολατρία), which occurs once in AV (1 S 15^{23}) as tr. of תְּרָפִים, has no exact Heb. equivalent. There are, however, nine or ten Heb. words which AV, and, in the main, RV (following LXX) render by 'idol,' and which give lively expression to the varied sentiments of contempt, loathing, and apprehension excited in the prophetical writers by idolatry. The terms are: אָוֶן nothingness (Is 66^{3}), אֵימִים objects of terror (Jer 50^{38}), אֵל neutral expression for any divinity (Is 57^{5}), אֱלִיל a cypher (often, esp. in Is), גִּלּוּלִים massy blocks (Lv 26^{30}), מִפְלֶצֶת a terror (1 K 15^{13}), פֶּסֶל or סֵמֶל a figure (2 Ch 33^{7}), עֲצַבִּים carvings, with perhaps a play on sorrow (Hos 4^{17}), cf. עִיר עֹצֶב a figure (Is 45^{16}). Image in AV is used as the equivalent of about an equal number of terms, of which the following alterations in RV may be noted: חַמָּן a sun-image (Lv 26^{30}), מַצֵּבָה a pillar, תְּרָפִים untranslated. פֶּסֶל is the graven image (Ex 20^{4}), but is sometimes used comprehensively (Is 40^{19}). מַסֵּכָה (Ex 34^{17}) and נֶסֶךְ (Is 41^{29}) denote the molten image. In NT 'image' translates εἰκών and once χαρακτήρ (He 1^{3} 'express [RV 'very'] image'). See more fully under Image. The common idol was an uncouth figure of clay or wood; the more pretentious was of gold or silver, or at least plated. The process of manufacture is contemptuously described in Is $44^{11ff.}$.

I. Heathenism in Israel.—Not the least interesting chapter in the history of this subject is that upon which the narrative of Genesis throws little if any light, viz. the religion of the stock from which the Hebrews sprang. The teaching of Genesis is to the effect that there was a primitive knowledge of the true God, which was handed down through Noah to the line of Shem, of which Abraham became the custodian, and which he transmitted to his posterity. It is, at the most, implied in the story of the Call of Abraham (Gn 12^{1}), and first stated explicitly in Jos $24^{2ff.}$, that the patriarchal religion had a background of idolatry. For the reconstruction of this primitive Semitic heathenism there is some material available. It is reasonable to suppose, in the first place, that vestiges of the older beliefs and customs survived to the later period illuminated by the OT. A second source, which has been closely examined in the same interest, especially by Wellhausen (Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, Heft 3) and W. R. Smith (RS^{2}), is the type of heathenism which prevailed in Arabia before the rise of Islam, and which, it is assumed, had not widely diverged from that of the common ancestor of the Semitic peoples. The examination of this evidence has shaken the older view that Semitic idolatry began in the worship of the heavenly bodies (so, e.g., Maimonides, De Idololatria, who explains star-worship by an intelligible desire to honour what God had honoured, but traces the later phase of image-service to the designs of false prophets, cap. i. § 4). The suggestion of Ewald (Gesch. Isr.^{3} i. p. 380), that a polytheistic system may be detected in the genealogies of Gn 4 and 5, where the gods and goddesses of an earlier age have been degraded to patriarchal rank, has not met with much favour. By other writers, esp. Stade, it is held that an important, if not the most important, element in the early religious life of the Semites was ancestor-worship—sacrifices having been offered at Hebron and Shechem to Abraham and Joseph ere they were offered to Jahweh; and for proof stress is laid on significant features of burial and mourning (cf. Is 65^{4}), the long persistence of the worship of a species of household gods known as Teraphim, and the specific designation of spirits as Elohim (1 S 28^{13}). The special purpose of W. R. Smith's work in this field, on the other hand, was to draw attention to the vestiges of a primitive totemism or animal-worship both among Arabs and Hebrews; and these he found to linger, in the case of the Hebrews, in the denomination of tribes and families after animals, birds, and reptiles; in a vigorous animal-cult, described by Ezekiel as flourishing so recently as the eve of the Exile (Ezk 8^{10}); and in the distinction of clean and unclean beasts, where the totem of the earlier survived as the unclean animal of the later period (Journ. of Philology, ix. 75 ff.). There are, however, reasons for regarding both ancestor-worship and animal-worship as secondary in the development of the religions of nature; and others are of opinion that the evidence rather points to a polydæmonism as the original type of Semitic heathenism. Of this the fundamental conception is that men are in contact with a realm of spirits which take to do with their concerns, and to which they can draw near in some spot or object in which these are housed—as the well, the tree, the sacred stone (so Kayser, Theologie des AT, p. 21 ff.). From polytheism it is distinguished by the fact that the spirits have not yet attained to a clear-cut individuality, or to the possession of a mythology, while it tends to run down into fetishism through the adoration of the tenement in place of the tenant. In one of the most speculative regions of history a certain conclusion is, of course, unattainable, but the view in question at least harmonizes with what is known of the primeval modes of Semitic thought, while such an animistic religion formed some sort of a preparation for the introduction of the higher faith. In particular, it could offer no such opposition as a developed polytheism to the claim of one God upon the undivided allegiance of a people.

When Israel emerges into the light of history, it has broken, at least in principle, with heathenism. In the national memory the momentous step was connected with Abraham; and although the date of the patriarchal narratives makes them in large measure the vehicle of prophetic ideals, there is no reason to doubt that Mosaism reposed on and appealed to a religious past, in which the light of revelation had dawned. The work of Moses was to widen and perpetuate the breach with heathenism, and this he accomplished through the coincidence of the divine deliverance of Israel with the hour of his prophetic mission. Mosaism, whatever else it may have included, was at least a revolt from heathenism, from which it sought to protect Israel by prohibiting the worship of any divinity save J″ its God (Ex 20^{3}), and by bringing under His ban immoral acts and practices to which the genius of heathenism is at the best indifferent. From this standpoint there are two notable declensions related in the history of the period. The story of the golden calf, though its main significance belongs to the sphere of the minor idolatry, is also conceived as an apostasy to other gods than J″ (Ex 32^{8}). The second reported lapse is the idolatry with Moab at Peor, where Israel succumbed to the fascinations of a Baal-cult that consecrated sexual licentiousness (Nu 25). These incidents, however, even if historical,—and it may be noted that they belong in substance to our oldest capital source,—were mere episodes of temporary reaction natural to a period of intense religious fervour. The Israel which hurled itself upon Canaan was the people of J″, and saw in the gods of the nations real gods indeed, but His and their enemies.

Upon the settlement in Canaan there followed a heathen revival. The history of the Book of Judges moves through a succession of cycles: the people forsake J″ and serve the Baalim and the Ashtaroth; J″ in anger delivers them into the hands of the spoiler; then it repents Him, and He raises up judges who save them; then once more they turn back, and deal more corruptly than their fathers (Jg $2^{11ff.}$). For this relapse various causes are plausibly assigned—intermarriage with the Canaanite population, association of the Baal-cult with the agricultural year, a sense of the possession of proprietary rights by the old divinities in the land of Canaan (Smend, AT Religionsgeschichte, p. 50). But doubtless the strongest enticement lay in the character of the Canaanitish worship, which, in the main resting on a deification of the productive forces of nature, gathered up into religion all that is comprehended in laughter and licence. And if it had also quite another side, which revealed the divinity as cruel, and lusting for agony and blood, there was an element in the Hebrew nature to which this also appealed. The divine remedy for the backsliding was war. When Israel was attacked and spoiled, or when the hand of the oppressor was heavy upon them, they remembered that of old time J″ had been their deliverer, the religious enthusiasm welled up afresh, and under a leader whom it possessed they marched to victory. Such a leader also, without doubt, was Saul, although the history lays most stress on his later defection from, and his desertion by, J″. But among those who delivered Israel in the name of J″ the noblest and the best character was that of David, whose piety, even if allied with the superstition of divination, and marred by sensuality and cruelty, in some respects was the model of Christian communion with God; and the final outcome of the experiences of the period of the Judges, and esp. of the career of David which established the monarchy, was to place the sovereignty of J″ on as firm a basis as in the first flush of the wars of conquest. But again with an era of peace there came a heathen reaction, beginning in the seduction of Solomon to Canaanitish and cognate cults through the influence of his wives (1 K 11^{1-8}), and extending throughout a great portion of the history both of the Northern and the Southern Kingdoms.

In the Northern Kingdom the religious life took in the first instance an opposite direction. Antagonism to the heathenish innovations in Jerusalem may have been a factor in the power behind Jeroboam, as the setting up of the worship of the golden calves in two ancient sanctuaries may have been conceived in the interests of the ancestral religion; at all events, there is no reason to charge Jeroboam and his immediate successors with deliberate apostasy from J″. The recrudescence of heathenism in the Northern Kingdom is connected with Ahab, who built a temple in Samaria to the Zidonian Baal (1 K 16^{32}), and supported a heathenish priesthood. How far the hostile designs of Ahab against the religion of J″ extended is less certain. Many modern writers are of opinion that Ahab remained loyal to the national God — for which the names of his sons, Ahaziah and Jehoram, afford some evidence, and that the story of the persecutions is at least exaggerated (see, e.g., Smend, op. cit. p. 154 ff.). But, while it is true that the OT annals give broad effects and neglect fine distinctions, the Elijah traditions make it impossible to doubt that we have to deal in the case of Ahab with a dangerous assault on the national religion; and this impression is confirmed by the observation that the house of Omri was shortly afterwards destroyed with all its works in the name of the God of Israel (2 K 10). At all events, the intrusion of the alien cult received an effectual check. The annalist grants that the successors of Jehu stopped short in the sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, however persistently the heathen leaven may have continued to work in the local sanctuaries.

The main sources for our knowledge of heathenism in this period are the writings of the 8th cent. prophets. Their testimony is, however, somewhat obscure, owing to the difficulty of distinguishing between the degraded worship of J″ and the rites of heathenism proper. It appears that J″ could be worshipped in name while the conception formed of Him was no higher or purer than that of the heathen. 'God has so utterly abolished the idols with whom Satan contested with Him the allegiance of His people that we have no certain knowledge what they were' (Pusey on Am 5^{26}). The final commentary on the history of the Northern Kingdom mentions as the chief forms star-worship, Baal-worship, accompanied by the most cruel rites, and magic (2 K 17). By the Baal-cult we have doubtless to understand the worship, not of a simple mighty rival of J″, but of a multitude of local divinities characterized by alternating moods of prodigality and ferocity. According to Amos, the worship of the Baalim (?, see Driver, ad loc.) was one of the four great sins of Israel, aggravated by its association with inhumanity, fornication, and drunkenness ($2^{7.8}$). As the places of worship, are mentioned hills and mountains and groves (passim). The central object was the altar, with which were associated the sacred pillar and post—doubtless conceived as 'houses of God.' The rites included the offering of incense (1 K 11[8]) and of sacrifices, in times of crisis human sacrifices (2 K 17[17]). In expostulating with his countrymen, Hosea pleads that J″ was from of old the God of Israel who conferred on them great benefits (11[1-4]), and from whose hand they receive their present blessings (2[8]); while the Baalim are mere creations of their own, who, as proved by experience, are powerless to protect them (18[1]).

In the Southern Kingdom we discover a more vigorous and developed type of heathenism, but also a more passionate and energetic resistance. A significant note in the record of Rehoboam's reign shows that the idolatry of Solomon left as a legacy the vilest form of consecrated prostitution (1 K 14[24]); and of this, as well as of the seducing idols, Judah was purged by Asa (1 K 15[9ff.]). A similar tribute of praise is accorded to Jehoshaphat, and especially to Hezekiah (2 K 18[4]); and that the latter had to deal with a true heathenism, as well as with a debased worship of J″, may be collected from the contemporary witness of Isaiah.

'The land,' Isaiah declares, 'is become full of not-gods' (2[8]). As the chief abominations he mentions the Asherahs and the sun-images (17[8]), of which, however, the former is not necessarily a clue to heathenism. He also mentions the popularity of magicians, soothsayers, etc. (2[6] 3[2] 8[19]). Specially noticeable is the rise to a pure monotheism in the contemptuous dismissal of the rival gods as mere human handiwork (2[8]), things of naught (31[7]), and his extension of J″'s sovereignty to the ends of the earth.

From the reforms of Hezekiah there is a sudden descent to the corruptions of the reign of Manasseh, who introduced the worship both of the heavenly bodies and of the Canaanitish divinities, and along with the latter their cruel and licentious rites (2 K 21). To understand such a lapse from the general tradition of the Davidic house we have to bear in mind two facts: the apparent political expediency of showing reverence for the celestial gods of the great empire in the North, and the doubts which the course of events may have aroused as to whether there was indeed in J″ power and will for effectual deliverance (cf. Smend, AT Theologie, p. 270 ff.). But in Josiah, another, and the greatest of the reformers, was to follow. In centralizing the worship at Jerusalem he dealt at heathenism the most effective blow possible, while he suppressed with a stern hand the innovations of his father, and the abominations that had crept in in their wake (2 K 23[5]).

The programme of the reformation under Josiah contained in Deut. is terrible in its thoroughness. Not only does it embody the threat of destruction as the penalty of national apostasy (6[15] 8[19] etc.), but it prohibits the individual from practising idolatry, under pain of death (17[2ff.]). Further, those who persuade others to idolatry are to be punished with death (13[6]). Nay, the subject was not even to be looked into (12[30]). The destruction of the furniture of heathenism is a most sacred duty (7[5. 25] 12[2]). How deeply and harmfully heathenism had eaten into the life of the people may be inferred from the fierceness of these enactments, which occur in a code otherwise marked by exceptional mildness and humaneness.

How far short the reformation fell of fulfilling the prophetic expectations is indicated by the prophets of the Chaldæan period. It would seem that the closing decades of the monarchy were marked by yet wilder excesses, as if the nation were making a last desperate cast in a losing game with fate. 'Thy gods, O Judah,' cries Jeremiah, 'are according to the number of thy cities' (2[28]). Specially instructive is the vision of Ezekiel (ch. 8), in which he enumerates the three main forms of heathenism by which Judah was polluted — an animal-worship embracing loathsome beasts and reptiles, the cult of Tammuz, which drew the women after it, and the adoration of the sun-god. And the last of the kings succumbed to the contagion of the times, and scouted the counsel that was delivered to them by the prophets in the name of J″.

The purification came in the discipline of the Exile. Surrounded by the emblems of foreign idolatry, the exiles became deeply conscious of the grandeur and truth of the spiritual religion taught by their prophets; and although we know that a large number remained in Babylon, of whom many would become merged in the adjacent heathen mass, the remnant which returned brought with them the contempt of the great exilic prophet for the manufactured gods of gold and silver and wood, and the stubborn loyalty to J″ which was to become in Roman times the wonder and the hatred of the world. That even after the Exile heathen practices lingered in the community is argued by Smend (loc. cit. p. 39) from Ps 16[1ff.], Zec 10[2] 13[2], Job 31[26], cf. Is 27[9]; but in any case it was a rapidly vanishing quantity. And the lessons of past experience had been carefully gleaned. The dissolution of mixed marriages by Ezra excluded the most dangerous of the influences which made for heathenism, while the Law sought to guarantee the purity of religion by an uncompromising policy of national isolation.

II. Idolatrous Worship of J″.—In the age of the Judges, as we have seen, and in the middle period of the Northern Kingdom, the imminent danger had been the submersion of Jahwism under the refluent wave of heathenism. In the 8th and 7th cents. the object on which prophetism concentrates its fervent energy is the purification or spiritualization of the worship which was rendered to the national God. Of that worship an ancient and increasingly marked feature was the use of images, and with Hosea there begins an attack upon image-service as inconsistent with the spirit of Jahwism, and virtually substituting fetishes for the living God (8[5. 6] 10[5]).

That the practice was ancient, and sanctioned by high authority, does not admit of dispute. After his victory over Midian, one of the chosen instruments of J″, Gideon, made an ephod out of the spoils—by which the context suggests that we are to understand a gold-plated image (Jg 8[24ff.]). Still more instructive is the story of Micah the Ephraimite, who out of 200 shekels of silver framed a graven image and a molten image, and hired Jonathan, a descendant of Moses, to be his priest (Jg 17[3]). Even David has closely associated with him emblems of idolatry; for besides that he tolerates the probably ancestral cult of the human figures called Teraphim (1 S 19[13]), the interrogation of the Ephod, here again most likely an image of J″, is a habit of his religious life (1 S 21[9] 23[6. 9] 30[7]). It could not therefore, as above hinted, impress the national mind as an impious innovation when Jeroboam associated the worship of J″ with the symbols of the golden bulls, and the absence of any polemic against the image-worship in the crusade of Elijah is generally regarded as proving that it was acquiesced in even by the enlightened conscience of the time. (On the other side König, Hauptprobleme der altisraelitischen Religionsgeschichte, p. 65). That the idolatrous worship of J″ had even reached back to the Mosaic age, and was sanctioned by Moses, it is not necessary to admit. Apart from the case for the originality of the second commandment, there are independent grounds for believing, on the analogy of other faiths, that primitive Mosaism embodied the conception of an imageless worship (Reichel, Vorhellenische Göttercultе). Sufficiently significant is the obvious fact that from the Judges to the 8th cent. the idols became more and more numerous and costly, and that only in the Assyrian period were they realized to be alien to the genius of the national religion.

In the prophetic campaign against the historically legitimated idolatry we may distinguish three important phases. Were it made out that Ex 34 contains an older Decalogue, we might have to recognize an earlier attempt at reformation, as it is possible to hold that that code, in prohibiting 'molten gods' (Ex 34^{17}), tacitly sanctioned the simpler type of the graven images (Smend, AT Theol. p. 195). The great effort was put forth in the Northern Kingdom, but the prophets were unable even to weaken the idolatry which was embedded in the political framework, and the kings persisted to the last in the sin of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat. In Judah the first notable contribution to a more spiritual ritual was made by Hezekiah, in whose reforming spirit may be detected a reflection of the zeal of Isaiah. In the report of some of his acts, especially of his suppression of the high places and their insignia, critics have suspected the ante-dating of later reforms; but there is at least unmistakable evidence of his active aggression against the idolatrous elements of the traditional religion (2 K 18^{4}). Specially noteworthy is his removal of the brazen serpent, by which he withdrew the most sacred of sanctions, the Mosaic, from the approach to J″ through figured symbol. The Reformation under Josiah is here memorable, not merely as consolidating the worship in an imageless sanctuary, but as energetically acting on the Deuteronomic prohibition of the posts and pillars (Dt $16^{21ff.}$), which, before there had been images to give expression to the character of a divinity, had been venerated as places of a god's abode. 'He brought out the Asherah from the house of the Lord, and burned it at the brook Kidron' (2 K 23^{6}). On the whole it may be said that in Judah more energy was shown in, and more success followed on, the purification of the Jahweh-worship than was the case in Israel, but that in Judah also the purer Jahwism had its reaction in a grosser heathenism.

On two general features of the OT idolatry as exhibited by the sacred writers a remark may be made. The first feature is the astonishing strength of its fascinations. The perverse obstinacy of the chosen people in opposition to the logic of conscience, history, and heaven, can only be explained on the assumption that idolatry offered some deeply-satisfying provision for human nature. Wherein did this attraction lie? As regards the form which has been described as heathenism, the answer is obvious: it was popular because it was not ethical. There are many things which are felt to be attractive if only they were lawful, and the genius of heathenism, especially of the Canaanitish type, was to make it possible to overleap the boundaries of right and wrong with an appeased conscience. Were we confronted by a new religion which in a solemn spirit, and with a reasoned claim, threw its mantle over all which we assign to the world, the flesh, and the devil, we should realize something of the strength of the opposition with which the prophets of J″ had to contend. As regards idolatrous worship of God, again, the need which it met is a universal one. The invisible God of the infinite attributes is a being whom thought with difficulty grasps, to whom the heart hardly warms—and the necessity of a more vivid and concrete manifestation of His essence is common ground of all the great religions save one. As a fact, we can approach God only through the aid of symbols—mental pictures and words are no less symbols than paintings and statues; and it is not clear that there is any difference in principle between the verbal representation of God as our Father and the more graphic representation of the same conception which can be given in His special material by the artist. The prophet did not scruple to use imagery which represented God as flying and even as roaring and ravening like a beast of the forest, and the image of the idolater was more effective than the imagery. But the justification of the prophetic attitude is that the image was too effective. Where a certain spiritual level has been reached, the visible symbol may be a real aid to devotion; but on lower levels the worshipper stops at the outward form, and sinks back into a true heathenism. And so it worked out, against the wise opposition of the prophets, in Israel: the symbol became to the unspiritual people a fetish, and the fetish poisoned the national life.

From what has been said, we are in a better position to appreciate the scheme of retributive justice which the prophetical writers find exemplified in the history of Israel and Judah, and of their kings. Because of idolatry Israel was removed from its place, and Judah after it went into captivity. The religious reformation is followed by a prosperous reign, the backsliding is avenged by the Philistine, the Assyrian, or the Chaldæan. That, says criticism, is not history. As a fact it is, in the main outline, history, and it is besides the vehicle of the grandest and most certain of historical generalizations—viz. that the Ruler of the world is on the side of purity and righteousness. The idolatry of Israel was, as we have seen, a description from the religious side of the evil doings which God hates, and it is therefore rightly written down as the cause of His vindictive and chastening judgments upon Israel.

Idolatry in NT.—The references to idolatry in NT are naturally of much more contracted scope. With the Jews the opposition to idolatry had become since the days of Antiochus Epiphanes a fanaticism, and the subject scarcely finds a place in the sayings of our Lord. From the circumstances of his mission it occupied a considerable space in the thoughts of St. Paul. Of peculiar importance is what we may call his philosophy of heathenism expounded in Ro 1, where he traces it to its origin in a sin against the light of nature, shows that this was punished by the withdrawal of the former light, and sets forth the hideous moral corruption of the Roman world as the result of the religious apostasy. A somewhat milder judgment of the heathen world is passed in the speech at Athens (Ac 18), where ignorance of God is not insisted on as matter of guilt, and an appeal is made to men on the ground of the dignity of their origin to rise to the recognition of the true God, and hearken to His latest accredited word. A special problem arose for Christian casuistry in connexion with meats offered to idols, which the apostle resolves by referring it to the arbitrament of a conscience enlightened by the twin principles of Christian liberty and Christian sympathy (1 Co 8). To the view popularized by Milton that the idols of the heathen were in reality devils, some colour is lent by 1 Co $10^{14ff.}$; but, against this is to be put the emphatic protest, 'we know that no idol is anything in the world' (1 Co 8^{4}). Idolatry appears in the catalogue of the works of the flesh (Gal 5^{20}), and of those which exclude from eternal salvation (1 Co 6^{9}); but, as is characteristic of NT thought, the apostle widens the old religious conception, and makes it include all practices which are tantamount to a dethronement of God in favour of a creature. So gluttony and covetousness, where 'non objecto sed solo acto peccatur,' are species of idolatry (Eph 5^{5}, Ph 3^{19}). The recollection of the blessed deliverance from the darkness of heathenism is appealed to as furnishing a motive to sanctification (1 Th 1^{9}). Finally, St. John predicts an idolatrous apostasy in the last days (Rev 9^{20}).

LITERATURE.—The OT idolatry is naturally one of the capital topics in the histories of Israel and in the monographs on the Biblical Theology of the OT. For the presentation of the subject from the purely evolutionist point of view, see Wellhausen, Isr. u. jüd. Geschichte; Stade, Geschichte des Volkes Israel: for a more conservative treatment, Kittel, Hist. of Hebrews. In addition to the works on Biblical Theology above mentioned, among which Smend's AT Religionsgeschichte is full and suggestive, may be mentioned Duhm, Theologie der Propheten. See also art. 'Baal,' by Ed. Meyer, in Roscher's Lexicon. For the Image Controversy in the Greek Church, see in Mansi's Councils the decrees of the Seventh Œcumenical Council; and for a review of the arguments, Harnack's Dogmengeschichte, ii. p. 460 ff. IDUEL ('Ιδούηλος), 1 Es 8^{43}.—In Ezr 8^{16} ARIEL. The form is due to confusion of ר and ר.

IDUMÆA, IDUMÆANS.—See EDOM.

IEDDIAS (A 'Ιεδδίας, B 'Ιεζείας, AV Eddias), 1 Es 9^{26}.—One of those who agreed to put away their 'strange' wives. Called IZZIAH (יִזִּיָה: B 'Αζειά, A 'Αζιά, ℵ 'Αδειά) Ezr 10^{25}.

IEZER, IEZERITES (אִיעֶזֶר Nu 26^{30} P), contracted from ABIEZER, wh. see.

IGAL (יִגְאָל '[God] redeems').—1. (B 'Ιλαάλ, A F 'Ιγάλ; Igal) One of the twelve spies sent by Moses from the wilderness of Paran: he is described as the son of Joseph of the tribe of Issachar (Nu 13^{7}).

2. (Γαάλ; Luc. 'Ιωήλ) One of David's heroes, the son of Nathan of Zobah (2 S 23^{36}). In the parallel list (1 Ch 11^{38}) the name is given as 'JOEL (יוֹאֵל 'Ιωήλ), the brother (A; 'the son' B) of Nathan.'

3. ('Ιωήλ; Jegaal; AV Igeal) Son of Shemaiah of the royal house of David (1 Ch 3^{22}).

J. F. STENNING.

IGDALIAH (יִגְדַּלְיָהוּ 'J" is great').—A 'man of God,' father of Hanan, whose name is mentioned in connexion with Jeremiah's interview with the Rechabites (Jer 35^{4}).

IGNORANCE is spoken of in Scripture mainly in connexion with sin; it modifies to some extent the sinner's responsibility. Thus even of a sin in which the chief actors knew well that they were doing wrong—the crucifixion—St. Peter says, 'Ye did it in ignorance' (κατὰ ἄγνοιαν, Ac 3^{17}); St. Paul, 'if they had known, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory' (1 Co 2^{8}); and the Lord Himself, 'Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do' (Lk 23^{34}). They all knew something, but not everything; not, for instance, what the apostles only grasped through the resurrection and the teaching of the Risen One, that He was the Son of God, and His death a propitiation for the whole world; hence, according to NT, though their guilt was deep, in some cases awful, it was not unpardonable. The choice of evil, by one who knows clearly and fully what it is, removes the possibility of pardon: such a choice would be the αἰώνιον ἁμάρτημα of which Jesus speaks in Mk 3^{29}—sin, final and irretrievable.

On a broad view, the pre-Christian ages of human history, or the pre-Christian part of any one's life, may be characterized as 'times of ignorance' (Ac 17^{30}, 1 P 1^{14}). The meaning is not that the heathen know nothing; there is a light which lightens every man, a law written on the heart, however blurred or even misleading the writing may have become. But they do not know everything, and therefore, according to NT teaching, their sin is pardonable, and repentance and forgiveness are to be preached to them. Ignorance, such as it is, does not entirely exculpate; but it precludes final condemnation out of hand. When those who have lived in heathen ignorance are converted, their past life will not appear guiltless; on the contrary, they will be ashamed and confounded when they look back on it; when it stands out before them in the light of God's eternal law, and of the life of Jesus, they will be unable to understand how they lived as they did; they will condemn themselves, and humbly acknowledge their guilt. They were ignorant, but not innocent; yet, because of their ignorance, not without hope. Such guilt as theirs leaves the possibility of feeling in the moral nature; they may yet be pricked in their hearts, and repent and be saved. It is thus St. Paul interprets his own experience: 'I was a blasphemer, etc.; but I obtained mercy, because I did it ἀγνοῶν ἐν ἀπιστίᾳ' (1 Ti 1^{13}).

The gradual enlightenment of the Christian conscience, its entrance under the teaching of experience into fuller possession of the mind of Christ, has to be considered, in applying the plea of ignorance in extenuation of guilt. Thus to keep slaves might once have been done ignorantly—κατ' ἄγνοιαν, like the crucifixion—by a Christian; now it would be a sin against the light. Each generation is amazed at what its fathers perpetrated or tolerated or did not see; to say they knew no better is to utter at once their excuse and their condemnation, for such is the connexion between moral integrity and moral enlightenment that we feel sure they might have, and ought to have, known better. St. Paul not only mentions 'the times of ignorance,' which God 'winked at' (Ac 17^{30}), but indicates the genesis of that ignorance in a way which makes it itself an ominous feature of non-Christian life (Ro 1^{18-23}, Eph 4^{17-19}). In the last resort it is due to an immoral suppression, and even extinction, of divine light. It keeps pace with, as it is due to, a πώρωσις of the heart; though the two things, once initiated, are mutually cause and effect. Men act in the hardness of their hearts, and the light is dimmed; they act in the darkening light, and the capacity for feeling is deadened. If this process had its perfect work in any one, so that he had lost utterly the power of distinguishing good and evil, the result would not be the ἄγνοια which mitigates guilt; it would be that ignorance of the 'moral universal' which is itself a final condemnation.

The verb ἀγνοεῖν is used in He 5^{2}, and the subst. ἀγνοήματα in He 9^{7}, to describe sin in the character of 'sin of ignorance.' For the OT conception see Nu 15, Lv 4. The main idea is that of unwitting error or inadvertence. For such sins a sacrifice was provided, more serious in proportion to the culpability of the offender. Thus more was expected—or ignorance was less of a plea—in the case of a priest or a ruler than in that of a private person. Sins of ignorance were sins, and therefore had to be expiated; but they were not high-handed sins, and therefore they could be expiated. They were not renunciations of the covenant, which could not be purged with sacrifice or offering for ever, but had to be punished by extermination. What are commonly called 'infirmities' in Christians may be said to answer now to 'sins of ignorance.' There is a disproportion, so to speak, between our nature and our calling. We are flesh and blood, with inherited vices perhaps, and it is our calling to be holy as God is holy. In spite of faith and vigilance the Christian may be overtaken in a fault. The sudden fall, from which the heart instantly revolts, which it condemns, which it deeply mourns, is the sin of ignorance under the new covenant. If we had only known, if we had seen at the moment how it grieved God, scandalized others, hurt ourselves, we should never have done it. This leaves pardon possible, and we have a High Priest, who was Himself compassed with infirmity (though with none that issued in sin), that He might be able to bear gently with those who sin in ignorance and go astray (τοῖς ἀγνοοῦσι καὶ πλανωμένοις, He 5^{2}). J. DENNEY.

IGNORANCES.—This plural form is given as the tr^{n} of ἄγνοιαι in 1 Es 8^{75}, Sir 23^{3}, and of ἀγνοήματα in To 3^{3}, Sir 23^{2} 51^{19}. It is a literal rendering of the Greek, and can scarcely be illustrated from Eng. secular literature, though other abstract words like 'impenitences' are found, and this plu. is quoted with other meanings. RV retains the form, except in 1 Es 8^{75} 'errors.' For sins of ignorance see the previous article and article Sin. J. Hastings.

Ijon (עִיּוֹן).—A town in the north part of the mountains of Naphtali, noticed with Dan and Abel-beth-maacah in 1 K 15^{20} (=2 Ch 16^{4}) as taken by the captains of the armies of Benhadad. It was captured also and depopulated by Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15^{29}). The name is thought to survive in the Merj 'Ayun or 'meadow of springs,' a plateau N.W. of Dan. The most important site in this plateau is Tell Dibbîn, immediately south of the Leontes ravine, which Robinson and others have suggested may be the site of Ijon.

Literature.—Robinson, BRP iii. 375; Baedeker-Socin, Pal.^{2} 349; Porter, Handbook (Index); Guérin, Galilée, ii. 280; Buhl, GAP (Index, s. 'Ijon'). C. R. Conder.

Ikkesh (עִקֵּשׁ).—The father of Ira, one of David's heroes, 2 S 23^{26}, 1 Ch 11^{28} 27^{9}.

Ilai (עִילַי; B 'Ηλεί, A 'Ηλί; Ilaí), an Ahohite, one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11^{29}). In the parallel list (2 S 23^{28}) the name appears as Zalmon (צַלְמוֹן; B 'Ελλών, A Σελλώμ, Luc. 'Αλιμάν). It seems probable that the Chronicler has preserved the more correct text. Klostermann conjectures עֵילַי or עֵילָי as the original form; Wellhausen עֵלַי: Thenius, however, adheres to the text of Samuel.

Iliadun (B Εἰλιαδούν, A 'Ιλ-, AV Eliadun), 1 Es 5^{58} (^{56} LXX). — Perhaps to be identified with Henadad, Ezr 3^{9}.

Ill.—Like 'evil' (of which it is a contraction), 'ill' is used in AV as adv., adj., and subst. The only occurrence of the subst. is Ro 13^{10} 'Love worketh no ill to his neighbour' (κακόν). Cf. Rhem. NT Note to Mt 3^{10} 'It is not only damnable to doe il, but also not to doe good.' The adj. was formerly, with the meaning of 'bad,' applied to persons as well as things. Thus in the Rhem. NT, the Note on 'Thamar' (Mt 1^{3}) is, 'Christ abhorred not to take flesh of some that were il, as he chose Judas among his Apostles: let us not disdaine to receive our spiritual birth and sustenance of such as be not alwayes good'; and in the Note on the Penitent Thief (Lk 23^{43}) occurs, 'Learne only not to despaire, though thou hast been il [=wicked] to the last moment of thy life.' Again, T. Adams on 1 P 1^{4} says, 'If thy words and works be ill meal, thank the miller, thy heart, for such corrupt thoughts'; and on 1^{6} 'The husband told his wife that he had one ill quality, he was given to be angry without cause; she wittily replied that she would keep him from that fault, for she would give him cause enough.' The adj. occurs in Dt 15^{21} 'any ill blemish'; Jl 2^{20} 'his ill savour'; Jth 8^{8} 'ill word'; Wis 5^{23}, Sir 29^{7} 'ill dealing'; 9^{18} 'ill tongue,' 41^{11} 'ill name.' The adv. is found in Gn 43^{6} 'Wherefore dealt ye so ill with me?' Job 20^{26}, Ps 106^{32} 'go ill'; Is 3^{11} 'be ill'; Jer 40^{4} 'seem ill'; Mic 3^{4} 'they have behaved themselves ill in their doings'; and Wis 18^{10} 'an ill according cry' (ἀσύμφωνος βοή); as well as in the phrase 'ill-favoured,' Gn 41$^{3.\ 4.\ 19.\ 20.\ 21.\ 27}$, for which see Favour, and cf. North, Plutarch, 889, 'He had no further leysure, but to cast an ill-favoured cloke about him, the first that came to hand, and disguising himselfe to flie for life'; Fuller, Profane State, v. 3, p. 365, 'The suspicion is increased if the party accused be notoriously ill-favoured; whereas deformity alone is no more argument to make her a Witch, then handsomenesse had been evidence to prove her an Harlot.' J. Hastings.

Illuminate, Illumination.—Milton uses the verb to illuminate ('give light to,' 'enlighten') literally in PL vii. 350—

> 'And made the stars,
> And set them in the firmament of heaven,
> To illuminate the earth.'

He has it figuratively in Sam. Agon. 1689, 'Though blind of sight . . . with inward eyes illuminated'; so T. Fuller, Holy State, iii. 12, p. 184, 'Of Naturall Fools'—'God may sometimes illuminate them, and (especially towards their death) admit them to the possession of some part of reason.' It is figuratively that the vb. occurs in AV, Bar 4^{2} 'Walk in the presence of the light thereof, that thou mayest be illuminated'; and He 10^{32} 'after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions' (φωτισθέντες, RV 'enlightened').

AV has followed the Rhem. NT here, which (after Vulg.) has 'illuminate' in the foll. passages in which the Gr. is φωτίζειν, Eph 1^{18} 3^{9}, 2 Ti 1^{10}, He 6^{4} 10^{32}, Rev 18^{1} 21^{23} 22^{5}, having 'lighten' in the remaining places, viz. Lk 11^{36}, Jn 1^{9}, 1 Co 4^{5}. No other version uses the word; but in He 6^{4} Wyc. (1380) has 'illumyned,' 1388 'lightned.' It may be noted that Shaks. uses the three forms of the vb. 'illume,' 'illumine,' and 'illuminate'; Milton only 'illume' and 'illuminate.'

Illumination occurs in AV but once, Sir 25^{11} 'The love of the Lord passeth all things for illumination' (εἰς φωτισμόν; RV after edd. omits). Cf. the Rhem tr^{n} of 2 Ti 1^{10} 'But it is manifested now by the illumination (ἐπιφάνεια, Vulg. illuminatio) of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath destroied death, and illuminated (φωτίζειν, Vulg. illuminare) life and incorruption by the Gospel'; and the heading to Jn 9 'Our Lord . . . foretelleth by this occasion the excecation of the Jewes (because of their wilful obstinacie) and illumination of the Gentils who confesse their owne blindnes.' J. Hastings.

Illyricum ('Ιλλυρικόν) was a term used in various senses; but in the mouth of St. Paul (Ro 15^{19}) it must undoubtedly be interpreted in its Roman sense, as denoting the Roman province which extended along the Adriatic from Italy and Pannonia on the north to the Macedonian province on the south. That this Roman sense was in the apostle's mind is shown, not merely by his consistent practice of using geographical terms in the Roman sense (Zahn, Einleitung, p. 130) and by the fact that it was natural and almost necessary in writing to a Roman church to follow the Roman usage, but also by the very form of the word. The Greek term was 'Ιλλυρίς or 'Ιλλυρία; and the strict and regular Greek noun, used to translate the Latin Illyricum, was 'Ιλλυρίς (so in Strabo, pp. 323, 327; while Ptolemy formally gives 'Ιλλυρίς in the Greek version of 2 Ch 16 corresponding to Illyricum in the Latin version). But St. Paul simply transliterates the Roman form into Greek as 'Ιλλυρικόν; Ro 15^{19} is probably the only passage in Greek where a noun 'Ιλλυρικόν is used (showing how Roman St. Paul was in his expression of political or geographical ideas); elsewhere 'Ιλλυρικός is always an adjective.

The conquest of Illyricum had been a very slow process; a province Illyria had been formed as early as B.C. 167, and during the following two centuries all new conquests east and north-east of the Adriatic were incorporated in Illyricum, until in A.D. 10 Augustus separated Pannonia from it, and gave a final organization to Illyricum. The province was important and warlike; a large force of troops was required to maintain order, two legions, vii and xi, being stationed there by Augustus; and the governor was a consular legatus Augusti pro prætore. The northern half of the province was called Liburnia, and the southern, Dalmatia (wh. see). The name Dalmatia, however, gradually came into use to denote the province as a whole; and from the Flavian period onwards it became the regular and usual term. Pliny, writing before 77, uses both terms. Suetonius uses Illyricum for the time of the earlier emperors (distinguishing Dalmatia as a part of the country under Augustus), while he uses both names for the time of Otho and of Claudius. It is therefore interesting to find that St. Paul in a later epistle (2 Ti 4[10]) uses the later term Dalmatia, and not the older term Illyricum. This affords no argument for a post-Pauline date. The name Dalmatia was coming into use during his lifetime; and such changes first affect the usage of ordinary life before they affect the formal official and literary usage. If Pliny, who was so much affected by the expression of his authorities (who, being early, would all use the name Illyricum), could use the term Dalmatia before 77, St. Paul might use it ten years earlier. In fact, we may from the usage of St. Paul date the definite change in popular Roman usage from the one term to the other about A.D. 57 to 67.

In Ro 15[19] St. Paul says he has preached the gospel 'even unto Illyricum.' He is here stating the exterior limit up to which his work had extended; and there is no reason to understand (contrary to Ac) that he had actually preached in Illyricum. The doubt whether an exterior or a contained limit is meant in geographical expressions is observable in many cases, and must be determined by the context and by other evidence (see, for example, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, i. p. 319 f.). W. M. RAMSAY.

IMAGE, IMAGERY.—Image is loosely used in AV and RV as the tr[n] of many different Heb. words. A complete list of these words may be given for reference from other articles and for the proper interpretation of this important expression.

1. צֶלֶם zelem, a copy or counterpart, is translated 'image' by AV and RV in all its occurrences (Gn 1[26. 27 bis 5[3] 9[6], Nu 33[52] [צַלְמֵי מַסֵּכֹתָם 'their molten images'], 1 S 6[5 bis. 11], 2 K 11[18], 2 Ch 23[17], Ps 73[20], Ezk 7[20] 16[17] 23[14], Am 5[26]), except Ps 39[6] 'vain shew,' AVm 'image,' RVm (badly) 'shadow.' See next article.

2. סֶמֶל ṣemel, a resemblance or likeness, is rendered 'image' in Ezk 8[3. 5] (AV and RV); but 'figure' in Dt 4[16] and 'idol' in 2 Ch 33[7. 15]. See IDOLATRY.

3. תְּמוּנָה, tĕmûnâh, similitude, is rendered 'image' in Job 4[16] only; elsewhere 'likeness' (Ex 20[4], Dt 4[23. 25] 5[8], Ps 17[15]), or 'similitude' (Nu 12[8], Dt 4[12. 15. 16]). RV has 'form' everywhere except Ps 17[15] 'likeness,' m. 'form.' See FORM.

4. מַשְׂכִּית maskîth, representation, picture, is translated variously: Lv 26[1] (אֶבֶן מַשְׂכִּית) AV 'image of stone,' RV 'figured stone'; Nu 33[52] AV 'pictures,' RV 'figured stones'; Ps 73[7] (עָבְרוּ מַשְׂכִּיּוֹת לֵבָב) AV 'they have more than heart could wish,' AVm 'they pass the thoughts of the heart,' RVm 'the imaginations of their heart overflow'; Pr 18[11] AV 'conceit,' RV 'imagination'; 25[11] AV 'pictures,' RV 'baskets,' RVm 'filigree work'; Ezk 8[12] AV and RV 'imagery.' See PICTURE.

5. מַצֵּבָה maṣṣêbhâh, pillar, is translated simply 'pillar' by AV and RV in Gn 28[18. 22] 31[13. 45. 51. 52 bis 35[14. 20], Is 19[19]; in Dt 12[3] AV and RV 'pillar,' RVm 'obelisk'; in Ezk 26[11] AV 'garrison,' RV 'pillar,' RVm 'obelisk'; elsewhere AV has 'image' with 'statue' or 'standing image' in marg., RV always 'pillar' with 'obelisk' in marg. (Ex 23[24] 24[4] 34[13], Lv 26[1] [AV 'standing image'], Dt 7[5] [AVm 'statue or pillar'] 16[22], 1 K 14[23], 2 K 3[2] 10[26. 27] 17[10] 18[4] 23[14], 2 Ch 14[3] 31[1], Jer 43[13], Hos 3[4] 10[1. 2], Mic 5[13] [AV 'standing image']). See PILLAR.

6. [חַמָּן] only in plu. חַמָּנִים ḥammânîm, pillars for sun-worship. AV translates by 'images' in Lv 26[30]; by 'images' with marg. 'sun images' in 2 Ch 14[5] 34[4], Is 17[8] 27[9], Ezk 6[4. 6]; and by 'idols' in 2 Ch 34[7]: RV always 'sun-images.' See IDOLATRY and SUN.

7. תְּרָפִים, only plu., tĕrâphîm, is always simply transliterated in RV 'teraphim.' AV has 'teraphim' in Jg 17[5] 18[14. 17. 18. 20], Hos 3[4]; but 'images' in Gn 31[19] (m. 'teraphim') 31[34. 35], 2 K 23[24] (m. 'teraphim'). Ezk 21[21] (m. 'teraphim'), with the sing. 'image' in 1 S 19[13. 16]; 'idolatry' in 1 S 15[23]; and 'idols' with marg. 'teraphims' in Zec 10[2]. See TERAPHIM.

8. [עָצַב] only in plu. עֲצַבִּים 'ăṣabbîm, is translated 'idols' almost everywhere by both AV and RV (1 S 31[9], 1 Ch 10[9], 2 Ch 24[18], Ps 106[36. 38] 115[4] 135[15], Is 10[11] 46[1], Hos 4[17] 8[4] 13[2] 14[8], Mic 1[7], Zec 13[2]); but both give 'images' in 2 S 5[21], and RV gives 'images' though AV has 'idols' in Jer 50[2]. See IDOLATRY.

9. [גָּלַל] only in plu. גִּלּוּלִים or גִּלֻּלִים gillûlîm, a distinctive word, properly 'idol blocks,' or such term of disparagement, in Ezk thirty-nine times; elsewhere only nine times (Lv 26[30], Dt 29[17], 1 K 15[12] 21[26], 2 K 17[12] 21[11. 21] 23[24], Jer 50[2]). It is tr[d] 'idols' in AV and RV everywhere except Jer 50[2] in AV 'images.' See IDOLATRY.

10. אֱלִיל 'ĕlîl, worthlessness, is often applied in derision to foreign gods. Its translation (when plu.) is usually 'idols' in both AV and RV, Lv 19[4] (RVm 'things of nought') 26[1], 1 Ch 16[25] (RVm 'things of nought'), Ps 96[5] (RVm 'things of nought') 97[7], Is 2[8. 18. 20 bis] 10[10. 11] 19[1. 3] 31[7 bis], Ezk 30[13], Hab 2[18]. In Jer 14[14] both versions give 'a thing of nought'; in Job 13[4] rôph'ê 'ĕlîl is in both 'physicians of no value'; while in Zec 11[17] hoi rô'î ha'ĕlîl is translated in AV 'Woe to the idol shepherd' (where 'idol' is apparently used as an adj.), in RV 'Woe to the worthless shepherd.' See GOD, IDOLATRY.

11. פֶּסֶל pesel (from פָּסַל to carve) is translated 'graven image' by RV everywhere (Ex 20[4], Lv 26[1], Dt 4[16. 23. 25 58] 27[15], Jg 17[3. 4] 18[14. 17. 18. 20. 30. 31], 2 K 21[7], 2 Ch 33[7], Ps 97[7], Is 40[19. 20] 42[17] 44[9. 10. 15. 17] 45[20] 48[5], Jer 10[14] 51[17], Nah 1[14], Hab 2[18]). AV has 'carved image' in Jg 18[18], 2 Ch 33[7]; elsewhere it agrees with RV.

12. [פָּסַל] from same root, only in plu. פְּסִילִים pĕṣîlîm, is also translated by RV 'graven images' in all its occurrences (Dt 7[5. 25] 12[3], 2 K 17[41], 2 Ch 33[19. 22] 34[3. 4. 7], Ps 78[58], Is 10[10] 21[9 bis] 42[8], Jer 8[19] 50[38] 51[47. 52], Hos 11[2], Mic 1[7 bis]), except Jg 3[19. 26] where both versions have 'quarries' in text, with 'graven images' in margin. AV gives 'carved images' in 2 Ch 33[22] 34[3. 4]; elsewhere as RV.

13. מַסֵּכָה massêkâh, lit. 'a pouring out,' is used of molten metal, and (with the word for 'calf' added) of a 'molten calf' in Ex 32[4. 8], Dt 9[16], Neh 9[18]; or 'molten gods' Ex 34[17], Lv 19[4] (with word for 'gods'); but generally it stands alone and is translated 'molten image' (Nu 33[52] [Heb. here adds zelem], Dt 9[12] 27[15], Jg 17[3. 4] 18[14. 17. 18], 1 K 14[9], 2 K 17[16], 2 Ch 28[2] 34[3. 4], Ps 106[19], Is 30[22] 42[17], Hos 13[2], Nah 1[14], Hab 2[18]). In Is 30[1] the words לְנָסֵךְ מַסֵּכָה are rendered in AV and RV 'that cover with a covering'; in RVm 'weave a web or pour out a drink-offering or make a league.'

14. נֶסֶךְ nêsek, or נָסֶךְ nesek, from the same root as the last, is the word for a 'drink-offering,' and is so translated by AV and RV in all its occurrences, except Is 41[29] 48[5], Jer 10[14] 51[17] where both versions have 'molten image,' and Nu 4[7] where קְשׂוֹת הַנֶּסֶךְ is rendered in AV 'covers to cover withal,' in RV 'cups to pour out withal.'

In the Apocr. 'image' occurs in the following places: 2 Es 5[37] 8[44] (both imago), Wis 2[23] 7[26] 13[13. 16] 14[15] (all εἰκών), 14[17] (ἐμφανῆ εἰκόνα, AV 'an express image,' RV 'a visible image'), 15[4] (εἶδος, RV 'form'), 15[5] (εἰκών), 15[13] (γλυπτά, EV 'graven images'), 17[21] (εἰκών); 1 Mac 3[48] (εἴδωλον, RV 'idol'), 5[68] (γλυπτά, EV 'carved images'); 2 Mac 2[2] (ἀγάλματα, EV 'images').

In NT χαρακτήρ is translated 'express image' in He 1[3] (χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ, 'the express image of his person,' RV 'the very image of his substance,' RVm 'the impress of his substance'; it is the only occurrence in NT of χαρακτήρ, which gives us our word 'character'). Elsewhere image is always εἰκών, and that Gr. word is always so translated in both versions.

Imagery occurs twice: Ezk 8[12] 'Son of man, hast thou seen what the ancients of the house of Israel do in the dark, every man in the chambers of his imagery?' (בַּחֲדְרֵי כִשְׁכִּיתוֹ, RV 'in his chambers of imagery'); and Sir 38[27] 'give themselves to counterfeit imagery' (εἰς ὁμοίωσαι ζωγραφίαν, RV 'to preserve likeness in his portraiture'). In the Prol. to Deut. Tindale uses the word in the sense of images or idols, 'And to beware ether of makynge imagerye or of bowinge them selves unto images.' Sir T. Elyot is very near the use in Sir when he says (The Governour, ii. 403), 'It is written that the great kynge Alexander on a tyme beinge (as it hapned) unoccupyed, came to the shoppe of Apelles, the excellent paynter, and standyng by hym whyles he paynted, the kynge raisoned with hym of lines, adumbrations, proportions, or other like thinges pertainyng to imagery, whiche the paynter a litle whyles sufferynge, at the last said to the kynge with the countenance all smylyng, Seest thou, noble prince, howe the boye that gryndeth my colours dothe laughe the to scorne?' Bp. Atterbury uses the word in the same sense as Ezk, 'It might be a mere dream which he saw; the imagery of a melancholick fancy.'

IMAGE.—About a score of Heb. words are rendered in AV 'idol' or 'image.' See preceding art. and IDOLATRY. The terms reserved for the expression which in Christian doctrine (to which the present art. is confined) represents 'image' or 'likeness,' are צֶלֶם and דְּמוּת, to which correspond εἰκών and ὁμοίωσις in the NT. For the latter Heb. word the LXX once at least uses ἰδέα (Gn 5^3). צֶלֶם sometimes (Dn 3^{19}) signifies an aspect or expression of countenance. In biblical Greek κατ' εἰκόνα is sometimes used adverbially = 'after the manner of,' as e.g. Hos 13^2 κατ' εἰκόνα εἰδώλων, 'after the fashion of idols.' Wis 13^{13} εἰκόνι ἀνθρώπου, 'in the manner of a man.'

There are two main biblical doctrines which find expression under these terms, viz. that of (1) man as made in the image of God, and (2) that of Christ the Son, as the image of the Father, or of the invisible God.

I. The passages in which this view of man is expressly stated are: Gn $1^{26.\ 27}$ $5^{1.\ 3}$ 9^6, 1 Co 11^7, Col 3^{10}, Ja 3^9. To these should be added Ps 8, which, though not containing the phrase 'image of God,' is a poetical replica of the creation-narrative of Gn 1 as far as it refers to man. St. Paul's address at Athens is another passage where the idea of 'likeness' between man and his Maker is fully implied, though the word is not used. A quite factitious importance has been attached to the difference between צֶלֶם and דְּמוּת in the primal passage. There is really no difference. At the utmost, it is that between an original or pattern and that which is framed according to the pattern. The double expression in Gn 1^{26} and 5^1 is simply intended to strengthen the idea. The divine image which man bears is one corresponding to the Original.

This grand assertion is the distinctive feature of the Bible doctrine concerning man. It distinguishes the revealed teaching about him from all ethnic or naturalistic views, and is the real foundation of all our ideas about the dignity of man. Although thus definite and significant, however, the phrase is not explicit. Large place is left for discussion as to whether this definition refers to something in man's own nature or mainly to his relations: and among these whether to his aspect towards the other creatures or his relation to God. This is why the doctrine of the Divine Image in man has been a topic so fruitful of differences in theology. For long the theological bent was to make the imago Dei distinctive of man unfallen. In the loss of the image by sin lay man's need of redemption. 'What we lost in Adam,' says Irenæus, 'to wit, the divine image and similitude, that we receive again in Christ Jesus.' But later on, it was seen that this was too sweeping. Then set in the tendency to expound the idea in a double sense. The cruder form of this was the Romish, as expressed by Bellarmin—that by the Fall man lost the 'likeness' of God, though he retained the 'image.' But Protestants held a not dissimilar view, viz. that the image had two meanings. In one sense it is essential to man's nature, and in this sense consists of his intellectual powers, his liberty of will, and his superiority among the creatures,—features which can never be wholly lost, but remain with man though fallen. In the other sense it includes those ornaments or complements of the idea—immortality, grace, holiness, righteousness—which were defaced or blotted out by man's transgression. One point of unity and consistency with Scripture holds fast amid these variations of view. For it is certain that in the passages cited above the divine image is recognized as existing in man fallen as well as unfallen. Among recent evangelical divines of a philosophical cast the tendency has been to return to the position of the early Eastern Church, and place the image mainly in that which distinguishes man among created beings, rather than in that which marks off the unfallen from the fallen condition. The Greek Christian Fathers did define it as something rather metaphysical than ethical. But to place the image mainly in the possession of 'Spirit' and 'Free Will' is to overlook the moral and religious elements essential to man's nature. Man in his ideal is a 'spirit' and 'will' under the dominion of conscience, developed freely no doubt, but in subjection and obedience to God. That this biblical notion of the divine image is a profoundly simple and consistent one, is made clear by the NT passages which speak of its renewal in grace (Col 3^{10}, cf. Eph 4^{24}), where the moral elements are prominent and supreme. But they cannot be read as defining what the divine image was in man at the first, for they treat expressly of the 'new man.' The unity and simplicity of the idea are conserved, if we note that this description of the 'new man' presupposes corresponding outlines in the first man which were broken off by sin, and are for the first time fully realized in man redeemed and renewed.

Another suggestive point in the discussion comes out of the question, long debated, whether the divine image in man was a gift of grace added to his nature, i.e. was in a sense something 'supernatural,' or was wholly natural and concreated from the first, as Protestants have always maintained. The real point in dispute is much confused and hidden. The mediæval view is really one of dualism or divergence in man's nature. It splits his life into two. It accentuates the distinction between nature and grace, between things secular and sacred; whereas the true view is that of an original unity in the creature made after God's image, and a harmonious development of the human and divine elements in him. For there is a truth in the mediæval idea of a 'supernatural gift of righteousness' to man, though it was crudely expressed. Human nature only attains its ideal when cultivated by divine grace. The nature of man is incomplete without its Godward development, and this can take place successfully only through grace. For it is essential to man's highest to be not left to himself. Mere human nature or 'unassisted reason,' as the phrase goes, is a contradiction of the Bible idea of man. That idea is that human nature rightly and fully developed manifests the divine, and is a reflection of what it has received of God.

II. That Christ is 'the Image of the Father' belongs to the doctrine of the Saviour's pre-existent Godhead as taught in the NT. It is one of the ways in which that truth is set forth. The precisely relevant passages are 2 Co 4^4, Col $1^{15\text{-}17}$, He $1^{2.\ 3}$. The idea is not restricted to the term εἰκών which occurs in the first two citations, but is also expressed by two kindred phrases in He 1^3 ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης, 'the effulgence of his glory,' and χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ, 'the very image of his substance.' It will be noted from the context of all these passages that the terms are used not so much of the incarnate Redeemer as of the eternal Son. No doubt, according to the teaching of Jesus and that of all His apostles, the 'Christ come in the flesh' is for us the mirror and reflection of God. 'He that hath seen me,' says Jesus, 'hath seen the Father' (Jn 14^9). This is the prominent and prevailing sense of the Christian doctrine that Christ is the Revelation or Image of God. This is the central teaching of the Incarnation. But in the few places where the word 'image' or its equivalents is used in this connexion by the writers of the NT Epistles, it is employed in support of a special doctrine of Christ's essential divine personality. In this respect it stands on the same plane as the title ὁ υἱός, 'the Son,' used so widely throughout the NT writings, and ὁ λόγος in the Johannine passages.

Notice (1) that in the Hebrews passage, where Christ as υἱός is the subject of the assertion, the other terms supplement and complete the idea of His divine Sonship. To say that He who is the Son is the 'effulgence of God's glory' and 'the very image or impress of his substance,' is not only to reassert the Sonship, but to add to it the idea of 'likeness.' It affirms community of nature with the Father in the same way as when He is called 'the Son of God.' It thus strengthens the expression of Christ's place in the Godhead by affirming at once His likeness to God and yet His personal distinctness, for how can any one be spoken of as 'the image' of himself?

Further, note (2) how this term 'image' as used of the pre-existent Christ, echoes, like ὁ λόγος, a form of older or pre-Christian speech. Εἰκών and ἀπαύγασμα are both applied to the 'Wisdom' of Old Testament literature, e.g. in Wis 7^{26} 'For she is the "brightness" of the everlasting light, the unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the "image" of his goodness.' Χαρακτήρ is applied by Philo to the Logos; so also εἰκών, as where he says the Logos is εἰκὼν δι' οὗ ὁ κόσμος ἐδημιουργεῖτο. It is probable, therefore, that the writer of the Fourth Gospel, the writer 'to the Hebrews,' and St. Paul were all drawing on ancient terms, common to the Jewish Alexandrian schools, which had been applied in pre-Christian thought to a personified divine attribute. The NT writers are in these passages rescuing these terms to describe their Master's Person and glory. Judaizing Gnosticism had employed some of these expressions to uphold the doctrine of a graduated hierarchy of divine manifestation, more especially that of a secondary or representative divine being alongside of the supreme and invisible God,—a notion which, when applied to the Person of Christ, became afterwards the Arian heresy. The apostolic writers apply these terms ὁ λόγος, ἡ εἰκών, and the like, to their Lord in a way fitted to bring out what is true in them and to repudiate what is false;—conspicuously, so as to repel the notion of inferiority in the second member of the divine Trinity.

Note (3) how this is clenched by the fact that in the context of the three passages Jn 1^{1-3}, Col 1^{15-17}, and He 1^{2-3} the special function of creating and upholding the universe is ascribed to Christ under His titles of Word, Image, and Son respectively. The kind of Creatorship so predicated of Him is not that of a mere instrument or artificer in the formation of the world, but that of One 'by whom, in whom, and for whom' all things are made, and through whom they subsist. This implies the assertion of His true and absolute Godhead. It was evidently meant so to do. For there is no more direct and successful method of affirming that Christ is God than to ascribe to Him the making and governing of all things in the supreme form which the ascription takes in these passages.

Something remains to be said of a possible connexion between these two facts noted by biblical theology, viz. that 'man is made in the divine image,' and that 'Christ is,' in the supreme sense, 'the Image of God.' The older dogmatic was wont to distinguish the two, by saying that the divine image in man was accidentalis compared with that Godlikeness which belonged to the eternal Son as Imago substantialis. But what Scripture teaches of their connexion can be briefly stated. It has two distinct lines—one referring to the original creation of man, the other to his redemption.

Man is represented in Scripture as the crown or goal of that earthly creation of which the Eternal Word is the Author. He who is the 'Image of the Invisible God' is also declared to be the 'Firstborn or First-begotten of all creation' (Col 1^{15}), i.e. the absolute heir and sovereign Lord of all things. There is thus a propriety in holding man to be a copy of the Logos. But there is no express Scripture for the assertion that man was created in the likeness of the eternal Son. On the contrary, it is always the image or likeness of God that is spoken of in this connexion. No doubt, it is implied that the Logos or Image of God is He 'in whom and for whom' man was created. But it would be a misreading of these passages to take them as affirming that man was created after the likeness of the Son, and not of the Father or of the Holy Spirit. Everywhere Scripture represents man as created after the image of the Elohim, or of the Godhead. Man is said to be 'the image and glory of God,' not of Christ alone.

On the other hand, when the new creation of man is referred to, the NT is explicit in asserting that Christ is the prototype of the redeemed or renewed humanity. The 'divine image' is restored in those who are predestinate to be 'conformed to the image of his Son.' We are 'renewed in the spirit of our mind' only as we put on 'the new man—renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him' (Col 3^{10}), —a new creation in which 'Christ is all in all' (Col 3^{11}). Likeness to His Image is only to be completed when the redeemed shall see their Redeemer as He is (1 Jn 3^{2}). The likeness shall then extend even to the outward form. 'He shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory' (Ph 3^{21} RV); 'As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly' (1 Co 15^{49}).

All this is explicit and clear. There has long been a desire and tendency among theological thinkers to complete the connexion of the two statements. It looks extremely probable to infer that man must have been created from the first in the image of Him who was afterwards to be incarnate for man's redemption, and who in redeeming men conforms them to His own likeness. It is a tempting and perhaps innocent speculation, but not an ascertainment of biblical theology.

IMAGINE, IMAGINATION.—The verb to 'imagine' has always in AV the obsolete meaning of purpose, scheme, contrive. Thus Gn 11^{6} 'Nothing will be restrained from them which they have imagined to do' (יָזַמּוּ, RV 'they purpose'); Zec 7^{10} 'Let none of you imagine evil against his brother in your heart' (אִישׁ־רָעָתוֹ, Amer. RV 'devise'). Cf. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 74, 'It was reported to the noble emperour Octavius Augustus that Lucius Cinna, which was susters sonne to the great Pompei, had imagined his dethe'; and Tindale, Notes to Deut., 'Zamzumims, a kinde of geauntes and signifieth myschevous or that be all waye imagininge.' RV generally retains 'imagine,' but Amer. RV prefers 'think' in Job 6^{26}, 'meditate' in Ps 2^{1} 38^{12}, and 'devise' in Ps 10^{2} 21^{11} 140^{2}, Pr 12^{20}, Hos 7^{15}, Nah $1^{9.\ 11}$, Zec 7^{10} 8^{17}.

Imagination has always the sense of evil purpose, contrivance. This is so even in Ro 1^{21} 'became vain in their imaginations,' where the Gr. is διαλογισμός, more consistently tr^{d} 'reasoning' in RV; and in 2 Co 10^{5} 'casting down imaginations,' where the Gr. is λογισμός, and AVm RVm give 'reasonings'; in the only other occurrence in NT of this Gr. word (Ro 2^{15}) AV and RV have 'thoughts,' RVm 'reasonings.' But 'reasoning' is plainly too colourless, the evil intent in the Gr. words here being lost. For 'imagination' in the sense of mischievous intention, cf. Is 55^{7} Cov. 'Let the ungodly man forsake his wayes, and the unrightuous his ymaginacions, and turne agayne unto the LORDE.' Tindale uses the word in the sense of a visible representation of a thought, Nu 33^{52} 'Se that ye dryve out all the inhabiters of the londe before you, and destroy their Ymaginacions and all their Ymages of Metall.' The Heb. subst. shĕrîrûth expresses firmness in a bad cause, and is mistranslated by 'imagination' in AV: RV gives 'stubbornness' in all its occurrences (Dt 29^{19}, Ps 81^{12}, Jer 3^{17} 7^{24} 9^{14} 11^{8} 13^{10} 16^{12} 18^{12} 23^{17}).

IMALCUE, AV Simalcue (Σινμαλκουή A, Ἰμαλκουέ ℵV, Εἰμαλκουαί; Simalchue, Emalchuel, also Malchus), 1 Mac 11^{39}.—An Arab prince to whom Alexander Balas entrusted his youthful son Antiochus. After the death of Alexander, in B.C. 145, Imalcue reluctantly gave up the boy to Tryphon, who placed him on the throne of Syria as Antiochus VI. in opposition to Demetrius II. Nikator (1 Mac $11^{39\text{-}54}$; Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 1; Diodorus in Müller's Frag. Hist. Græc. ii. p. xvii n. 21). Elsewhere Diodorus (op. cit. n. 20) names Diocles, prince of Abæ in Arabia, as the guardian of the young (νήπιος) Antiochus. Josephus and the Syriac give the name as Malchus, Diodorus as Jamblichus, both representing the Heb. יִמְלְכוּ, a name which appears on Palmyrene inscriptions. IMMANUEL (עִמָּנוּ־אֵל, Ἐμμανουήλ, 'God is with us,' or, as others, 'God with us').—The name of a child whose birth was predicted by Isaiah, and who was to be a sign from God to Ahaz during the Syro-Ephraimitic war (Is 7). The name does not occur again in Scripture; and much difference of opinion has prevailed on the question wherein the point of the sign lay, whether in the person of Immanuel himself, or in the meaning of his name, or in the time of his birth, or in the conditions of his life, or in several of these things together. Other things in the prophecy are also obscure. The mother of Immanuel is described as the 'almah (LXX ἡ παρθένος), a term which means merely 'young woman' (cf. the masc. 1 S 17^{56} 20^{22}), though in usage it appears said only of unmarried persons. Even if the more technical word for 'virgin' (בְּתוּלָה) had been employed, the term might have described the young woman merely at the moment when the prophet spoke; the idea of a virgin conception and birth could have been expressed without ambiguity only by a circumlocution. The force of the art. (הָעַלְמָה) may also be variously understood. Some take the art. as generic, referring to the class of persons called 'almah (Ec 7^{26}), in which case the meaning would be that any or many of this class would exemplify the prediction, calling their children Immanuel. But perhaps the 'almah becomes definite to the prophet's mind just from the circumstances connected with her and the part she performs (2 S 17^{17}). There is nothing in the passage to suggest that the 'almah is of mean birth or estate; but the generality of the term is unfavourable to the idea that the wife of the prophet —called 'the prophetess' 8^{3}—or the wife of king Ahaz is meant. Neither is there anything in the passage to suggest that the 'almah is a personification of the house of David or the people of Judah.

The prophecy is to be explained partly from the historical circumstances, partly from the circle of thoughts which had filled the prophet's mind from the beginning (chs. 1–6), and in the light of which he interpreted the circumstances, and partly from ideas regarding the house of David that had long formed part of the national faith. It cannot be altogether without significance that it is 'the house of David' that is addressed and spoken of throughout the chapter.

The historical circumstances were these: In the days of Ahaz the kings of Syria and Ephraim formed an alliance and made war on Judah. The object of the allies was possibly to compel Judah to enter into a confederacy against Assyria, and not improbably Egypt had its hand in the game (7^{18}). Ahaz being reluctant, the allies resolved to dethrone the house of David and set a tool of their own upon the throne of Judah. Amidst the terror inspired by the alliance (7^{2}), the prophet was bidden go to meet the king and say to him in regard to the purpose of the allies, 'It shall not stand.' He added the solemn warning that faith in J″ was the condition of deliverance. Shortly after, the prophet offered the corroboration of any sign which the king might ask. This offer Ahaz rejected, putting it away under the pretext that he would not put God to the proof. Roused to passion by the king's unbelief or obstinacy, the prophet exclaimed, 'Is it too small a thing for you to weary men, that ye weary my God also? Therefore the Lord himself shall give you a sign.'

The subject may be approached by asking: Of what is Immanuel the sign or corroboration?

1. Some answer, of the promise, 'It shall not stand'—of the failure of the northern coalition, and of the deliverance of Judah from Ephraim and Syria. In this case the sign lies partly in the meaning of the name Immanuel, 'God is with us,' and partly in the time of his birth. His mother and he are no persons in particular—they are any young woman and her son. By the time young women conceive and bear sons they will be calling their children 'God is with us,' in token of Judah's deliverance from Syria and Ephraim: 'Before the child shall know to reject evil and choose good, the land before whose two kings thou fearest shall be depopulated,' v.^{16} (Duhm). This interpretation is simple, but difficult to accept. (1) It requires the excision of vv.$^{15.\ 17}$. For, whoever Immanuel and his mother be, they are Judæans, and when it is said that the child shall eat thick milk and honey (v.^{15}), it is implied that Judah shall be reduced by war to a pasture land no more cultivated (v.$^{21\text{ff.}}$)—a thing in direct contradiction to the supposed meaning of the sign. (2) The sign becomes virtually a duplicate of that of Mahershalal ($8^{1\text{-}4}$), for though Assyria is not named as the destroyer of Syria and Ephraim in 7^{16}, it is admittedly in the prophet's mind. A duplication of the same sign is highly improbable. (3) Is it probable or possible that Isaiah should conceive Judæan mothers expressing their thankfulness for deliverance from Ephraim and Syria by using the name Immanuel? He has himself the utmost contempt for the northern alliance (7^4). The danger does not seem to him to lie there (8^{12}). Further, that which will make the northern alliance abortive is the Assyrian invasion, but everywhere in the passage he assumes that the Assyrian will devastate Judah also ($7^{18.\ 20}$ $8^{7.\ 8}$). The Assyrian invasion will extend over Israel and Judah in common. Immanuel cannot be a sign of deliverance from Ephraim and Syria, for the deliverance will be effected only through a calamity infinitely greater. (4) Though the sign first offered to Ahaz was to be a token of deliverance from the allies ($7^{11.\ 12}$), the change of tone on the prophet's part suggests that the sign now given will be of a different sort. It is a mistake to suppose that the sign must be something which Ahaz could see, in corroboration of something else. The sign may be just the coming fact, or some aspect of it, as it was said to Moses, 'And this is the sign to thee that I have sent thee: when thou hast brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye shall serve God upon this mountain' (Ex 3^{12}; cf. Is 37^{30}).

2. Some regard the sign as lying partly in the meaning of the name Immanuel, and partly in the circumstances of his birth and life; that is, the sign is twofold, first, of deliverance from the northern coalition (Immanuel), and second, of the Assyrian devastation of Judah ('milk and honey shall he eat,' vv.$^{15.\ 17}$). But, as before, against this is the utter uselessness of giving Ahaz a sign of deliverance from the allies when that deliverance is effected only by the complete desolation of his own country at the same time.

3. It is therefore probable that the sign is of larger significance. Several things must be taken into account. First, that which others would call a national crisis, the prophets, and particularly Isaiah, consider a religious crisis. His statement to Ahaz, 'if ye do not believe ye shall not be established' (v.^{9}), is not the enunciation of a commonplace. It is the central thought of his prophetic life ($6^{9ff.}$ and often). And this faith is wanting both in prince and people ($7^{12.\ 13}$ $8^{5ff.}$). Secondly, throughout this interview the prophet's mind is in a state of extreme exaltation, as his offer to Ahaz of a sign anywhere in all the universe of things shows. And this exaltation is intensified by the king's rejection of the sign offered him—'Will ye weary my God also'? (7^{13}). The sign now given will not be a favourable one forced upon Ahaz, but one of a wider kind. The prophet casts his eye forward over the whole destiny of the kingdom of J″. He sees his conceptions of this destiny about to take shape in history. The conditions and the instruments of fulfilling what he had from the beginning foreseen to be inevitable are now present. A great judgment shall sweep over the land, 'the Lord will bring on thee days that have not been since Ephraim departed from Judah' (v.^{17}); 'milk and honey shall every one eat that is left in the land' (v.^{22}). The country shall be reduced to a pasture land, whose scanty inhabitants shall live on milk and wild honey. But this is not the end; a remnant shall turn: amidst the desolation and behind it there will be those who say, 'God is with us.'* The sign has no reference to Syria and Ephraim; it refers to the destiny of the people, though, of course, to the prophet's mind or his vision this destiny had two steps—the Assyrian devastation, and the repentance and salvation that would follow it. This view is supported by the fact that where Immanuel is mentioned again it is in connexion with the Assyrian invasion ($8^{8.\ 10}$). But does not this interpretation require the omission of v.^{16} 'Before the child know to reject evil and choose good, the land shall be depopulated, before whose two kings thou art in terror'? (so Budde). Even if this should be the case, we must choose that side on which there appears to lie the greater probability. The chapter and the succeeding ones have not escaped interpolation. V.^{16} might be due to the same hand that inserted the words 'within sixty-five years Ephraim shall be broken that it be not a people' (v.^{8}, cf. 8^7). The verse in its present form cannot be read along with v.^{17}. Perhaps, however, it might be sufficient to omit the last words of the verse, 'before whose two kings thou art in terror.' With this omission 'the land' would be Judah as in 6^{11}, and the whole passage v.$^{14ff.}$ have reference to the desolation of Judah. It is certainly very improbable that Isaiah should have spoken of Syria and Israel as a single 'land,' though a reader might have so understood the word and helped out the sense by the gloss 'before whose two kings,' etc.*

This view still leaves room for different interpretations of Immanuel. The 'almah and her son might be considered merely examples of something general, in which case Immanuel would represent the new generation rising up after the desolation (v.^{15}), the 'holy seed' of 6^{13} (cf. the change of mind described in $8^{21ff.}$). The force of the sign to Ahaz would lie in the threat of invasion and the destruction of the order of things now existing of which he and his house was a great part, though the prophet's own interest would be chiefly in that which was to follow this, the new faith in J″, expressed in the words 'God is with us.' He himself and his children, not by their names, but by their faith amidst the darkness already as good as fallen on the nation, are a 'sign' of this future faith of the people ($8^{16\text{-}18}$). There are some things, however, which rather suggest a more precise meaning for Immanuel. (1) The whole passage relates to the 'house of David.' It was the design of the allies to dethrone this house, a purpose which could not but awaken wider thoughts in the prophet's mind. As represented in Ahaz this house had pronounced judgment on itself ($7^{9.\ 13}$), and with his assured conviction of the imminent destruction of the nation the prophet cannot have helped forecasting also the fate of the royal family. If, as is likely, the prophecies, chs. 9. 11, belong to this period, they show that he contemplated its downfall (11^1). (2) The words 'thy land, O Immanuel' (8^8) suggest that Immanuel, in the prophet's mind, is an individual person, to whom the land in some way belongs. (3) The general line of the prophet's thoughts at this time may be fairly appealed to. In $9^{1\text{-}7}$ the 'child born' is certainly a member of the house of David, and he is there introduced in such a matter of course way as to suggest that he had been already referred to and was known. Such a reference could only be found in ch. 7. (4) The names given to the child in ch. 9 may all be summed up in the name Immanuel, of which they are an analysis. These considerations may suggest that Immanuel is identical with the child of ch. 9 and the 'shoot' of ch. 11. If so, the sign does not lie in the meaning of the word Immanuel, but in the person who was the embodiment of the meaning, and who was 'called' Immanuel because he was Immanuel.

* Whether it can also be said through the desolation, i.e. by its discipline, will depend on whether לְרַעְתּוֹ (v.^{15}) is to be rendered 'that he may know' (AV) or 'when he knows' (RV), and on whether 'to reject evil and choose good' be a moral act. To dispose of the sense 'that he may know' by saying that eating milk and honey will hardly 'promote the formation of ethical character,' is to use a pleasantry which misses the point. Eating milk and honey is a token and synonym of desolation and hardship, and it is the teaching of all the prophets from Hosea downward that it is just through the discipline of such things that the people shall be brought to a right ethical mind.

* This reading of v.^{16} was suggested in Expos. Times, 1894. The same idea has occurred to others, e.g. Buhl, Jesaja oversat og fortolket, Kjöb. 1894; Kittel, 'Jesaja' (Exeg. Handb.^{6}), Leip. 1898).

If Immanuel be an individual person of this significance, the question of the 'almah perhaps rises in importance. The art. 'the' 'almah would be easiest explained if in some previous prophecy she had been already mentioned. But the assumption of such prophecies may not be held admissible. The passage Mic 5^3 'until the time that she (or, one) that travaileth hath brought forth' alludes to the prophecy of Isaiah. The authenticity of the passage has been doubted, though, of course, not everything which has been doubted is doubtful. If the passage belonged to Mic, it would show how the prophecy of Is was read perhaps 20 or 30 years after it was spoken. It was held to refer to the Messiah, and to be still awaiting fulfilment; and, what is of interest in regard to the way prophecy was interpreted in those days, Isaiah's apparent expectation of the nearness of the Messiah's birth (if 7^{16} be original) was not held of any importance so far as the general meaning of the prophecy was concerned. All these things hold good if the passage be younger than Mic, though we should not in that case have a contemporary, but a later interpretation of the prophecy of Isaiah.

It is uncertain whether the LXX interpreters found anything mysterious in the passage, for Gr. παρθένος, like Lat. virgo, was used generally for 'girl' or 'young woman' (Gn $24^{14.43}$). Possibly to evade the technical sense put on the word by the Christians, the three newer Gr. translators (Aq., Theod., and Symm.) adopt the term νεᾶνις, a change of which Irenæus takes notice and disapproves. There is some evidence that the idea that the Messiah would be born of a virgin was to some extent prevalent both in Palestine and Alexandria. The idea may have been suggested by the somewhat mysterious language of Is, or by the LXX version, or by both. In general, it was more the actual life of Christ that suggested to NT writers the application to Him of OT passages, than a prevalent method of interpreting the passages. They saw in His life the full religious meaning of the passages, and the question of their original sense or application did not occur to them. As Bleek long ago argued (Comm. on Ep. to Heb.), historical interpreters may have to distinguish between the things which NT writers affirm and corroborate by OT passages, and the proofs or corroborations which they adduce. The things they assert we take on their authority, but the kind of confirmations by which they support them, however valid they may have seemed to those to whom they were addressed, and however well they served as evidence then, may not seem of such importance now. We believe in the resurrection of Christ because it is testified to by eye-witnesses; St. Peter's interpretation of Ps 16 is at best only a corroboration of it. And in like manner we believe in the virgin birth because it is affirmed by one 'who had traced the course of all things accurately from the first' (Lk 1^3); the interpretation put on Is 7 (Mt $1^{22f.}$) occupies but the secondary place of a confirmation of it.

IMNAH (יִמְנָה).—1. The eldest son of Asher, Nu 26^{44} (AV Jimna), 1 Ch 7^{30}. 2. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah, 2 Ch 31^{14}. See GENEALOGY.

IMNITES (הַיִּמְנָה). — Patronymic from Imnah (No. 1), Nu 26^{44} (AV Jimnites). See GENEALOGY.

IMPLEAD.—Ac 19^{38} 'The law is open, and there are deputies: let them implead one another,' i.e. 'accuse' as RV; Gr. ἐγκαλεῖν, to summon one to answer a charge, to bring a charge against; cf. Cotgrave, Fr. Dict. s.v. Emplaider, 'to sue, to bring an action against'; and Hakluyt, Voyages, i. 117, 'They shall not be bound to come before the justices aforesaid, except any of the same barons doe implead any man, or if any man be impleaded.' J. HASTINGS.

IMPORTABLE, in the sense of 'unendurable,' is used in Pr. Man, 'And thine angry threatening toward sinners is importable.' The Rhem. NT uses the word in Mt 23^4 'For they binde heavy burdens and importable, and put them upon men's shoulders.' Other examples are: Elyot, The Governour, i. 14, 'And all thoughe Hietro, Moses' father in lawe, counsailed hym to departe his importable labours, in continual jugementes, unto the wise men that were in his company, he nat withstandynge styll retayned the soveraintie by goddis commandement'; Becon, Works, i. 53, 'He alone shall tread down the wine-press, and take upon his back the great and importable burden of your sins all.' J. HASTINGS.

IMPORTUNITY occurs only in the Parable of the Loaves, Lk 11^8 'because of his importunity he will rise and give him as many as he needeth.' The word means radically 'difficulty of access' (from portus, a harbour); but the Lat. adj. means 'unsuitable,' 'troublesome,' 'rude'; and the subst. importunitas, 'unfitness,' 'insolence,' as Cic. De Sen. iii. 7, 'importunitas et inhumanitas omni ætate molesta est.' In the course of its history as an Eng. word 'importunity' has lost some of its force. Even when introduced by Tindale in 1526, it was scarcely strong enough to translate the Gr. ἀναίδεια [T, WH ἀναιδία] of Lk 11^8, since that word is literally 'shamelessness.' Christ spoke by contrast, not comparison; if shameless persistence can win a boon from one who is not a friend, surely we may offer prayer that is earnest enough to obtain our Father's blessings. J. HASTINGS.

IMPOTENT.—Impotent is 'without strength,' 'weak,' as the Geneva tr^n of Gal 4^9 'how is it, that ye are tourned backwarde unto impotent and beggerly ceremonies?' (ἀσθενής, Wyc. 'feble,' Tind. and others 'weak'). The word is applied in AV to persons who are infirm of body: Bar 6^{28}, Ac 14^8 (ἀδύνατος); Jn $5^{3.7}$ (ἀσθενεῖν, RV 'sick'); Ac 4^9 (ἀσθενής). So Fuller, Holy Warre, i. 18, p. 28, 'In which compasse (i.e. in Palestine) in David's time were maintained thirteen hundred thousand men, besides women, children, and impotent persons'; and Holy State, ii. 19, p. 124, 'When Religion is at the stake, there must be no lookers on (except impotent people, who also help by their prayers), and every one is bound to lay his shoulders to the work.' Adams contrasts it with 'potent' in his Exposition of II Peter (on 1^8 p. 26), 'But is there nothing that God cannot do? Yes, he cannot lie, he cannot die, he cannot deny himself. He is for potent, not for impotent works.' J. HASTINGS.

IMRAH (יִמְרָה).—An Asherite chief, 1 Ch 7^{36}. See GENEALOGY.

IMRI (אִמְרִי).—1. A Judahite, 1 Ch 9^{4}. 2. Father of Zaccur, who helped to build the wall, Neh 3^{2}. See GENEALOGY.

IN.—1. 'In' is sometimes used in AV where we should now use at, as Mt 11^{24} 'But I say unto you, That it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee'; but in 11^{22} 'But I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon at the day of judgment, than for you.' The Gr. is ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κρίσεως in both places, and RV has 'in the day of judgement' in both. This apparent looseness is due to two causes: (1) the wide range of meaning of the Heb. prep. ב, much of which was taken up in NT by ἐν; and (2) the greater freedom about 1611 and earlier in the use of the smaller Eng. prepositions. Shaks. has 'at the day of judgment' in Merry Wives, III. iii. 227, the only place in which that phrase occurs; but he says in Othello, I. ii. 93—

> 'How! the Duke in council
> In this time of the night;'

and Merch. of Venice, II. iv. 1—

> 'Nay, we will slink away in supper time.'

So also To 2^{1} 'there was a good dinner prepared me, in the which I sat down to eat' (καὶ ἀνέπεσα τοῦ φαγεῖν, RV 'and I sat down to eat').

2. The Heb. ב being used for the agent and the instrument, and being often followed in this respect by the Gr. ἐν, it is not surprising to find the instrumental ἐν represented in Eng. by 'in' instead of 'by' or 'through.' So Gal 3^{19} 'it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator' (δι' ἀγγέλων ἐν χειρὶ μεσίτου, RV 'through angels by the hand of a mediator'). It is difficult to decide in many places whether the ἐν is instrumental or (spiritually) local. RV often prefers 'in' to AV 'by.' Thus He $1^{1.2}$ 'God having of old time spoken unto the fathers in (AV 'by') the prophets by divers portions and in divers manners, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in (AV 'by') his Son.' See the Heb. Grammars and Lexicons on ב, the Gr. NT Grammars and Lexicons on ἐν, and the commentaries on the various passages, as Sanday-Headlam on Ro 1^{19}, Lightfoot on Gal 1^{16} and Col $1^{4.16}$, Abbott on Eph 4^{17}; also Westcott in Expos. Times, iii. 396; and cf. 1 P 3^{18} Wyc. 'made dede in fleisch, but made quyk in spirit' (so Tind. 'was kylled as pertayninge to the flesshe; but was quyckened in the sprete,' AV 'by the Spirit,' RV 'in the spirit'). In 2 P $1^{1.2}$ Wyc., Tind., and Rhem. have 'in the righteousness,' and 'in the knowledge,' but Cran. and AV 'through,' Geneva 'by.' Aldis Wright refers to Gn 21^{18} where AV and RV have 'Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him in thine hand,' under the influence of Heb. ב, though the meaning is 'take him by the hand,' and he quotes Shaks. Rich. III. IV. i. 2—

> 'Who meets us here? my niece Plantagenet, > Led in the hand of her kind aunt of Gloucester.'

3. The Gr. prep. εἰς, which expresses movement and corresponds with mod. Eng. 'into' or 'unto,' is often translated 'in' (Clapperton in Preacher's Magazine, viii. 499, says 'one hundred and thirty-one times'). In that way some significant shades of meaning are lost, as in Ac 8^{16} 'they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus' (εἰς τὸ ὄνομα, RV 'into the name'; all other versions as AV); 1 Co 8^{6} 'God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him' (εἰς αὐτόν, AVm 'for him,' RV 'unto him'); Eph 4^{13} 'Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man' (εἰς τὴν ἑνότητα . . . εἰς ἄνδρα τέλειον, AVm 'into the unity,' RV 'unto the unity'). In mod. Eng. 'in' and 'into' are kept easily apart, 'into' being expressive of movement, 'in' of rest (though we still say 'fall in love,' 'come in question'). But in 1611 they were not so sharply distinguished. Thus Shaks. has (Merch. of Venice, V. i. 55)—

> 'How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank!
> Here we will sit, and let the sounds of music
> Creep in our ears';

Rich. III. I. ii. 261—

> 'But first I'll turn yon fellow in his grave';

and Sonnets 112—

> 'In so profound abysm I throw all care.'

And so at an earlier time Coverdale translates Is 52^{1} 'For from this tyme forth, there shal no uncircumcised ner uncleane person come in the.' On the other hand, but more rarely, 'into' was used for 'in,' as Lk 13^{21} Wyc. 'It is lijk to sourdough, that a womman took, and hidde it in to thre mesuris of mele, til al were sourid'; and Shaks. Tempest, I. ii. 361—

> 'Therefore wast thou
> Deservedly confined into this rock.'

It is not surprising therefore that we should find 'in' for 'into' frequently in AV, as Gn 43^{22} 'We cannot tell who put our money in our sacks' (so RV); 50^{26} 'he was put in a coffin' (so RV); Dt 24^{1} 'Then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it in her hand' (so RV); Neh 2^{12} 'What my God had put in my heart' (RV 'into'). Cf. Ps 73^{5}, Pr. Bk. 'They come in no misfortune like other folk'; 136^{13} Pr. Bk. 'Who divided the Red Sea in two parts.'

4. 'In' is occasionally found for 'on,' as in the familiar example, Mt 6^{10} 'Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven' (ὡς ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς, RV 'Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth'; 'in earth' is probably due to Vulg. 'in cælo, et in terra'; it is found in all the Eng. versions). So Gn 1^{22} 'let fowl multiply in the earth' (so RV); 6^{5} 'in the earth' (AV and RV), but 6^{6} 'on the earth' (AV and RV); Wis 10^{4} 'For whose cause the earth being drowned with the flood, wisdom again preserved it, and directed the course of the righteous in a piece of wood of small value' (δι' εὐτελοῦς ξύλου, Vulg. per contemptibile lignum, RV 'by a poor piece of wood,' Ball 'on a paltry plank'; 'in' was probably used because the translator had the ark before his mind). Cf. Mt 5^{heading} 'The Sermon in the Mount'; Ac 13^{14} Wyc. (1388) 'and thei entriden in to the synagoge in the dai of sabatis' (Tind. 'on the saboth daye'); Shaks. Othello, I. iii. 74—

> 'What in your part can you say to this?'

and Milton, Lycidas, 185—

> 'Henceforth thou art the genius of the shore,
> In thy large recompense, and shalt be good
> To all that wander in that perilous flood.'

5. 'In' is used along with a verbal subst. to signify 'in process of,' 'while,' as Gn 35^{18} 'as her soul was in departing'; 2 Mac 4^{30} 'while those things were in doing'; Jn 2^{20} 'Forty and six years was this temple in building.' Cf. Joy, Apology to Tindale (Arber's ed. p. ix), 'he knew yat I was in correctynge it myselfe'; Knox, Hist. 107, 'While these things were in doing in Scotland.'

6. 'In that' = because, has now gone out of use. It occurs Gn 31^{20} 'And Jacob stole away unawares to Laban the Syrian, in that he told him not,' and other places. Cf. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, 'Some things they do in that t ey are men . . . some things in that they are men misled and blinded with error.'

Literature.

This term shortly expresses the fundamental fact of Christianity, as St. John describes it in his Gospel (1[14]), ὁ Λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο. It signifies the act of condescension whereby the Son of God, Himself very God and of one substance with the Father, took to Himself human nature in order to accomplish its redemption and restoration. The NT insists upon the I. as a physical, historic fact (1 Jn 1[3]), but points for its true explanation to the grace, or love, of God (Jn 3[16], 1 Jn 4[9. 10]). The expression of St. Paul, 'mystery of godliness' (1 Ti 3[16]), implies, on the other hand, that the redemptive action of God is beyond our power completely to analyze or comprehend. Such being the general aspect of the fact, we find the most comprehensive statement of it in the prologue to St. John's Gospel (1[1-18]). St. John begins by intimating a plurality of persons within the Godhead; he describes the functions of the Logos, the objective utterance or self-expression of Deity, in His relation to the created universe of which He is the author and sustainer, and to man, whose conscience and reason owe whatever illumination they possess to His presence and operation. St. John also teaches, as a further presupposition of his doctrine of the I., the occurrence of a fall, or process of aversion from God, whereby man became subject to the power of 'darkness' or moral evil. It was to recover man from his state of alienation, and to raise him into the life of divine sonship, that the Word was finally manifested in a human form. After being heralded by the witness of creation, and by the voice of Heb. prophecy which culminated in the testimony of the Baptist, the Word finally made His appearance within the pale of an elect people of God; His manifestation, however, had a two-fold issue: the incarnate Word was rejected by the chosen nation to which, as touching His manhood (Ro 1[3]), He belonged; on the other hand, to those individuals who welcomed Him and recognized His true nature and claim, He communicated a due measure of the fulness of 'grace and truth' which resided in Himself, imparting to them 'power to become children of God,' and unveiling to them the glory, i.e. the essential character and life, of the Most High. St. John in this passage strikes the keynote of many varied representations of the Incarnation. It was before all else a unique exhibition of divine grace; a supreme manifestation of divine truth. The NT writers dwell now on one, now on the other, of these two aspects of the fact. Thus the Son is spoken of as 'given' (Jn 3[16]), or 'sent' (3[17 34], 1 Jn 4[9], Gal 4[4]), by the Father; but it was not less true that He gave Himself (Eph 5[25], 1 Ti 2[6], Gal 2[20]). That which displayed the grace of God the Father (Tit 2[11]), 'the kindness and love of God our Saviour' towards man (ib. 3[4]), is also to be regarded as exhibiting the grace of the Son (2 Co 8[9] 13[14]). The motive of the I. is, in short, the redemptive love of God. On the other hand, the I. was a signal manifestation of truth: a revelation of the divine character, supplementing and qualifying that which was revealed of God in nature, conscience, and history. St. John says expressly that 'No man hath seen God at any time; God only-begotten, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him' (1[18], cf. 14[9]).

Such, then, is the dominant point of view from which NT writers regard the I.: it is an act of unmerited grace—a movement of divine love towards fallen man for his restoration and re-creation; it is also a culminating moment in a progressive and continuous self-revelation of God (He 1[1. 2]); nor is there any hesitation in identifying this divine movement with the historic career of Jesus Christ. Historically, however, the recognition of His higher nature started from the acknowledgment of His Messiahship. He was first recognized as one whose advent had been foretold, and awaited with eager expectation, for a period of many centuries; as the promised seed of Abraham in whom all families of the earth were to be blessed (Gn 12[3]). Jesus Christ did, in fact, claim to fulfil and satisfy the hopes and anticipations to which successive prophets had given utterance. In 'the fulness of time' (Gal 4[4]) He appeared, to crown the hopes of the elect people from whom, as touching the flesh, He sprang. It is accordingly necessary to briefly summarize the testimony of OT to the fact of the Incarnation.

i. Witness of OT.—There are elements in the theological conceptions of OT which prepare the mind for the mystery of a divine I., e.g. the doctrine that man is made in God's image (Gn 1[27]), and is capable of intercourse and union with God. Thus Ezk 1[26] implies that man's bodily structure was essentially adapted to represent the form of Deity; and the revelation of God in nature (Ps 19[1] etc.) would suggest the possibility of His self-manifestation under the form of human nature. Further, the so-called 'Theophanies' of OT—the manifestations of J"'s presence in a created 'angel'—point in the same direction. Again, the ascription by OT of various titles, functions, and relationships to the Godhead, served to prepare the Jewish mind for the Christian doctrine of a triune Deity, which is necessarily connected with that of the Incarnation. Further, the striking personification of the divine Wisdom which meets us in such passages as Pr 8[22f.] (cf. Wis 7[22f.] 8[1f.] 18[15f.]) seems to anticipate St. John's doctrine of the creative Logos, or St. Paul's teaching in passages like Col 1[15-19]. Of special importance, however, is the witness of prophecy, the 'Messianic hope' being at its root an anticipation of the union of divine and human attributes in a single personality. The main points of Messianic doctrine may be summarized as follows: In its earliest stages prophecy is vague and indeterminate. Starting with the promise recorded in Gn 3[15], it points to a victory of the woman's seed over the evil principle represented by the serpent, the 'seed' being afterwards more precisely described as 'the seed of Abraham,' in whom all the nations of the earth are to be blessed (Gn 12[3] 18[18] 22[18] etc.). The tribe of Judah is indicated in Gn 49[10] as the future depositary of sovereignty over the nations (cf. Nu 24[17]). The passage Dt 18[15] contributes a further element to the Messianic idea, viz. the notion of a prophetic mediator between God and His people, probably in a comparatively late literary form giving expression to the hopes and ideas which the career and work of Moses had suggested. For it is noticeable, in regard to the Messianic hope in its earlier stages, that the actual history of Isr. itself gives birth to Messianic conceptions, e.g. the Exodus from Egypt helped to give form and colour to the national expectations of future deliverance from foes and oppressors; the rise of prophecy and of the kingdom suggested the image of an ideal prophet and a righteous king. At any rate, it is in the early period of the kingdom that the Messianic hope takes a clear and definite shape.

(a) The oracle, 2 S 7[5-16] (cf. Pss 2. 89. 132), points to a future descendant of David whose throne is to be everlasting, and who is to stand in a unique relation to God as His 'Son.' This title, solemnly transferred from the nation (Ex 4[22]) to the king, implies that the 'Son of David' is to be henceforth regarded as the representative of the chosen nation. This oracle is specially important as determining the scope and future direction of Heb. prophecy. In the prophets and psalmists we find successive pictures of a monarch who is extolled either as a warrior victorious over Judah's foes (Ps 2), or as a royal bridegroom taking to himself the daughter of an alien people (Ps 45), or as a monarch reigning in righteousness and peace (Ps 72), and blessed with signal marks of divine favour, length of days and perpetual communion with God (Pss 21. 61). These predictions of an ideal ruler culminate during the crisis of the struggle with Assyria. Thus Am 9[11-15] points to the revival of David's house as Judah's last remaining hope; Hos 1[11] 3[5] goes further, and foretells the appearance of a second David. Mic 5[1-5] directs the thoughts of the faithful to Bethlehem, the original home of the Davidic family, and predicts its future greatness as the birthplace of the Messianic deliverer. Isaiah describes the Messiah's righteous rule, directed and inspired by the Spirit of J" (11), and dwells on the glory and peace of the city which Messiah chooses as his metropolis (4. 32, cf. Zec 9[9f.]). Indeed it may be said that at this period (c. 750–700) the Davidic monarch becomes the central figure of prophecy; and Ro 1[3] shows that the Davidic descent of Christ was ever regarded as an essential element in the Messianic claim (cf. Ac 2[30], 2 Ti 2[8]), and our Lord Himself bears witness to the current belief that Christ was 'the son of David' in Mk 12[35].

(b) Closely connected, however, with this conception is another, viz. that of a personal advent of J" to set up His throne in Zion, as the Judge and Saviour of His people. This thought indeed (Am 4[12] etc., Is 2. 32, etc.) is not actually combined with the picture of a Davidic king; the figure of the son of David is nowhere identified with the self-manifesting J". Both elements enter into the general current of Messianic thought, but they find fulfilment and mutual adjustment only in the person of Jesus Christ. In Ezk 34[11. 24] we find an instance of the juxtaposition of the two ideas. In this and in other instances it is evident that there were parallel streams of prediction which, owing to necessary limitations in the prophetic faculty, were not brought into combination.

(c) New elements were added to the Messianic picture by the prophets of the pre-Chald. and exilic period (700–538). The most impressive of these is the wonderful conception of the 'servant of J",' the representative of the faithful remnant of God's chosen people, who by his vicarious sufferings makes atonement for their transgressions, and by his loyal fulfilment of the divine mission entrusted to him becomes the 'light of the Gentiles' and the missionary of the nations, so accomplishing in his own person the ideal functions of the chosen people (Is 40–66, passim). In the post-ex. period of prophecy the priestly and mediatorial work of the coming Messiah rises into prominence (Ps 110) together with his relation to humanity at large as 'the Branch' (Zec 3[8] 6[12], cf. Jer 23[5] and the phrase 'Son of Man,' Dn 7[13]). At the same time is indicated his close relation to J". He is called J"'s 'fellow' (Zec 13[7]), His 'angel' (Mal 3[1]), one in whom J" Himself is pierced (Zec 12[10]). Such expressions are to be compared with earlier passages which they elucidate or develope: e.g. the prophecy of Immanuel (Is 7[14]), or of the king whose name 'shall be called J" is our righteousness' (Jer 23[5. 6], cf. Is 9[6]). The deepest and most permanent element pervading the varied imagery of the prophets is the thought of the advent of J" Himself to judge, redeem, and govern His people, and to sanctify them by the bestowal of His Spirit (Ezk 36[25-27] 37[27]). The Redeemer who should come to Zion would be Himself divine (cf. Is 59[16-20]).* See MESSIAH.

ii. NT account of Jesus Christ. — A. It was through experience of the Manhood and human life of Christ that men gradually arrived at the recognition of a higher nature, of which the lower was only a veil. Thus the preaching of the I. began with an appeal to facts and incidents open to ordinary observation; Jesus Christ was first known as 'a man' (Ac 2[22]), and NT lays special stress on the verity and completeness of His manhood. The Gospels describe His birth (Mt 1[18ff.], Lk 2[6ff.]), His growth 'in wisdom and stature' (Lk 2[52]), His liability to the ordinary and innocent infirmities of human nature, e.g. hunger (Lk 4[2], Mk 11[12]), weariness (Jn 4[6]), thirst (Jn 4[7] 19[28]), pain and weakness (cf. He 5[2]), death. His body was subject to ordinary conditions of nurture and development; it was the apt instrument of creaturely service and obedience to the will of God (He 10[5-7]), and of self-sacrifice on behalf of His fellow-men (Mt 26[28]). The soul of Christ was subject to human affections and emotions: compassion (Mt 9[36]), love (Mk 10[21], Jn 11[5]), grief (Jn 11[35], Lk 19[41]), fear and anguish (Lk 22[44], cf. He 5[7]), anger (Mk 3[5], Jn 2[15ff.]). He had a true human will (Jn 6[38], Mt 26[39]), which, however, is described as ever subjecting itself to the guidance of the divine will. This subjection necessarily implied the possibility of temptation, and of painful effort of will (Mt 26[38], Lk 22[42]), so that 'He learned obedience by the things which he suffered' (He 5[8]). Finally, Jesus Christ possessed a human spirit (Lk 2[40]. 10[21], Jn 11[33], Mk 8[12]), which was apparently the seat or sphere of His divine personality (Ro 1[4]), and which in the hour of death He commended into the hands of God (Lk 23[46]). After death this human spirit of Christ, divinely 'quickened' (1 P 3[18]), is found to have preached the gospel to certain of the departed (ib. 4[6]).

Thus the humanity of Jesus Christ was real and complete. He was made like His brethren in all things (cf. He 2[17]); 'in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (ib. 4[15]). On the other hand, there is nothing in Scripture to support the idea that Christ's humanity was docetic or unreal, or that He failed to undergo a real human experience. In all the main conditions of human life He was on a level with His fellow-men; a partaker of flesh and blood (ib. 2[14]); submitting to a life of hard toil, poverty, suffering, moral conflict with keen and varied temptation, alternations of success and failure, honour and dishonour, favour and disrepute. Specially noteworthy is the fact that Christ's life was one of continual prayer (Mt 14[23], Mk 1[35], Lk 3[21] 5[16] 9[29] 22[41], Jn 11[41] etc.). It is

* The Messianic beliefs of the period between 165 and our Lord's birth do not come within the scope of this article. A brief survey of them will be found in Loofs, Dogmengeschichte, § 7. in virtue of a general similarity of conditions that Christ is described as the 'captain of faith' (He 12^{2}), i.e. He exhibited those very virtues which are appropriate to man's creaturely condition: trust, reverence, submission, faith, obedience. For the same reason He is pointed to as the true pattern of manhood (Jn 13^{15}, 1 Jn 2^{6}, 1 P 2^{21}). He is the great exemplar of humanity, because the circumstances of His life and probation were, speaking broadly, similar to those of ordinary men. He was found in outward guise or fashion as a man (Ph 2^{7}); on a level with other men 'in all points' that can fall under human observation, 'yet without sin' (He 4^{15}, 2 Co 5^{21}, 1 Jn 3^{5}).

This brings us to two points in which, according to NT, Jesus Christ was different from other men: (a) He was supernaturally born, (b) He was without sin.

(a) The birth of Christ is described by Mt and Lk. They tell us that He was conceived by the Holy Spirit (see p. 405^{b}), without the intervention of a human father (Mt 1^{20}, Lk $1^{34.\ 35}$). By the operation of the 'creator Spirit' the 'Word was made flesh.' It is to be observed that this account of the birth is not contradicted, but rather suggested, by the teaching of other NT writers. Thus St. John speaks of Christ as ὁ ἄνωθεν ἐρχόμενος (Jn 3^{31}), and St. Paul calls Him 'the second man from heaven' (1 Co 15^{47}), a phrase which evidently describes the origin of the second Adam in contrast to that of the first. Further, as has been already observed, NT speaks of Christ as sinless, holy, sanctified by God (Jn 10^{36}); 'knowing no sin' (2 Co 5^{21}); 'holy, harmless, undefiled, and separated from sinners' (He 7^{26}); 'a lamb without spot and blemish' (1 P 1^{19}); 'the righteous one' (1 Jn 2^{1}, cf. Ac 3^{14} 22^{14}). True, He appeared 'in the likeness of the flesh of sin' (Ro 8^{3}, cf. Ph 2^{7}), i.e. He took the very flesh which had been the instrument of human sin, but in assuming it He purified it from the sinful taint: * His flesh was, in fact, 'like' ours, inasmuch as it was flesh; but it was only 'like,' for it was also sinless. Christ, then, was without sin, and NT suggests a close connexion between His sinlessness and His miraculous birth by constantly representing Christ as the Head or First Principle of a new race (ἀρχή, Col 1^{18}), 'the firstborn among many brethren' (Ro 8^{29}), the 'second Adam' (Ro 5^{14}, 1 Co 15^{45}), the 'new man' (Eph 2^{15}). Thus the tradition of the Church which first meets us in Mt and Lk is corroborated to some extent by antecedent considerations. If NT writers are correct in representing Jesus Christ as a new moral creation, it might be asked whether this new creation can have involved anything short of a new mode of generation. 'Must not the physical generation of the second Adam have been such as to involve at once His community with our nature and His exemption from it?' † If, in fact, Jesus Christ was what NT writers believed Him to be, a pre-existent being, the narrative of the virginal birth would have antecedent credibility. 'The chief ground,' says Prof. Stanton, 'on which thoughtful Christian believers are ready to accept it [the miraculous birth] is that, believing in the personal indissoluble union between God and man in Jesus Christ, the miraculous birth of Jesus seems to them the only fitting accompaniment of this union, and so to speak the natural expression of it in the order of outward facts.' ‡ If it be rejoined that the 'fact of its necessity from a doctrinal point of view would tend to the formation of a legend,' it may with equal justice be urged that the evangelists' account of the birth testifies to the early prevalence of the belief in the Divinity of Christ. The ultimate reason, in fact, for belief in this, as in all the other miraculous occurrences recorded in the Gospel, is faith in the higher nature of Jesus Christ. What Augustine says of the Gospel miracles strictly applies to the supernatural birth of Christ: Mirum non esse debet a Deo factum miraculum . . . Magis gaudere et admirari debemus quia Dominus noster et salvator Jesus Christus homo factus est, quam quod divina inter homines fecit. * The accounts of miracles, it must be remembered, were written for those who were already Christians, i.e. who already believed in Christ as a superhuman person. The Gospels were not primarily intended to create such a belief; they rather presuppose it.

(b) The sinlessness of Christ appears at first sight to conflict with the possibility of His being tempted. We have, however, already noticed that NT describes Christ as liable to temptation (Mt 4, Lk 4, esp. He 4^{15}, Lk 22^{28}); but it never allows us to suppose that He suffered from any disordered affections, any inward propensity to sin. He had no illicit desires, no discord between the flesh and the spirit; † sin could have no enticing or illusive power in His case (Ja 1^{14}); He had no affinity for sin, no experimental knowledge of it (1 Jn 3^{5}, 2 Co 5^{21}). On the other hand, He possessed in their perfection and integrity all those human faculties and senses to which moral temptation appeals,—all necessary and innocent affections and instincts to which some things appear naturally desirable, others naturally repugnant. Accordingly, He was capable of being tempted: for 'if the highest virtue does not exclude that instinct inseparable from humanity, to which pain is an object of dread, and pleasure of desire, which prefers ease and quiet to tumult and vexation, the regard and esteem of others to their scorn and aversion; to which ill-requited toil or experienced unkindness are sources of corroding anguish and depression: then every conjuncture which presents but one of these objects of dread as the concomitant of doing God's will, or associates one of their desirable opposites with neglect or disobedience,—every such conjuncture must produce a conflict between duty and these necessary instincts of humanity sufficient to constitute temptation in the strictest sense.' ‡ Christ, then, could be really tempted; He felt the pressure of moral evil; He experienced the pain of resistance to it, and He endured, He remained stedfast even under the full weight of manifold difficulties. There is nothing in the Gospels to warrant the idea suggested by John Damascene that 'He repelled the assaults of the enemy like smoke.' They rather suggest that the strength conferred on His human nature by the Divine Spirit was 'infallibly sufficient, but not more than sufficient, to sustain Him in His conflict, and bear Him through the fearful strife.' § He verily 'suffered being tempted'; He was made morally 'perfect through sufferings' (He $2^{10.\ 18}$ 5^{9}). In the power of the Divine Spirit (Lk $4^{1.\ 14}$, Mk 1^{12}) He was enabled to prevail over the tempter, but it was by a process of moral struggle ending in victory; indeed the writer of Rev seems to summarily describe the human life of Christ as a continuous victory over evil (Rev 5^{5} 6^{2} 19^{11}, cf. Jn 16^{33}).

With the above significant exception NT depicts Jesus Christ as one who shared in all points the nature of man. He was (to use a later theological term) 'consubstantial' with men. Accordingly, the general conditions of His human life enable Him to be the perfect pattern of human goodness (see below, p. 466[a]). And indeed there are facts recorded in the Gospels which plainly indicate that Christ underwent a real human development, moral and mental, and that He was even subject to some necessary human limitations in respect of knowledge. At this point it is necessary to touch on these points only so far as they concern the perfection of Christ's humanity. Morally, then, Christ is said to have developed; He grew in wisdom (Lk 2^{52}); He was 'made perfect'; 'He learned obedience by the things which he suffered' (He 2^{10} 5^{8}). There were some qualifications necessary for the discharge of His high-priestly functions which He acquired through the moral discipline of actual human experience, esp. the graces of sympathy (He 2^{17} 4^{15} 5^{2}), patience, faith (cf. Westcott on He 12^{2}). He was perfected in the sense that He was progressively educated by His human experience; He became a consummate 'leader of salvation' (He 2^{10}), a perfect high priest (ib. vii. 28). Further, Christ is represented as subject, at least in some degree, to ordinary laws of mental growth and development. 'He advanced (προέκοπτεν) in wisdom' as well as in stature (Lk 2^{52}). Occasions are mentioned on which He expresses surprise (Mt 8^{10}, Mk 6^{6}); and He also appears at times to desire information as to matters of fact (Mk 9^{21}, Jn 11^{34}, cf. Mt 21^{19}, Mk 11^{13}). Finally, in regard to one special point He professes ignorance (Mk 13^{32}). From these phenomena it may be inferred that Christ's human faculties, supernaturally exalted and illuminated though they were by the operation of the Holy Spirit, were yet subject to limitation; and so far the impression produced by the records, that Christ lived as very man among men, is further strengthened. The Synop. Gospels especially portray a real human life and character; they present to faith as its immediate object the figure of a true man, 'the man Christ Jesus' (1 Ti 2^{5}, cf. Jn 8^{40}).

B. Besides giving ample evidence of their belief in the real manhood of the historical person Jesus Christ, NT writers endeavour in different ways to express their sense of something transcendent and superhuman in His personality. There is no question, it may be observed, in regard to the actual belief of the apostles themselves, which may be gathered from their Epistles. The importance of the Gospels is that they describe the way in which this belief was arrived at. Speaking broadly, the apostles believed that in the historical Christ a pre-existent being had manifested Himself,* a being to whom belonged the dignity of a unique divine sonship. This common belief is by no means equally prominent in all the apostolic Epistles; but it is always latent, and even where not expressed it is usually implied in the attributes or functions ascribed to Christ. This belief, then, was slowly and hesitatingly reached by successive steps which can be traced with some clearness in the Gospel narrative. The Gospels record those utterances of Christ which suggested the idea of His higher nature. He Himself proposed the question to His disciples, 'Whom say men that I, the Son of Man, am?' (Mt 16^{13}); He Himself ascribed to His own person a particular significance (e.g. Mt 10^{37}); He pointed men to Himself, and the Gospels record the effect on His hearers of Christ's utterances. They describe the moral authority of His teaching (Mt 7^{29}, Mk 1^{27}, Lk 4^{32}), the impression produced by His personality, the claim He put forward to forgive sins (Mt 9^{2-6}, Lk 5^{20-24}), to judge men according to their personal relation to Himself (Mt 7^{23}), to revise, expand, interpret the Mosaic Law (Mt $5^{21ff.}$ 12^{8} 19^{4}), to be the giver of rest to the burdened soul (Mt 11^{28}), to be an object of devotion to the heart of man superseding all other interests (Mt 10^{37}, Lk 14^{26}). There can be no serious doubt, moreover, that Christ claimed to be the Messiah. In calling Himself 'the Son of Man' He adopted a title which indisputably involved Messianic pretensions. Further, He claimed to stand in a unique relation to God; although He very rarely applies to Himself the title 'Son of God,' He never disclaims it; on occasions of exceptional urgency He refuses to disown it (Mt 16^{16} 26^{63}); indeed, He habitually speaks of God as 'my Father' (Mt 23 times), and He attributes to Himself powers and prerogatives which imply coequality with God. He exercises sovereign authority over souls, claiming them as His own, and putting forward that jealous, exclusive claim which can rightfully belong only to the Creator Himself (Mt $10^{37.\ 40}$, Lk 10^{16}, Mt 24^{35} 13^{41}, Lk 21^{33}). He promises to bestow the Holy Spirit (Mt 10^{19}, Lk 12^{12}, cf. 21^{15}); He speaks of Himself as having given a commission to the ancient prophets of Israel (Mt 23^{34}, cf. Lk 11^{49}). Finally, in one solemn passage common to Mt and Lk, He claims an exclusive knowledge of the Father (Mt 11^{27}, Lk 10^{22}), and an exclusive power of manifesting Him. On the other hand, the negative consideration is important, that although Christ is the preacher of humility, repentance, conversion, and the vehement rebuker of Pharisaic self-righteousness, He never betrays any consciousness of guilt, such as OT prophets frequently exhibit, nor any sense of a personal need of reconciliation with God.

But the Gospels do not merely preserve characteristic utterances of Christ, they describe the process of apostolic belief in Him. We can trace more or less distinctly the successive stages through which the faith of the apostles advanced to the point of acknowledging the higher, or pre-existent personality of Christ. The Fourth Gospel seems, indeed, to serve, among other purposes, that of depicting the development of faith. To sum up briefly the gist of the evangelic testimony: it would seem that the apostles discerned in Jesus Christ first a Teacher or Rabbi sent from God, then successively the expected Messiah, the Holy One, the Lord of nature, the searcher of hearts, the revealer of God, the supreme example of suffering love, the conqueror of death, the Son of God. Faith, finally, bows before Him as 'Lord and God' (Jn 20^{28}). This point is arrived at only after a long and heart-searching discipline of suspense and hesitation; but it unquestionably represents the final answer of the apostles to a question which was morally inevitable, and which, as a matter of fact, had been repeatedly and openly raised,—the question 'who is this?' (Mt 21^{10}, Lk 5^{21} 7^{49} 9^{9}; cf. Mt 8^{27}, Mk 4^{41}, Lk 8^{25}). The ultimate answer seems to have been based on a number of convergent considerations: on the effect of Christ's personality, and the 'self-evidencing' power of His appeal to heart and conscience, on the superhuman claims which His teaching disclosed, and on the symbolic acts of power by which He at once illustrated and authenticated His teaching. For much of the evidential importance of the Gospel miracles depends on their moral character. They are in keeping with all that Christ reveals of God's nature and attributes. They are exactly such phenomena as we should expect in a universe in which physical forces are subordinated to righteous law and a purpose of grace. They reveal power, but the power is that of righteous will; and they are symbolic of the redemptive action of God which the doctrine of Christ proclaims. But what finally crowned and justified the faith of the apostles was the actual resurrection of Jesus Christ from death. Their testimony is concentrated on this fact, the real occurrence of which alone explains their spiritual transformation and the stedfastness of their belief in face of hostile opinion. The apostles seem to have recognized, some more quickly than others, but all sooner or later, that the resurrection was in fact inevitable, Christ being what He claimed to be. It afforded a key to the entire life; it was the ground of a final assurance that under the veil of mortal flesh the eternal Son of God Himself had 'tabernacled' among men (Jn 1^{14}). It was the supreme revelation to the apostles of the glory of the Divine Word, who, as man, had lived and conversed with them on earth. It was the starting-point of a new and higher life, and of a more exalted faith. The resurrection followed by the ascension 'declared,' determined, or proved Jesus Christ (Ro 1^{4}) to be, not merely the promised Messiah and 'the Lord' to whom all power was given in heaven and earth (Mt 28^{18}), but a heavenly being who had been manifested in a human form, and had returned into the divine glory whence He originally came. Thenceforth Jesus Christ became an object of worship, and the gospel of redemption preached by the apostles had His person for its central theme (Ac 28^{31}).

Such, then, seems to have been the conception of Christ to which the apostles were led by their long intercourse with Him. When, however, we turn to the apostolic teaching in regard to Christ's higher nature, we cannot fail to recognize a striking diversity of treatment. All the writers are at one in their general conception of the I. as a supreme self-manifestation of God; but we seem to trace, not only a certain advance in clearness of perception, corresponding to differences of phraseology (e.g. contrast the OT Messianic title παῖς in Ac 4[7] with λόγος in St. John's Gospel), but to a certain extent distinct aspects of Christ's person.* These must be recognized even though they form no sufficient basis for the idea of radically different and mutually exclusive types of NT Christology—'adoptianist,' 'pneumatic,' etc. Thus (1) the simple objective view of Christ as fulfilling in His person and life the OT Messianic expectations is characteristic of St. James and St. Peter; (2) the earlier Epistles of St. Paul estimate Christ's person from the side of anthropology: man's yearning for reconciliation and union with God finds its satisfaction in Christ; (3) a more transcendental treatment of Christ's person marks the later Pauline and Johannine writings; they deal with cosmological and mystical aspects of the Incarnation. And it must be remembered that 'between the clear-sighted apostle of the Gentiles and the straitest of [Jewish or Ebionite] zealots there lay every conceivable gradation of intermediate positions.'† But the apostles themselves seem to have a fundamental bond of union in their belief about Christ as one who may be worshipped,‡ and whose name may be co-ordinated with that of God. It cannot be shown that St. Paul taught anything about Christ that was not implied in the belief of his fellow-apostles; but we must remember that 'what to them was the result of their belief in Christ, was to him the starting-point from which logical conclusions were seen to follow, practical applications made, in every direction.'

What, then, was the earliest conception of Christ's higher nature current in the Church? We turn to Ac, and find that the earliest preaching of Christ is naturally conditioned by conceptions of God already current among those to whom the gospel message was proclaimed. St. Peter is a Jew speaking to Jews, to whom any unqualified declaration of Christ's Deity or pre-existence would have appeared perplexing, and even blasphemous. We notice in his preaching an avoidance of the phrase υἱὸς θεοῦ (contrast Mt 16^{16}); his starting-point is the well-known historical figure, the facts of whose life, ministry, and recent passion were notorious in Jerus. (Ac 2^{22} 3^{13} 4^{10} 5^{30} $10^{37f.}$). St. Peter dwells repeatedly on the exaltation of One who had been known as man. This man, 'approved of God' (2^{22}), bearing all the marks of God's commissioned 'servant' (παῖς, 3^{13}, cf. Is 52^{13}), manifesting clear tokens of divine unction, was 'made' by God 'both Lord and Christ' (2^{36}). The main points in St. Peter's preaching which would naturally strike a Jewish audience would be (1) his references to the fulfilment of Messianic prophecy in Christ ($2^{3f.}$ 3^{22} 4^{11}), for we must remember that to Jewish ears the very title 'Messiah' would imply a superhuman being; (2) his insistence on the resurrection as at once the seal of Christ's divine unction and mission (2^{32} 3^{15} 4^{10} 5^{31}, cf. 13^{30}), and a decisive manifestation of the glory of His person. The resurrection had proclaimed Him 'prince of life' (3^{15}), source of spiritual blessing and power (3^{6}), 'prince and saviour' (5^{31}), 'judge of quick and dead' (10^{42}). Speaking generally, the same point of view is characteristic of St. Peter's 1st Epistle. He regards Christ as the exalted man, enthroned at God's right hand, and bestowing the gift of the regenerating Spirit (1 P 1^{12}). Christ is One whose human acts and sufferings have preternatural virtue; who is destined to judge mankind (4^{6}); who is the author of Messianic salvation, 'both in its negative aspect as a rescuing from the wrath under which the whole world is lying, and in its positive aspect as the imparting of eternal life.* On the other hand, it is doubtful whether the two passages 1^{11} and ^{20} necessarily imply the doctrine of Christ's pre-existence.† With St. Peter we may couple St. James and St. Jude, each of whom calls himself 'slave of Christ.' St. James even speaks of Christ as 'Lord of glory' (2^{1}), and looks for His appearance in judgment ($5^{3.9}$); he also uses language ($1^{18.21}$) implying that in Christ is revealed a principle of supernatural power which the law was unable to bestow (cf. Ro 8^{3}).

On the whole, it may be taken for granted that St. Peter's sermons in Ac, together with his 1st Ep. and the Epp. of St. James and St. Jude, present us with the general conception of Christ current in the earliest apostolic age. By the first Christians Christ was regarded as the promised Messias, whose mission had been sealed by His resurrection and exaltation, and in whom the Jewish expectations concerning the 'kingdom of God,' and anticipations of future 'salvation,' were spiritually fulfilled. There can be little doubt that both these ideas ('the kingdom' and 'salvation') were coloured by Jewish preconceptions. There was, for instance, a widespread expectation of the speedy second coming of Christ—an idea which seems, indeed, to have been shared by the apostles themselves. But, at any rate, the conception of Christ just indicated formed the starting-point, so to speak, for the deeper conceptions of St. Paul, the writer of He, and St. John. In proceeding to gather up the † See Harnack, Dogmengeschichte, vol. i. appendix i. Harnack believes in regard to 1 P $1^{18f.}$ that the writer holds to the old Jewish conception of 'pre-existence,' i.e. predestination in the counsels of God. Christ 'was manifested in these last days for our sake, that is, He is now visibly what He already was before God. What is meant here is not an incarnation, but a revelation' [Eng. tr. vol. i. p. 322]. The passage $1^{11f.}$ may refer to the prophets either of the old or of the new dispensation, but according to the usual interpretation the OT prophets are meant.

main christological theses of the apostolic teaching regarded as a whole, we are for the most part, but not exclusively, dependent on these last-mentioned writers.

The following points appear to be of main importance: (1) The conception of Christ's Lordship. The name κύριος meets us in St. Peter's sermons, in Ja and Jude, in Jn and Rev, and in St. Paul's Epistles, passim. The word does not necessarily imply Divinity,* but in NT it meets us in contexts and connexions which, taken together, involve the ascription of Deity to Christ. The 'Lordship' of Christ means His 'sovereignty' in the sphere of nature and in that of grace. To Christ belongs a lordship which He has merited by His life of creaturely service and obedience (Ro 10^{9}, 1 Co 12^{3}, 2 Co 4^{5}). He is supreme over the universe and over His Church (Col $1^{16\text{-}18}$, Ph $2^{10\text{f.}}$). Christians belong to Him (Ro 14^{8}, 1 Co 3^{23}); they are 'under law to Christ' (1 Co 9^{21}, Gal 6^{2}). He is the fountainhead of all grace, authority, disciplinary and ministerial power (1 Co 5^{4}, 2 Co 10^{8} 13^{10}). He is to be awaited as judge (2 Co 5^{10}). St. Paul applies to Christ OT Jahweh passages (e.g. Ro 10^{13}=Jl 2^{32}; cf. Ro $10^{11\text{-}13}$, 1 Co 2^{16} 10^{22}); he ascribes to Him the absolute title ὁ κύριος (1 Co 16^{22}, 2 Co 1^{14} 11^{31} 12^{8}, Ro 14^{14}), and in one passage, which is of the nature of a climax, he uses an even stronger expression, 'God over all blessed for evermore' (Ro 9^{5}).†

(2) Parallel to the idea of lordship is that of Sonship. Christ is υἱὸς θεοῦ—a recognized title of Messiah, which, like κύριος, is often illustrated by its context; often by other characteristic NT phrases with which it is closely associated. The 'Sonship' of Christ is spoken of as unique (ὁ ἴδιος υἱός, Ro 8^{32}; ὁ ἑαυτοῦ υἱός, ib. 8^{3}; μονογενής, Jn 1^{18}, 1 Jn 4^{9}), i.e. it is not ascribed to Christ merely as a Messianic title, but as connoting a personal relationship to God. The phrase is used in contexts which imply a literal pre-existence; the Son of God is 'sent' (Ro 8^{3}, Gal 4^{4}, 1 Jn $4^{9.\ 14}$); He 'comes' (1 Jn 4^{2} 5^{6} 5^{20}); He was originally an inhabitant of heaven (1 Co 15^{47}); the I. was a change of state in the life of a pre-existent being, of the Word Himself (Jn 1^{18}), of One who is essentially 'spirit' (2 Co 3^{17}).‡ The 'Sonship' of Christ is thus defined, and acquires a new significance. It is not merely 'ethical,' i.e. such as any man may acquire by moral affinity to God; nor merely theocratic; it denotes a special, unique, incommunicable relationship (Jn $10^{36\text{-}38}$). Hence, especially in St. Paul's earlier Epistles (Th, Ro, Co, Gal), a position is habitually assigned to Christ which inevitably implies His real Deity. He is co-ordinated with God in greetings and farewells (e.g. 2 Th 1^{2}, 2 Co 13^{14}). He is the source of St. Paul's apostolate (Gal 1^{1}); the agent or mediator in creation (1 Co 8^{6}) and in redemptive history (1 Co 10^{4}). The I. was, in fact, an act of self-abnegation whereby a life of creaturely limitations was accepted in exchange for the glories of heaven (2 Co 8^{9}, Gal 4^{4}).

In two passages of later Epp. these christological thoughts are more fully developed. In Ph $2^{5\text{-}11}$ St. Paul deals with the method of man's redemption. Christ is set forth as the example of one who foregoes prerogatives that might be claimed, and renounces for a season a state of divine glory, bliss, and sovereignty which was His by natural right. The passage exhibits specially the original divine dignity, the unity, and the continuous action of the person who passed voluntarily from a state of heavenly bliss to a condition of creaturely servitude and suffering. This process St. Paul speaks of as one of self-emptying (ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν, 5^{7}); it was an action by which a being, possessing the attributes of Deity itself, took upon Himself conditions non-natural to Deity, while continuing in a real sense to be what He was before. The reward of His self-sacrificing 'obedience' (5^{8}; cf. Ro 5^{19}) was exaltation according to an essential law of divine action. In the human nature which He vouchsafed to assume, He was raised to the throne of divine lordship as the object of universal worship. In Col $1^{15\text{-}20}$ St. Paul deals with the cosmic significance of the I. of the Son. As the 'image of the invisible God,' He occupies a position of unique pre-eminence and sovereignty, both over the physical universe and over the new or moral creation, the Church of redeemed humanity. He is the essential mediator in nature, the 'firstborn of all creation,' i.e. prior to creation, and sovereign over it; in relation to history He is the inheritor of the Messianic promises (Ps 89); in relation to the Church He is the essential mediator in the sphere of grace, the firstborn from the dead, the fountainhead and principle of a new supernatural life. In this majestic statement St. Paul seems to unfold a conception essentially identical with that of the prologue to St. John's Gospel.

(3) In Christ God reveals Himself; in Him man is able to discern the character and nature of 'the invisible God' (Col 1^{15}). The word εἰκών in the passage here quoted is found in an earlier Epistle (2 Co 4^{4}). It may be compared both with the Johannine phrase Λόγος, and with the expression in He 1^{3} χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως. The 'Image' of God is at once the adequate expression and the essential revealer of Deity (cf. Jn 1^{18} 6^{40} 12^{45} 17^{3}, Gal 1^{16}, He 1^{2}, and consider Mt 11^{27}=Lk 10^{22}). In Him the divine Fatherhood is manifested, not as a mere creative relationship in which God stands to mankind, but as an internal and ultimate mystery of the Godhead (Ro 8^{15}, Eph 4^{6}, Jn $14^{6.\ 9}$ 16^{27}); in Christ the love of God (1 Jn 4^{9}) and His holiness (Jn 17^{11}, Rev 4^{8} 16^{5}) are alike revealed. But beyond this, the inner mystery of the divine nature is in part unfolded. An essential Fatherhood, an essential Sonship, eternal and intemporal, subsists within the sphere of Deity: a necessary relationship of communion and dependence between two divine Persons (Jn $1^{1\text{-}4}$). St. Paul seems to recognize the perfect equality of these divine Persons, especially in such a phrase as that of Ph 2^{6} (ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων); while in 1 Co $15^{24\text{-}28}$ he teaches the fundamental relation of dependence in which the Son stands to the Father. Thus the revelation of God 'in a Son' (He 1^{2}) is the manifestation of the divine 'glory' in a twofold sense; the Son manifests at once the moral perfections of the Godhead, and the internal distinctions of Person subsisting within the divine essence. In Him the whole fulness of Deity has its permanent abode (Col 1^{19}); to faith it can be manifested (2 Co 4^{6}); by human souls it can be apprehended as a source of life-giving grace (Jn 1^{16}).

(4) All the apostles agree in attributing a unique significance to the work and death of Christ. In Him the divine purpose of 'salvation' was realized: deliverance from wrath, and the imparting of eternal life (1 Th $5^{9.\ 10}$).* Jesus Christ stands in relation to human sin not merely as judge, but as 'saviour' and deliverer (1 Th 1^{10}, Ph 3^{20} etc.). He gives Himself a ransom (λύτρον, 1 Ti 2^{6}; cf. Mt 20^{28}, Jn $11^{51.\ 52}$ etc.); He dies 'for our sins' (1 Co 15^{3}; cf. Mt 26^{28}, 1 P 2^{24} 3^{18}), thus inaugurating a new covenant, the distinctive features of which are remission of sins (1 Co 11^{25}), a new right of access to God (He 7^{19} etc., Eph 2^{13-18}), life and immortality (Ro 2^{7}, 1 Co 15^{42}), the gift of the Holy Spirit (Gal 3^{2}, Eph 1^{13}, He 6^{4}; cf. Ac 2^{38}, 1 Jn 3^{24}). The effects of the redemptive work are described under several different aspects. In Ro and Gal St. Paul connects his doctrine of justification with the Person of Christ. He is the justifier of humanity; through faith in Him the merits of His death are appropriated by men (Ro $3^{25f.}$), and they are brought into a new relation to God, they are treated as righteous (δικαιούμενοι, Ro 3^{24}), 'accepted in the Beloved' (Eph 1^{6}). The shedding of His blood was, in fact, a sacrifice which had propitiatory value (Ro $3^{25f.}$). It was parallel to, while it transcended, the sacrifices of the Levitical law; they were material in quality, often repeated, ineffective in result; Christ's sacrifice was spiritual, and therefore real; one only because perfect in moral quality, effectual for the entire removal of sin (He 10^{1-18}). Under another aspect Christ is the High Priest of humanity (He 4^{14}): its perfect representative and adequate intercessor before God; quick to sympathize and powerful to save (ib. 4^{15} 5^{2} 7^{25}). He appears in the innermost sanctuary of the true tabernacle, there to present Himself in the presence of God on man's behalf (He 7^{25} $9^{23f.}$). Once again, Christ is the second Adam, the Head of a new race (Ro $5^{12ff.}$, 1 Co $15^{45ff.}$). His influence on humanity is parallel to that of the first Adam in the extensiveness of its range, but transcendent in the beneficence and power of its effects (Ro 5^{15-21}). The result of Adam's sin was death; the mediatorial work of Christ has its issue in the triumphant reign of grace in 'eternal life' (Ro 5^{21} 6^{23}; cf. Jn $3^{15.\ 16.\ 36}$ 5^{24} $6^{40.\ 47}$ 20^{31}).

In Eph, one very prominent thought is that of the extension of the life of the incarnate Redeemer, risen and glorified, in the Church. The Church is His body, the complement or fulness of His being (Eph 1^{23}); Christ is her Head, infusing into her the grace and virtue of His humanity (Eph 1^{22} 4^{11} 5^{23}); present in the manifold operations of His Spirit; uniting His people in fellowship with Himself. St. Peter teaches characteristically that the Church is the true people of God, inheriting by right of spiritual descent the titles of ancient Isr. (1 P 2^{9}; cf. Gal 4^{26}, He 12^{22}); while St. John dwells on the mystery of fellowship with God attained in Christ (1 Jn 1^{3}), and on the grace of sonship vouchsafed to individual believers (Jn 1^{12}). In a word, the work and passion of Christ are regarded by the apostles as the source of all spiritual blessing; as the means of bringing all Messianic promises to accomplishment.

(5) It remains to notice that all the apostolic writers seem to presuppose an authoritative tradition as to the historic events of Christ's career, and a general acceptance in the Church of His Messianic claim. In his sermons (Ac 2, etc.) St. Peter appeals, as we have seen, to the known facts of the Passion and Resurrection; while St. Paul, in spite of the fact that his starting-point is that of one who had not known Christ after the flesh, but was called to believe in a glorified Saviour, alludes in various passages to recognized incidents of Christ's human life (see Ro 1^{3} 8^{3}, Gal 4^{4}, 2 Co 8^{9} 5^{21}, 1 Co 15^{3}, Ph $2^{5f.}$, and other passages). There was, in short, an apostolic 'tradition' (παράδοσις) or 'traditions' which formed the common groundwork of teaching (cf. Ro 6^{17}, 1 Co 11^{2}, 2 Th 2^{15} 3^{6}). The Messianic conception of Christ's person specially distinguishes St. Peter's sermons in Ac, but it is by no means absent from the earlier thought of St. Paul,* and in St. John's teaching occupies a prominent place. In Rev, for instance, the image of Christ is Messianic. He is described in terms suggestive of His human descent from the chosen people (Rev 5^{5} 11^{15} 12^{10} 22^{16}); and His kingly dominion is Messianically conceived as a victorious conflict with enemies (6^{2} 12^{5} 19^{11-16}), though His lordship and royalty are the fruit of humiliation (see especially 5^{9}; cf. Jn $1^{29.\ 36}$). There is also a strong Messianic element in the Gospel of Jn, e.g. the titles 'Lamb of God,' 'Son of God,' 'King of Israel,' 'He that should come' (6^{14}), 'sent' (9^{7}), etc.*

Such are the leading points of view under which the apostles describe the higher nature of our Lord. Taken together they combine the various lines of Messianic prediction in a single conception, that of the God-man. Jesus the Messiah of prophecy is the central object of their thought and devotion. Nothing more significantly illustrates this than the use by NT writers of the designation δοῦλος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ; in this case the name of Christ replaces that of J" in an already familiar OT phrase (δοῦλος θεοῦ or κυρίου). Further, we may notice that prayer is addressed to Christ (Ac 7^{59}, 2 Co 12^{8}, Jn 9^{38}); and that He is the object of universal adoration in heaven (Rev $5^{8f.}$); that He is, in a word, God.

It has been found convenient to survey NT teaching in regard to the person of Jesus Christ as a whole. But it is important to bear in mind the fact that the Christian idea of the God-man was one which would not be readily apprehended in all its bearings by men who, like the twelve apostles, had been educated in Jewish modes of thought, and had perhaps imbibed to a great extent the national spirit of their countrymen. It was not till after the fall of Jerus., and the beginnings at least of the movement by which the message of the gospel was extended to the heathen world, that Christians could become fully conscious of the significance of the divine fact on which their religion was based—the appearance of the God-man on earth.† When we consider that our Lord confined His own ministerial activity and that of the Twelve to the 'house of Israel' (Mt 10^{6}), we shall not be surprised that there appears in NT a lower, as well as a higher, form of christological doctrine; a form which is, roughly speaking, represented by the teaching of the Synoptists, and St. James, and St. Peter, as contrasted with that of St. Paul and St. John. But, as we have pointed out, the distinct aspects under which different NT writers present the figure of Christ cannot fairly be construed as representing radically different types of belief in regard to His person. See SON OF GOD.

iii. It may be next inquired what light Scripture throws upon the purposes and results of the Incarnation. The significance assigned to the event in Scripture presupposes something much more than the mere inspiration, 'adoption,' or exaltation of a man. The I. was no mere presence of God in a man; no mere mode of mystical indwelling; no mere moral relationship such as might subsist between friends. It was a real, permanent, indissoluble union of two perfect natures, divine and human; an assumption of manhood into personal unity with a divine being, so that the Godhead employs the manhood as an organ, and wears it as a vesture; so that all the acts and sufferings of the human nature properly belong to the Godhead. This is the doctrine of the NT; it is implied in the express statement of Jn 1^{14} (ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο); in all references to the personality of the Son of God as single and continuous (e.g. 1 Co 8^{6}, Eph $4^{5.\ 10}$, Ph $2^{5f.}$, He 1^{3} etc.); in such 'theopaschite' language as that of Ac $2^{)28}$; in the ascription of life-giving properties to the flesh of Christ (Jn $6^{53f.}$), or of cleansing efficacy to His blood (He 9^{14}); in the mention of His human nature as an object of adoration (Ph 2^{10}). In fact, speaking generally, the NT regards the I. not as the birth of a unique man, but as a momentous event in the eternal life of God: a manifestation, a forthcoming, a mission, a redemptive movement, a visitation, a great descent. In the I. the self-same Person who had pre-existed in the form of God, who had created and sustained in being the universe of things visible and invisible, 'descended' from heaven (Eph 4^{10}), and submitted Himself to a fresh series of experiences in the sphere of human life and history, without ceasing to be in essence what He ever had been, the Son or Word of the Father. He and none other lay in the cradle, grew in wisdom and stature, was tempted and troubled, suffered, died and lay in the grave, rose again, and ascended to the right hand of God. He is 'the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever' (He 13^8). It follows that in virtue of this unity of Person, subsisting in two different states, heavenly and earthly, both human and divine attributes are ascribed to Christ, and may be rightly interchanged. An instance of this 'cross and circulatory' mode of speech (technically called communicatio idiomatum) may be found in 1 Co 2^8, and possibly also in Jn 3^{13}.

The belief of the first Christians as to the real nature of the I. may, in fact, be gathered rather from the significance attached to Christ's work than from express statements in Scripture about His person. All the NT writers are at one in ascribing to the appearance and work of Jesus Christ an element of finality. St. Peter and St. James reflect to some extent the current Messianic belief in the nearness of Christ's return to judgment (1 P $4^{7.17}$, Ja $5^{8.9}$). The 'revelation' of Christ is the goal of human hope and expectation (1 P 1^{13}). St. Paul teaches that Christ is the supreme object of faith; religion consists ultimately in a right relation of the soul to Him (Ro 3^{26} etc.). Christ is a Being in whom souls are mystically incorporated by baptism. They share sacramentally the acts, experiences, and sufferings of His earthly life (Ro $6^{3ff.}$, Gal 2^{20}, Col 2^{12}, Eph $2^{5.6}$ 5^{30}). They are 'in Christ' (Ro 8^1 12^5, Gal 1^{22} $3^{26.28}$, Eph 1^1 2^{10}, Ph 1^1 etc.) 'and Christ in them' (Ro 8^{10}, Gal 2^{20} etc.); their souls and bodies are His temple (2 Co 13^5).

The writer of Hebrews regards Christianity mainly under one aspect—as the final religion. Christ as 'Son' of God brings to man a final authoritative message from God. The religion which is based on His revelation and finished work has the characteristic of 'perfection' (τελείωσις). It establishes that unimpeded fellowship between God and man which was impossible under the Levitical system (7^{11}). Christianity is 'the better hope whereby we draw near to God' (7^{19}). In this verse we have the 'dogmatic centre' of the Epistle. To St. John Christianity is the absolute religion—the final disclosure of God, revealing the possibility of perfect fellowship between God and man. It is final because it rests on the fact of a real I. of God. 1 Jn 'is probably the final interpretation of the whole series of divine revelations. . . . It declares that in the presence of Christ there has been given and there will be given that knowledge of God for which man was made, issuing in fellowship which is realized here in the Christian society, and which reaches to the source of all life.'* The collective testimony of the apostles, viewed as a whole, irresistibly proves the power of the impression which Christ's life and personality had made. No doubt they varied in their power of analyzing that impression. But the doctrine of the true Deity of Christ is the necessary inference from all that they ascribed to Him, and taught concerning Him.

The august dignity and glory of the event corresponds to the importance of the purpose it was designed to serve: the consummation of the universe, the disclosure of God, the restoration of humanity.

1. The cosmic significance of the I., and the view that it was eternally purposed independently of the fact of human sin, seems indeed to be implied in such passages as Eph 1^{4-10}, and possibly He 2^{10}—passages which seem to suggest that the I. of the Son was an event predestined before the foundation of the world. The universe may well, so far as human reason can judge, have been framed with a view to the I. of its Creator. When, however, the question is raised whether this event was predestined in view of man's foreseen fall, scriptural testimony fails us, and we are left to the consideration whether it is a priori probable that God would have made His highest gift to His creatures contingent on human transgression. On the other hand, the evolutionary movement, whether in physical nature or in human history, which tends towards a 'fulness of time' (Gal 4^4, cf. Eph 1^{10}), seems unaccountably to fail unless crowned by the appearance of One who is the flower of human kind, and whose coming marks a climax in revelation. But here, again, we have to fall back on a priori reasoning.

2. At least we know that the I. is a crowning disclosure of God. He who had revealed something of His nature, His 'power and Godhead,' in the works of creation (Ro 1^{20}); who had spoken to man in divers ways, through the warnings of conscience, through visions, dreams, and oracles; who had manifested His purposes in judgment, type, and inspired prophecy, finally spoke to man 'in a Son' (He 1^2). In Christ the will, mind, and character of God were finally revealed. 'If we searched all space,' says Luthardt, 'we should discover only the gospel of power; if we surveyed all time, only the gospel of righteousness. Only in Jesus Christ do we learn the gospel of grace.' Christ indeed revealed the essence of God's being: fatherly love and self-imparting holiness. In the character of Christ, in His life of self-forgetful love, in His compassion for sinners, in the severity of His judgment on sin, is manifested the essential character of God: 'He that hath seen me,' He said, 'hath seen the Father' (Jn 14^9; cf. 12^{45}, Col 1^{15}, εἰκὼν τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ἀοράτου). Further, by His claim to stand in a unique relation to God, He manifested the distinctions of relationship existing within the divine essence. He unfolded the name of God as Triune (Mt 28^{19}). The formula of baptism, in fact, supplements those passages in which the Son and the Spirit are represented as subordinate to God, or ministering to His will. It implies that these two blessed Persons are co-equal with the Father in nature and state, and in their claim to be, together with Him, worshipped and glorified.

3. The mystery of the I. was intended for the restoration of man, for the removal of sin and its effects (Lk 15^4 19^{10}, Jn 1^{29} $3^{14f.}$, Gal 4^4, Ro $5^{2.6f.}$, 1 Co 15^{21-26}, 1 Ti 1^{15}, 1 Jn 3^5). The coming of Christ made all things new; it restored all things to their original unity (Eph 1^{10}). The Redeemer gathered up into Himself elements which the Fall had disintegrated; He represents manhood to God in its initial truth and purity, corresponding to the divine thought, fulfilling its true law, attaining its ideal destiny, perfection through suffering (He $2^{8f.}$). In Him is exhibited the fact that sin is no true or necessary element in human nature, but a vice or corruption of it. The first step in the re-creation of humanity must be the exhibition of a true pattern of manhood in a life perfectly well-pleasing to the Father (Jn 8^{29}; cf. Lk 3^{22}, Mt 17^5). It is needless to illustrate the way in which NT writers constantly point to the example of Christ. He Himself bids men 'learn of him' (Mt 11^{29}) and follow His example (Jn 13^{15}); and St. Paul tells the Thessalonians that they themselves 'are taught of God to love one another' (1 Th 4[9]; cf. Jn 6[45]). But, further, Christ removes the barrier which sin had raised between man and his Creator; He 'takes away the sin of the world' (Jn 1[29]); He makes atonement for it (cf. He 2[17]); He offers a propitiatory sacrifice for it (cf. Ro 3[25] ἱλαστήριον, 1 Jn 2[2] 4[10] ἱλασμός), the sacrifice of Himself (He 9[26]). He assumed human nature, in its outward aspect such as the Fall had left it, with all its obligations (cf. Mt 3[15]), its accumulated heritage of weakness and pain, its necessary subjection to vanity (Ro 8[20]); He 'laid hold of it' (ἐπιλαμβάνεται, He 2[16]) in its weakness indeed, but not in its perversion and corruption, for He was without sin, though He suffered for sin (Ro 8[3] etc.); and by a continuous act of perfect obedience (Ro 5[19]) He discharged the debt of entire self-devotion by which alone man could satisfy the jealous love and the righteous claim of his Creator (cf. He 10[1-10]). His death on the cross was a representative and vicarious act of submission to the just penalties of human sin (see different modes of expression: in Gal 2[20] ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ, 1 Co 15[3] ὑπὲρ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν, Ro 8[3] περὶ ἁμαρτίας, Mt 26[28] περὶ πολλῶν, 20[28] λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, etc.); and the effects of Christ's acceptance of death are described under different metaphors: 'redemption' (i.e. according to OT associations, deliverance from slavery at a mighty cost), 'propitiation' (i.e. an act or process by which sin is neutralized), 'remission' of sins (Ro 3[25] etc.), 'reconciliation with God,'* 'salvation,' etc.

But the work of redemption is followed by the work of re-creation and sanctification. The resurrection, by which the seal is set on the mission and work of the Son, and the ascension, by which as High Priest He passes within the veil to appear in the presence of God in our behalf (He 9[24]), are followed by the outpouring of the Comforter, in whose coming the presence of Christ in His Church is accomplished; He comes as a 'quickening spirit' (1 Co 15[45]) to inspire, enlighten, heal, strengthen, and sanctify His members, to unite them to Himself and to God, to dwell permanently in their hearts, to impart to them 'by habitual and real infusion' His own righteousness, to make them partakers of His life, to enable them for the life of divine service and sonship, to conform them to the likeness of Himself, and raise them into the glory of the risen life (Ro 8[9f.], Gal 2[20] etc., Jn 6[54f.]).

These three aspects of the work accomplished by the incarnate Son of God may be otherwise distinguished, according to Messianic conceptions, as prophetic, priestly, and kingly functions. Thus (1) as Prophet, Christ places Himself, so to speak, in line with the ancient prophets of Israel (Mt 23[29f.]). Like them, He teaches, He reveals the will of God, He preaches the divine requirement; like many among them, He is dishonoured, rejected, and slain (cf. Lk 4[24f.] 13[33f.]). It is in the exercise of His prophetic office that He preaches the kingdom of God, and reveals its principles and mysteries (see Mt 13[35]). He elucidates the moral law; He guides souls; He instructs His disciples; He denounces the hypocrisy of the Pharisees; He rebukes, threatens, predicts the future (Mt 5[20] 15[13] 22[21. 29], 23[13f.] etc.). As prophet endued with power, 'the power of the Spirit' (Lk 4[14]; cf. Mt 12[28]), He works miracles which are themselves emblems or symbols of the diverse operations of grace. And He exhibits the divine will for man, not merely by authoritative teaching and by deeds of power, but by a life of unbroken zeal, devotion, and fidelity to God (cf. He 3[2]); His example, in short, is one element in the exercise of His prophetic office. In Him, according to the prophecy of Isaiah, man is 'taught of God' (Is 54[13]; cf. Jn 6[45]).

* See a note in Sanday-Headlam on Romans, p. 129 f.

(2) As High Priest, Christ offers a propitiatory sacrifice on behalf of man—the sacrifice of Himself. The writer of Hebrews implies that, for the discharge of His priestly function, Christ was prepared by the discipline of earthly life: He vouchsafed to 'learn' obedience, sympathy, compassion, fellow-feeling with sinners; His participation in a common nature fitted Him to be a faithful representative of mankind. He fulfils in Himself two distinct types of priesthood: He is a priest after the order of Melchizedek (He 7), i.e. His priesthood belongs to an order eternal and supra-national, connected with a celestial service and a 'true tabernacle' (8[2]), based on divine promises, and combining kingly with priestly functions (cf. Zec 3[8-10] 6[9-15]). Further, He fulfilled all that had been prefigured by the Levitic ordinances and priesthood, by offering Himself as a spotless victim (He 7[27] 8[3] 9[14. 26] 10[10-12]), and by entering within the veil of the true tabernacle, there to present Himself in the presence of God on behalf of His brethren, and to dedicate them in His own Person for the life of acceptable service (4[14] 6[20] 7[25] 8[1. 2. 6] 9[12]). As the true Melchizedek, in whom the offices of king and priest are united, He bestows blessing, and feeds His people with eucharistic bread and wine (cf. Gn 14[18f.]). As the antitype of the Aaronic priest He cleanses the whole sphere of worship with His own blood (9[23f.]); He purges the individual conscience from the defilement of sin (9[13. 14]), and 'ever liveth to make intercession for' mankind (7[25]).

(3) Finally, as King, Christ is the personal centre of the kingdom of God. The royalty of the Messiah had been predicted by ancient prophecy, and as 'King of the Jews' Christ was proclaimed on the cross (Jn 18[37] 19[19]). As King, He assumes an absolute authority over the consciences and hearts of men as their rightful lord. In Him the ancient theocratic idea, that God was the true King of Isr., dwelling among His subjects, and residing in His temple as in a palace, was fulfilled. In Rev St. John to some extent reverts to the OT and later Jewish conception of the Messianic King as a warrior victorious over Israel's foes. The Son of God is crowned with 'many crowns'; He rides forth conquering and to conquer (Rev 6[2] 12[5] 14[14] 19[11-16]); and the same thought of Messianic Kingship is a leading idea of Mt. As King, Christ proclaims 'with authority' the dawn of His kingdom in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5–7). He explains its nature and conditions in the parables of the kingdom (Mt 13), and after His resurrection He claims 'all authority' in heaven and on earth (Mt 28[18]). As King, He is the fountainhead of ministerial power, the Master whom His servants honour and obey, the omnipotent source of grace, power, life, and mercy (He 4[16]). He founds a mediatorial system whereby men attain what they seek for, union with Himself and with the Father. With authority He institutes the sacrament of baptism or incorporation (Mt 28[19], Jn 3[3f.]), and the Eucharist or sacrament of union (Mt 26[26] etc., Jn 6[47f.]). He bestows the Spirit; He gives 'gifts unto men'; He appoints a ministerial order, which He commissions to act, and to proclaim forgiveness in His name (Eph 4[11f.], Jn 20[22f.]) in order that the central purpose of His coming may be accomplished, 'that repentance and remission of sins' should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerus. (Lk 24[47]). Finally, He rules the universe, bearing all things onward in their appointed course (He 1[3]), extending His kingdom through gradual subdual of all hostile elements: 'He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet' (1 Co 15[25]). He waits expectant 'till his enemies be made his footstool' (He 10[13]; cf. 1[13]); and in the last day it is He who will sit as King 'on the throne of his glory' to judge the world (Mt 25[31f.]).

Thus the I., properly understood, is a key to the history of the universe. All history, it has been said, is summed up in the three sentences, He is coming, He has come, He will come again (cf. Rev 22^{13}); and certainly this is the fundamental teaching of Scripture. If the OT foresees (Gal 3^{8}) the I., the NT develops its significance as an actual event, and persistently points to the return of the Incarnate as the goal of history. There is no reason for denying a certain advance in the intellectual apprehension and statement of the doctrine of the I. on the part of the apostles, so far as it can be clearly demonstrated. Indeed it is what we should a priori expect. But in this article we have been concerned with positive and definite results, with the ultimate position which the NT assigns to Christ; and it is contended that the divergent and varied testimonies of Holy Scripture can only be satisfactorily adjusted and reconciled by the belief that Jesus of Nazareth was not only the expected Messiah of prophecy, but in a unique and absolute sense divine: God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God.

INCENSE is AV tr^{n} of two Heb. words which at first were quite distinct in meaning, although latterly the second of them came to be practically synonymous with the first. 1. לְבוֹנָה, frankincense (wh. see), is tr^{d} 'incense' by AV in Is 43^{23} 60^{6} 66^{3}, Jer 6^{20} 17^{26} 41^{5}, in all of which passages RV accurately substitutes 'frankincense.' The Gr. equivalent is λίβανος, which appears in NT in Mt 2^{11} and Rev 18^{13}. 2. קְטֹרֶת (in Dt 33^{10} קְטוֹרָה [cf. the prop. name Ḳeturah, קְטוּרָה], in Jer 44^{21} קִטֵּר), generally reproduced in LXX by θυμίαμα or θυμιάματα (cf. for NT usage Lk 1^{10}, Rev 5^{8} $8^{3f.}$ 18^{13}, in the last along with λίβανος). In Ex $30^{35.\ 37}$ RV substitutes 'incense' (קְטֹרֶת) for 'perfume,' in 2 Ch 2^{6} 'burn incense' (הַקְטִיר) for 'burn sacrifice,' and in Rev 5^{8} 18^{13} 'incense' (θυμιάματα) for 'odours' of AV (cf. Rev 8^{3}).

Frankincense was an ingredient of the holy incense, Ex 30^{24}; it was used as incense, Jer 6^{20}; it was put on the meal offering (Lv $2^{1.\ 2.\ 15.\ 16}$ 6^{8}, cf. 5^{11}, Nu 5^{15}); also on the shewbread, Lv 24^{7}; one form of luxury was to burn it as a perfume, Ca 3^{6} $4^{6.\ 14}$; along with gold it is mentioned as part of the tribute to be brought to Israel, Is 60^{6} (cf. Mt 2^{11} of the gifts of the Magi to the infant Jesus). Both frankincense (λίβανος) and incense (θυμίαμα) are mentioned amongst the merchandise of the apocalyptic Babylon, Rev 18^{13}. On the Arabian traffic in incense see ARABIA, vol. i. p. 134^{b}.

The offering of incense, which bulks so largely in the later ritual, appears to have been unknown in the earlier stages of Israel's history. Wellhausen (who is followed in his conclusions more or less closely by Kuenen, Nowack, Benzinger, and many others) will have it that the first mention of offering incense is in Jer 6^{20}. In the older literature קטר,* according to him, always refers to the burning of the fat or the meal and making these go up in sweet smoke (cf. Lv 3^{5} [P] etc.) to J″, while the substantive קְטֹרֶת in like manner has the quite general sense of what is burnt upon the altar.* The meaning 'incense' belongs to it for the first time with certainty in Ezekiel (8^{11} 16^{18} 23^{41}); subsequently the word occurs frequently in P, always in this sense; elsewhere only in Pr 27^{9}, where it is used not with a sacred but a secular application (EV 'perfume'). Even in such late passages as 1 S 2^{28}, Ps 66^{15} 141^{2} Wellhausen denies that it means anything more than sweet smoke, which is the sense he attributes to it in the only two certainly pre-exilic passages where it occurs, Is 1^{13} and Dt 33^{10} (otherwise Dillm. and Steuernagel, both of whom find the meaning 'incense' in Dt 33^{10}, although Steuernagel considers that this implies a pretty late date for the passage, which, however, he would make prior to P, because all Levites have according to it the prerogative of burning incense to J″, whereas in P this duty and privilege is assigned only to the seed of Aaron; cf. Nu $16^{6.\ 10}$ 17^{5} [Eng. 16^{40}]). Again, in Am $4^{4f.}$ $5^{21ff.}$, Is $1^{11ff.}$, Mic $6^{6f.}$, where we have detailed lists of ritual acts, there is no mention of incense, and JE as well as the books of Judges, Samuel, and Kings are equally silent. לְבוֹנָה, 'frankincense,' appears first in Jer 6^{20} 17^{26} 41^{5}, elsewhere only in P (Ex 30^{24}, Lv $2^{1.\ 2.\ 15.\ 16}$ 5^{11} 6^{8} 24^{7}, Nu 5^{15}), Deutero-Isaiah (Is 43^{23} 60^{6} 66^{3}), the Chronicler (1 Ch 9^{29}), and Canticles (3^{6} $4^{6.\ 14}$).

From all this it may perhaps be inferred that the use of incense was introduced not long before the time of Jeremiah (in 6^{20} it is referred to as rare, costly, unnecessary). It may have been connected with the gradual refinement of the cultus, the extension of commerce, and the contagion of the rites of heathen religions (cf. Jer $11^{12.\ 17}$ 48^{35}, 2 Ch 34^{25}).

In P incense has a very extensive use, and is regarded as extremely sacred. It was to be used with every meal offering (Lv $2^{1.\ 2}$ etc.), as well as to be offered alone, in which latter case it safeguarded the high priest on the Day of Atonement when he entered the Holy of Holies (Lv $16^{12f.}$); and it made atonement for the people after the rebellion of Korah (Nu $17^{11f.}$ [Eng. $16^{46f.}$]). The holy incense was to be prepared according to a special recipe (Ex $30^{34f.}$) from stacte, onycha, and galbanum (see sep. arts. on these words), along with pure frankincense—an equal weight of each (see Dillm. ad loc.). Josephus states that there were thirteen ingredients used in his day, and that a great store of these was always kept in the temple (BJ v. v. 5, VI. viii. 3). It was forbidden (Ex $30^{37f.}$) to imitate this preparation for private use; to burn it was the prerogative of the high priest; the presumption of the Korahites in taking it upon them to burn incense was punished with death (Nu 16; cf. the Chronicler's account of Uzziah's leprosy, 2 Ch $26^{16ff.}$); Aaron's own sons died for offering it improperly (Lv $10^{1f.}$).

Nothing shows more clearly the growing importance attached by P to incense than the circumstance that finally an altar of incense (מִזְבַּח הַקְּטֹרֶת) is introduced. Of this there is no trace in Solomon's temple (1 K 7^{48} being part of what is otherwise known to be a late passage), and in the account of the Tabernacle it is generally admitted that the mention of the incense altar comes in awkwardly at the end (Ex $30^{1ff.}$). Hence the majority of modern critics are disposed to assign the mention of this altar to a late stratum of P. It is pointed out, for instance, that even in the ritual of the Day of Atonement (Lv 16 [P]) it is not upon an altar but with censers (wh. see) that incense is offered (v.^{12}). Even Pseudo-Hecatæus (ap. Jos. c. Ap. i. 22) mentions nothing as being in the interior of the temple but the candlestick and a golden βωμός, which probably refers to the table of the shewbread (cf. Ezk 41^{22} 44^{16}, with Davidson's and Bertholet's notes). Dillmann, who does not share Wellhausen's scepticism as to the existence of an altar of incense, admits that at least Ex 30[10] is an addition to the original law, designed for the purpose of supplementing Lv 16[16b]. On this question, as well as on the position of the altar, and the difficulty occasioned by He 9[4], see Incense Altar under art. TABERNACLE.

* The Piel of this verb is used by the older writers, the Hiphil by P and the Chronicler, while in the transition period represented by the compiler of Kings the two formations are used promiscuously.

* 'The root katara in Arabic signifies to exhale an odour in roasting' (Driver on Am 5^{5}).

According to Ex 30[7ff.] incense had to be offered on the altar every morning and evening (cf. Joma iii. 5). The Mishnic tract Tamid gives a full account of the ritual of the morning service, which may possibly be fairly correct for NT times, although it is of little value for our knowledge of the ritual some centuries earlier. We are told, inter alia, that it was the custom to decide by lot which of the priests were to perform the various functions (cf. Joma ii. 4), amongst which the offering of incense was counted specially solemn, although it was no longer the exclusive prerogative of the high priest. John Hyrcanus (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 3) and Zacharias (Lk 1[9.20]) are both said to have received a divine revelation while engaged in this act. In offering the incense, fire was taken from the altar of burnt-offering and carried into the temple, where it was laid upon the incense altar, and then the incense was emptied from a golden vessel upon the fire. See a full account in Schürer, HJP II. i. 295.

The use of incense in the temple may have been partly for antiseptic fumigation, but it is largely explained by the partiality of the Oriental to sweet odours. He enjoys these himself, and he offers them to those whom he desires to honour (cf. Dn 2[46]). In India it was customary to scent the roads when the king went out (Curt. VIII. ix. 23); when Xerxes crossed the Hellespont, incense was burnt on the bridge (Herod. vii. 54); as Alexander the Great marched against Babylon, there were altars erected to him and incense burnt (Curt. V. i. 20). It is easy to see how such customs could be transferred to the cultus, in honour of the object of worship. If this cannot be proved for some other Oriental nations, at least it is certain in the case of such neighbours of Israel as the Phœnicians (2 K 23[5], Jer 7[9] 11[13] 32[29] 44[17ff.], Hos 2[15]), the Babylonians (Herod. i. 183, possibly Is 65[3]), and the Egyptians (Plutarch, Isid. 81; Dioscor. i. 24). Cf., further, 1 K 11[8], 2 K 22[17], Jer 1[16] 19[13], Ezk 6[13] 23[41]. In Israel incense was supposed to be specially acceptable to J" (Dt 33[10]), and, as we have seen, to have an atoning efficacy (Nu 17[11f.] [Eng. 16[46f.]]). See the very full and interesting note of Dillmann, Ex-Lv[3], p. 359 f., from which the above illustrations are taken. We may add the explanation of the religious value of frankincense suggested by W. R. Smith (RS[1] 406): 'frankincense was the gum of a very holy species of tree, which was collected with religious precautions . . . it appears to have owed its virtue, like the gum of the samora tree, to the idea that it was the blood of an animate and divine plant.'

On the symbolical meaning of incense and its ingredients much has been written both in ancient and in modern times that is pure baseless phantasy. In Rev 5[8] incense represents the prayers of the saints (cf. Ps 141[2]). The reading αἵ (which is the correct text) does not in the least necessitate a reference to φίαλαι instead of θυμιάματα (see Bousset, ad loc.). The point of comparison is probably the ascending to heaven of the smoke of the incense (cf. Dillm. on Lv 1[9]). In Rev 8[3] there was given to the angel much incense that he should add it (ἵνα δώσῃ) to the prayers of the saints, and in v.[4] the smoke of the incense goes up (not 'with' RV, but) 'for (RVm; Bousset 'zu Gunsten') the prayers of the saints,' i.e. giving them an extra claim to acceptance.

INCONTINENCY, INCONTINENT. — Incontinency is the tr[n] of incontinentia in 2 Es 5[10], and of ἀκρασία (Vulg. incontinentia) in 1 Co 7[5]. In 2 Es the word has probably the general sense of 'absence of self-control,' 'lawlessness,' for so both the Lat. and the Eng. words have sometimes been used. The usual sense, however, has always been 'unchastity,' and that is the meaning in 1 Co.

The Gr. word ἀκρασια occurs also in Mt 23[25], where it is tr[d] 'excess' by both AV and RV (Vulg. immunditia). It describes the character of the ἀκρατής (from κρατέω, to control), one who wants self-restraint, its opposite being ἐγκράτεια. This ἀκρασία must be distinguished from ἀκρᾶσία, which comes from κεράννυμι, to mix, is associated with ἀκρατής, 'untempered,' and is used by Theophr. (C.P. III. ii. 5) of a bad (lit. 'badly mixed') climate.

The adj. 'incontinent' occurs only in 2 Ti 3[3] as tr[n] of ἀκρατής, which has probably the general meaning of 'unrestrained,' 'uncontrolled' (RV 'without self-control'). It is scarcely possible, however, to find an instance of 'incontinent' in this general sense; and it is probable that Wyc. and Rhem., from whom AV accepted the word, understood the Vulg. incontinentes in the sense of 'unchaste.' Tind. (whom the other versions follow) has 'ryatours.' J. HASTINGS.

INCREDULITY.—In 2 Es 15[3] the Lat. incredulitates dicentium is rendered 'the incredulity of them that speak against thee.' The word means no more than 'unbelief' (as RV). The Rhem. NT, which confesses itself a translation of 'the old vulgar Latin text, not the common Greek text,' makes frequent use of the word. Thus Mt 13[58] 'And he wrought not many miracles there because of their incredulity'; 17[20] 'Then came the disciples to Jesus secretly, and said, Why could not we cast him out? Jesus said to them, Because of your incredulity'; He 3[19] 'And we see that they could not enter in, because of incredulitie.' In the same version incredulous occurs no less frequently, as Mk 9[19] 'O incredulous generation'; Lk 1[17]; Jn 3[36] 'he that is incredulous to the Sonne shal not see life'; 20[27] 'be not incredulous but faithful'; He 11[31] 'By faith, Rahab the harlot perished not with the incredulous.'

Incredulity is used in the same way in Preface to AV 1611, 'it is a fault of incredulitie to doubt of those things that are evident.' J. HASTINGS.

INDIA (הֹדּוּ, ἡ Ἰνδική).—This name, which in the OT is found only in Est 1[1] 8[9] (cf. 1 Es 3[2], Ad. Est 13[1] 16[1]), represents the Old Persian Hind'u and the Sansk. Sindhu (=sea or great river), and is applied, not to the peninsula of Hindostan, but to the country immediately adjoining the Indus, i.e. the Punjab, and perhaps also Scinde. This is the portion of I. which was first known to the Greeks, and which is described by Herodotus (iii. 94, 98) as forming the most easterly region of the empire of Darius. Elsewhere (vii. 9) he names I. and Ethiopia as being among the most distant parts of the empire; and similarly in Est the dominions of Ahasuerus (Xerxes) are said to extend from I. to Ethiopia, comprising 127 provinces. At a later period we have evidence of intercourse between I. and Syria, in the allusion to the Indian drivers in charge of the war elephants of Antiochus V. (1 Mac 6^{37}). In 1 Mac 8^{8}, indeed, I. is said to have been a part of the dominions of Antiochus the Great, taken from him by the Romans and given to Eumenes, king of Pergamum. But neither Antiochus nor Eumenes can really have had possessions in India. The statement must therefore be due to the inaccuracy of the historian; unless, as has been conjectured, we should correct the text and read 'Ionia and Mysia' instead of 'India and Media.'

But although the name I. occurs only in the later Jewish literature, the products of the country were known to the Hebrews at a much earlier date. Many modern scholars have identified the Pison and the gold-producing Havilah of Gn 2^{11} with the Indus and I. (so Ges. Thes.; but cf. Dillm. and Del. ad loc.). This view is as old as the Targ. Jerushalmi, which in Gn 2^{11} 10^{7} renders Havilah by Hindeki, while in Targ. Jon. of Is 11^{11}, Jer 13^{23}, Hindeki represents Cush. We meet with Indian articles and Indian words in the accounts of the foreign trade of Solomon. The ships from Ophir brought almug trees (1 K 10^{11} אַלְמֻגִּים, 2 Ch 2^{8} [Heb. ^{7}] 9^{10} אַלְגֻּמִּים), perhaps sandalwood; and the navy of Tarshish (1 K 10^{22}) imported ivory (שֵׁנְהַבִּים, ?cf. Sansk. ibhas, elephant), apes (קוֹפִים=Ind. kapi, cf. Halévy, Mél. de crit. 81), and peacocks (תֻּכִּיִּים=Malabar tógai, cf. Ges. Thes.). See Cheyne and Hommel in Expos. Times, July and August, 1898, pp. 470, 524. It is probable also that Indian wares were included in the merchandise of Tyre, whose extensive caravan trade is described in Ezk 27. According to v.^{15} the men of Dedan brought presents of ivory and ebony, products either of I. or Ethiopia; cassia and calamus (v.^{19}) are spoken of by the ancients as coming from I., and perhaps the 'bright iron' was imported from the same country (see Smend). Real knowledge of I. in more Western countries dates from the time of Alexander's conquests, and of the travels of Megasthenes (c. B.C. 300), whose works were continually quoted by later Gr. writers. But though it appears that a regular trade with I. by way of the Red Sea was carried on in the Græco-Roman period (cf. Periplus Mar. Eryth. 37. 44); and individual Indians, and even Indian embassies, are mentioned as visiting the Rom. Empire (cf. Mon. Anc. v. 50, 51; Suet. Aug. 21; Dio Cass. liv. 9); yet it is probable that at the beginning of our era the knowledge of that country was but slight, and it is a mistake to suppose that Indian thought can have exerted any appreciable influence upon the West by that time (cf. Schürer, HJP II. ii. 215 f.; Lightfoot, Colossians, 389 ff.). In particular, Zeller (Phil. d. Griech. III. ii. 223) denies that any trace of Buddhists is to be found in Gr. literature before the middle of the 2nd cent. A.D. H. A. WHITE.

INDIFFERENT.—'It is a striking testimony,' says Trench (Select Glossary, p. 111), 'of the low general average which we have come to assume common to most things, that a thing which does not differ from others, is thereby qualified as poor; a sentence of depreciation is pronounced upon it when it is declared to be indifferent.' And he points out that the same feeling embodies itself in Greek 'at the other end' when διαφέρειν means præstare and τὰ διαφέροντα præstantiora. But this is a modern fault. About 1611 and earlier, to be called 'indifferent' was to be highly complimented, for it meant to be impartial, not making a difference where none existed. In the Joint Attestation of Several Bishops and Learned Divines of the Church of England, avowing that her Doctrine was confirmed, and her Discipline was not impeached, by the Synod of Dort, we read, 'As for ourselves, in the ingenuity of our conscience, we herein do not decline the judgment of any indifferent dispassionate man; and such we hope this true and plain narration will satisfy' (M. Fuller, Life of Bp. Davenant, p. 107). Tindale, in The Obedience of a Christian Man (Works, i. 236), says of God, 'Neither is there any respect of persons with him; that is, he is indifferent and not partial; as great in his sight is a servant as a master.' The adj. occurs in Sir 42^{5}, where 'merchants' indifferent selling' is praised (B περὶ ἀδιαφόρου πράσεως καὶ ἐμπόρων, AℵC διαφόρου and om. καί, RV 'Of indifferent selling of merchants,' so Cowley-Neubauer after Heb. text). The meaning is clearly 'impartial.' But even Tindale, in a note to Ex 12^{3}, says, 'That I here cal a shepe, is in Ebrue a word indifferent to a shepe and a gotte both.' Then in his 'Godly Letter' (Works, iii. 177) Knox represents 'the haill Counsaile' as saying of Grindall, Lever, and others of the Protestant preachers, 'Thay wald heir no mo of thair sermonis: they wer but indifferent fellowis; (yea, and sum of thame eschameit not to call thame pratting knaves).' And at a later time Thomas Adams (on 2 P 1^{4}) speaks of 'idle indifferents, that do neither good nor harm.'

The adv. indifferently occurs in the Communion Service in the Prayer (1662) for the King and his officers 'that they may truly and indifferently administer justice.' Joy, in his Apology to Tindale (Arber's ed. p. 4), says, 'I desier every indifferent reder to iuge indifferently.' So Tind. in Prologe to Deut. 'god is lorde above all lordes and loveth all his servauntes indifferently, as well the poor and feble and the straunger, as the rich and mightye'; which is a recollection of his tr^{n} of Ja 1^{5} 'Yf eny of you lacke wysdome, let him axe of God which geveth to all men indifferentlie, and casteth no man in the teth.' And on the miracle of the Ten Lepers, Bp. Hall says (Works, ii. 154), 'The miracle indifferently wrought upon all, is differently taken.'

The subst. indifferency is also found in the Pr. Bk. of 1604, in the King's Proclamation for the Uniformity, etc., 'the indifferency and uprightness of our Judgment.' Cf. Knox, Works, iii. 271, 'I knowledge and confesse . . . the lacke of fervencye in reproving synne, the lacke of indifferency in feedyng those that were hongrye, and the lacke of diligence in the execution of mine office.' But Hall uses the word nearly in the mod. sense (Works, ii. 148), 'How many are there that thinke there is no wisdome but in a dull indifferency?'

J. HASTINGS.

INDITE.—To 'indite' a letter is now to write it, and even so the expression is somewhat old-fashioned; but formerly it was to dictate or at least compose, and the 'inditer' is distinguished from the writer. Thus in Pref. to AV 1611, the Translators, describing the Scriptures as 'a fountaine of most pure water springing up unto everlasting life,' add, 'And what marvaile? The originall thereof being from heaven, not from earth; the authour being God, not man; the enditer the holy spirit, not the wit of the Apostles or Prophets; the Pen-men such as were sanctified from the wombe, and endewed with a principall portion of God's spirit.' So in Ps 45^{1} 'My heart is inditing a good matter,' is naturally followed by 'my tongue is the pen of a ready writer.'

The verb in the Heb. (רָחַשׁ) means to bubble up (like a fountain) or boil over (like a pot of water): LXX Ἐξηρεύξατο ἡ καρδία μου λόγον ἀγαθόν; Vulg. 'Eructavit cor meum verbum bonum'; Wyc. 'Myn herte bowide out (1388 'hath teld out') a good woord'; Luth. 'Mein Herz dichtet ein feines Lied'; Cov. 'My hert is dytinge of a good matter'; Great Bible (Pr. Bk.), 'My hert is endyting of a good matter'; Gen. 'Mine heart will utter forthe a good matter'; Dou. 'My hart hath uttered a good word (with note 'I have received by divine inspiration in my hart and cogitation a most high Mysterie'); Bish. 'My heart is inditing of a good matter.' Mod. expositors translate more literally: Del. 'My heart bubbles over with a goodly word'; Per. 'My heart is overflowing with a goodly matter'; Cheyne, 'My heart bubbles with goodly words'; Kay, 'My heart is teeming with a good word'; Kirkp. 'My heart bubbleth over with goodly words'; Kautzsch, 'Mein Herz wallt über von lieblicher Rede'; Wellh.-Furness, 'My heart overflows with a theme that is good'; RV, 'My heart overfloweth with a goodly matter'; Driver, 'My heart is astir with a goodly matter.'

The Eng. word comes from Low Lat. indictare (a frequentative of indicere, to proclaim), and it entered the Eng. lang. at first in the French form endicter, 'indite' being a later spelling in imitation of the Latin, while 'dite' is a vernacular shortening. Knox has the form 'dite' (which he spells 'dyte'), as Hist. 214, 'those Prayers were dyted unto the people by the holy Ghost, before they came to the uttermost of trouble, to assure them, that God, by whose Spirit the Prayer was dyted, would not contemne the same in the midst of their calamities.' Thomas Fuller uses 'endite,' as in Holy State, iv. 5 (p. 261), 'More hold is then to be taken of a few words casually uttered, then of set solemn speeches, which rather shew men's arts then their natures, as endited rather from their brains then hearts.'

The same verb meant also to accuse (after the Lat.); but now a distinction is made, the verb to accuse, though pronounced the same, being spelt 'indict.' Golding, in Calvin's Job (on 32^{1-3}), has 'so then, what remayneth, but too learne first and formoste too condemne our selves, and too bring our inditement alwayes readie made, when we come before God, and too say, that we be wretched sinners.' On the other hand, Elyot (The Governour, ii. 343) has 'Plato (or rather Socrates, Plato indictynge).' But Fuller, Holy Warre, iii. 16, p. 134, spells the word in the mod. way, 'indicted by his conscience for his cruelty.' RV has used the subst. 'indictment' in Job 31^{35} 'O that I had one to hear me! . . . and that I had the indictment which mine adversary hath written' for AV 'and that mine adversary had written a book.'

J. HASTINGS.

INFIDEL, INFIDELITY.—An 'infidel' in our modern speech is one who deliberately rejects the Faith; but at one time a person might be called an 'infidel' who had never heard it. Infidelis in eccles. Latin simply meant 'unbelieving,' and 'infidel' carried the same purely negative meaning. Thus Tindale, in his general Prologe to the Pent., says, 'Behold how soberly and how circumspectly both Abraham and also Isaac behave them selves amonge the infideles'; and in Rhem. NT the tr^{n} of Ro 15^{31} is 'Helpe me in your praiers for me to God, that I may be delivered from the infidels that are in Jewrie'; while Hooker (Eccles. Polity, III. viii. 6) speaks of 'Festus, a mere natural man, an infidel, a Roman, one whose ears were unacquainted with such matters.' Hence RV changes 'infidel' of 2 Co 6^{15}, 1 Ti 5^{8} into 'unbeliever,' which is all that the Gr. word (ἄπιστος) means.

So 'infidelity' was once no more than 'unbelief,' as the marg. note to Lv 7^{5} in Matthew's Bible, 'Trespace after the order of the scrypture signifyeth somtyme all the lyffe past which we have lyved in infidelyte, being ignoraunt of the veritie, not only in doyng open synnes, but also when we have walked in oure awne rightwesnes'; and still more clearly in Fuller, Holy State, iv. 18, p. 335, 'After his [Gustavus Adolphus'] death, how did men struggle to keep him alive in their reports! partly out of good will, which made them kindle new hopes of his life at every spark of probability, partly out of infidelity that his death could be true.' This is all that 'infidelity' means in 2 Es 7^{44} ('incredulitas').

INGATHERING, FEAST OF.—See TABERNACLES (FEAST OF).

INHABIT.—We do not now use 'inhabit' intransitively. Hence RV changes 1 Ch 5^{9} 'And eastward he inhabited unto the entering in of the wilderness' into 'he dwelt.' Cf. Pr. Bk. 1552, Act of Uniformity (Keeling, p. vii), 'all and every person, and persons, inhabiting within this realm' and Defoe, Crusoe, p. 510, 'There are many Travellers, who have wrote the History of their Voyages and Travels this way, that it would be very little Diversion to any Body, to give a long Account of the Places we went to, and the People who inhabit there.' Nor do we now speak of a single person inhabiting a place, as Jer 48^{18} 'Thou daughter that dost inhabit Dibon,' though the construction may be defended on the ground that 'daughter' stands for the whole people (RV 'O thou daughter that dwellest in Dibon').

Figurative examples of the word are: (1) Ps 22^{3} 'O thou that inhabitest the praises of Israel' (יוֹשֵׁב תְּהִלּוֹת, RVm 'art enthroned upon'), a bold adaptation, says Kirkpatrick, of the phrase 'that sittest enthroned upon the cherubim' (2 S 6^{2}, 2 K 19^{15}, Ps 80^{1} 99^{1}), the praise-songs of Israel being regarded as clouds of incense which form J"'s throne. Cheyne (in loc.) sees in the phrase a poetic glorifying of the 'old mythic phrase.' The cherubim were the forces of nature; but J" is not merely a God of force, He is a God of praise-producing loving-kindness. See also Cheyne in Expos. 3rd ser. vii. 20 ff. (2) Is 57^{15} 'the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy' (שֹׁכֵן עַד). This tr^{n} is after LXX κατοικῶν τὸν αἰῶνα and Vulg. habitans æternitatem, and is first used in Geneva Bible 'that inhabiteth the eternitie' (Wyc. 'wonende the everelastingte,' 1388 'that dwellith in everlastyngnesse'). Modern expositors translate more directly, as Del. 'the eternally-dwelling One'; Cheyne and Orelli, 'who dwelleth for ever'; Skinner, 'that sitteth (enthroned) for ever.'

The old and rare form inhabitance is found in Wis $12^{7m.}$ 'new inhabitance' for text 'a worthy colony' (ἀξία ἀποικία). So Beaumont and Fletcher, Sea Voyage, iv. 1—

> 'Here's nothing, sir, but poverty and hunger;
> No promise of inhabitance; neither track of beast.'

Inhabiter is used for 'inhabitant' in Rev 8^{13} 12^{12}. It occurs in Coverdale, as Is 26^{9} 'For . . . the inhabitours of the earth lerne rightuousnesse'; and 40^{22} 'all the inhabitours of the worlde are in comparison of him but as greshoppers'; cf. Pr. Bk. Ps 75^{4} 'The earth is weak and all the inhabiters thereof.' The fem. form inhabitress occurs in Jer $10^{17m.}$, an attempt to show the gender of the Heb. word used in the passage. Cf. Chapman, Hymne to Venus—

> 'An inhabitresse
> On this thy wood-crowned hill.'

INHERITANCE.—The English word 'inheritance' represents, in the OT, the terms חֵלֶק, יְרֻשָּׁה, מוֹרָשָׁה, and נַחֲלָה. Of these, however, the first is more frequently (and properly) rendered 'portion' (LXX μερίς), and the second and third are rare. The last mentioned occurs nearly two hundred times. Although the common term for the expression of the idea of 'inheritance' proper, or estate which descends to the heir of the last holder, נַחֲלָה need not imply this, and, in ordinary biblical usage, signifies possession generally. The same remark applies to the NT (and LXX) term κληρονομία (cf. the use of 'inherit' and derivatives, e.g. in Shaks. . . . 'the great globe itself, yea, all which it inherit'—Tempest, iv. 1, also Hamlet, i. 1, etc.). At the same time this idea remains, though latent, in both terms, and may in certain connexions of thought become explicit.

i. Old Testament.—For the Hebrew law and practice regulating succession see art. HEIR. From these it is evident how true is the remark of Keil, that Israel was 'essentially a land-holding people.' In her case, however, social institutions and usages appear as charged throughout with a religious significance, arising in this instance from the fact that the possession of a national territory, on which the theocracy should be maintained, was among the most elementary and indispensable conditions for the fulfilment of her destiny. The 'land of promise' (He 11^9), accordingly, holds a prominent place among the blessings represented as assured to her from the first. It is the burden of the patriarchal covenants (Gn 15^{18-21} 26^3 28^{13}); a renewed pledge of its acquisition lies behind the exodus from Egypt (Ex 6^8); the entrance of the people upon possession, although not effected without fierce and protracted warfare, is due rather to the interposition of their God on their behalf (Jos 21^{43-45}, Ps 44^{1-3}); and the subsequent division of the land among the several tribes, clans, and families is provided for by detailed regulations bearing divine sanction (Nu 32. 34, Jos 18^{1-9}), and is finally accomplished by lot (Jos 14^2), the 'whole disposing' whereof is 'of the Lord.' Obtained thus by divine infeftment, the land is regarded as held thereafter conditionally upon fidelity on the part of the people to the covenant under which it has accrued to them, and as bound up in the closest way with their moral history. It is 'defiled' by their crimes and impieties (Lv 18^{25}, Jer 16^{18}); may even, by a quasi-personification, be said to 'sin' with its sinful inhabitants (Dt 24^4); and divine punishment takes the form, now of blight and famine overtaking the devoted land for the people's sake (Dt $11^{8ff.}$), now of their forfeiture of it outright (Dt $4^{26ff.}$). On the other hand, reinstatement in the divine favour is signified by restoration to the land and to its peaceful enjoyment. Also, inasmuch as the election of God is 'without repentance,' it appears as His purpose that His people should hold it 'for ever' (Gn 13^{15} etc.). The portion allotted to each several tribe even is to be that tribe's inalienable possession (Nu 36^{1-12})—an idea which underlies the remarkable provisions connected with the Jubilee Year, and which may have dictated the severe condemnation pronounced (Dt 19^{14}, Hos 5^{10}) upon the removing of a neighbour's landmark (cf. Driver, Deut. in loc., however, and Knobel quoted there). Yet withal J″ remains ultimate owner or inheritor here. The land is 'the inheritance of J″' (Ex 15^{17}, 1 S 26^{19}). 'The inheritance is mine, and ye are strangers and sojourners with me' (Lv 25^{23}).

Thus far the land as such, and as the scene of God's fellowship with His people, constitutes the 'inheritance,' which may be regarded as pertaining either, ultimately and absolutely, to Him, or, derivatively and conditionally, to them. So concrete an idea, however, determined thus religiously, could scarcely fail in course of time to be still further spiritualized, as indeed appears in two directions. This is not the place to inquire how far the conception even as already defined may represent the reflection of subsequent modes of thought upon the conditions of an earlier time; but in any case in certain later writings it undergoes a further development. On the one hand, OT faith learns to claim not the land but J″ Himself, fellowship with whom within its borders lends it its significance and value, as the true and proper 'inheritance.' Probably we are to find the immediate suggestion of this way of thinking in the provision by which the priests (Nu 18^{20}) and the Levites generally (Dt 18^2) were to have no territorial inheritance allotted to them: J″ was to be their inheritance. That is to say, their portion was to consist of the altar-dues and first-fruits (Dt 18^{1-5}) offered by the Israelites to J″, 'the service of the god of the land' being 'a burden on the land' (W. R. Smith, RS p. 229). From this the step was a short one to the employment of the term to signify that enjoyment of God which is the object of religious faith and hope always (cf. Ps 16^5). In any case by the time of Jeremiah the conception of J″ as the 'portion' of His people was a common one (Jer 10^{16} 51^{19}), while in certain of the Psalms even individual faith claims Him thus (73^{26} 119^{57} 142^5). From the other side, again, the original signification of the term gives way similarly. J″'s 'inheritance' ceases to be the land His people occupy, and becomes rather the people itself. Israel is, in a special sense, His own, brought out of Egypt 'to be unto Him a people of inheritance' (Dt 4^{20}), 'chosen to be a peculiar people unto himself, above all peoples that are upon the face of the earth' (Dt 7^6)—'J″'s portion is His people; Jacob is the lot of His inheritance' (Dt 32^9)—a conception which broadens out under the influence of the later universalism until it includes the Gentiles also (Is 19^{25} 47^6 63^{17}, Ps 2^8). Here the idea has parted with its original associations altogether. In place of attaching to what is at most only a fundamental condition of the realization of the covenant, it now expresses that mutual appropriation and enjoyment of each other on the part of God and His people which is the essence of the covenant itself. Still, this by no means represents the ordinary usage of the term anywhere in the OT. Even when it becomes most highly volatilized, so to say, OT thinking remains charged with elements which belong to the outward conditions amid which it has arisen. The fellowship of God and His people, even in its perfect form, is always represented as to be maintained in the territory originally assured to them; and to the last it is an essential feature in the picture of the Messianic time that the people shall then at length enter upon sure and peaceful possession of their own land (Is 60^{21}, Jer 23^8, Ps 37^9 etc., To 4^{12}), where they shall enjoy the immediate presence of their God and serve Him in righteousness (Ezk 37^{21-28} etc.).

ii. New Testament.—In the NT use of the term these limitations naturally disappear. Here also hope grounded on divine promises retains the central place in the religious life (Ro 8^{24}, cf. He 11), and its content as a fellowship with Himself into which God graciously introduces men is the same always; but the external conditions amid which in the OT this is realized remain in the NT merely as a metaphorical colouring in the language expressive of the final spiritual good made available through Jesus Christ. Thus our Lord's saying, 'Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth' (Mt 5^5), may be regarded merely as a figurative mode of signifying the fulness of life and blessedness to which faith ultimately brings men (so Meyer and others; for a more literal interpretation see Expositor's Greek Testament, in loc.). Elsewhere Jesus speaks of the faithful inheriting 'the kingdom' (Mt 25^{34}), which, in accordance with His general teaching, is not merely already come, but also, and even more, awaits realization in the future. And again, He represents this as synonymous with entering upon 'life eternal' (Mt 25^{46}, cf. Mk 10^{17}), but neither term does He define more fully. In the earlier apostolic writings a similar indeterminateness of usage prevails. In Ja, for example, that which faith inherits is 'the kingdom which God hath promised to them that love Him' (2^5), or again, 'the crown of life' which has been similarly promised (1^{12}), both expressions being employed to denote generally the ultimate full possession of salvation. In 1 P the connexion of ideas is only slightly more elaborate. Here singular stress is laid upon the hope which lies at the heart of faith always. Possession of it is the distinctive note of the Christian life (1^3 3^{15}); it looks towards the Parousia and the 'grace' which shall be 'manifested' then ($1^{7.\ 8.\ 13}$ $5^{1.\ 4}$); and just as it appears to the writer that the 'people of God' has now first, through Christ's death and resurrection, been truly constituted (2^{4-10}), so also he represents their 'inheritance' as now at length fully discovered and secured (1^{3-5}). It has been suggested (by Weiss, NT Theologie, § 50 (c) Anm. 4) that the characterization of the 'inheritance' as 'incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away,' contains a covert allusion to various OT phrases applied to the land of Israel (Is 24^4, Jer 2^7, Is $40^{6ff.}$); and this is possible. But no closer definition of it is given. As synonyms the expressions 'life' (3^7, cf. 4^6) and 'glory' or 'crown of glory' ($5^{1.4.10}$) are employed, but without being explained further

In the hands of two of the NT writers, however, the idea in question receives much fuller treatment. From his peculiar point of view, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews is naturally led to make not a little of a conception which had played so large a part in the world of OT faith (see note on κληρονομία in Westcott's Hebrews, p. 167 f.). That which constitutes the 'inheritance' of the believer is described variously as 'the blessing,' i.e. of the covenant (12^{17}), 'salvation' (negatively, from death and every evil, $2^{14.15}$ 5^7; positively, as the securing of man in his eternal destiny, 2^3 5^9 9^{28}), 'the promises' (6^{12}), and otherwise. But, in order to apprehend the idea as it presents itself to this writer's mind, it must be subsumed under and interpreted in harmony with the general conceptions and argument of the Epistle. Religion with him is regarded in the light of a covenant into which God has graciously entered with men. Essentially this has been one and the same from the beginning, but historically it has embodied itself in two forms, the Sinaitic and that made through Christ, so diverse in various respects that they may be distinguished as the 'first' and 'second' covenants (8^7), of which the earlier proved ineffective and only the later has truly realized the purposes which such an arrangement had in view. In one sense the covenant may be considered as its own end. As signifying a state of relatedness in which God becomes to men their God and they become His people, it stands for that which in itself makes great part of their blessedness, and which is only secured in the 'new covenant' (8^{13}), under the provisions of which the conscience is cleansed from dead works and the worshipper has boldness to enter into the holiest ($9^{14.19}$ etc., compared with $7^{11.18}$ etc.). But chiefly it is regarded as contemplating that which lies beyond itself. In its later form especially, as sealed by a 'better sacrifice' than before (9^{23}), it rests also upon 'better promises' ($8^{6.10-12}$), the fulfilment of which introduces the people once for all into a sphere in which all their hopes and needs are satisfied. Through this 'eternal covenant' (13^{20}) administered by Jesus (9^{15}, where the author, through playing on the double sense of διαθήκη as meaning both 'covenant' and 'testament,' brings the idea of succession, namely on the death of 'the testator,' into view for the moment) believers receive the promise of the eternal inheritance (9^{15}); a consummation otherwise described as reaching the heavenly city (11^{16}) or the city that hath the foundations (11^{10}), or receiving the kingdom that cannot be shaken (12^{28}), or having the world to come subjected to them (2^5 etc.), or entering upon the rest of God. In such expressions the influence of OT modes of thought is obvious, and the last especially forms the subject of a remarkable passage (3. 4) in which the writer betrays almost more fully than anywhere his sense alike of the continuity of salvation under the old covenant and the new, and of the final completeness with which the latter realizes it. When Israel originally entered upon their inheritance and 'possessed the land and dwelt therein,' J", says the historian, 'gave them rest round about according to all that He sware unto their fathers' (Jos $21^{43.44}$). But, as the author of the Epistle recognizes, it proved a delusive rest (4^8). Enemies still infesting the land, war waged from without, civil strife and manifold evils in every age disturbed the condition of peace and blessedness assured to them, and which is here (4^{3-5}) represented as a participation in the deep tranquil satisfaction with which God Himself rests in the enjoyment of the works of His hands. Nevertheless, the divine purpose cannot be defeated (4^6); it can only at most be temporarily suspended, and that which Israel through unbelief ($3^{10.16.17}$ 4^{11}) came short of 'we who believe' (i.e. in the 'good tidings preached unto us,' 4^2) attain to (4^3). To put it otherwise, we 'inherit the promises' (6^{12}) in their full and final expression. As has been said (Davidson, Hebrews, p. 99), 'the mere land of Canaan was never in itself all that was understood either by those to whom it was promised or by God who promised it, when it was named as Israel's heritage. The patriarchs and people certainly looked to the possession of the land, but the idea they attached to it, or the light in which they regarded it, was that of a settled place of abode with God, where He would be fully present, and where they would find repose in His fellowship. All those religious ideas, dimly perhaps, yet in longing and imagination, clustered about it which we now attach to the heavenly world.' And all this it is, hardly to be defined more narrowly, which faith is heir to.

In the usage of St. Paul, again, the 'inheritance' often signifies the object of believing hope generally (Ac 20^{32} 26^{18}, Eph $1^{11.14}$, Col 1^{12} 3^{24}). Also, believers are said to be heirs of 'eternal life' (Tit 3^7), or, more frequently, of 'the kingdom' (1 Co $6^{9.10}$ 15^{50}, Eph 5^5), both expressions being employed in the indeterminate manner common in the Gospels and elsewhere. When he treats of the idea more at large it is in connexion with one or other of two lines of thought. The first of these concerns his anti-Judaic polemic. Quite in the manner of the author of the Ep. to the Hebrews he insists upon the divine 'promises' as lying at the basis of all true faith and hope toward God. The possession of these differentiates the Jew from the Gentile (Ro $3^{2.3}$); the covenants are essentially 'covenants of promise' (Eph 2^{12}); while the entrance of the law itself in the course of their historical fulfilment is to be regarded as a mere episode, by no means designed to supersede the promises, but rather to make more manifest the grace they contain and which bestows the inheritance (Ro 4). The import of the promise, however, is stated as being that Abraham should be 'heir of the world' (v.^{13}), an interpretation of the original covenant expressing in a remarkable way the universal purpose which lay within it. But in this sense the covenant is fulfilled only in Christ (Gal 3^{16}), with whom again, in St. Paul's thinking, believers are indissolubly bound up (Gal 3^9, Ro 4^{16} 8^{17}); and perhaps, although it must be confessed he does not do this explicitly, it is under this point of view that we ought to bring his references to the inheriting of 'the kingdom.' It is Christ who, as Abraham's seed, has in the first instance assumed the rule of the Messianic kingdom (Gal 3^{16}), and believers, as reckoned within that seed (Gal 3^{29}) and called to His fellowship (1 Co 1^9), may be said to share in His rule (1 Co 4^8, Ro 5^{17}), in which, in accordance with Eastern modes of thought, the prerogative of judging is included (1 Co $6^{2.3}$; cf. Mt 19^{28}).

More distinctive of this apostle still, however, is his attaching of the idea in question to that of the sonship of believers. For his doctrine under this head see art. ADOPTION. What is of importance here to note is, that in his view sonship carries with it an indefeasible right to the inheritance—'if sons, then heirs' (Gal 4^7). As Weiss expresses it, 'as justification is the security for life, so its result, adoption, is the security for participation in the divine δόξα as the second chief part of Christian hope in which the whole blessedness and glory of the future eternal life is comprehended in one great view' (Op. cit. § 97 (c)). As Son, Christ is destined to glory, and first through His resurrection attains to it (Ro 1^4); and so also believers, who bear 'the image of the heavenly,' are in the resurrection conformed to the 'likeness of the Son of God,' so that he becomes 'the firstborn among many brethren' (1 Co 15^{49}, Ro 8^{29}). The transformation of the 'body of our humiliation,' accordingly, holds an emphatic place in the inheritance which St. Paul teaches (Ph 3^{21}); while along with this goes a perfect inward assimilation to the mind of the Lord, and beyond it lies that which the apostle describes as 'glory' (see art. under that title), a spiritual condition to which God's children are destined (Ro 8^{30} 9^{23}), in which the mystery of their adoption is finally disclosed (Ro 8^{19}, Col 3^4), in the freedom and blessedness of which creation generally will share (Ro $8^{19ff.}$), and which constitutes the ultimate aim of the divine counsel (1 Co 2^7). Of the inheritance thus conceived, the Spirit, who attests our adoption (Ro 8^{16}), is meanwhile the seal and earnest (Eph 1^{14} 4^{30}).

Finally, in the Apoc. the faithful are said to 'inherit all (or 'these') things' (21^7). What these 'things' consist of is to be gathered from the book generally. Chiefly they appear to embrace 'life'—that life 'which is life indeed' (cf. the recurring representation of the idea in such figures as the 'tree of life' 22^2, the 'water of life' 22^1, the 'crown of life' which the conquerors carry off 2^{10} 3^{11}, the 'book of life' in which their names are written 21^{27} etc.); perfect holiness (2^{17} $3^{4.\ 5}$ 4^4 6^{11} 7^9 19^8); immediate fellowship with God (7^{15} $21^{3.\ 22}$ 22^3), and the vision of His face (22^4). A royal dignity (22^5) and glory (2^{28}) also pertain to that which awaits the believer, along with deliverance from all pain and want and death (7^{16} 21^4). It is a blessedness (14^{13} 19^9 22^{14}) which is complete and eternal. ALEX. MARTIN.

INIQUITY.—See SIN.

INJURIOUS.—Like the Fr. injurieux, 'injurious' formerly had the meaning of 'insulting,' as well as its mod. meaning of 'hurtful.' Hence in Sir 8^{11} and 1 Ti 1^{13} the adj. ὑβριστής which means 'insolent' is tr^{d} in AV 'injurious.' The same adj. occurs in Ro 1^{30}, where AV has 'despiteful,' RV 'insolent.' RV gives 'insolent' in Sir, but retains 'injurious' in 1 Ti. The meaning of the Eng. word may be illustrated from Shaks. II Henry VI. I. iv. 51—

'Injurious duke, that threatest where's no cause and Pope, Iliad, ii. 274—

'Thus with injurious taunts attacked the throne.

The adv. was used in the same sense, as Hall, Works, iii. 966, 'Humane reason is apt to be injuriously saucy, in ascribing those things to an ordinary course of natural causes, which the God of nature doth by supernatural Agents.' And the subst. 'injury,' as Bacon, 'He fell to bitter invectives against the French king, and spake all the injuries he could devise of Charles.'

INK is mentioned once in OT (Jer 36^{18}), where Baruch says that he wrote Jeremiah's prophecies 'with ink (דְּיוֹ, perhaps from a root signifying slowly flowing) in the book.' W. R. Smith (OTJC^{2} 71 n.) refers to Ex 32^{33} and Nu 5^{23} for evidence that the old Hebrew ink (derived from lamp-black [?]) could be washed off, and as the foundation of the Rabbinical prejudice against the use of a mordant in ink. From the bright colours that still survive in some papyri, it is evident that the ink used by the Egyptians must have been of a superior kind. The NT term for 'ink,' occurring three times (2 Co 3^3, 2 Jn ^{12}, 3 Jn ^{13}), is μέλαν (lit. 'black,' Lat. atramentum), which is also a classical term (Plato, Phædr. 276 C; Demos. de Coron. 313. 11; Plut. Mor. 841). See, further, under WRITING.

J. A. SELBIE.

INKHORN.—In one of Ezekiel's visions (Ezk $9^{2.\ 3.\ 11}$) a man appears with a scribe's inkhorn (קֶסֶת הַסֹּפֵר) by his side (lit. 'upon his loins,' בְּמָתְנָיו). The 'inkhorn' consisted of a case for the reed pens, with a cup or bulb for holding the ink, near the upper end of the case. It was carried in the girdle (hence the above expression). See illustration under art. DRESS, vol. i. p. 626^{b}; and cf. Benzinger, Heb. Archäol. 290. J. A. SELBIE.

INN.—Owing to the prevalence of hospitality in the East, down to our own times, the growth of places of public entertainment has been slow; and to this day, save in parts frequented by tourists, anything corresponding to our inn or hotel is entirely unknown (see HOSPITALITY).

The word 'inn' first occurs in our English Bible (AV) in Gn 42^{27} as the equivalent of מָלוֹן, and is similarly employed in Gn 43^{21}, Ex 4^{24} (LXX καταλυμα). In other passages (Jos $4^{3.\ 8}$, 2 K 19^{23}, Is 10^{29}, Jer 9^2) מָלוֹן is rendered 'lodging-place'; and the Revisers have adopted this translation uniformly throughout. This does not imply a building of any kind, but only the place where travellers, or carriers of merchandise, were wont, with their caravans, to pass the night. לוּן or לִין appears to have been used in a sense equivalent to that of the Arab bât, and the corresponding participial, mabît, is a night-lodging. The Arabs also use the word manzil in a similar sense. It is 'the place of alighting,' and is now mainly employed for the house where the traveller spends the night; but it still retains its application to the spot where a company of wayfarers may have spent the hours of darkness. Occasionally one may encounter in the East a scene which probably reproduces the chief features of that mentioned in Gn 42^{27}. Near by a well or fountain, or on the bank of a stream, as the day is closing, the caravan will halt. The bales of goods are lifted from the beasts of burden, and placed so as to shelter the men from the night air. The animals, having been watered, are tethered around, and supplied with fodder which they have carried. The men draw close around a fire, where, having partaken of simple fare from their provender bags, they pass an hour in conversation or in hearing or telling tales, and then lie down under their wraps to sleep till daybreak. The place thus occupied is called el-manzil; the Hebrew would have called it mālōn.

But the development of commerce would necessitate at a very early time some better means of protecting the goods and the lives of the merchants, especially in the more remote and desolate parts, where it might be needful to rest the caravan over night. That buildings were soon erected for this purpose, we have no direct proof; but it is possible that the 'lodging-place of wayfaring men' in the wilderness, referred to in Jer 9^2, may have been such an establishment. Chimham, the son of Barzillai, who returned to Jerusalem with David (2 S 19^{37-40}), is supposed by some to have reared some structure near to Bethlehem, which in Jeremiah's time was known as גֵּרוּת כִּמְהָם Gērūth chimham. AV renders this 'habitation of Chimham'; RV 'Geruth-chimham,' but in margin 'lodging-place.'

Stanley (S. and P. p. 329) and others translate 'inn' or 'hostel.' It may have been such a building as offered shelter to belated merchants or travellers.*

Rahab, described in Jos 2^1 as אִשָּׁה זוֹנָה, is said (but see Dillm. ad loc.) by the Chaldee paraphrase to have been an 'innkeeper.' (See also Jos. Ant. v. i. 2). The instance given in Jebamoth xvi. 7, where the innkeeper's word is not relied on without material corroboration, cannot be quoted as showing that she was regarded with special suspicion (Smith, DB, art. INN), since her evidence is placed on the same level as that of the daughter of a priestly house; but it is significant that Jewish writers seem to have used פונדקית or פונדקיתא, formed from the Greek πανδοκεύτρια, as the equivalent of either 'hostess' or זוֹנָה (David Kimchi on Jos 2^1). The idea of an 'inn' was therefore familiar to them. From Aboda Zara ii. 1 we gather that the פונדק, from the Gr. πανδοχεῖον, was a place where cattle might be sheltered as well as men; it seems to have corresponded in character with the modern khân or caravanserai. Of this order certainly was the 'inn' (πανδοχεῖον, Lk 10^{34}) to which the Good Samaritan carried the victim of outrage, and which by tradition is located at Khan Hadrûr, on the way to Jericho. The modern building is probably only the last of a succession erected on the same spot, as in that wild district the need of some such place of retreat would always be felt. Along the great trade and pilgrimage routes in the course of time these khâns or caravanserais were raised, to which the chains of mouldering ruins that stud the sides of the main highways stand to bear testimony. Many of these buildings stood apart, and were of considerable strength, to guard against marauders. Occasionally, as at Khân et-Tujjâr, under the brow of Tabor, a fortress overlooked and defended the place of rest. From the days when the sea was so infested with pirates as to render navigation perilous, probably date the ruinous buildings on the caravan routes from Aleppo, Baghdâd, Damascus, and Haurân, which met on the southern border of Esdraelon, followed the common path by Antipatris to Gaza, and passed thence to Egypt. When these pests were cleared away, and transport by ship became both safe and cheap, the deserted roads were soon grass-grown, and the khâns were left to crumble (Thomson, Land and Book, i. 106). Those built of old by the Persian magnates on the pilgrimage roads from Baghdâd (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 478) probably resembled in some ways the 'castles' that mark the desert route of the Syrian haj. One great object of the latter is to preserve for the use of the pilgrims the water collected during the rainy season. Provision for pilgrims has long been made on a liberal scale by the Greek and Roman Churches; hospices for their entertainment are found near to most of the holy places the faithful are accustomed to visit. In khân and hospice alike the sojourner furnishes his own food; and he is wise to have also, if possible, his own bedding. The person in charge—the Khânjy (cf. πανδοχεύς of Lk 10^{35})—will supply water to man and horse: nothing more is expected. For this and shelter the natives pay a trifling sum, known as hak el-khân, 'the price of the khân.'

In every town of any size in Syria more than one khân will be found, commonly resorted to by muleteers, in which the traveller's horses and native attendants are accommodated at merely nominal charges. These are often very miserable places, quite unlike the imposing buildings that once fringed the highways. There are, however, several famous khâns which represent them at their best; e.g. that of Antûn Beg in Beyrout, and that of As'ad Pasha in Damascus. The latter is 'one of the finest specimens of Arabian architecture in the country . . . the stone carving above the gateway and around the stalactite vaults is of the most elaborate character.' The khân is constructed of black basalt and white limestone in alternate layers, and is about two hundred feet square. The interior court is about half that size, with a large round fountain in the centre, above which is a lofty dome, resting upon four arches, each supported by four clustered pillars. These are connected with the walls by a series of similar arches and domes—eight in all. Those domes have each sixteen large windows through which light, air, and sunshine penetrate to the rooms and the court below. Around the sides are vaulted magazines of various sizes, for the disposal of merchandise of every description at wholesale.

'On either side of the main entrance a staircase leads up to an arched corridor, which extends quite around the building and communicates with the small retail shops and offices of the merchants. It forms a fine promenade, from where one can look down on the strange and truly Oriental scene in the court below, free from the noise and confusion which there characterize each commercial transaction, large or small. To Khân As'ad Pasha come caravans from Baghdâd, Mosul, Aleppo, Beyrout, and elsewhere. On entering, the muleteers and camel-drivers, with mighty din and uproar, throw down their loads of merchandise in this court, and here they must remain until the owners settle with the custom-house officials' (Thomson, Land and Book, iii. 373, 374). With this corresponds Lane's description of the Wakâlehs in Cairo (Mod. Egyp. ed. 1895, p. 325).

The ordinary khân was, however, a hollow square, open above, with arches round one or more of the sides within, and over these a series of rooms, approached by a stone stair. The rooms are for travellers; muleteers, animals, and baggage share the space and arches below. In the opinion of the present writer, this must be distinguished from the κατάλυμα or guest chamber, in which the parents of Jesus sought shelter when they reached Bethlehem (Lk 2^7). The meaning of this word in the NT may be gathered from a reference to Mk 14^{14}, Lk 22^{11}, taken in the light of a prevailing Jewish custom. These two passages concern a room in a private house, which the owner readily places at the disposal of Jesus and His disciples for the celebration of the Passover. This was in accordance with the ordinary practice. At the festivals of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles the people were commanded to repair to Jerusalem; and it was a boast of the Rabbis, that, notwithstanding the enormous crowds, no man could truthfully say to his fellow, 'I have not found a fire where to roast my paschal lamb in Jerusalem,' or 'I have not found a bed in Jerusalem to lie in,' or 'My lodging is too strait in Jerusalem' (Aboth R. Nathan, cap. 34, quoted by Lightfoot, Works, ed. 1825, ix. p. 128). The vast numbers who came for the Passover from all parts were made free of the needed apartments, as far as the capacity of the houses permitted; and for this no payment was taken. It was, however, customary for the guests on departing to leave the skins of the paschal lambs, and the vessels which had been employed in the ceremonies, in token of gratitude for their hospitable entertainment (Talm. Bab. Joma, fol. 12. 1, quoted by Lightfoot, Works, xi. p. 325; compare also use of verb καταλύω in Lk 9^{12} 19^7). We may reasonably suppose that on such an occasion as the great enrolment, when natives of a town came from afar, the 'guest chambers' of their friends would be thrown open to receive them. Joseph, arriving late, found that in which he had purposed to stay already occupied; and no room elsewhere being available, he betook himself with his charge to the khân. Even this apparently

* Instead of גֵּרוֹת, however, there are weighty reasons for reading גְּדֵרוֹת 'pens or folds.' So Josephus and Aquila, followed by Hitzig and others.

* Κατάλυμα is used, however, in Ex 4^{24} to translate מָלוֹן.

was full; possibly some of the animals were moved to afford them space; and here Jesus was born.

Well-organized and equipped hotels are now to be found at the principal seaports of Egypt and Syria, and also in the chief inland towns. Along the more frequented roads the natives have learned that something may be gained by accommodating travellers; but remote from the main routes the ancient conditions prevail.

LITERATURE.—Thomson, Land and Book; Lane, Modern Egyptians; Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, ed. 1877, pp. 163, 529; Farrar, Life of Christ; Baedeker, Palestine and Syria, ed. 1894, pp. 163, 318, etc.; Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 478; Doughty, Arabia Deserta Lightfoot, Works, ed. 1825, ix. p. 128, etc., xi. p. 325, etc. W. EWING.

INNER MAN or INWARD MAN.—An expression, the exact force of which depends on the contrast intended where it occurs. In 2 Co 4^{16} the contrast is between the 'outward man' (ὁ ἔξω ἡμῶν ἄνθρωπος) as mortal and perishable, and the 'inward' as spiritual and immortal; where note, that the Revisers' Greek, with WH and others, reads ὁ ἔσω ἡμῶν (instead of ὁ ἔσωθεν, TR), which exactly corresponds with the former member of the antithesis. Not very remote from this is the contrast in 1 P $3^{3.4}$ between the 'outward adorning' (ὁ ἔξωθεν κόσμος) and 'the hidden man of the heart.'

But the two peculiarly Pauline passages are Ro 7^{22} and Eph 3^{16}, where κατὰ τὸν ἔσω ἄνθρωπον and εἰς τὸν ἔσω ἄνθρωπον are used of something very closely akin to the 'new nature' or the 'renewed man.' The contrast in Ro 7^{22} is of the 'inward man' or of the 'mind' (νοῦς, v.^{23}), with 'the flesh' or 'the law of sin in the members.' In Eph 3^{16} there is no direct antithesis, but a single and positive reference to the new nature, or, at least, to the seat of the Spirit's indwelling and working, to which the corresponding expression in v.^{17} is 'that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith.' It is possible in both passages to distinguish between the 'inward man' and the new or regenerate nature, but only in the sense that the former is the inner or higher self in man as acted on by divine grace, enlightened by God's law, and under preparation and discipline for salvation. Cremer holds that what is really meant by these expressions is not the mere contrast between the inward and the outward in man, between the invisible and the visible, the reality and the appearance, but the inner, spiritual, divine nature in antagonism to the flesh. 'Inward man,' upon this construction, would answer very nearly to πνεῦμα when that word is used in the special sense of (e.g.) Ro 8^{10}, for the 'new nature,' i.e. the spirit of man renewed and sustained by the Spirit of God. Thus the phrase must be reckoned as belonging to an entirely NT cycle of ideas—indeed to one almost exclusively Pauline.

INORDINATE.—'Inordinate love' is the clumsy tr^{n} in Ezk 23^{11} of עַגְבָּה, a word which occurs only there, and means 'lust' (RV 'doting'); and 'inordinate affection' in Col 3^{5} of πάθος (RV 'passion'). The former tr^{n} comes from Cov. (Wyc. 'lecherie') and the latter from the Bishops' Bible (Wyc. 'leccherie,' Tind. 'unnatural lust,' Gen. 'wantounes,' Rhem. 'lust'). Inordinate is ill-regulated, ungoverned, as Bacon, Essays, 'Of Love' (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 36), 'the former was indeed a voluptuous Man and Inordinate, but the latter was an Austere and wise man'; and Shaks. Othello, II. iii. 311—'Every inordinate cup is unblessed, and the ingredient is a devil.' Wyc. uses the adv. in 2 Th 3^{5} 'withdrawe you fro ech brother wandrynge unordynatly'; and Latimer, Sermons (Arber's ed. p. 99), 'I heare saye ye walke inordinatelye, ye talke unsemelye other wayes then it becommeth Christian subjectes.' J. HASTINGS.

INQUISITION.—To make inquisition is to make investigation, to search, Dt 19^{18}, Est 2^{23}, Ps 9^{12}, 2 Es 6^{19}, Wis 1^{9} 6^{3} (RV), Sir 23^{24}. In Sir 41^{4} the phrase is 'There is no inquisition in the grave' (οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν ᾅδου ἐλεγμὸς ζωῆς, RV 'There is no inquisition of life in the grave,' RVm 'in Hades'), that is, no inquiry is made there how long or short a man's life has been. Coverdale uses the word in Job 10^{6} 'Are thy dayes as the dayes of man, and thy yeares as mans yeares? that thou makest soch inquisicion for my wickednesse, and searchest out my synne?' and 35^{15} 'Then useth he no violence in his wrath nether hath he pleasure in curious and depe inquisicions.' And Fuller (Holy Warre, iii. 23, p. 150), in memory of Ps 9^{12}, says, 'But no doubt God, when he maketh inquisition for bloud, will one day remember this bloudy Inquisition.'

INSECTS.—See NATURAL HISTORY.

INSPIRE, INSPIRATION.—To 'inspire' is literally to 'breathe into,'* and that is the meaning of the word in its single occurrence in AV, Wis 15^{11} 'Forasmuch as he knew not his Maker, and him that inspired into him an active soul, and breathed in a living spirit' (τὸν ἐμπνεύσαντα αὐτῷ ψυχὴν ἐνεργοῦσαν, καὶ ἐμφυσήσαντα πνεῦμα ζωτικόν); Vulg. 'qui inspiravit illi animam quæ operatur, et qui insufflavit ei spiritum vitalem.' Wyc. has 'enspirede' here, but in other places he uses the simple 'spire'=breathe, as Gn 2^{7} 'The Lord God thanne fourmede man of the slyme of the erthe, and spiride in to the face of hym an entre [=entrance] of breth of lijf' (1388 'brethide'). All the other versions have in the passage just quoted from Wyc. 'breathed the breath,' and it is probably in memory of the Vulg. 'inspiravit in faciem ejus spiraculum vitæ' that Bacon (Essays, 'Of Truth,' p. 3) has 'First he breathed Light upon the Face of the Matter or Chaos; then he breathed Light into the Face of Man; and still he breatheth and inspireth Light into the Face of his Chosen'; and Milton, PL x. 785—

> 'Yet one doubt
> Pursues me still, lest all I cannot die;
> Lest that pure breath of life, the spirit of Man
> Which God inspired, cannot together perish
> With this corporeal clod.'

Cf. also Judgement of the Synode at Dort, p. 40, 'So then faith is the gift of God; not in that it is profered by God unto man's free-will, but because it is really bestowed, inspired, and infused into man.' Then the word passes into the meaning of 'fill with the spirit,' which we see in Knox, Works, iii. 99, 'Happie is the man whome thow sall inspyre, O Lord'; and in Tindale's tr^{n} of Mk 12^{36} 'for David him selfe inspyred with the holy goost, sayde.'

Inspiration occurs twice in AV: (1) Job 32^{8} 'But there is a spirit in man: and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding'; Heb. נִשְׁמַת שַׁדַּי; Vulg. 'Inspiratio Omnipotentis'; Wyc. 1382 'the inbrething of the Almyghti,' 1388 'the enspiryng ether revelacioun of Almyghti God'; so Cov. has 'inspiration,' and is followed by all the versions except RV 'the breath of the Almighty,' which agrees with LXX πνοή, and with AV in 33^{4} for the same Heb. 'The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life.' The reference is to Gn 2^{7}. (2) 2 Ti 3^{16} 'All scripture is given by inspiration

* The literal meaning is well seen in Spenser, FQ II. iii. 30—

> 'Her yellowe lockes, crisped like golden wyre,
> About her shoulders weren loosely shed,
> And, when the winde emongst them did inspyre,
> They waved like a penon wyde dispred,
> And low behinde her backe were scattered.'

of God, and is profitable for doctrine'; Gr. πᾶσα γραφὴ θεόπνευστος καὶ ὠφέλιμος; RV 'Every Scripture inspired of God is also profitable.' For the doctrine of the Inspiration of the Bible see under art. BIBLE, vol. i. p. 296. For this passage, reference may be made (besides the commentaries) to Perowne in Expos. Times, ii. 54; Warfield in Pres. Quarterly, July, 1889, pp. 389–406 (with Old and New Test. Student, Oct. 1889, ix. 245); Row, BL 454; Drummond, Hib. Lect. 77 f.; and Cremer, s.v. θεόπνευστος. The construction of the sentence in RV is the oldest Eng. construction: thus Wyc. 'al scripture onspired of god, is profitable,' Tind. 'al scripture geven by inspiracion of god, is profittable,' so Coverdale and the Great Bible. The Gen. Bible is the first to offer 'the whole Scripture is geven by spiration of God, and is profitable.' Tindale elsewhere uses the word in the same sense of a person, as Lk 2^{27} 'And he [Simeon] came by inspiracion in to the temple.' J. HASTINGS.

INSTANT.—Instant (in-stare, stand upon, press upon) is used in AV in the sense of the present immediate time, as Is 29^5 'it shall be at an instant suddenly'; and as an adj. in the sense of 'pressing,' 'urgent': so Lk 23^{23} 'And they were instant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified' (ἐπέκειντο; Vulg. instabant, which gave Rhem. 'were instant,' whence AV; Amer. RV 'were urgent'); Ro 12^{12} 'continuing instant in prayer' (again from Rhem., Vulg. instantes, Gr. προσκαρτεροῦντες, RV 'continuing stedfastly'); and 2 Ti 4^2 'be instant in season, out of season' (ἐπίστηθι, Vulg. insta, Bishops 'be instant,' Rhem. 'urge'). Cf. Knox, Hist. 36, 'At their instant suit, more than of his own motion, was Thomas Gwilliame, a black Frier, called to bee Preacher'; and Ac 6^4 Rhem. 'But we wil be instant in praier and the ministerie of the word.'

Instantly in AV means 'urgently,' Lk 7^4 'they besought him instantly' (σπουδαίως; Vulg, sollicite; 'instantly' is Tindale's word here; RV 'earnestly'); and Ac 26^7 'Unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come' (ἐν ἐκτενείᾳ, AV again from Tind., RV 'earnestly'). Cf. Tind. Prol. to Pent. 'It is not ynough therfore to read and talke of it only, but we must also desyre god daye and night instantly to open oure eyes, and to make us understond and feale wherfore the scripture was geven'; and his tr^n of Mk 5^{10} 'And he prayd him instantly, that he wolde not sende them awaye out of the countre,' where AV follows Rhem. 'he besought him much.' So Cranmer has 'very instantly' in Works, i. 77, 'which prior and his brethren . . . have desired me very instantly to be a mediator for them to your Most Noble Majesty'; and Melvill, Diary, 171, 'In the mean tyme, the Erles of Angus and Mar, lyand at Newcastell, wryttes for me ans, and the second tyme verie instantlie, to com and pretche the Word unto tham for ther comfort.' The Rhem. NT uses 'instance' in the same sense in Eph 6^{18} 'watching in al instance and supplication.' Shakespeare has both adj. and adv. frequently, but always with reference to time.

J. HASTINGS.

INSTRUMENT.—In the current sense of the means of accomplishing anything 'instrument' frequently occurs in OT, chiefly as tr. of kĕlî. In NT it is found but twice, both in Ro 6^{13} and in the same sense, 'Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God.' The Gr. is ὅπλα, the ordinary word for 'weapons' (as AVm and RVm), and it is very doubtful if in NT it ever means 'instruments.' Besides, the military metaphor was more natural to St. Paul, and it reappears in v.^{23} 'the wages ('your pay as soldiers'—Sanday) of sin is death.' Then the meaning is as Lightfoot expresses it (Notes on Epistles of St. Paul), 'Sin is regarded as a sovereign who demands the military service of subjects, levies their quota of arms, and gives them their soldiers' pay of death.' Moule hits happily on 'implements,' which is capable of either interpretation, but he also regards the metaphor as a military one.

In To 7^{14} and 1 Mac 13^{42} 'instrument' has the legal sense of a 'deed.' The Gr. is general, συγγραφή, a document.

For Instruments of Music see MUSIC.

J. HASTINGS.

INTELLIGENCE.—Dn 11^{30} 'He shall even return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant.' The meaning is more than mutual understanding, it is 'communication,' 'intercourse.' So Knox, Hist. 186, 'The Queene did grievously complaine, that we had intelligence with England'; and Drayton, Pierce Gaveston—

> 'From whence I found a secret means, to have > Intelligence with my kind lord the king.'

The Heb., however (יָבִין עַל), means simply 'give heed to'; RV 'have regard unto.' The Eng. word occurs also in 2 Mac 3^9 in the ordinary sense of 'information,' which is the word preferred by RV. J. HASTINGS.

INTEMPERANCE.—See DRUNKENNESS.

INTEND, INTENT.—To intend is used by Spenser in the lit. sense of the Lat. intendere, to stretch out: FQ I. xi. 38—

> 'The same advancing high above his head,
> With sharpe intended sting so rude him smot,
> That to the earth him drove, as stricken dead.'

But in AV it is used only in the sense of directing the will to an object. This is sometimes no more than the formation of a design, as in modern use. So Ac 5^{35} 20^{13} (μέλλω). But sometimes it is the determination of the will, a fixed resolve, as Ac 5^{28} 12^4 (βούλομαι), Lk 14^{28} (θέλω). Cf. Gal 1^7 Tind. 'ther be some which trouble you, and intende to pervert the gospell of Christ' (θέλοντες μεταστρέψαι). The word is even used in the sense of pursuing a resolution (as distinguished from merely forming it). Thus in Jos 22^{33} it is said that after an explanation from the eastern tribes 'the children of Israel blessed God, and did not intend to go up against them in battle,' where the meaning of AV is no doubt as explained by Davies (Bible English, 194), that they had intended in our sense of the word but no longer prosecuted the design. Cf. Latimer, Sermons, i. 342, 'The devil sleepeth not; he ever intendeth to withdraw us from prayer'; Knox, Works, iii. 297, 'Howe these my wordes at that tyme pleased men, the crymes and action intended agaynste me dyd declare'; and Chapman, Homer's Iliads, viii. 80—

> 'Stay, let us both intend
> To drive this cruel enemy from our dear aged friend.'

This verb is now rarely used with a direct object. In AV we find Ps 21^{11} 'For they intended evil against thee' (וַיַּטּוּ 'they stretched'; Perowne, either 'they have spread against thee evil,' like a net, Lat. tendere insidias; or 'they have bent against thee,' etc., like a bow, Lat. tendere arcum; Del. 'cause evil to impend over thee,' so Cheyne; Wellh.-Furness, 'When they revolve evil against thee'; King, 'Though they plotted evil against thee'); Ad. Est 13^4 (κατευθύνω); 2 Mac 14^5 'being . . . asked how the Jews stood affected and what they intended' (ἐν τίνι διαθέσει καὶ βουλῇ καθέστηκαν, RV 'what they pur-posed'); and 14[8] 'even for that I intend the good of mine own countrymen' (καὶ τῶν ἰδίων πολιτῶν στοχασάμενος, RV 'I have regard also to mine own fellow-citizens'). So Knox, Hist. 25, 'And thus did those cruell beasts intend nothing but murther in all the quarters of this Realme.'

Intent is always purpose, intention, as in Tindale, Expositions, p. 96 (on Mt 6[14-18]), 'But and if thou think that God delighteth in the work for the work itself, the true intent away, and in thy pain for thy pain itself, thou art as far out of the way as from heaven to the earth'; and p. 147 (on 1 Jn 1[3]), 'To bring unto the fellowship of God and Christ, is the final intent of all the scripture.' So Jer 44[25] Cov. 'Purposely have ye set up youre owne good meanynges, and hastely have ye fulfilled youre owne intente'; and Knox, Hist. 149, 'They were minded to keep no point of the promise longer than they had obtained their intent.' The phrase in AV is usually 'to the intent that,' but the plural occurs Jer 30[24] 'until he have performed the intents of his heart' (מְזִמּוֹת לִבּוֹ); He 4[12] 'a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart' (κριτικὸς . . . ἐννοιῶν καρδίας). Fuller says of the Crusaders (Holy Warre, I. xii. p. 18), 'We must in charitie allow that many of them were truly zealous, and went with pious intents'; and on p. 243 (v. 9), 'Farre be it from us to condemn all their works to be drosse, because debased and alloyed with superstitious intents.'

INTERCESSION.—See PRAYER.

INTERMEDDLE (from Old Fr. entre among and medler to mix) meant formerly either literally to mix, as Malory, Morte Darthur, xvii. 15, 'Right so entered he into the chamber, and came toward the table of silver; and when he came nigh he felt a breath that him thought it was intermeddled with fire'; and Hakluyt, Voyages, i. 572, 'He hath intermedled in his historie certaine things contrary to the trueth'; or else figuratively to have to do with, take an interest in, which is the meaning in AV. It occurs twice, Pr 14[10] 'The heart knoweth his own bitterness; and a stranger doth not intermeddle with his joy' (יִתְעָרַב, takes part in, shares, not necessarily interferes in; LXX ἐπιμίγνυται; Vulg. 'miscebitur'); and 18[1] 'Through desire a man, having separated himself, seeketh and intermeddleth with all wisdom' (בְּכָל־תּוּשִׁיָּה יִתְגַּלָּע, RV 'rageth against all sound wisdom,' RVm 'quarrelleth with'; Del. 'Against all that is beneficial he showeth his teeth'; Oxf. Heb. Lex. 'bursts out in strife against.' AV misunderstands the meaning, and takes the verb in a good sense, 'have to do with,' 'take an interest in,' after the tr. of the Gen. Bible, 'For the desire thereof he wil separate him self to seke it, and occupie him self in all wisdome,' with its margin, 'He that loveth wisdome, wil separate him self from all impediments, and give him self wholly to seke it').

INTERMEDIATE STATE.—See ESCHATOLOGY.

INTERPRETATION.—This subst. and its verb are used in Scripture in a variety of senses.

1. Of dreams (פִּתֶּר 'interpret,' פִּתָּרוֹן 'interpretation'); the dreams of the chief butler and the chief baker, Gn 40[5. 8. 12. 16. 18. 22] 41[11. 12. 13]; Pharaoh's dream, 41[8. 15]; Gideon's dream, Jg 7[15] (where the word for 'interpretation' is the ἅπ. λεγ. שִׁבֶּר, lit. 'breaking up,' i.e. 'solution'). In Dn occur the Aramaic forms פְּשַׁר (verb) 'interpret' (Qal in Dn 5[16], Pael ptcp. מְפַשַּׁר 5[12]), and פֶּשֶׁר (noun) 'interpretation'; used of the dreams of Nebuchadnezzar (Dn 2[4ff.] 4[6]), of Daniel himself (7[16]); cf. the use of the same word for the interpretation to Belshazzar of the writing on the wall (5[7ff.]), and the similar use of פֶּשֶׁר in Ec 8[1] (only).

Dreams being regarded as vehicles of divine communication and frequently as portending future events, it became a matter of great importance to discover their interpretation. This function was discharged at the court of Egypt by the חַרְטֻמִּים 'sacred scribes' (Gn 41[8]; cf. the complaint of the butler and the baker, while in prison, 'We have dreamed a dream, and there is none that can interpret it,' 40[8]). With the reply of Joseph (ib.), 'Do not interpretations belong to God?' compare the statement of Herodotus (ii. 83) regarding the Egyptian opinion, Ἀνθρώπων μὲν οὐδενὶ προσκέεται ἡ τέχνη, τῶν δὲ θεῶν μετεξετέροισι. The 'wise men' and 'Chaldæans' (the latter by a late conception) have similar functions attributed to them, in the Book of Daniel, at the court of Babylon.

2. Of interpreting a foreign language. Egyptian being, of course, the language of the court, the conversation between Joseph and his brethren was carried on by the medium of an interpreter, who was probably always expected to be in attendance at court (Gn 42[23] הַמֵּלִיץ with art. 'the interpreter'). The interpreter being between (בֵּינֹתָם ib.) the two parties, מֵלִיץ can be used as = 'ambassador' (2 Ch 32[31]) or 'mediator' (Is 43[27], of prophets standing between J" and Israel; Job 33[23], of an angel as interpreting to man God's providential treatment of him and what is right for him to do [Davidson], probably also as interceding for man to God [Dillmann, Siegfried-Stade]). הֵלִיץ and its derivatives (cf. קְלִיצָה in Hab 2[6], 'taunt-song') have always the sense of deriding or taunting except in the four above-cited passages, Gn 42[-3], 2 Ch 32[31], Is 43[27], Job 33[23] (contrast 16[20]), and in Pr 1[6] where מְלִיצָה (LXX σκοτεινὸς λόγος) probably means 'a dark saying' (RV 'a figure') rather than 'interpretation' (AV, RVm).

In Ezr 4[7] the passive ptcp. מְתֻרְגָּם is used of a translation from Persian into Aramaic. From this root comes the well-known word Targum ('paraphrase') as well as the designation meturgeman applied to the official in the synagogue, who was required to translate the Hebrew (which was read to, but no longer understood by, the people) into the Aramaic vernacular. Latterly, in addition to translating the sacred text, the meturgeman was wont to add all manner of Haggāda to it (W. R. Smith, OTJC[2] 36, 64 n., 154).

In NT we have the familiar phrase 'which is, being interpreted,' etc. (μεθερμηνευόμενος, ὃ ἑρμηνεύεται, διερμηνευόμενος, ὁ μεθερμηνεύεται), where a Heb. or Aram. expression is rendered into Greek (Mt 1[23], Mk 5[41] 15[22. 34], Jn 1[38. 41] etc. Ac 9[36] 13[8]), a symbolical force being also sometimes discovered in it (Jn 1[42] 9[7], Ac 4[36], He 7[2]).

Although it scarcely falls within the scope of the present article, the reference of Papias (ap. Eusebius, HE iii. 39) to St. Mark as the 'interpreter' (ἑρμηνευτής) of St. Peter may be mentioned (see MARK). Link (SK, 1896, Heft iii. p. 405 ff.; cf. Expos. Times, Aug. 1896, p. 496) contends strongly that 'interpreter' here is to be understood in its strictly literal sense, implying that the Apostle Peter, in his missionary journeys among the Jews of the Diaspora, availed himself of St. Mark's services to render Aramaic into Greek.

3. Of interpreting the utterances of those who spoke with tongues. This was a 'gift' (χάρισμα) which might or might not belong to the speaker with tongues himself (1 Co 12[10. 30] 14[5. 13. 26. 27. 28]). See CHURCH, vol. i. p. 428[b], and TONGUES (GIFT OF).

4. Considerable uncertainty attaches to the meaning of the word 'interpretation' in 2 P 1[20] (γινώσκοντες ὅτι πᾶσα προφητεία γραφῆς ἰδίας ἐπι- λύσεως οὐ γίνεται, 'knowing that no prophecy of Scripture is of private interpretation'; cf. the use of ἐπιλύειν in Mk 4^{34} and Ac 19^{39}). All the varieties of explanation may be grouped under two heads, according as the 'interpretation' is (a) ours or (b) the prophet's own. Both the context and the very similar language of Philo (Quis rer. div. hær. p. 52) plead in favour of the second explanation. Grimm, indeed (Clavis, s. γίγνομαι), supports the first, taking the meaning to be that no one can by his own mental powers explain the prophecies of the OT, but that he requires the aid of the same spirit which originally called forth their utterance. But this true conception seems hardly in place here. See further Alford, ad loc., and Farrar (Early Days of Christianity, 119 n.), who takes the meaning to be that 'the prophets did not speak by spontaneous knowledge and spoke more than they could themselves interpret . . . If this utterance is not his own, his interpretation may also well be inadequate (cf. 1 P 1^{10-12}).'

For interpretation of prophecy see PROPHECY.

The history of the various schemes, Jewish and Christian, for interpreting Scripture, the supposed double sense, the allegorizing method once so much in vogue, etc., lie outside the scope of this article. For details, the reader must refer to works on Rabbinical Theology and on Hermeneutics.

INTREAT, ENTREAT.—In the edd. of AV since 1760 'entreat' has the meaning of 'deal with,' 'handle' (mod. 'treat'), and 'intreat' of 'beg,' 'pray.' But they are different spellings of the same verb (fr. Lat. in-tractare, through Fr. entraiter), and in 1611 the spelling was indifferently 'entreat' or 'intreat.'

In the sense of treat, 'entreat' occurs in AV 1611 eleven times, 'intreat' twelve times; in the sense of pray, 'entreat' occurs eleven times, 'intreat' twenty-eight times. In Job 19^{16} we find 'I intreated him with my mouth,' but in the next verse 'I entreated for the children's sake.' Again in Jer 15^{11} we read, 'I will cause the enemie to intreat thee well in the time of evill,' while the marg. has 'Or, I will entreat the enemie for thee.' The subst. is found once 'intreaty' (Pr 18^{23}), once 'entreaty' (2 Co 8^{4}), both meaning 'petition.'

1. To entreat is simply to 'deal with,' 'handle,' any person or thing, as Hos 6^{4} Cov., 'O Ephraim, what shal I do unto the? O Iuda, how shall I intreate the?' More, Utopia (Lumby's ed. p. 69), 'Ther com yearly to Amaurote out of every cytie iii. old men wyse and well experienced, there to entreate and debate, of the common matters of the land.' But in AV the word is used in this sense only with an adv., 'well,' 'evil,' 'spitefully,' 'shamefully,' and once in a good sense, 'courteously,' Ac 27^{3}.

2. To intreat is to 'beseech'; but in older Eng. the word had also the meaning of 'beseech successfully,' 'persuade.' Thus Shaks. As You Like It, I. ii. 135, 'since the youth will not be entreated, his own peril on his forwardness.' In this sense 'intreat' is evidently used in AV, as Gn 25^{21} 'And Isaac intreated the LORD for his wife . . . and the LORD was intreated of him.' So 2 S 21^{14} 24^{25}, 1 Ch 5^{20}, 2 Ch $33^{13.\ 19}$, Ezr 8^{23}, Is 19^{22}. The Heb. is always the reflex. (Niph.) of עָתַר, 'âthar (as Gn 25^{21} וַיֵּעָתֶר לוֹ), which in Arabic is 'to slaughter or sacrifice' (Lane, see also Buhl s.v., and esp. We.), but in Heb. is used with the more general sense of 'supplicate' in the reflex. 'to let oneself be supplicated,' 'be persuaded,' so that 'be intreated' was an exceedingly happy rendering. In Ja 3^{17}, 'easy to be intreated' (εὐπειθής, not elsewhere in NT), the meaning is the same. The tr. is Tindale's; Wyc. has 'able to be counceilid,' Rhem. 'suasible.'

J. HASTINGS.

INWARD, INWARDS.—Inward means: 1. Towards the inside, as 2 S 5^{9} 'And David built round about from Millo and inward' (פְּנִימָה); 2 Ch 3^{13} 'The wings of these cherubims spread themselves forth twenty cubits: and they stood on their feet, and their faces were inward' (לַבַּיִת; RV [as AVm] 'toward the house,' RVm 'inward'); Ezk 40^{9} 'the porch of the gate was inward' (מִקָּדִים, RV 'toward the house'). 2. As an adj. inward has two meanings: (1) Interior, as in Bacon, Essays, 'Of Building,' p. 184, 'Beyond this Court let there be an Inward Court, of the same Square and Height'; Bunyan, Holy War, p. 133, 'The Gaoler, therefore, having received such a charge, put them all in the inward prison'; and Shaks. Cymb. III. iv. 6—

> 'Wherefore breaks that sigh
> From the inward of thee?'

The Heb. kerebh, a subst. of frequent occurrence and variously translated (but of which the general meaning is well seen in Ps 103^{1} בְּקִרְבִּי 'all that is within me'), is rendered by 'inward part' or 'parts' in Ps 5^{9}, Is 16^{11}, Jer 31^{33} (see also Gn 41^{21} AVm); and by 'inward thought' in Ps 49^{11} 64^{6}, where the meaning is almost 'secret,' as in Bacon, Advancement of Learn. II. xxiii. 48, 'The government of the soul in moving the body is inward and profound.' 'Inward parts' is the tr^{n} also of ṭûḥôth (parts covered) in Job 38^{36} (but see Davidson and RVm), Ps 51^{6}; and of ḥădârîm (chambers) in Pr $20^{27.\ 30}$, RV 'innermost parts.' Inward has the same meaning of 'interior' in 2 Mac 3^{16} 'the changing of his colour declared the inward agony of his mind' (Gr. simply ἀγωνία, RV 'distress'). And in NT there occurs 'the inward man,' Ro 7^{22}, 2 Co 4^{16} (ὁ ἔσω ἄνθρωπος, i.e. the conscience or reason, as opposed to the body (ὁ ἔξω ἄνθρωπος, 2 Co 4^{16}; see INNER MAN), a phrase used also by Shaks. in Hamlet, II. ii. 6—

> 'Something have you heard
> Of Hamlet's transformation; so I call it,
> Since not the exterior nor the inward man > Resembles that it was.'

And Pericles, II. ii. 57—

> 'Opinion's but a fool, that makes us scan
> The outward habit by the inward man.'

We also find in 2 Co 7^{15} the phrase 'inward affection' as the tr^{n} of σπλάγχνα, a tr^{n} which comes from Tindale, and is accepted by all the Eng. VSS except Rhem. 'bowels.' Wyc. 1380 has 'entraylis,' 1388 'inwardnesse.' (2) But the adj. 'inward' means intimate in Job 19^{19} 'All my inward friends abhorred me' (אַנְשֵׁי סוֹדִי, lit. as RVm 'all the men of my council'). Davidson calls the AV tr^{n} 'a fine expression,' and adds, 'the reference is to such as his three friends, men whose high converse and fellowship seemed to Job, as a thoughtful godly man, something almost better than relationship, Ps 55^{14}.' Fuller uses the word in the same sense in Holy Warre, ii. 37 (p. 92), 'the Caliph himself . . . having few of his most inward eunuchs about him'; and Evelyn, Diary, July 22, 1674, 'He was . . . so inward with my Lord Obrien that, after a few moneths of that gentleman's death, he married his widow'; and Shaks. has it not only as an adj. Rich. III. III. iv. 8, 'Who is most inward with the noble duke?' but also as a subst., Meas. for Meas. III. ii. 138, 'I was an inward of his.'

Inwards never occurs in AV or RV as an adv., but always as a subst., and the tr^{n} of kerebh, bowels. See next article and SACRIFICE. In Shaks. II Henry IV. IV. iii. 115, it is used generally of the inner parts of the body, 'The second property of your excellent sherris is, the warming of the blood; which, before cold and settled, left the liver white and pale, which is the badge of pusillanimity and cowardice; but the sherris warms it, and makes it course from the inwards to the parts extreme'; but more particularly of the bowels, in Othello, II. i. 306—

'The thought whereof
Doth like a poisonous mineral gnaw my inwards.'

J. HASTINGS.

INWARDS, INWARD PARTS. — 'Inwards,' representing קֶרֶב, is repeatedly used in AV of Ex and Lv as equivalent to 'entrails.' 'Inward parts' is used in a much wider application throughout the OT, and represents not only קֶרֶב of the original, but several other words, as מֵעִים, כְּלָיוֹת, טֶחוֹת, סִתְרֵי־בָטֶן, and לֵב. The phrase is used in two broadly distinct applications—(1) in the literal or corporeal, (2) in the tropical or psychical.

1. Examples of the literal sense are Gn 41^{21}, where 'eaten them up' is rendered in AVm 'come to the inward parts' (אֶל־קִרְבָּנָה); 1 K 17^{21}, where 'let the child's soul come to him again' is on the margin 'into his inward parts' (עַל־קִרְבּוֹ).

2. Examples of the tropical application for the 'inward' or 'hidden' in character contrasted with the 'outward' or 'manifest' are Ps 5^{9} 62^{4} (Heb. ^{5}), mouth or outward expression (פֶּה) contrasted with thoughts (קֶרֶב); Ps 64^{6} (Heb. ^{7}), where קֶרֶב and לֵב are put for the concealed elements of character. In Is 16^{11} both מֵעִים and קֶרֶב are used metaphorically of the divine compassions. In Jer 31^{33} קֶרֶב and לֵב are used of the inward nature of man as the seat of a divine renewal.

Several familiar examples of the phrase for the 'secrets of the human soul' threaten to disappear from our Bibles under the effect of modern alterations in reading and rendering, e.g. Ps 49^{11} 'Their inward thought is that their houses,' etc., by the transposition of two letters (קִרְבָּם for קִבְרָם), becomes 'Their graves are their houses,' a reading supported by Sept. Pesh. Targ. and adopted by most modern scholars (RVm); Job 38^{36}, where בַּטְּחוֹת 'inward parts' can be rendered 'dark clouds,' and the parallel word for 'mind,' 'meteors' (see RVm); Ps 51^{6} (Heb.^{8}), where Wellhausen (following Hitzig) holds that the consonants בטחות represent, not the noun טֶחוֹת and preposition בְּ, but a derivative of the verb בטח, and accordingly renders 'Faith and trust, it is these Thou lovest ('Psalms' in Polychrome Bible, Lond. 1898). See, further, Cheyne in Expositor, Aug. 1898, p. 83 ff.

In the NT the phrase, represented by τὸ ἔσωθεν, is used only in Mt 7^{15} and Lk 11^{39} in the unfavourable sense for inward wickedness. The other use of inner or inward man in relation to the renewed nature is almost wholly Pauline. See INNER MAN.

J. LAIDLAW.

IOB (יוֹב, AV Job).—The third son of Issachar, Gn 46^{13}. Job (יוֹב) appears to be a textual error for Jashub (יָשׁוּב) of the parallel passages Nu 26^{24}, 1 Ch 7^{1}, which is read by Sam. Pent. and Pesh. even in Gn, and is supported by LXX Ἰασούφ, Luc. Ἰασούβ. So Dillmann, Oxf. Heb. Lex., etc.

J. A. SELBIE.

IPHDEIAH (יִפְדְּיָה 'J" redeems').—A Benjamite chief, 1 Ch 8^{25}. See GENEALOGY.

IPHTAH (יִפְתָּח, AV Jiphtah).—A town in the Shephelah of Judah, Jos 15^{43}. The name has not been recovered.

IPHTAH-EL (יִפְתַּח־אֵל, AV Jiphtah-el).—A ravine (גַּיְא) N.W. of Hannathon, on the north border of Zebulun, Jos $19^{14.\ 27}$. The situation of DABBESHETH (v.^{11}) seems to show that the great ravine, called Wady el-Ḳurn, 'valley of the horn,' west of Kefr 'Anân, is intended. The word has nothing to do with the name Jefât (i.e. Jotapata of Jos. Wars, iii. 7), with which it has been wrongly compared (e.g. by Robinson, BRP iii. p. 107).

C. R. CONDER.

IR (עִיר, A Ὠρά, B Ῥαώμ), 1 Ch 7^{12}.—Shuppim and Huppim are mentioned as the sons of Ir (called in v.^{7} Iri) in a list of the sons of Benjamin.

IRA (עִירָא, Εἴρας, Ira).—1. A Jairite, i.e. of Jair, a family of Gilead (Nu 32^{41} etc.). He is described as 'priest unto David' (cf. 2 S 8^{18}, where David's sons are also called 'priests'; Driver, Sam. pp. 219 and 293 f.), and associated with Zadok and Abiathar (2 S 20^{26}). It may be noted in this connexion (a) that in the list of court officials given in 2 S $8^{15ff.}$ (from which this notice [2 S 20^{26}] appears to be repeated, cf. Budde, Richter u. Samuel, p. 254) no mention is made of Ira, (b) that his name is also absent from the list in 1 Ch 18^{14-17} (which, however, is simply transcribed from 2 S 8); in both these passages a statement as to the office of David's sons is substituted (?), and (c) that the difficulty attaching to the word 'priest' in this passage, whether it be applied to Ira or to the sons of David (in 1 Ch 18 'priests' is changed to 'chiefs about the king,' הָרִאשֹׁנִים לְיַד הַמֶּלֶךְ), admits of solution if the passage is assigned to a late date (although, of course, it may be plausibly urged on the other hand that the freer use of the word 'priests' is an evidence of antiquity). Additional confirmation is thus given to Budde's theory that 2 S 20^{23-26} were repeated (with variations) from 2 S $8^{15f.}$ by a later redactor, who wished to include the genuinely old section 2 S 9^{1}–20^{22} and took this means of connecting the chapters added with what preceded (see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF). Nothing further is known of this Ira, unless, following the reading of the Peshiṭta (يثري = 'of Jattir,' i.e. הַיִּתְרִי for הָאִרִי the Jairites, Luc. ὁ Ἰεθέρ), we adopt the somewhat hazardous conjecture (Then. Klost.) that he is identical with 2. Ira the Ithrite (הַיִּתְרִי), one of David's heroes (2 S 23^{38} = 1 Ch 11^{40}). Most probably Then. and Klost. are right in pointing the text differently (הַיִּתְרִי for הַיִּתְרִי, see ITHRITE, THE), and treating Ira as a native of Jattir in the hill-country of Judah (cf. 1 S 30^{27}). 3. (2 S 23^{26}, B Εἴρας, A Ἴρας; 1 Ch 11^{28} Ὦραί; 1 Ch 27^{9}, B Ὀδουίας, A Εἰρά, Hira) Another of David's heroes, son of Ikkesh the Tekoite. According to 1 Ch 27^{9} he was captain of the temple guard for the sixth monthly course.

J. F. STENNING.

IRAD (עִירָד, LXX Γαιδάδ).—Son of Enoch and grandson of Cain (Gn 4^{18}). The name perhaps means 'fugitive' (Budde, 'strong,' 'increasing,' following the Arabic 'arada, which, used of plants, = 'come forth and become tall' or 'come forth hard and erect' [Lane, 1997 f.]), and may be a transformation of יֶרֶד (Gn $5^{15f.}$ = 1 Ch 1^{2}). See Dillmann and Spurrell on Gn 4^{18}, and Budde, Urgeschichte, 123 ff.

IRAM (עִירָם).—A 'duke' (אַלּוּף) of Edom, Gn 36^{43} = 1 Ch 1^{54}. The precise connotation of the name in this 'geographico-statistical list' (Dillm.) is unknown. The LXX has in Gn A Ζαφωεί, DE Ζαφωείν, in 1 Ch B Ζαφωείν, A Ἱράμ.

IR-HA-HERES (עִיר הַהֶרֶס).—In Is 19^{18} the name to be given to one of the 'five cities in the land of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jehovah of hosts'; in AV, RV, 'one shall be called The city of destruction.' The passage is difficult; and many different views have been held about it, especially in modern times.

(1) The Massoretic reading of the passage (which is supported by Aq. Theod. Pesh.) is that given above: and of this the usually accepted interpretation is that expressed in AV, RV, and adopted by Delitzsch; the name 'city of destroying'—or, more exactly, 'of tearing down,' the verb הָרַס being used properly of tearing or pulling down buildings, cities, altars, etc. (Ex 23^{24}, 1 K 18^{30}, 1 S 14^{17}, Ezk 13^{14} etc.)—is supposed to be chosen for the sake of a punning allusion to heres (חֶרֶס Job 9^{7}*) 'sun,' the 'city of the sun' being a designation which might have been given in Hebrew to On, the Heliopolis of the Greeks, a city a few miles to the N.E. of the modern Cairo, in ancient times the chief centre of the sun-worship in Egypt, and full of obelisks dedicated to the sun-god, Ra. The meaning of the passage, then, is that the place which has hitherto been a 'city of the sun' will in the future be called the 'city of destroying,' i.e. a city which has devoted itself to destroying the temples and emblems of the sun; cf. the prophecy of Jeremiah (43^{13}), where it is said of Nebuchadnezzar that 'he will break in pieces the pillars (i.e. obelisks) of Beth-shemesh (the 'house, or temple, of the sun'), that is in the land of Egypt.' The objections which have been urged against this view, that it requires too much to be supplied, that חֶרֶס does not occur elsewhere, and that the expression ought rather to mean 'the destroyed city,' are not cogent: the name is, of course, meant allusively, not as a complete definition; there are many other words which occur but once in the Hebrew Bible; † and the sense in which the 'destroying' was meant would be determined by the context.

(2) Symm. (πόλις ἡλίου), Vulg. (civitas Solis), the Talm. (Menāḥōth, 110^{a}), and Saadyah (10th cent.), read חֶרֶס ('sun') for חֶרֶס ('destruction'), a reading found also in 16 Heb. MSS.‡ This reading, in spite of the preference expressed for it by Ges. (Thes.) and Riehm (Einl. ii. 552 f.), cannot be deemed probable,—at least, if the words be accepted as Isaiah's: if it be adopted, be it observed, the expression used by the prophet would be, not 'one shall be the city of the sun' (in which case, no doubt, his words could be understood as a promise of the conversion of Heliopolis to the worship of Jehovah), but 'one shall be called the city of the sun,' an idiom which, according to usage (cf. 1^{26} 4^{3} 9^{5} $61^{3b.\,6}$ 62^{4}, Jer 19^{6}, Hos 1^{10}), always implies that the words following denote the character of the place or person mentioned; and it would be very pointless to say that one of the converted cities would bear the character of a sun-city.

Ges. (Comm.), Ew., Knob., who adopt the same reading, explain it from the Arab. ḥarasa, 'the guarded or protected city'; but this is to introduce a very questionable Arabism into the text of the OT.

(3) The LXX has πόλις ασεδεκ, i.e. עִיר הַצֶּדֶק 'city of righteousness' (cf. 1^{26} 61^{3b}). This would yield a fair, though not a specially pertinent sense: it is open to the suspicion of being an alteration based on 1^{26} (where the 'righteousness' is in pointed contrast to the unrighteousness denounced in vv.$^{21\text{-}23}$ etc.). On the other hand, that in Egypt the text of Is 19 was treated freely, and accommodated to the circumstances of a later age, is evident from the LXX rendering of v.^{25}, where, for 'Blessed be Egypt my people,' they substitute 'Blessed be my people that is in Egypt,' with manifest reference to the Jews settled there in the time of the Ptolemies. See further (5).

A decision on the passage is complicated by historical considerations. The high priest Onias III., after his deposition by Antiochus Epiphanes,—or, according to other statements, his son, Onias IV.,*—despairing of better times in Judæa, sought refuge in Egypt (c. B.C. 170–160) with Ptolemy Philometor; and conceived the idea of building there a temple, dedicated to Jehovah, in which the ancient rites of his people might be carried on without molestation, and which might form a religious centre at least for the Jews settled in Egypt. Upon his application to Ptolemy, the king granted the disused site of a sanctuary of Bubastis at Leontopolis, in the 'nome,' or district, of Heliopolis, and there Onias erected his temple.† In support of his plan he had pointed to Is 19^{19} and its context,‡ as a prediction that a temple to Jehovah was to be built in Egypt.§ These facts have been supposed to have a bearing upon both the reading and the exegesis of the passage under consideration. Certainly, if the passage be Isaiah's, they will not affect either; in that case, the first view given above is the only one which can be regarded as probable. But there are scholars whom that view fails to satisfy; and, without going so far as to deny Isaiah's authorship of the whole of $19^{16\,(18)\text{-}25}$, it must be granted that the clause in v.^{18} 'one shall be called,' etc., might well be a later addition to the original text of the prophecy: the verse would not read incompletely without it, nor does it add anything material to the main thought of the verse. Those who hold, then, that this clause (with or without the context) is not Isaiah's, adopt the following views about it.

(4) Duhm boldly translates 'shall be called Leontopolis,' explaining heres from the Arab. ḥariṣ, properly the bruiser, crusher, a poet. name for a lion. But that a very special and fig. application of an Arab. root, not occurring in Heb. even in its usual Arabic sense, should be found in Heb., is most improbable.

Dillmann's suggestions are better worthy of consideration. First (5), adhering to Isaiah's authorship, but deeming (1) and (2) above both unsuitable, he thinks it possible (agreeing in this with Bredenkamp) that 'city of righteousness' was the original reading,‖ supposing that heres, 'sun,' and heres, 'destruction,' were alterations made intentionally after B.C. 170, for the purpose of introducing a more definite allusion to the temple of Leontopolis (which was situated, as said above, in the nome of Heliopolis), the former by those who viewed this temple with approval, the latter by those who judged it schismatic. But he goes on (6) to throw out the suggestion that, after all, the whole clause may have been added at this later date, heres, 'sun,' being the original reading, which was altered afterwards by the Jews of Palestine into heres, 'destruction,' in order to obtain a condemnation of the Egyptian temple,¶ and by the Jews of Egypt into zedek, 'righteousness,' in order to make the prophecy more distinctly favourable to it.

(7) Cheyne (Introd. to Is. pp. 102–110), followed by Skinner, rejecting the view that the passage was written in the interests of the temple of Leon-

† The form of the word is perfectly regular and normal: cf. אֹרֵב a lying-in-wait (Job 38^{40}), קָשֵׁב an attending (Is 217), קָטֶל a slaying (Ob ^{9}), שֶׁבֶר a breaking, הָרֶג a killing, חֶבֶל a destruction (Mic 2^{10}), לֶכֶד a catch (Pr 3^{26}), etc.

‡ The present text of the Targ. expresses a combination of both readings, (1) and (2): קרתא בית שמש דעתידא למחרב 'the city Beth-Shemesh [see Jer 43^{13}, cited above], which is destined to be destroyed' (cited in the Talm. l.c. without the last clause: see Levy, NHWB ii. 112).

‖ So Geiger, Urschrift (1857), p. 79 f. (treating the verse, however,—and indeed the whole passage, $19^{18\text{-}25}$,—as a late addition to Isaiah's prophecy, written for the express purpose of glorifying the temple of Leontopolis).

¶ Dillm. is thus far following Hitzig, Jesaja (1833), pp. 219, 233 (who indeed assigns the whole of $19^{16\text{-}25}$ to the same age, and even suggests Onias himself as its author).

topolis, and interpreting the words in v.[18] ('five cities speaking the language of Canaan' [Hebrew], etc.), not as a symbolical expression for the conversion of Egyptian cities to the worship of J", but as referring to Jewish colonies in Egypt maintaining their national language and religion, supposes vv.[16-25] to have been written in the latter years of Ptolemy Lagi (c. B.C. 290), when there were unquestionably many Jewish settlements in Egypt: the original reading was 'city of the sun,' the meaning being that one of these Jewish colonies, preserving loyally the faith of their fathers, should flourish even in Heliopolis, the city of the sun-god, the Heb. name of which should be Ir-ha-heres; the reading was altered afterwards, when the Jews of Pal. began to show hostility towards the Egyptian temple, by the Jews of Egypt into 'city of righteousness,' and then further by the Jews of Palestine, as a counter-blow, into 'city of destruction.'

(8) König (Einl. p. 86) treats the clause as a late Palestinian gloss, written originally on the margin, in condemnation of the temple at Leontopolis ('city of destruction,' with allusion to heres 'of the sun').

It is evident that most of these views are merely hypotheses. At the same time, the diversity of reading makes it clear that arbitrary alterations, upon one side or the other, were introduced into the text; and as positive information upon the matter fails us, it becomes necessary to resort to hypotheses in order to explain the facts. The only question is, what hypothesis explains them best? If the words are Isaiah's, the objections to 'city of the sun' being the original reading have been already stated: if the words were written after the foundation of the temple at Leontopolis, the objections to the same being the original reading are, 1. that the temple was not at Heliopolis, and 2. (as remarked by Cheyne) that a passage interpolated by an Egyptian Jew in the interests of that temple should have made its way into the Palestinian text of Isaiah. If 'city of the sun' were the original reading, the most reasonable explanation of it is Cheyne's (7), though that implies that the passage is not Isaiah's, and also involves an interpretation of vv.[18-20], which is, at least, not the obvious one. The present writer must own that the view which seems to him to be the least open to objection is (1): the difficulties which have been found in this do not (as indicated above) seem to him as serious as has been sometimes maintained; and heres, 'sun,'—whether an intentional or accidental alteration of heres, 'destruction,'—though unsuitable, if used in the first instance with reference to Leontopolis, could readily enough be applied to it, if found, as upon this view of the case it would be found, in the text of an ancient prophecy.* S. R. Driver.

IRI.—See Ir.

IRIJAH (יִרְאִיָּה 'J" seeth').—A captain who, during the siege of Jerus., arrested Jeremiah on the charge of intending to desert to the Chaldæans (Jer 37[13. 14]).

IR-NAHASH (עִיר נָחָשׁ).—A city of Judah, 1 Ch 4[12]. The site is uncertain.

* In connexion with the views which see in the passage an allusion to the temple at Leontopolis, it is at least remarkable that, as M. Naville observes (pp. 12, 20, 21), in the Great Harris Papyrus, which describes at length the buildings of Ramses III. (c. 1200 B.C.), mention is made of 'the abode of Ramses III., in the house of Ra (the sun-god) on the north of On,'—a name which would fairly correspond to 'city of the sun,' and which M. Naville is strongly disposed to consider was the sacred name of the city buried now under Tell el-Yahudîyeh: the close connexion of this place with On is also implied by the further statement in the Papyrus that 'all that belonged to the abode of Ramses in the house of Ra, north of On, the buildings as well as the cattle, was under the authority of the priests of On for their yearly tribute.'

IRON (יִרְאוֹן, Yir'ōn).—A city of Naphtali, in the mountains, Jos 19[38]. It is probably the modern Yârûn. See SWP vol. i. sheet iv., and Baedeker-Socin, Pal.[3] p. 261.

IRON in the English Bible almost always stands for בַּרְזֶל (in Dn Aram. פַּרְזֶל) in OT, and for σίδηρος or the adj. σιδηροῦς in Apocr. and NT [Exceptions:—In Job 41[7] 'barbed irons' is the rendering of שְׁבוֹת, and in 1 Ti 4[2] 'seared (as) with a hot iron' is a paraphrase of κεκαυστηριασμένος]. Conversely, בַּרְזֶל and its Gr. equivalents are usually translated by 'iron' [Exceptions:—In Dt 19[5], 2 K 6[5] בַּרְזֶל is rendered '(ax-) head,' and in Is 44[12] חֶרֶשׁ בַּרְזֶל is simply 'smith'; σίδηρος is tr[d] 'sword' in Jth 6[6] 9[8], 4 Mac 14[19]].

LXX is less consistent. It has σίδηρος for חֶרֶב (sword), Job 5[20] 15[22] 39[22], for גַּרְזֶן (axe), Dt 20[19], for מוֹרָה (razor), Jg 13[5] 16[7], 1 K 1[11], and τέκτων σιδήρου for חָרָשׁ (smith), 1 S 13[19]. On the other hand, it renders בַּרְזֶל by μάχαιρα, Is 10[34], by σιδήριον, Dt 19[5], 2 K 6[5.6], Ec 10[10], and elsewhere by σίδηρος or σιδηροῦς. Evidently both in Heb. and Gr. 'iron' was a term used somewhat generally to describe both the metal and instruments of various kinds made from it.

This well-known metal is one of the so-called elementary substances. From its abundance, the ease with which it can be separated from its ores, and its many useful properties, it is the most important of all the metals. Ordinary iron is not a pure element, but always contains a small amount of carbon, the proportion of which greatly affects its qualities. When the quantity of carbon is small (from 0·15 to 0·5 per cent.) we have wrought iron, which is extremely difficult to melt, but is tough, and can be welded at white heat. When the percentage of carbon is from 3 to 6 we have cast iron, which is brittle, and cannot be welded, but which can be melted and cast in mould. The intermediate variety, containing from 0·6 to 2 per cent. of carbon, is steel, which can be both cast and welded, and can also be tempered to various degrees of elasticity and hardness. In modern processes iron is separated from its ores in the form of cast iron, from which the other forms are obtained by removing some of the carbon. The high temperature required to melt cast iron has been urged as a difficulty in the way of understanding the use of the metal in early times. But iron can be separated from its ores without being melted. In many countries primitive processes of iron manufacture survive, and are carried on at the present day. These doubtless represent the ancient methods, and their crude product is not cast iron, but a 'bloom' or spongy mass of wrought iron or steel.

Native iron is almost unknown except in meteorites. Meteoric iron, however, contains impurities which make it brittle and exceedingly difficult to forge. For primitive methods of iron manufacture see Napier, Ancient Workers and Artificers in Metal; Day, The Prehistoric Use of Iron and Steel; Swank, Iron in all Ages (OT references in the last-named are uncritical).

In the Scripture records iron appears side by side with brass (which see) or bronze from the very earliest times, and the two metals are often mentioned together. Tubal-cain is described as an artificer in both (Gn 4[22]), and similar workers are referred to in the reigns of David (2 Ch 2[7. 14]) and Joash (2 Ch 24[12]). In Dt 8[9] both are named among the minerals of Palestine, and in Jos 22[8] they are among the spoils carried home by the tribe of Manasseh after the conquest of Canaan. They are mentioned in Nu 31[22] in a list of incombustible materials, and in Jer 6[28], Ezk 22[18], among the impurities of silver.

Iron is classed among the necessaries of life (Sir 39[26]); and the Scripture allusions testify to its extensive and varied applications. Is 60[17] shows that its relative value in ancient times was much the same as at present, being less than that of gold and silver, and greater than that of stone. Iron was used for weapons of offence (Nu 35[16], Job 20[24], Jth 6[6] 9[8], 4 Mac 14[19]), for war chariots (Jos 17[16. 18], Jg 1[19] 4[3. 13]), and for defensive armour (2 S 23[7], Rev 9[9]). Saws, harrows, and axes of iron were used by David in dealing (?; see Driver, Sam. p. 288, and cf. art. HARROW) with his Ammonite prisoners (2 S 12[31], 1 Ch 20[3]). Hands of iron are mentioned as instruments of torture in 4 Mac 8[12] 9[26. 28]. There are allusions to iron gates (Ac 12[10]), fetters (Ps 105[18] 149[8], 3 Mac 3[25], 4 Mac 11[10]), prison bars (Ps 107[10. 16], Is 45[2]), yokes (Dt 28[48], Jer 28[13. 14], Sir 28[20]), and horns (as prophetic symbols, 1 K 22[11], 2 Ch 18[10]). Axes for felling trees were made of iron (Dt 19[5], 1 K 6[5. 6], Is 10[34]), and also tools for stone-quarrying (Sir 48[17]) and stone-hewing (Dt 27[5], Jos 8[31], 1 K 6[7]). There were iron* threshing instruments (Am 1[3]), images (Dn 5[23]), vessels (Jos 6[19. 24]), pans (Ezk 4[3]), nails or bolts (1 Ch 22[3], Wis 13[15]), pens or graving tools (Jer 17[1], Job 19[24]). Iron was among the materials gathered by David for the building of the temple (1 Ch 22[14. 16] 29[2. 7]), among the merchandise of Tyre (Ezk 27[12. 19]), and of the apocalyptic Babylon (Rev 18[12]). The whetting of iron tools is referred to in Pr 27[17], Ec 10[10]. The heaviness of iron is noted in Sir 22[15]. Its weight was reckoned by shekels (1 S 17[7]), or by talents (1 Ch 29[7]).

As to the manufacture of iron, the ore is alluded to in Job 28[2]. The references to the 'iron furnace' (Dt 4[20], 1 K 8[51], Jer 11[4]) may be either to the smelting furnace, in which the iron was separated from its ore, or to the blacksmith's forge, which is vividly described in Is 44[12], Sir 38[28].

In many of the above passages, and in a number of others, 'iron' is used metaphorically. The description of the heavens and the earth as brass and iron (Lv 26[19], Dt 28[23]) is a picture of drought. The iron furnace is a striking figure for the severest suffering. Iron is a symbol of strength, and as such is employed of Asher (Dt 33[25]), of Israel (Mic 4[13]), of the fourth kingdom in Nebuchadnezzar's vision (Dn 2[33-45 passim]), and of behemoth (Job 40[18] 41[27]). Prophetic boldness is typified in Jer 1[18] by an iron pillar. On the other hand, iron is an emblem of Israel's obstinacy (Is 48[4]) and corruption (Jer 6[28], Ezk 22[18], iron being an impurity in silver). The rod of iron (Ps 2[9], Rev 2[27] 12[5] 19[15]) symbolizes a rule of irresistible might.

One or two passages referring to iron have been reserved for special comment.

The 'bedstead of iron,' belonging to king Og of Bashan (Dt 3[11]), was probably a sarcophagus of basalt, the black iron-like stone of the region. This stone, and not literal iron, may possibly be intended also in Dt 8[9]. See Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 11; and Driver, Deuteronomy, in loc.

In Jer 15[12] occurs the phrase בַּרְזֶל מִצָּפוֹן 'northern iron' (AV), 'iron from the north' (RV), of which there are two different interpretations. On the one hand, it has been supposed to refer to the iron manufactured by the Chalybians, which was reputed to be of special excellence; while, on the other hand, it has been understood simply as a figurative description of the northern invasion which Jeremiah elsewhere predicts as impending (1[14] 4[6] 6[1] 13[20]).

In Ezk 27[19] we have בַּרְזֶל עָשׁוּת, which is rendered 'bright iron' in AV and RV, but 'wrought iron' in RVm. LXX connects the phrase with the preceding clause, and translates ἐξ Ἀσηλ σίδηρος εἰργασμένος. The meaning is generally understood to be 'iron wares of rare workmanship' (kunstreich verarbeitetes Eisen—Siegfried in Kautzsch's AT). The Rabbis took the locality described to be in South Arabia, like Dedan, and the iron articles to be Indian swords, which were famous in that region. See Cornill and Smend, in loc.

The word 'iron' in Scripture is applied to articles which may have been made of wrought iron, and to others which probably were made of steel. The apparent special allusions to steel in AV are misleading (see STEEL). See also following article.

JAMES PATRICK.

IRON (barzel).—The use of iron was comparatively late. In the whole of the plunder of Syria about B.C. 1480 iron is never mentioned; nor is it in the cuneiform letters from Syria about B.C. 1360. No clearly dated example of it is known in Egypt before about B.C. 700. Probably it began to come into use in Syria about B.C. 900 or 1000. Beyond the generalities of iron being named among metals (Gn 4[22], Nu 31[22] 35[16]), and the phrases 'chariots of iron' (Jos 17[16. 18], Jg 1[19] 4[3. 13]) and 'bed of iron' (Dt 3[11][?]), the 'tool of iron' is definitely named under Solomon (1 K 6[7]), and as an axe about B.C. 850 (2 K 6[5]). Iron is mentioned under Tiglath-pileser I. (c. 1100). See KIB i. 39. Well-developed tools of iron (chisels, rasps, files, centre-bits, etc.) were made by Assyrians in B.C. 670, implying that such had probably been in progress for a century or two at least. It appears, then, that iron began to spread about B.C. 1000, most likely from the Chalybes in the Assyr. highlands, who still work it, and were celebrated for it anciently. This is probably quite as early as, or earlier than, it appears for any purpose in Europe. See MINES, MINING. W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE.

IRPEEL (יִרְפְּאֵל 'El heals').—A city of Benjamin, noticed with Chephirah, Mozah, and others, Jos 18[27]. The most probable site is the ruin Rafât, N. of el-Jib (Gibeon). See SWP vol. i. sheet xvii.

IRRIGATION.—In Babylonia and Egypt, on account of the lack of rain, water was supplied to the fields and gardens by an elaborate system of irrigation. The waters of the Nile, Euphrates, and Tigris were conveyed to a distance by a network of larger and smaller canals. The water from these, or from reservoirs supplied by them, is raised by various machines, the most common of which is the shadoof, the essential part of which is a lever, with a weight at one end, serving to raise the full bucket at the other. Other machines are somewhat like a turbine. The water thus raised is distributed along narrow gutters. The Nile Valley is naturally fertilized by the inundations caused by the rise of the Nile; and the control and distribution of these floods was an important feature in the irrigation of Egypt. To this purpose Lake Mœris was adapted by the great engineering works of Amenemhat III. (see Herodot. i. 193; Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, 67 ff., 445 ff., 763 ff.; Lane, Modern Egyptians[5], ii. 26 f.; Petrie, History of Egypt, i. 193; arts. ASSYRIA, 178[a]; EGYPT, ii.).

Palestine, however, is by no means a waterless country; the eastern table-lands especially are well provided with springs. In parts, however, e.g. on the Judæan plateau, springs are rare, moreover the rain drains away quickly; nevertheless, the earlier and the later rains suffice for the crops generally. As to need for irrigation, Palestine is expressly contrasted with Egypt in Dt 11[10. 11] 'For the land, whither thou goest in to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out, where thou sowedst thy seed and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs; but the land, whither ye go over to possess it, is a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven.' This passage does not imply that irrigation was unknown in Palestine, but that it was only used on a small scale, for gardens, etc. Thus we read in Is 58[11] of a 'watered garden,' gan rāweh; in Ec 2[5. 6] Solomon is made to say, 'I made me gardens and parks, and I planted trees in them of all kinds of fruit: I made me pools of water, to water therefrom the forest where trees were reared.' Cf. also Sir 24[30. 31] 'I also came out as a brook from a river, and as a conduit into a garden. I said I will water my best garden, and will abundantly water my garden bed.' So G. A. Smith, HGHL 83, 'Vegetables thrive where summer irrigation is used.' Driver on Dt 11[10] (cf. 2nd ed. p. xxi) quotes Conder, Tent-Work, p. 328, as stating that he had seen gardens irrigated 'by means of small ditches trodden by the foot.' Steuernagel, however, explains 'watered with the foot' in the same passage as referring to a wheel worked with the foot.

There are numerous references to pĕleg or palgê mayim (Ps 1[3] etc.), i.e. the trenches used for irrigation; but we cannot therefore deduce a wide use of irrigation in Palestine; some of the passages may have been written in Babylonia, or by authors familiar with the irrigation trenches of Egypt or Chaldæa; nor is it certain that pĕleg may not sometimes mean a natural tributary.

IR-SHEMESH (עִיר שֶׁמֶשׁ 'city of the sun,' Jos 19[41]).—See Bethshemesh 1, and Heres 1.

IRU (עִירוּ).—The eldest son of Caleb, 1 Ch 4[15]. The correct name is probably Ir, the -u being simply the conjunction 'and' (ו) coupling it with the following name Elah. (See Kittel, ad loc.).

ISAAC (יִצְחָק; in Am 7[9. 16] [where it is a poet. synonym for Israel], Jer 33[26], Ps 105[9] יִשְׂחָק; LXX and NT Ἰσαάκ).

1. The story of Isaac is that of the least conspicuous of the three Hebrew patriarchs. The following brief description gives all that is preserved in the Book of Genesis respecting him.

Isaac was the long promised son of Abraham and Sarah. He was born when Abraham was 100 and Sarah 91 years old (cf. Gn 17[17. 24] 21[5]). He was circumcised on the eighth day (Gn 21[4]). He was called Isaac ('laughter') by divine command (Gn 17[19]), because Abraham had laughed at the thought of a child being 'born unto him that is an hundred years old' (Gn 17[17]). The jealousy of Sarah being aroused at the sight of Ishmael, Hagar's son, playing (מְצַחֵק) with Isaac, led to the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael from the tent of Abraham (Gn 21[8-21]). See Hagar. It would appear from this narrative (Gn 21[14]) that Isaac's earliest days were spent in the neighbourhood of Beersheba.

The next recorded event in the life of Isaac was the sacrifice 'in the land of Moriah,' when Abraham was bidden of God to offer his 'only son . . . Isaac' for a burnt-offering upon one of the mountains (Gn 22[2]). For remarks upon this trial of Abraham's faith see the article Abraham. The beauty of the story is enhanced by the simple colloquy between Abraham and his son, as they went 'both of them together' to the appointed place, Isaac bearing 'the wood of the burnt-offering' (Gn 22[6-8]). The submission and obedience of Isaac are virtues as evidently intended to be emphasized in the narrative as the faith of Abraham. The life of Isaac was spared through the interposition of 'the angel of the Lord'; and 'a ram caught in the thicket by the horns' was offered up by Abraham 'for a burnt-offering in the stead of his son' (Gn 22[13]). Abraham and Isaac returned to Beersheba (Gn 22[19]).

The death of Sarah occurred at Hebron when Isaac was 36 years old (Gn 23[1]); but Isaac is not mentioned in connexion with the purchase of the field of Machpelah and the burial of Sarah (Gn 23). Abraham is not stated to have consulted Isaac when he despatched 'his servant, the elder of his house' (Gn 24[2]), to take a wife for his son from his country and kindred in Mesopotamia. Rebekah, the daughter of 'Bethuel, the son of Milcah, the wife of Nahor, Abraham's brother' (Gn 24[15]), is brought from Mesopotamia by Abraham's servant. Isaac, we are told (Gn 24[62]), dwelt at that time 'in the land of the South,' near Beer-lahai-roi. Rebekah became his wife; and Isaac 'was comforted after his mother's (or 'his father's,' reading אָבִיו for אִמּוֹ, as his mother's name has not been mentioned in the section) death.' Isaac joined with Ishmael in committing the body of Abraham to burial in the cave of Machpelah (Gn 25[9]).

The remaining records of Isaac's life ('the generations of Isaac,' Gn 25[12]) are very meagre. Twin children are born to Rebekah after Isaac's entreaty of J" (Gn 25[21]). In Gn 26[1-6] we are told that, in consequence of a famine, Isaac journeyed to Gerar, but was warned by God not to go down into Egypt. On the occasion of this theophany, Isaac is told of the blessing upon himself and his seed because of the obedience of his father Abraham (Gn 26[6]). In Gn 26[7-11] Isaac is guilty of the same cowardice and deceit in the land of the Philistines, as Abraham among the Egyptians. In order, as he thought, to save his own life, he gave out that Rebekah was his sister. Abimelech, the Philistine king, saw from a window 'Isaac . . . sporting (מְצַחֵק) with Rebekah' (Gn 26[8]), and perceived at once that she was his wife and not his sister. Abimelech justly rebuked Isaac; and gave his people charge not to molest either him or his wife. Isaac during his sojourn in Gerar became so prosperous as a wheat-grower and herdsman as to incur the envy of the Philistines. They commenced a petty persecution of Isaac, stopping up the wells which his father Abraham had dug, and which Isaac's servants had opened again. Abimelech even counselled Isaac to withdraw from the country in the interests of peace (Gn 26[16]). We are then told of two wells dug by Isaac's men, and violently claimed by the Philistines; these he called 'Esek ('strife') and Sitnah ('enmity'). Moving his encampment still farther away, he dug another well, which the Philistines did not dispute, and which Isaac therefore called Rehoboth ('broad places'), generally identified with the modern Ruhaibe, a well some 25 miles S. of Beersheba.

Isaac subsequently journeyed to Beersheba (Gn 26[23]), where J" appeared to him by night and blessed him. He built an altar there to J", and his servants digged a well. And while encamped in this spot, he received overtures for an alliance with the Philistines. Abimelech the king, Ahuzzath 'his friend,' and Phicol the captain of the host, came over from Gerar; and Isaac made a covenant with them, and gave them a banquet. They plighted their faith to him by an oath (שְׁבוּעָה); and on the day of their departure Isaac heard that his servants had come upon water in the well they were digging. Accordingly he gave the well the name of Shibah, as if equivalent to Shebuah; and thus the name Beersheba, according to one tradition (cf. for another Gn 21[31]), took its rise.

In the remaining passages in which Isaac is referred to, he is an old and feeble man. In Gn 27 he appears as a man upon his deathbed, practically blind, and desirous to bestow his last blessing upon his elder son, Esau, whom 'he loved . . . because he did eat of his venison' (Gn 25[28]). Through Rebekah's cunning, Jacob the younger son supplants his brother. Isaac, too blind to distinguish between them by sight, is suspicious of the voice, but is reassured by Jacob's hairy garments, by their feel and smell. He pronounces upon Jacob the blessing of the birthright, in words of a high poetical strain (Gn 27^{27-29}). Shortly afterwards Esau returns; and Isaac is greatly agitated when he realizes the deception practised by his younger son. But he cannot go back. He pronounces a blessing—or rather a prediction of a wild and independent destiny—upon his elder son.

Isaac's days were nearly numbered (Gn 27^{41}). And Rebekah, to save Jacob from Esau's fury and revenge, induces Isaac to send Jacob away to Mesopotamia, there to obtain a wife from his own kindred, and not to imitate Esau by marriage with Canaanite women. Isaac invokes another blessing upon the head of Jacob, and sends him away to Paddan-aram unto Laban, Rebekah's brother (Gn 27^{46}–28^{5}).

Once more only do we hear of Isaac; and that is when we read of his death, after the return of Jacob from his 21 years' sojourn in Mesopotamia. The mention of it occurs just after the enumeration of Jacob's twelve sons; and we then read that 'Jacob came unto Isaac his father to Mamre to Kiriath-arba (the same is Hebron), where Abraham and Isaac sojourned.' Here Isaac died, being 180 years old, and his two sons Esau and Jacob buried him (Gn 35^{27-29}).

2. These somewhat disjointed notices of Isaac's life were drawn from the three main sources of tradition preserved in the Book of Genesis.

J records the promise of a son to Abraham and Sarah (Gn 18^{9-15}), and the fulfilment of the promise, in Gn 21^{1-7}. From the same source (Gn 21^{33}) we gather that Isaac's early years were spent at Beersheba. J records the narrative of the servant's journey to Mesopotamia; and the marriage of Isaac and Rebekah (Gn 24). It mentions Isaac's inheritance from Abraham and the sojourn at Beer-lahai-roi (Gn $25^{1-6.\ 11}$). J had also the account of Isaac's dealings with the Philistines (Gn 26), and of the deception practised by Jacob upon his father (Gn 27).

E recorded the birth of Isaac and the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael (Gn $21^{6a.\ 8-21}$); and from E we have the narrative of the sacrifice of Isaac (Gn 22^{1-13}). Portions also of Gn 27 are ascribed to E, showing that this source contained the narrative of Isaac's commission to Esau to bring him the venison that he loved, and of Jacob's deception.

The Isaac narrative in P was evidently very brief. It mentions that Isaac at 40 years of age married Rebekah, the daughter of Bethuel the Syrian (Aramæan), in Paddan-aram; that his two sons were born when he was 60 years of age (Gn $25^{19.\ 20.\ 26}$); that Esau grieved his father and mother 40 years later by marrying two Hittite wives (Gn $26^{34.\ 35}$); that Isaac, to prevent Jacob marrying a Canaanite wife, sent him to Laban in Paddan-aram to obtain a wife from his kindred, and blessed him as he set forth (Gn 27^{46}–28^{9}); and that, after Jacob's return, Isaac died at Hebron 180 years old, and was buried by his sons (Gn $35^{28.\ 29}$).

3. The recognition of these different strata of tradition will enable the student to understand the cause of certain apparently contradictory statements in the narrative. Thus attention has often been called to the fact that in Gn 27 Isaac is represented as old, blind, and on his deathbed, while his death is recorded as occurring possibly 80 years later (cf. Gn 26^{34} with Gn 27^{1-41} and Gn 35^{27}). But the narrative in Gn 27 is from the Prophetic, that in Gn 26^{34} 35^{27} is from the Priestly tradition. Similarly, whereas in Gn 27^{41-45} Jacob is sent away to escape Esau's vengeance, which will take a murderous form as soon as Isaac dies, we find in Gn 27^{46}–28^{1-6} that Isaac sends Jacob away to take a wife from Paddan-aram, and blesses him, without any reference being made to the blessing obtained by guile, which has been described in the previous chapter. But the difficulty disappears when we find that Gn 27^{1-45} is from the Prophetic, and Gn 27^{46}–28^{5} is from the Priestly source, and that the two traditions are combined, though not harmonized.

The great similarity between the story—though not harmonized—of the repudiation of Rebekah by Isaac at the court of Abimelech at Gerar, and the story of the repudiation of Sarah by Abraham, likewise at the court of Abimelech king of Gerar, will have occurred to all readers. The Abraham narrative (Gn 20) is from E; the Isaac narrative (Gn 26^{8-11}) is from J. It can hardly be doubted that the two traditions are different versions of the same event.

According to the figures given in Gn 25^{26}, where it is stated that Isaac was 60 years old when Jacob and Esau were born, and those given in Gn 35^{28}, where it is stated that Isaac died at the age of 180, we should infer that Isaac's death occurred only 10 years before Jacob's descent into Egypt (Gn 47^{10}). Moreover, by a comparison of the data of Joseph's age (Gn 41^{46} 45^{6}) with those of Jacob's age (Gn 47^{9}), it would appear that Isaac was 137 years old when Jacob went to Haran.

4. The position of Isaac in the narrative is not so conspicuous or so attractive as that of Abraham or of Jacob. He impersonates, as it were, the peaceful, obedient, and submissive qualities of an equable trust in God, distinct alike from the transcendent faith of Abraham, and from that lower type which in Jacob was learned through discipline and purged from self-will. There are but a few items upon the strength of which a picture of Isaac's character can be constructed. But the submission shown at the crisis of sacrifice (Gn 22), the lonely meditation at eventide (Gn 24^{63}), the intercession on his wife's behalf (Gn 25^{21}), Jacob's allusion to the object of his father's fear (Gn 31^{42}), are details which supply features of greater dignity and grace than are suggested by the mention of his fondness for good food in Gn 25^{28} 27^{4}. He is, however, a subordinate figure as compared with Abraham and Jacob; and the lower level at which he seems to stand is implied in Gn 26^{5}, where the covenant of blessing is granted to Isaac and his seed, not for their own sake, but for their father Abraham's sake.

It was not without significance for the Israelites that the prehistoric founders of their race were not all of heroic mould. The ordinary materials of Hebrew life, as represented in Isaac and Jacob, were selected to be the channels of special revelation no less than the more splendid and striking personality of their father Abraham. Isaac was similar to the majority in every community, yielding, easy-going, stationary, content to receive the promise without realizing the extent or nature of the privilege. The events of his life are associated with a few localities, all (except Mamre, Gn 35^{27-29}) within a restricted area in S. Palestine. His encampments at Beer-lahai-roi, Gerar, and Beersheba form a sharp contrast to the varied scenes in the lives of Abraham and Jacob. The typical service of one of the patriarchs was rendered in quietness and sitting still.

5. References in the New Testament. — The sacrifice of Isaac is twice referred to in the NT. (1) He $11^{17.\ 18}$, where the writer brings out the triumph of Abraham's faith in the conflict between the affection of a father and the duty of obedience; (2) Ja 2^{21}, where the apostle appeals to the great deed of sacrifice as against the perversion of the doctrine of justification by faith. In each case the submission of Isaac plays its part, but only a secondary part, in the argument of the writer.

6. The great importance attached by the Jews of the Middle Ages to the sacrifice of Isaac is worthy of attention. 'The Jews implore the mercy of God by the sacrifice of Isaac, as Christians by the sacrifice of Christ' (Mayor, Ep. James, p. 97). In the submission of Isaac was seen the submission of the whole race. Cf. Targ. on Mic 7^{20} 'Remember for us the binding of Isaac.' Pesikta R. Kahana, 'For the merit of Isaac who offered himself upon the altar, the Holy One, blessed be He, will hereafter raise the dead' (Buber).

Amongst many strange Jewish traditions respecting Isaac may be mentioned that of Targ. Jerus. on Gn 27^{1}, where Isaac's blindness is accounted for 'because when his father was binding him, he had seen the throne of glory, and from that time his eyes had begun to darken.' Even more strange is the altercation between Isaac and Ishmael, which, according to the Targum of Palestine, led to the sacrifice of Isaac: 'And it was after these things that Isaac and Ishmael contended; and Ishmael said, It is right that I should inherit what is the father's, because I am his firstborn son. And Isaac said, It is right that I should inherit what is the father's, because I am the son of Sarah his wife, and thou art the son of Hagar the handmaid of my mother. Ishmael answered and said, I am more righteous than thou, because I was circumcised at thirteen years; and if it had been my will to hinder, they should not have delivered me to be circumcised; but thou wast circumcised a child of eight days; if thou hadst had knowledge, perhaps they could not have delivered thee to be circumcised. Isaac answered and said, Behold now, to-day I am thirty and six years old; and if the Holy One, blessed be He, were to require all my members, I would not hesitate. These words were heard before the Lord of the World, and the Word (Memra) of the Lord at once tried Abraham' (Etheridge's translation).

7. Though not employed for that purpose in the writings of the NT (yet cf. Ro 8^{32}), the sacrifice of Isaac was largely made use of by the Fathers as typical of the sacrifice on the cross. The earliest use of it in this connexion appears to be Ep. Barn. ch. 7, 'Because He was in His own person about to offer the vessel of His Spirit a sacrifice for our sins, that the type also which was given in Isaac, who was offered upon the altar, should be fulfilled' (Lightfoot's Apostolic Fathers, p. 251). Irenæus speaks of Abraham having yielded up his son as a sacrifice in order that God might also be pleased to give His only Son as a sacrifice for our redemption (προθύμως τὸν ἴδιον μονογενῆ καὶ ἀγαπητὸν παραχωρήσας θυσίαν τῷ θεῷ, ἵνα καὶ ὁ θεὸς εὐδοκήσῃ ὑπὲρ τοῦ σπέρματος αὐτοῦ πάντως τὸν ἴδιον μονογενῆ καὶ ἀγαπητὸν υἱὸν θυσίαν παρασχεῖν εἰς λύτρωσιν ἡμετέραν, ed. Stieren, i. 572). Cf. August. De Civ. Dei, xvi. 32.

8. The name 'Isaac.' It would appear that the name Isaac, derived from the root צחק, and meaning 'laugh,' was connected in popular Israelite tradition with incidents preceding or attending the birth of the patriarch. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that the form of these traditions was occasioned by the stories based upon, or suggested by, the popular etymology of the name. At least three different explanations seem to have been given, in order to account for the name; the compiler of Genesis has faithfully reproduced them all. (1) In Gn 17^{17} (P) 'Abram laughed' at the idea of a son being born to him in his old age; (2) in Gn 18^{12} we are told that 'Sarah laughed within herself' at the prediction that she should bear a son; (3) in Gn 21^{6} Sarah, after the birth of the child, is represented as saying, 'God hath prepared laughter (צְחֹק) for me.' The continuation of the same verse, however, suggests that there was yet another version of the same tradition, according to which the laughter was neither that of incredulity on the part of Abraham and Sarah, nor that of joy on the part of Sarah, but that of derision on the part of those who heard the news, and who would laugh at one so old becoming a mother: 'every one will laugh at me.' It should also be noticed that the same root occurs in the sense of 'playing' in the story of Ishmael and Isaac (Gn 21^{9}), and also in that of Isaac and Rebekah (Gn 26^{8}).

A fanciful Rabbinic derivation for the name explained it to be a compound of two words יצא־חק 'the out-going of statute,' as if in Isaac was to be discerned a development of the religious faith of Abraham (Hamburger, RE, s.v.).

It has been suggested that 'Isaac' may possibly be a truncated form for 'Isaac-el,' on the analogy of 'Isra-el,' 'Ishma-el,' and possibly 'Joseph-el' and 'Jacob-el' (cf. Gray's Studies in Hebrew Proper Names, p. 214).

Literature.

Although anticipated by Amos and Hosea in many of his leading doctrines, and excelled both by Jeremiah and the great Prophet of the Exile in depth of personal experience and width of religious outlook, Isaiah was nevertheless the greatest of the Hebrew prophets—by the strength of his personality, the wisdom of his statesmanship, the length and unbroken assurance of his ministry, the almost unaided service which he rendered to Judah at the greatest crisis of her history, the purity and grandeur of his style, and the influence he exerted on subsequent prophecy.

I. NAME.—The English name Isaiah is an approximate transliteration of the abbreviated form Yĕsha'yāh יְשַׁעְיָה, which appears as the title of the prophet's book in the Hebrew Canon, and occurs besides as the name of several individuals in post-exilic writings (Ezr $8^{7.\ 19}$, Neh 11^{7}, 1 Ch 3^{21}). The full and older form is Yĕsha'yāhû יְשַׁעְיָהוּ (Gr. Ἡσαΐας, Lat. Esaias and Isaias), by which the prophet himself is always called in the text of his book (cf. 1^{1} etc.) and in the historical writings of the OT (2 K $19^{2ff.}$, 2 Ch 26^{22} $32^{20.\ 32}$); also of other Jews, 1 Ch $25^{3.\ 15}$ 26^{25}. It means 'J" is salvation,' and is therefore synonymous with the frequent Joshua or Jeshua (Jesus) יְהוֹשֻׁעַ or יֵשׁוּעַ, and Hosea הוֹשֵׁעַ, cf. the Heb. Elisha אֱלִישָׁע 'God is, or God of, Salvation'; Elishua אֱלִישׁוּעַ, Ishi יִשְׁעִי, etc., the Sabæan or Himyaritic forms יהעאל and אליהע, and the Phœn. ישע.

II. PERSONAL HISTORY.—The exact limits which we are led to assign to Isaiah's career depend on the conclusions we have still to reach with regard to several disputed portions of his book. Generally speaking, however, we may say that he prophesied from the year in which king Uzziah died (B.C. 740 or 736) to the year of the sudden deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib, 701, and possibly some years after this. Isaiah was therefore born about 760 (seven years before the reputed foundation of Rome), was a child when Amos appeared at Bethel (c. 755 or 750), and a youth when Hosea began to prophesy in N. Israel. Micah was his younger contemporary. Isaiah prophesied under Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. The chief political events of his life were the ascent of the great soldier Tiglath-pileser III. to the throne of Assyria in 745, with a new policy of conquest; the league of Aram and N. Israel in 735, and their invasion of Judah, which moved Ahaz to call Assyria to his help; Tiglath-pileser's capture of Damascus, and the captivity of Gilead and Galilee in 734; the invasion of N. Palestine by Salmanassar IV. in 725, with the long siege of Samaria which fell to his successor Sargon in or about 721; Sargon's defeat of Egypt on her border at Raphia in 719; Sargon's invasion of Palestine in 711 with the reduction of Ashdod, and his defeat of Merodach-baladan and capture of Babylon in 709; Sennacherib's succession in 705, and invasion of Palestine in 701; his encounter with Egypt at Eltekeh on the borders of Philistia and Judah; his capture of Ekron and siege of Jerusalem, with the pestilence that overtook him between Palestine and Egypt; and his retreat from Palestine, with the consequent relief of Jerusalem—all in 701. About 695 (some say about 690 or even 685) Hezekiah was succeeded by Manasseh. Whether Isaiah lived into the reign of the latter is very doubtful. We have no prophecies from him later than Hezekiah's reign, perhaps none after 701.* The Mishna (Jebamoth 49*b*; cf. Sanhedr. 103*b*) says that he was slain by Manasseh. The apocryphal work, The Ascension of Isaiah, which was written in the beginning of the 2nd Christian cent. (only an Ethiopic version is extant; see Dillmann's ed. with a Latin translation, Leipzig, 1877), affirms that Isaiah's martyrdom consisted in being sawn asunder, which Justin Martyr repeats (Dial. c. Tryph. ch. 120, c. A.D. 150). Whether this be true, and whether it is alluded to in He 11^{37}, we cannot tell. See next article.

Isaiah is called the son of Amoz (אָמוֹץ 1^1 2^1 etc.), who must not be confounded, as he has been by various Christian Fathers, with the prophet Amos (עָמוֹס). A Jewish tradition (Megilla 10*b*) makes Isaiah nephew of king Amaziah; and his royal descent has been inferred from his familiarity with successive monarchs of Judah, and his general political influence. A stronger reason than these might be drawn from the presence in his name of J", which appears to have been confined at the earlier periods of Israel's history to proper names of the royal houses. But even this is not conclusive, and one really knows nothing of either Isaiah's forefathers or his upbringing. He was married, his wife is called 'the prophetess' (8^3), and he had two sons to whom he gave names symbolic of those aspects of the nation's history which he enforced in his prophecies: She'ar-yashub, 'a remnant shall return,' who was old enough in 736–735 to be taken by his father when he went to face king Ahaz (7^3), and Maher-shalal-hash-baz 'spoil-speeds-booty-hastes,' who was born about a year later (8^{1-4}). The legend that Isaiah was twice married has been deduced from the false inference that the 'young woman of marriageable age,' הָעַלְמָה of 7^{14}, was his wife. By this expression the prophet probably did not mean a definite individual.

The most certain and significant fact about Isaiah is that he was a citizen, if not a native, of Jerusalem,† and had constant access to the court and presence of the king. Jerusalem is Isaiah's 'immediate and ultimate regard, the centre and return of all his thoughts, the hinge of the history of his time, the summit of those brilliant hopes with which he fills the future. He has traced for us the main features of her position and some of the lines of her construction, many of the great figures of her streets, the fashions of her women, the arrival of embassies, the effect of rumours. He has painted her aspect in triumph, in siege, in famine, and in earthquake: war filling her valleys with chariots, and again nature rolling tides of fruitfulness up to her very gates; her moods of worship, panic, and profligacy. If he takes wider observation of mankind, Jerusalem is his watch-tower. It is for her defence he battles through fifty years of statesmanship, and all his prophecy may be said to travail in anguish for her new birth.'

III. Structure and Contents of the Book of Isaiah.—The book which bears Isaiah's name consists of 66 chapters, which fall into two very distinct collections of prophetic discourses: chs. 1–35 and chs. 40–66, which are separated by a stretch of narrative or history, chs. 36–39.

A. Chs. 1–35 are further divisible into at least five sections—(1) 1–12 a series of orations upon the religious and political state both of Judah in face of invasions by Assyria and by the confederates Syria and N. Israel, and of N. Israel in face of an invasion by Assyria; as well as upon the Messianic future of Israel. There is also a series of narratives recounting Isaiah's call (6), his interview with king Ahaz (7), and other measures that he took (8); as well as a song of praise (12). This section seems composed of independent groups of oracles. Ch. 1 appears to stand by itself, and carries a title which more than covers the contents of the whole section, 'the reigns which it enumerates exhaust the range of Isaiah's career.' At the head of ch. 2 there is another title which appears to cover 2–4, which form a unity by themselves. Ch. 5 stands apart from them, and is itself composed of independent pieces. Then we have the pieces of narrative: 6 by itself on the prophet's vision in the year Uzziah died, and $7–8^4$ containing more oracles and running out into others $8^5–9^7$, all of them apparently from the reign of Ahaz. $9^8–10^4$, along with 5^{25-30}, which obviously belongs to them, from an oracle against N. Israel. 10^{5-34} is an oracle against Assyria, and ch. 11 consists of two prophecies, one of the Messiah (vv.$^{1-9}$), the other of the restoration of all Israel (vv.$^{10-16}$). Ch. 12 is the lyric already alluded to. (2) Chs. 13–23 contain a series of oracles upon heathen nations, with a few upon Judah, but none upon N. Israel. $13–14^{23}$ treats of the fall of Babylon; 14^{24-27} is on Assyria, and vv.$^{28-32}$ against the Philistines, assigned by its title to the year of Ahaz' death; 15. 16 on Moab; 17^{1-11} on the fall of Damascus and N. Israel; vv.$^{12-14}$, the repulse of Assyria; 18, the same in the form of an address to Ethiopia; 19 on Egypt—vv.$^{16-25}$ appear to be separate from vv.$^{1-15}$; 20 on Egypt, with a bit of narrative that points to Sargon's march against her about 711; 21^{1-10} on Babylon, 'oracle of the wilderness of the sea,' vv.$^{11, 12}$ on Edom, vv.$^{13-17}$ on Arabia; 22^{1-14} against Jerusalem during a siege, and vv.$^{15-25}$ against Shebna, a statesman of Judah; 23^{1-14} on Tyre, with an appendix vv.$^{15-18}$. (3) 24–27, an apocalyptic prophecy, describing the judgment of the whole world by supernatural convulsions, the blessedness of Israel who shall be rescued, and the resurrection of their dead. (4) 28–33, a series of oracles reflecting, apparently, the historical circumstances of Isaiah's day; 28^{1-6} predictive of the fall of Samaria, vv.$^{7-22}$ a controversy with the dissolute politicians of Jerusalem; 29^{1-8} the abasement and subsequent deliverance of Jerusalem, vv.$^{9-14}$ the spiritual stupidity of Jerusalem, vv.$^{15-24}$ exposure of a conspiracy of the court with Egypt, suddenly changing to a prediction of the future deliverance; 30^{1-17} a return to the Egyptian alliance with denun-

* Eichhorn and Möller, quoted by Vatke, Einl. 620, assigned chs. 40–66 to reign of Manasseh. None of the titles in the Bk. of Isaiah affirm that he prophesied under Manasseh.

† Some deduce from 2 K 20^4 that he lived in 'the middle' or 'lower city' (Cheyne, Encyl. Brit.^{9} xiii. 378).

ciations, vv.[18-26] a picture of the Messianic age, vv.[27-33] apocalyptic judgment on Assyria; 31 the Egyptian alliance, with a promise for Israel and doom on Assyria; 32^{1-8} a picture of the Messianic age, vv.[9-14] against the women of Jerusalem, vv.[15-20] another picture of the future; 33 denunciation of an invader of Judah, and affirmation of her deliverance. (5) Chs. 34. 35, Israel's triumph over Edom, return from exile, and blessedness.

B. Then follows the historical section 36–39, of which 36 f. narrates Sennacherib's demand for the surrender of Jerusalem; 38, Hezekiah's sickness and cure, with his hymn; and 39, Merodach-baladan's embassy to Hezekiah.

C. Chs. 40–66, the real or assumed standpoint of the bulk of which is the end of the Babylonian exile, though there are some chapters which appear to have been written in Palestine. (See below.)

IV. Criticism of the Authenticity of the Book.—The preceding analysis reveals not only that the Bk. of Isaiah is the combination of several earlier collections of oracles (ch. 1 a general preface, (a) 2–12 consisting of minor collections, (b) 13–27, (c) 28–35, (d) 36–39 (?), (e) 40–66), but also that, while many of these have obviously risen from the circumstances of Isaiah's own day, others reflect other periods, especially the Babylonian exile, and some, e.g. the apocalyptic passages, betray a style and temper very different from the oracles that belong to Isaiah's lifetime. Moreover, while some of the collections are entitled Isaiah's, others make no claim to be from his hand. Nevertheless, though Ibn Ezra hinted a few doubts and Calvin wrote as if he felt that ch. 55 at least was 'uttered during the captivity in Babylon' (on 55^{3}), up to the end of last century the book was universally understood to be covered by the title in its first verse, and therefore as Isaiah's throughout. About 1780, J. B. Koppe in the Germ. ed. of Lowth's Commentary was the first to undermine this position. He was followed by Eichhorn (Introd. iii. 76), and by Döderlein (Esaias, 1789, Præf. xii), who takes it as obvious that 40 ff. are by an anonymous prophet about the end of the Exile. (Vatké refers to a more detailed proof of this by J. E. Justi). Not without opposition from the conservative school (e.g. J. V. Möller, De authentia oracc. Es. cc. 40–66), this view was developed by the great critics of the beginning of this century; and it was further perceived that if 40–66 be exilic, parts of 1–39 must also fall to the same date. In 13^{1}–14^{23} 21^{1-10} 34. 35 Assyria is no longer as in Isaiah's day the dominant world power, nor do these oracles emphasize Jerusalem as the inviolate fortress of God. Babylon takes Assyria's place, her fall is imminent, Israel is in exile but about to be restored. To these non-Isaian chapters the critics added 24–27, which, although they appear to have some reflections of the age before the Exile, and do not allude to Babylon, yet contain phrases descriptive of the Exile as actual, with promises of Israel's deliverance therefrom, and hopes of the establishment of Zion, and the repopulation of the Holy Land. To this list of exilic and post-exilic oracles some added ch. 12, and it was agreed that 15–16^{12} was an oracle older than Isaiah's time, to which Isaiah himself added $16^{13, 14}$. All the rest of the discourses in 1–39, save for some glosses, were still regarded as Isaiah's own.

Such was virtually the position of criticism down to 1890. It had been established by Gesenius, Ewald, Knobel, and Reuss, and was supported by Kuenen (in 1863), Cheyne (Is. chronol. arranged, 1870, Prophecies of Is. 1880–81, though there is little introduction in this vol., and Enc. Brit. art. 'Isaiah,' 1881; see below on 40–66), Delitzsch (who had previously argued for the unity of the book, but in 1879–80 interpreted 40–66 as from the close of the Exile; see more fully his Comm.[4] 1889, Eng. ed. 1890), W. R. Smith (Proph. of Isr. 1882), Driver (Isaiah, Life and Times, 1888), G. A. Smith (The Expositor's Bible, 1888), Dillmann (1890). Some of these carried their doubts further than the passages described above. To the non-Isaian oracles some added 23^{15-18}, some the whole of 23, some 19 in whole or part, and some even 33. Others (see below) denied the unity of 40–66. Even conservative critics like Oehler, von Orelli, and Bredenkamp accepted 40–66 as from another than Isaiah, but the latter two argued for the authenticity of several of the disputed passages in 1–39, Bredenkamp and Klostermann for some in 40–66.

During the last ten years the Bk. of Isaiah, in common with all the prophetic writings, has been subjected to a still more rigorous analysis and criticism, with the result that while Kirkpatrick (Doct. of the Prophets, 1892), Driver (Introd.[6]), and Skinner (Cambridge Bible for Schools, 1896) adhere in the main to the position of the majority of critics before 1890, Duhm (in Nowack's Handkommentar, 1892), Hackmann (Die Zukunftserwartung des Jes. 1893), Cheyne (Introd to the Bk. of Is. 1895, cf. his edition of the text and translation in Haupt's SBOT, 1898), have cast doubt upon the authenticity of many more portions of 1–39. There can be no question that the thorough analysis to which those critics have subjected the text of 1–39 has been successful in discovering a number of late glosses and other insertions in the genuine prophecies of Isaiah. In all the prophetic books the presence of such is now generally recognized. But Duhm, Hackmann, and Cheyne have cut more deeply than this, and subtracted from Isaiah long passages which were previously regarded as genuine. Their reasons are sometimes mainly subjective; they base their conclusions upon the precarious distinction between the real Isaian style and what they consider to be imitations of it, or infer them from a change of rhythm. The feature of Duhm's able essay is the relegation of a considerable number of passages to the 2nd and even to the 1st cent. before Christ. He founds this upon their apocalyptic character, but he reserves for Isaiah not a few oracles and phrases quite as apocalyptic as those he transfers to the late date. In the latter, too, there are historical allusions which are suitable to the Assyrian period; Duhm either alters the reading of these, or strains their meaning to suit the Greek period. And, finally, there is the almost indubitable fact which he fails to discredit, that the prophetic Canon was so fixed by B.C. 200 as to render impossible the inclusion within it of the prophetic Book of Daniel. Duhm, indeed, argues that the latter was excluded because of its apocalyptic character; but if he is right, the same reason should have excluded from the Bk. of Isaiah the passages which, because of their apocalyptic character, Duhm assigns to the 2nd cent. This argument therefore, for the presence in Isaiah of features of so late a date, may be said to have failed (for details see Expositor, July to Dec. 1892, and Crit. Review, 1893). Hackmann (op. cit. p. 143 ff.) denies to Isaiah the two pictures of the Messiah 9^{1-6} and 11^{1-9}—the former on the grounds that it starts from the ruin of the Jewish state which was not actual in Isaiah's time, and implies a rejection of the reigning king, Ahaz or Hezekiah, and a confidence in an unborn One, which it is inconceivable to associate with Isaiah. It suits better a time when there was no king in Israel and the people had not independent existence. The destruction of David's dynasty is also implied, he thinks, by 11^{1-9}, the picture of universal peace in which and the 'supernatural' elements are further symptoms of a late date. These reasons are anything but conclusive. Few will doubt that the delinquencies of Ahaz furnished sufficient occasion to Isaiah for his hope of the appearance of a real champion and righteous ruler of Israel. It is equally hard to believe the great prophet incapable, at that age in Israel, of a dream of universal peace; one might as well argue that such a dream was impossible in the post-exilic period (to which Hackmann relegates it) because many of the writings of the latter, like Jl 4 and 'Zec' 10, exhibit a rude delight in war. The truth is that among all nations and in all periods of their history the hope of peace has existed along with a belief in the necessity of war, and even with a delight in it. Hackmann finds a more plausible reason (147 f.) for a late date for these passages in their language, which bears a few post-exilic features. He also denies to Isaiah the well-known passage 2^{2-5}, repeated in Mic 4^{1-5}, on the ground that its ideals of the sovereignty of J″ over foreign nations, their adoption of His law, the supremacy of the temple, and universal peace, agree better with a post-exilic than with a pre-exilic date (so, too, Mitchell, Isaiah, a Study of Chaps. i.–xii., New York, 1897, 108 ff.). On the last point an answer has been given above; nor on any of the others is there anything incompatible with a date in the 8th century. (So even Duhm: on the details see the present writer's Twelve Proph. i. 365 f.). Cheyne, who had previously (see above) agreed with the majority of critics as to what were Isaiah's authentic prophecies, stated modifications of his views in the JQR for 1891 f., and in 1895 published his very able and thorough Introd. to the Bk. of Isaiah, in which, while accepting some of Duhm's and Hackmann's results, he went still further and withdrew nearly a third of 1–12 from Isaiah, and from the oracles hitherto regarded as genuine in 13–35 nearly a half. It is impossible to examine his argument in details. His general principle must be regarded as sound by all who have worked at the text of the prophets, viz. that to the oracles of even the greatest of the prophets later generations of Israel added supplements, in order to mitigate unqualified messages of doom, or for other purposes of edification. This is a principle, however, in the application of which there must naturally be very great difference of opinion. The conclusions do largely depend on the subjectivity of the critic; and, speaking generally (which is all that the space of this article permits), it must be said that Cheyne's reasons for withdrawing passages from Isaiah are sometimes very hypothetical, and that, to say the least, there often exist in the periods to which he assigns these passages as many difficulties as in the age of Isaiah. There is not a little arbitrariness, as, for instance, when he says that the post-exilic origin of 2^{2-5} is 'beyond reasonable doubt'; or in reference to 15. 16 (which he takes to be not pre- but post-Isaian) 'was Isaiah the man to use another prophet's material?' There is sometimes an undue depreciation of the literary (cf. p. 88) and spiritual abilities of the pre-exilic period in Israel, especially if one keeps in mind the wonderful composition of the constituents of JE. And one may reasonably ask whether hope and comfort were not as much required by Israel, and not as likely to be contributed by her greatest prophet, in the 8th cent. as after the Exile. These considerations detract from the conclusiveness of Cheyne's powerful and candid arguments. Some further details may be noticed. In ch. 1, vv.$^{2-4}$ and $^{27.\,28}$ are taken from Isaiah, hardly with sufficient reason; 4^{2-6} is placed after the Exile, probably correctly; on 9^{1-6} 'Hackmann is probably right,' and better though still not conclusive reasons are offered for a date later than Isaiah; so with 11^{1-8}. In 13–23, 19 is all post-exilic (Skinner agrees that vv.$^{16-25}$ are probably so). 23^{15-18} is (in agreement with previous critics) a later addition. It is in 29–33 that Cheyne withdraws most from Isaiah: he gives strong reasons for the post-exilic date of 29^{16-24}, less strong for that of 30^{18-26}; 32 is also assigned to after the Exile, but hardly with sufficient reason, though strong objections to Isaiah's authorship are not unduly stated. 33 has been suspected as not authentic since Ewald's time. Kuenen placed it under Josiah or later, Stade after the Exile, and to the latter Cheyne inclines. There are indeed several difficulties both of style and substance in assigning the ch. to Isaiah (cf. Skinner; Driver leaves it with Isaiah).

V. The Prophecies of the Messiah in Isaiah 1–39. — In addition to the examination of the different passages given above, the Messianic element in Is 1–39 requires a more general discussion, not only because of its intrinsic importance, but on account of the tendency of recent criticism to deny that the Messiah appeared at all in the prophecy of Israel before the Exile. This thesis, stated by Marti (Gesch. der Isr. Rel. 190), has been elaborated by Paul Volz (Die vorexil. Jahweprophetie u. der Messias, Göttingen, 1897, cf. Brückner, Komp. des B. Jes.). Besides the evidence stated above from the language and historical allusions of the separate Messianic passages, the following are the chief reasons offered. The functions assigned to the Messiah by the disputed passages are not religious but political: to rescue Israel from her heathen tyrants and to govern her in righteousness, but neither to teach the people of God, whether as prophet or as priest, nor to convert the heathen. The rôle is national, not universal. How, it is asked, can these features be harmonized either with this fact that before the Exile the temper of prophecy is mainly threatening and judicial, or with that other, that when the pre-exilic prophets do open up the future they lay down the lines of a universal ethic? Besides, where is there room for so glorious a representative of J″ in a future which is to be filled with the manifest and all-sufficient presence of J″ Himself?

To the present writer these arguments not only appear inconclusive for a late date of the Messianic passages, but in some respects appear to support the tradition of an early date. For, that the functions of the Messiah are described in the passages as national surely suits an early, rather than the later, stages of Israel's religious development; no detailed picture of the Messiah which was later than the second Isaiah could have omitted the duties and hopes on which the latter so brilliantly insists, of converting the heathen to the knowledge and discipline of J″. Nor is the temper of pre-exilic prophecy so exclusively judicial as is now frequently alleged. The prophets insist that a remnant of Israel shall survive the judgment. Isaiah himself not only predicted, but, during the most influential period of his career, strenuously laboured for, the continuation of the Jewish State. It is not a different dispensation which, like the later apocalyptic prophecy, he anticipates, but a continuance of the present political conditions, purified and exalted. Now among these political conditions in Judah, was the dynasty of David. In contrast with the frequent usurpations of the throne of N. Israel, David's house persisted in Judah practically unchallenged. Since David's own day the religion of J″ was closely wedded with the dynasty, and, besides, David had been successful in achieving the ideal of the unity of all Israel. By Isaiah's time, therefore, the political presuppositions of the Messianic oracles in Is 1–39 were all present. We may even affirm that it would have been passing strange if his anticipations of the religious and political future of Judah had been dissociated from the Davidic monarchy. Moreover, it ought not to be forgotten that none of these disputed passages attribute to the Messiah any of the measures for achieving the establishment of Israel which were required by the exilic or immediately post-exilic ages of the nation's history. There is no word in them of bringing back the exiles or portions of God's people scattered over the world; and no word of the post-exilic dream of a world-empire. On the contrary, in the tasks which these passages assign to the Messiah, we see exactly the two main ends upon which Isaiah's prophetic activity was bent: the deliverance of Judah from the Assyrian invasion which overthrew the kingdom of N. Israel, and the establishment of justice and a pure civic life among the people of J″.

Such considerations amply disprove Volz's contention that the conception of the Messiah was one foreign to the spirit of prophecy, and only dragged into the service of their doctrine by the later prophets, out of the popular religion of Israel. It is true that the hope of the Messiah may have been an article of the popular creed, just as, according to Amos, was the hope of the victorious day of J″. But if the prophets, and, in particular, Isaiah, did not actually create the ideal of a victorious and righteous monarch for Israel, Isaiah certainly re-created it: gave it those moral elements with which we may be sure the popular religion was incapable of investing it.

VI. The Theology of Isaiah.—We are now in a position to discern the authentic doctrine of Isaiah upon God, religion, Israel, and the world. Like all the earlier prophets, Isaiah reveals his doctrine in no abstract or systematic form, but point by point in connexion with some event of contemporary history or some emergent phase of the character of his generation. Now two great facts were before him, and may be said to have formed from first to last the starting-point, if not the full premise, of his teaching. One was the moral badness of Israel's life, taken along with their stupid misunderstanding of what their God required of them. Isaiah's generation were not as a whole consciously apostate from J″; they were assiduous in His worship, lavish of sacrifice to Him, and careful to observe at all points the ritual which they believed to be His will. But they were shamelessly immoral. Luxury and the vices which spring from it sapped the national life. The administration of justice was corrupt. The rich oppressed the poor, civic duties were neglected. All this evil state of the people was contrary to the will of J″, and due to their misunderstanding of the character and demands of their God. He was a God of righteousness, and He had already made known to Israel His torah, as a demand for the very virtues they neglected. He loathed the assiduous worship which they combined with a life so immoral. He regarded the evil features of the latter as sin and rebellion, which required a very thorough punishment, one severe enough to destroy the bulk of the nation.*

Coincident with this state of sinfulness, in which the people were plunged, was the second fact from which Isaiah's prophecies started. The power of Assyria rose on the political horizon, threatening the destruction of all the principalities of Palestine. There had been Assyrian campaigns in N. Syria since 870. Damascus had fallen before one of them in 803, and her forces had suffered another defeat in 773. Then came a pause of nearly thirty years. But in 745, or at least five years before Isaiah's call to prophesy, Tiglath-pileser III., a soldier of great energy, usurped the Assyrian throne, and set in motion a more vigorous policy towards Palestine. The siege of Arpad and the subjugation of Babylon detained him for nine years, but in 734–733 he overthrew Damascus and swept into captivity, besides its people, the Israelite populations of Gilead and Galilee. Isaiah had perhaps at first been uncertain whether the required punishment of Israel would proceed from Assyria or from Egypt, the only other power at that time which was capable of contesting with Syria the lordship of Palestine (cf. 7^{18}). But those proofs of Assyrian power, and the novel Assyrian policy of sweeping into distant captivity the bulk of the subjugated peoples,—those proofs which came with the years 734, 733,—settled the question once for all. Assyria was the destined rod of J″'s anger, and this should accomplish itself not only in the overthrow of N. Israel, to which Isaiah holds out no hope, but in the thorough invasion of Judah. It is an interesting problem, in what proportion the moral conviction of Israel's guilt needing punishment on the one hand, and the political certainty of Assyria's advance on the other, contributed to the assurance of Isaiah's predictions. Of this we may be sure, however, that without their native convictions of J″'s righteousness and power of judgment upon Israel, the prophets could only have viewed the Assyrian advance as a perplexing, if not a paralyzing, problem. But instead of so feeling it, Isaiah is ready for Assyria, predicts the certainty of invasion while the bulk of his people still doubt the latter, and is very clear as to its meaning. That which enabled him and other prophets to see in the advance of Assyria a moral intention, which was to exhaust itself in the destruction of all the Syrian States, but stop short of the utter overthrow of Judah, was the character of Judah's God, His might above all the gods of the heathen, and His purpose of grace not to let His people be abolished. The advance of Assyria was, therefore, a secondary and subordinate factor in the inspiration of Isaiah. At the same time the appearance of the greatest empire of the age, as obviously the instrument of Israel's God, must have lent to the prophets' ideas of His government a largeness to which the religious imagination of Israel had not previously attained (see Ch. IV. of Bk. of the Twelve Proph. in the 'Expositor's Bible'). And so we find in Isaiah a conception of the divine providence of the world more wide and majestic than anything that had yet appeared in Israel, although several of its features had already been expressed by Amos and are implied in parts of the JE documents of the Pentateuch. All the forces of the world are subject to J″. The great empires unconsciously fulfil His will upon Israel: the heathen peoples, however they rage, break upon the limits He sets to their advance, as the sea breaks upon its shore. These limits are drawn at the utter destruction of His people. An Israel, however shortened and cut down, must survive. To this end Isaiah (though he sometimes appears to abandon the impenitent people to the destruction they court by their foolishness) insists for the most part on the inviolableness of Jerusalem. Judah may be overrun by the invader: Jerusalem cannot fall. Her security is an essential part of the providence of God.

The constant emphasis which Isaiah lays upon the inviolableness of this one spot of earth, this obscure highland fortress, not only as a settled fact of the future (10^{24-34}) but as an essential article of religious faith (28^{16} etc.), has been criticized as derogating from the spirituality of the religion he taught. But it must be kept in mind that Jerusalem was the one spot on earth where J″ was worshipped. His shrine was there. There lived the only community which preserved for mankind the true knowledge of Him and His purposes—the little band of disciples to whom Isaiah committed His testimony and revelation. The continued existence in the world of this spiritual Israel (it is the first conception in history of the Church within the Church) is what Isaiah believes in and proclaims with such unwearied assurance against both the fears of their rulers and the arrogance of the heathen who sought their overthrow. But for their continuance the inviolableness of at least Jerusalem was necessary; otherwise they had been blotted out of history like N. Israel itself. The Assyrian policy, to judge from the case of N. Israel, did not leave room for the survival of a people of J″ among its captives, as the Babylonian did more than a century later. To interpret, therefore, Isaiah's insistence on the inviolableness of Zion as if it were derogatory to the ethical and spiritual character of his teaching, is as unjust as it would be to bring the charge of unspirituality against any of the great leaders of Christianity who have insisted in a time of persecution that the Church shall not perish, but in spite of its present tyrants survive in freedom and peace. There was no other way for a spiritual community to exist in Isaiah's day except through the security of Jerusalem. And, as we have seen above, it is also in connexion with the survival of a people of J″ that the promise of a victorious and righteous ruler comes so naturally, if not inevitably, into Isaiah's predictions.

* That Judah was equally sinful with N. Israel, in Isaiah's regard, appears not only from ch. 1, from whatever date this proceeds, but in the inaugural vision 'people of unclean lips' (6^{5}), and 2^{11-17} where in v.^{16} at least Judah is meant.

The charge of unspirituality which is brought against the emphasis on Zion's security as a fortress might have had some justice in it if Isaiah had anywhere attempted to provide for that security by merely political means. But, on the contrary, his conviction of God's purpose to preserve Jerusalem is so profoundly spiritual that it leads him to condemn Israel's own restless attempts to save their State; and he does so with as much fierceness as he has condemned their immorality. They will not trust their God any more than they will obey His law; but, on the contrary, distrustful of His purpose and His power, they seek to effect Zion's safety by intrigues and alliances with the heathen. These, says Isaiah, will only draw them into the confusion of the world's politics, from which trust in J″ would assuredly keep them free. So, first, we find him seeking to restrain Ahaz from appealing for help to Assyria when Judah is threatened by Pekah of N. Israel and Rezin of Damascus (7): let them do their worst, they cannot harm Judah; but if Ahaz persists in calling on Assyria, J″ will punish his unbelief by summoning the heathen, either Egypt or Assyria (v.[18]), to overrun his land. Yet in spite of this, when Ahaz has thrown himself upon Assyria, and Judah settled down in quietness for thirty years as an Assyrian vassal, thus escaping the fate which destroyed N. Israel, Isaiah accepts the fact; and when, in 704, on the accession of Sennacherib, the nations of Palestine throw off their allegiance to the northern empire, he seeks to prevent Judah from joining them, and uses all his powers of counsel, scorn, and threatening to circumvent the political party at Jerusalem that intrigues for an alliance with Egypt (28–31). This apparent change of Isaiah's attitude to Assyria was not due to political opportunism, or only to the political experience of these thirty years, that Judah was as safe in allegiance to Assyria as in 734 he had believed she would be by abstaining from all intercourse with that heathen empire, but to the unchanging conviction that whatever Judah's political relations might be in the providence of God, He was able to preserve her by Himself, and that her rulers' forgetfulness of this, and their anxiety to take measures of their own, would only, because of the unbelief which was their motive, end in disgrace and ruin. Besides, the intrigue with Egypt was a breach of faith with Assyria, an unhallowed and immoral thing, and this was a second proof to Isaiah that it could not succeed. He found a third in the blindness of the Jewish statesmen to the weakness of Egypt, which promised much, but never did, or could do, aught to help those who trusted in her. This gives him occasion to say that, clever as the politicians deem themselves to be, J″ is more wise. J″'s measures for the security of Jerusalem are not mere arbitrary or supernatural exhibitions of power against her foes, but rational counsel to her statesmen, advice to keep clear of Egypt and to continue faithful to the Assyrian alliance.

The Jewish statesmen did not listen to Isaiah; and when Sennacherib invaded Palestine in 701, he found Hezekiah, like all his neighbour princes, in a state of revolt. Even then, however, Isaiah did not abate his confidence in the deliverance of Jerusalem. Once, indeed, his people seemed so corrupt, so abandoned to distrust of J″, and so incapable of the repentance to which he called them, that he announced the impossibility of their forgiveness, and condemned them to death (22^{1-14}). This, however, was momentary. Something happened to change their disposition. What it was exactly we cannot say. The most probable supposition is that Hezekiah submitted to Sennacherib, and bought the security of his city by a large tribute; but that having accepted this the Assyrian returned with heavier and more insolent demands (36. 37). Hezekiah and his statesmen were in despair (37^{1}), and the population, it would appear, ready to yield (36^{11}). Isaiah alone stood firm. Judah was sufficiently punished, the Assyrian in his arrogance made it clear that he expected the city to fall, because its God was no better than the gods of the States he had already overthrown. Isaiah affirmed such arrogance must be punished by J″, who would deliver His now penitent people. And the deliverance came. The hosts of Sennacherib appear to have been visited by the plague during their approach to the Egyptian border,—always in antiquity a region liable to such a visitation,—and the Assyrian corps that invested Jerusalem was suddenly withdrawn (cf. Isaiah 1–39 in 'Expositor's Bible'; Driver's Isaiah in 'Men of the Bible'; McCurdy, HPM, 1896, §§ 675–710). But however this may have been, Jerusalem was relieved, and Isaiah's predictions of her siege and ultimate deliverance literally fulfilled, and fulfilled, too, mainly by his own unbroken confidence and energy. It was, indeed, a victory of that faith by which the world is overcome. The people of J″, though sorely punished, were saved, the continuity of Israel's history preserved, and all the subsequent development of their religion made possible.

The above outline of Isaiah's doctrine and statesmanship makes it clear that while his long experience of the world's history, during one of its most critical periods, expanded and illustrated his belief in God, it was the latter which was the origin and root of all his convictions and his efforts on behalf of Israel. This is what Isaiah himself tells us (6). His ministry started from a vision of J″; and as his record of this vision is not placed at the beginning of his book, but after the first collection of his prophecies, and as the impressions he received from it appear (especially from vv.[9, 10]) to be stated as if articulated and developed by his subsequent experience, we may see in the chapter not only the origins, but a full record, of his belief about God. J″ is the Lord or King, immeasurably exalted above everything human. His sublimity is the ruling impression on the prophet's mind, and throughout the discourses it appears again and again, in contrast both to the puny pride and ambition, 'everything high,' in Israel themselves (2), and to the overweening arrogance of the Assyrian (10, etc.). This infinite, awful sublimity is in the main what Isaiah expresses by J‴s holiness—a term whose root-meaning is probably that of separateness. But by the prophet himself this holiness is personally felt most keenly in its contrast to his own and his people's sin. The first conscience excited in Isaiah by the vision of the thrice-holy God is that he is a man of unclean lips, and dwells among a people of unclean lips (6^5). Before he can be of use to such a Deity, his uncleanness must be purged away ($6^{6f.}$). And so, before a people can be the people of God, their iniquity must be punished and driven out of them. The awful severity of this judgment (6^{9-12} and in many other passages) is a consequence of J‴s holiness. Isaiah lived through terrible times; he predicted a fearfully rigorous judgment of God's own people by God Himself. Everywhere he betrays a burning sense of the awful earnestness of life, and the pitilessness of the divine providence in dealing with sin, with folly, and with pride. All these are consequences of the holiness of God, and another consequence is the irresistibleness of the power by which His judgments are carried through.

But though the majestic transcendence of God, and His sovereign independence of everything human and earthly, his exaltation above every entanglement and compromise of the world's life is thus the ruling article of Isaiah's creed; the prophet almost equally emphasizes the divine immanence in the world and the history of man. The correlative of J‴s holiness is His glory, of which the earth is full (6^3). J″ is not only the infinitely High, but the infinitely Near. His moral interest in man's conduct extends to the minutest details. He sees and is touched by every mood and change of His people's character. He marks each fault they have, loathes each sin, feels each wound, and is swift to respond to each turn of their hearts in penitence. His passion for them, His 'zeal' or 'jealousy,' is quick and powerful. Nor is J‴s interest confined to Israel. The oracles of Isaiah on the foreign nations, and especially those on Egypt and Tyre, not only reveal that J‴s standards of righteousness are for them also, and that their sins are punished by Him as transgressions against Himself, but that He has pity for their teeming multitudes, and rejoices in their particular civilizations and destinies.

Parallel to this doctrine of the immanence and practical interest of J″ in men's life runs Isaiah's constant teaching as to His reasonableness. He is no arbitrary Deity whom Isaiah reveals, but the father and teacher of His people, who reasons and argues with them, who commends His ways to them, in opposition to their own measures, by pointing out the greater wisdom and effectiveness of the former. J″ is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in that kind of wisdom which carries things through (28^{29}). He asks their trust in His guidance, because of its reasonableness, and not simply because it is His will (29^{34}). In the most harrowing and apparently destructive processes of history He proceeds by method (28^{23-29}). The politicians think themselves clever: He also is wise, and has His own righteous purposes, which He will effect in time: the destruction of evil-doers, and in the end the rescue of His people, however much He needs first to beat and break them down (31). In short, He is a God who works in history as in nature by law—El mishpaṭ is His name (30^{18}); the simplest of His moral principles effect, if violated, their own revenge (28); leave the tendencies of history, too, to Him, and they will issue right. With all this insistence on law moral and natural, is to be noted the absence of miracle and 'supernatural signs'; only once does Isaiah even seem to appeal to the latter ($7^{10ff.}$). The divine government of the world is manifested in natural and historical processes. The unity of these processes, which all over the visible world was conspicuously illustrated by the Assyrian empire, is for Isaiah himself a corollary from his belief in the transcendent sovereignty of J″. Smend says truly (AT Religionsgeschichte, 206) that 'the idea of the Weltgeschichte dates from Isaiah: its oldest meaning is the glorification of the One God.'

Isaiah has received from the Christian Church the title of the Evangelical Prophet. This was given mainly in the belief that chs. 40–66 were also by him. But, even in the prophecies which criticism has left to him, we find the elements of the doctrines of Grace. God forgives sin, the most heinous and defiling (1^{18}). Though He has passed sentence of death upon His people (22^{14}), their penitence procures for them His pardon and deliverance (36. 37). Necessarily severe as His judgment is, cruelly as His providence bears upon sin and folly, His love and pity towards His own never fail (14^{32}). He is their well-beloved, and has constantly cared for them ($5^{1ff.}$). It is His passion for them that works their deliverance (9^7). He longs to be gracious, and to have mercy even when His people are most given to their own destructive courses; and He waits eagerly for their prayers to Him ($30^{18f.}$).

Of the future which shall follow Judah's judgment and deliverance Isaiah makes several predictions (cf. ESCHATOLOGY OF OT, vol. i. 736 ff.). First, as was to be expected, he emphasizes its ethical features. The sinners having been destroyed (1^{28}), and Jerusalem purified, the city shall be a city of righteousness ($1^{25ff.}$), under a righteous ruler (9^7 $11^{4ff.}$). But above all J‴s own presence and government shall be very manifest, with exceeding joy and glory. As a result, men shall abandon all their idols (2^{20} etc.), the worship of which (as we ought to have noted above) had not wholly disappeared from Israel, in spite of the fact that the national religion was that of J″. With righteousness shall come peace (2^4, if this be Isaiah's, 9^7 11^3), and with peace the renewed fertility, and the free enjoyment of the fruits of the soil (1^{19} 4^2 30^{23-26}). In the last of these passages the promise is given in terms of great beauty, and suited to the needs of a people whose fields had been overrun by war for more years than one, and who have been cooped up by siege. Over all a wonderful light shall be shed: it is the symbol of the dispersion of the people's present gloom. Moreover, the nations shall willingly come to Jerusalem to be taught of Israel's God and His torah ($2^{2f.}$; but see above, § IV., where it is pointed out that there are some objections to the authenticity of this passage). On the Messiah see above, §§ IV. V. Isaiah's Messiah is a human king, of the stock of David, and with functions that are political, both military and judicial. He is not the mediator of religious gifts to His people: forgiveness, knowledge of God, and the like. It is only in this, that he saves the people of God from destruction and reigns over them, that he can be regarded as a type of Jesus Christ.

VII. RELIGIOUS REFORMS IN ISAIAH'S TIME.—It would have been strange if a prophet so practical and statesmanlike, and so influential with the rulers of Judah, had not left his mark on legislation and ritual. We cannot believe the author of the oracles against images, the spirit that organized the city's deliverance from Assyria, to have been idle in the long opportunity of reforms afforded by the accession of Hezekiah, and by the years of peace which followed till the death of Sargon, or again during the few years, uncertain in number, of Hezekiah's lifetime after the relief of Jerusalem in 701. It is to the former of these periods that 2 K 18 assigns certain drastic reforms of worship, of which it gives the credit to Hezekiah. The list of them given in v.[4] contains the removal of the high places, the mazzēbôth or pillars, the 'ashērîm (see ASHERAH), and the brazen serpent called Nehushtan, to which the people burned incense; and in v.[22] the Rabshakeh is reported to have said to the Jews in 701 that Hezekiah had already removed the high places. The integrity of v.[4] has been justly doubted: the grammar is of late Hebrew. It has also been maintained (Wellhausen, Isr. u. Jüd. Gesch., and Stade, GVI 1607 f.) that the only reform which we have any just ground for leaving with Hezekiah is the destruction of the brazen serpent and other images, which, because in 705 ff. Isaiah represents it as still future (30[22]), can only have taken place after 701.

In ascribing to Hezekiah the destruction of the high places, mazzēbôth and 'ashērîm, it is alleged that the hand intruded into v.[4] and the editor of v.[22] have wrongly anticipated reforms which were not effected till a century later by Josiah. But while this conclusion is undoubtedly favoured by the language of v.[4], it ignores the probabilities on the other side. It is quite true that Isaiah, while condemning images, says nothing against the high places, the mazzēbôth and the 'ashērîm. But to condemn images, and to do away with them, was to destroy the significance of the high places, which depended on their worship, and to concentrate the people's faith on the sanctuary in Zion, where J″ was not worshipped under any form. Besides, the Assyrian invasion, devastating as it did the whole country and yet incapable of violating Zion, worked mightily to the discredit of the high places, and the proof of Zion's unique holiness. We may also say that though Isaiah is not reported to have condemned the high places,* yet his fundamental principle of the oneness and spirituality of J″ must, according to the religious notions then prevalent, have logically involved the abolition of the high places, at which there was not only a half-pagan ritual, but the tendency also to think of the deity worshipped as a local deity different from J″ of Jerusalem. We are justified, then, in believing in the probability of some measures during Hezekiah's reign for the removal of the high places. But, even if we hesitate to affirm this, we may at least state with certainty that Isaiah, both by his doctrine of J″ as the one true God, who could not be worshipped under the form of an image made by man, and in his insistence upon the solitary inviolateness of Zion and in the unaided faith and energy by which he secured this, laid the indispensable foundation for the legislation of Deuteronomy and the reforms of Josiah. We may also assert that the measures in this direction which Hezekiah inaugurated under Isaiah's inspiration must have been pretty severe; otherwise they could scarcely have provoked the terrible reaction which followed under Manasseh. In this state of probability, somewhat short of certainty, we must be content, with our present data, to leave the question.

VIII. THE HISTORICAL CHAPTERS 36–39.—These chapters are found also in 2 K 18[13]–20[19], where their text has been somewhat more fully and accurately preserved (for details see Driver, LOT[6] 226 f.; Cheyne, Introd. 215) than here (cf. especially 38). The passage 2 K 18[14-16] is wanting in the Book of Isaiah, and the latter's Psalm of Hezekiah is wanting in Kings. The whole section is very composite. For details we must refer to Dillmann, Duhm, Cheyne, Skinner, and to Stade's analysis in ZATW for 1886. Here it is only possible to give a bare outline. In 36–37 we have two narratives of Sennacherib's endeavour or endeavours to capture Jerusalem: one of them 36–37[8], the other 37[9-38].* Many have read these as the respective accounts of those successive attempts on Jerusalem which we saw above to be the probable course of the Assyrian campaign. But Stade and others have taken them to be variant records of one and the same assault of Sennacherib on Jerusalem, and have divided them as follows: 36[1]–37[9a]+37–38, and 37[9b-37a].† Further, Cheyne believes that in these narratives the following are later insertions, 36[1. 7. 18-20] 37[4], 'to reproach the living God,' [6] 'Wherewith . . . have reviled me,' [8bc 22-32. 34]. On the question of the chronology in 36[1] and 2 K 18[10. 13] see Driver, Isaiah[2], 13; Cheyne, Introd. 216 ff.; Skinner, Is. 1–39, lxxvi f., 262 f. The reported message of Isaiah to Hezekiah 37[22b-35] consists of—(a) a taunt-song in the Ḳinah measure, vv.[22b-29], and (b) the giving of a sign to Hezekiah in another rhythm, vv.[30-32], and (c) a prediction of the relief of Jerusalem, vv.[33-35]. The taunt-song 'appears to be inserted in the narrative from some independent source . . . probably a genuine work of Isaiah'; [33-35] 'the actual message of the prophet on this occasion' (Skinner); but see Cheyne, Introd. 219. Chs. 38. 39 are probably from the same source as 36. 37: Duhm and Cheyne assign them to the author of the second of the two narratives in 36. 37. The 'writing of Hezekiah,' 38[9-20], was assumed even by Kuenen in the 1st ed. of his Onderzoek, ii. 93, and by Dillmann, to be genuine. The present writer expounded it as genuine in the 'Expositor's Bible,' Isai. 1–39, ch. xxv. But he now feels the force of the objections to this, drawn from the language, which has many late features (so Kuenen's later opinion, Duhm, and Cheyne).

IX. PROPHECIES CERTAINLY NOT ISAIAH'S IN CHS. 1–39.—The detailed discussion of these is hardly relevant to an article on Isaiah himself; but a few data may be given concerning the chief of them.

11[10-16].—Dillmann argues for Isaian authorship, but most think the passage implies that the Exile has taken place; the Messiah is not, as in Isaiah's own prophecies, the political ruler of Israel, but the restorer of the exiles and the resort of all nations (cf. Giesebrecht, Beiträge, 25 ff.; Driver, Isaiah[2], 214 f.). 12 is without doubt from a date after the Exile (besides the Commentaries see Francis Brown, Jour. of Bibl. Literature, 1890, 128 ff.). 13[1]–14[23] implies that the Jews are in exile, and in servitude to Babylon, the fall of whose king, however, is imminent; the Medes (13[17]) are already invading Babylonia. The ideas and language do not suit Isaiah's time, but do suit the exilic age. For details see Cheyne, Introd. 69 ff.: Driver dates it a little before B.C. 549. 15[1]–16[12] has usually been attributed, on grounds of difference of style from Isaiah's, and of the suitability of its historical allusions to the time of Jeroboam II., to a prophet of that date (so among others Hitzig, Wellhausen, W. R. Smith, Dillmann, and more doubtfully Driver. Ewald, Kuenen, Baudissin, assign to at least a prophet earlier than Isaiah), Isaiah himself adding $16^{13.14}$. In 1888 Schwally (ZATW 207 ff.) argued for the post-exilic origin of the whole section; and it forms one of those passages which Duhm would bring down to the Hasmonæan period. Cheyne thinks the most conservative theory which is possible is that a post-exilic author combined a genuine oracle on Moab, 16^{14}, with an anonymous pre-exilic prophecy also on Moab, and filled up illegible passages in an antique style. 21^{1-10} was assigned by some early critics (Ewald and others) to the close of the Exile, on the ground that no siege of Babylon such as the passage describes could have interested Judah before then. Then Kleinert (SK, 1877, 174 ff.; so also George Smith the Assyriologist) argued that the passage referred to the first of these sieges of Babylon by the Assyrians in Isaiah's time: 710, 703, 696. To this view Cheyne and Driver at first adhered; but they have recently returned to Ewald's view (Cheyne, Introd. 121 ff.; Driver, LOT[6] 216). Skinner agrees. There can be little doubt that they are right. 24–27, one of the most remarkable sections of prophecy in the OT, cannot be Isaiah's, and must be post-exilic, for the general reasons already given (to be found in greater detail in Driver, LOT[6] 219 ff.; Kirkpatrick, Doct. of the Prophets, 475 ff.; Cheyne, Introd. 145 ff.; and Skinner, Is. 1–39, 204 f.). The exact date is very uncertain. Ewald and Delitzsch both placed it in the late 6th or early 5th cent.; so, too, Dillmann, Kirkpatrick, and Driver 'most plausibly.' Probably the question will ultimately lie between this date and the campaigns of Artaxerxes Ochus, c. 350 (see below on 63^{7}–64), for which Cheyne has ably argued in detail. For an exposition of this very important prophecy see the Comm. and 'Expositor's Bible,' Is. 1–39. 34. 35 are two visions from the same hand, 34 of a general judgment on the Gentiles ($^{1-4}$) and a special doom upon Edom ($^{5-17}$), 35 of the restoration of Israel from exile. Obviously, they must be later than the beginning of the Exile, and the great crime of Edom when the latter took place. With this their language agrees. We are quite unable to fix an exact date. Dillmann (cf. Driver, Is.[2] 131, LOT[6] 226) suggests the end of the Exile. Arguing that the writer quotes late exilic and post-exilic writings, lives in Palestine, feels nothing of the Babylonian oppression, and sees imminent on Edom the same calamity as Mal 1^{1-5} refers to, Cheyne suggests the end of the 5th cent. or even a later period.

* Neither with any certainty is Micah, for the reading of Mic 1[5] is uncertain.

* Another division of the chapters would assign 36[1] (only with the addition 2 K 18[14-16]) to the first invasion of Sennacherib, 36[2]–37 to the second.

† Winckler (Untersuch. 34–36) has attempted to prove that while the first narrative refers to Sennacherib's campaign of 701, the second describes what happened on an alleged return of Sennacherib to Palestine to meet Tirhakah towards the end of his reign between 690 and 681. (Winckler makes the division between the narratives not at 37[9a] but at 37[8a]). But for this there is no conclusive evidence: cf. Cheyne, Introd. 234 f.

X. Structure and Date of Chapters 40–66. —The earliest critics who assigned these chapters to the Exile believed them to be a unity. But in the first place it became obvious that after 52^{12} the style changes as decisively and almost as often as in chs. 1–39, and in the second place critics who continued to support Isaiah's authorship alleged that the references are not all exilic or Babylonian, but that in the later chapters there are reflections of Palestine, and some allusions to the Exile as still to come. These facts gradually led to the perception of the composite character of 40–66. Bleek and Ewald were the first to distinguish this, the latter assigning $40^{1.2}$ 52^{13}–54^{12} and 56^{9}–57^{11} to the reign of Manasseh. In 1881 Cheyne (Enc. Brit.[9]) adhered to the pre-exilic origin of some of these passages, but claimed also that there were others equally separable from the earlier chapters, and these he assigned partly to the early Exile and partly to after the Exile. In 1886 Briggs (Mess. Proph.) sought to prove that the sections on the Servant of the Lord were in a different metre and by a different hand from the rest. In 1889 Kuenen assigned 40–49. 52^{1-12} and perhaps 52^{13}–53^{12} to one author, in the end of the Exile, the rest he considered added by this author himself, or by others, after the Return. In 1890 the present writer argued for the composite character of 40–66. In 1892 Duhm distinguished three authors: the so-called 'second Isaiah' in the Exile,* a post-exilic author of the passages on the Servant, and a 'third Isaiah' the author of the bulk of 56–66. Various articles and monographs appeared, working in the same direction. Then in 1895 Cheyne produced the most finished presentation of the theory: 40–55 from one author who combined in it a cycle of poems on the Servant of Jahweh, and the great prophecy of the restoration;† but 56–66, a collection of ten compositions, all of them from the age of Nehemiah, except 63^{7}–64^{11}, which is probably to be assigned to the reign of Artaxerxes Ochus, or about 360. Meanwhile Dillmann (1890) and Driver [both in the first and sixth (1897) editions of his LOT] adhered to the authorship of the great bulk of the prophecy by one prophet, mostly before but partly also after the Return. Dillmann (p. 363 ff. of his commentary) assigns 40–48 to about 545, 49–62 between 545 and the Return, and 63–66 to the very eve of the Return; only in 66 he sees insertions from a later hand. Driver, upon the resemblance of 56^{9}–57^{11a} and 59^{3-15} to passages in Jeremiah and Ezekiel, takes these to be pre-exilic prophecies incorporated by the author of 49–66 (Isaiah[2], 187 ff.). Cornill (Einleitung in AT) and Wildeboer (Litteratur des AT) admit in 49–62 many signs of composition in Palestine, which, however, do not force us to deny them to the author of 40–48. In 63–66, on the other hand, they find the marks of another and a later writer.

Chs. 40–66 have no title and make no claim to be by Isaiah. 40–48 plainly set forth the ruin of Jerusalem, and the Exile as having already taken place. Israel is addressed as if the time of their penalty in servitude to Babylon were exhausted, and their deliverance is proclaimed as immediate. Cyrus is named as their saviour, and is pointed out as already upon his career, and blessed with success by J". Nor is it possible to argue, as some have tried to do, that the prophet is predicting these things as if they had already happened. For, as part of an argument for the unique divinity of the God of Israel, Cyrus, 'alive and irresistible, and already accredited with success, is pointed out as the unmistakable proof that former prophecies of a deliverance for Israel are already coming to pass. Cyrus, in short, is not presented as a prediction, but as a proof that a prediction is being fulfilled. Unless he had already appeared, and was on the point of striking at Babylon, with all the prestige of unbroken victory, a great part of 40–48 would be unintelligible' (Isai. 40–66, 'Expositor's Bible,' 9 ff.; see the argument there in detail). There is thus a very clear date for these chapters; they must have been written between 555, Cyrus' advent, and 538, Babylon's fall. If 41^{25} implies the union of Cyrus with the Medes in 549, the possible years are reduced to eleven. Perhaps they should be confined between 545, when Cyrus took

* To this author Duhm assigns 40, except vv.[5. 31b], 41, both of which chapters he rearranges, 42^{5-14} (except v.[12]) ^{25}, $43^{1-20a.\ 22-28}$, $44^{1-8.\ 21-28a}$, 45^{1-25} except vv.[10. 13b], $46^{1-5.\ 9-13}$, 47^{1-15} except vv.[3a. 14b], $48^{1a.}$ (to 'Jacob')[3. 5a. 6-7a. 8a. 11-16a.] (to 'there am I')[20. 21], 49^{7-26}, 50^{1-3}, 51 except vv.[11. 15 16. 18], $52^{1.\ 2.\ 7-12}$, 54 except vv.[15a. 17b], 55 except vv.[3a. 7].

† In 40–55 Cheyne finds a number of insertions, for which the reader must be referred to his translation in the Polychrome Bible. The more important are 44^{9-20}. 46^{6-8}, two passages on the artificial idols; $48^{1a.\ 2.\ 4.\ 5b.\ 7b.\ 8b-10.\ 17-19.\ 22}$; 49^{13}–50^{3}, 51^{1-14} except 4b. 5b. 15. 16, $52^{1.\ 2.\ 7-12}$, 54 except v.[15], 55.

Sardis, and 538. With this agree the thoughts, the local colour, and the language of the chapters (on the last see Cheyne, Comm. ii., and Driver, Isaiah[2], 192 ff.). Nor is there any need to limit this proof to 40–48, though Babylon and Cyrus are confined to them. From 49 to 55 the circumstances are still of exile; as A. B. Davidson remarks, 49 is parallel to 42, and takes for granted the picture of Israel's restoration in 48. The first real break occurs at 52^{13}, where the prophecy of the sin-bearing Servant is introduced. Not only is this written with considerable difference of style, but, if it be left out, 54^{1} follows naturally upon 52^{12}. Yet 52^{13}–53 is an evident development from the previous sections on the Servant scattered throughout 40–52. And the whole question is raised whether these sections formed originally a poem by themselves, and if so, whether they are by a different author from the rest of 40–55. Cheyne thinks there is much which makes it impossible for any of these passages to have originally sprung, each at the place which it now occupies, from the progress of the prophet's thoughts. This is doubtful (for reasons the present writer has expressed on p. 313 ff. of Is. 40–66), and it would be difficult to understand why, if originally an independent poem, these sections were broken up and placed just where they are now. In any case there is nothing in them incompatible with their being from the same hand as the rest of 40–55; and indeed Cheyne assigns them to that hand. (For other opinions see above). 56^{1-8} is assigned by Cheyne and others to Nehemiah's time; but an earlier date is not impossible; v.[8], however, appears to imply that some Jews have already returned (see the linguistic analysis in Cheyne, 312 f.). 56^{9}–57 is the passage which most clearly reflects the scenery of Palestine, and charges the Jews both with political sins they could commit only in their own land, and with superstitions also most natural there. Critics have been divided between a pre-exilic date, such as Manasseh's reign, when idolatry and persecution were in force (so since Ewald), and a post-exilic date (so latterly Cheyne, who, after a literary analysis of the passage, places 56^{9}–57^{13a} shortly before Ezra's arrival and the rest later; the former position is by no means certain, especially after a study of Zec 1–8 and 'Malachi'; but probably the whole prophecy is post-exilic). 58 by most critics (including the present writer) has been assigned to the Exile; this is possible, but Cheyne gives strong reasons for a post-exilic date. 59 is very difficult to analyze and assign: probably it is the fusion of two prophecies, one of which speaks as if Israel, in their own land, were responsible for civic justice, the other as if the great deliverance from exile were just at hand. Some argue, not very successfully, for a pre-exilic date of at least portions of this chapter, but Cheyne for a date after Ezra. 60 was previously taken by Cheyne in his JQR article to be by the same hand as 40 ff., but in his Introd. he argues for its authorship by a post-exilic imitator of that writer, on the grounds of the ideas of the chapter, its poor style, and that the author speaks as if he were a resident of Jerusalem at a time when the city had again a population, though small, and when the temple had been rebuilt, but needed expansion and ornament. These latter reflections of a historical situation are by no means certain; there is no clear implication that the temple has been rebuilt; on the contrary, the city itself appears to have been uninhabited for a time. It is not possible to fix a date. There is the same indefiniteness of circumstance in the poem 61–62. Cheyne affirms that it implies the land of Judah to be in part repeopled and the temple rebuilt (62^{9}), but this is not evident; one might as well argue from 62^{6} that the walls have already been rebuilt. 61^{1} proclaims liberty to the captives; if, as Cheyne holds, this refers to the mass of Israel, the prophecy can hardly be referred, as he suggests, to a date after Cyrus, because, though numbers of Jews remained in exile in spite of that great Liberator's edict, they would not be described as in captivity. Probably, however, the reference is too general for so particular an inference from it. Besides, even after Cyrus, there must have been in various parts of the world enslaved or captive Jews. 61^{3} speaks of those who mourn in Zion, a phrase which appears to imply that Jerusalem is inhabited, unless we are to take it metaphorically. The language, in spite of resemblances to that of 40–55, affords a little more evidence of a later date. Nothing can be inferred from the person of the speaker of the first verses of 61 till we can conclude whether he is meant to be the Servant of the Lord, in which case we might take the passage as one of the series of oracles on that great figure, and (as some argue) from the same date as the others, or whether he is merely a representative of prophecy. But this is a question which has divided critics, and is very difficult, if not impossible, to answer (see Isaiah 40–66, 'Expositor's Bible,' 435 f.). On the whole, then, it is impossible to fix the date of 61. 62; most opinions vary between a date before the liberation under Cyrus and authorship by the writer of 40–55, and a later authorship by an imitator of that prophet.

The brilliant passage 63^{1-6} stands by itself. Its description of the loneliness of J″ in achieving the overthrow of Edom (the attempts to eliminate the name of Edom from the passage cannot be said to be justified) forbids a reference to some historical defeat of that bitter people by Israel. The vision is of a purely ideal conquest of Israel's chief enemy. In 42^{13} we have a similar picture of J″ travailing for the deliverance of His people; this, however, is not enough on which to argue for identity of authorship, while the ferocity of the passage is somewhat against it. None of the other dates suggested are sufficiently probable.

The next section is 63^{7}–64, a prayer of intercession for Israel. Here, again, there is great possibility for diversity of opinion as to the date. The passage cannot well be by the author of 40–45; as to that, Cheyne's analysis of the ideas and language (Introd. 352 ff.) is very convincing. Nor is it so clear as the present writer once thought it was, that because the author appeals (63^{11-15}) only to the delivery from Egypt, and not to that from Babylon, the latter is still future as he writes. For Haggai and Zechariah make no mention of Cyrus' decree, or the return from Babylon, though they wrote very soon after these events. (On the objections to Kosters' theory that their silence is a proof that no return had taken place, see the present writer's Twelve Prophets, vol. ii. ch. 16.). What is clear is that Jerusalem has suffered desolation, that the temple has been defiled and burned by Israel's adversaries (63^{18} $64^{10f.}$ Eng.). To what event does this refer? Some say Nebuchadrezzar's destruction of the temple in 586, and date the passage from the early Babylonian exile. But if that were so it would be difficult to understand the Massoretic reading of 63^{18} 'Thy holy people possessed it but a little while'; though this reading is uncertain. The only other similar calamities are that alleged to have taken place in the invasions of Palestine by Artaxerxes Ochus (B.C. 360 ff.) to which Cheyne refers the passage, and that by Antiochus Epiphanes in 169 to which Grotius referred it. The latter may be ruled out of consideration. Of the invasion by Artaxerxes Ochus we know extremely little (for details see W. R. Smith, OTJC, note D; and Cheyne, Introd.

358 ff.); and that he destroyed the temple is only inferred from his cruel character, from his desecration of other shrines on that campaign, and from an ambiguous tradition in Josephus about the reign of the other Artaxerxes. Nevertheless, W. R. Smith and Cheyne have assigned to the reign of Artaxerxes Ochus Pss 74 and 79, with their references to the destruction of the temple, which others assign to Maccabæan times. And arguing from the parallels between these Pss and Is 63^{7}–64 Cheyne also assigns the latter to the same date. The reasoning is strong, but not conclusive, and hampered by the uncertainty of a burning of the temple about 350. Besides, Ps 74 distinctly points to the conviction that prophecy has ceased in Israel. Not only does Is 63^{7}–64 betray no such conviction, which, if it had existed, could hardly have been omitted by a writer of the mood of Is 63^{7}–64, but the whole prophecy is itself an answer to the idea that the prophetic spirit had faded from the nation. Moreover, if Is 63^{7}–64 has some parallels with Ps 74. 79 it has also some very striking resemblances, both of thought and phraseology, to the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah, and its whole tone suits the years of disillusion and despair which elapsed between the return from exile in 537 and the beginning of the rebuilding of the temple in 520. The unique phrases, 'Thy holy cities' (64^{10}), and 'J″s spirit in the midst of Israel' (63^{11}), find parallels in Zec 2^{16} [Heb.] and Hag 2^{5} respectively. There is the same sense of the people's uncleanness as in Hag 2 and Zec 3; the same sense of J″s excessive anger as in Zechariah's first vision; the same emphasis on the Spirit of J″, and the same idea of J″s angel, interchangeable with J″ Himself. The despair of Is 63^{7}–64 is exactly that which Haggai and Zechariah appear to combat in the people, and the circumstances of the time fully explain, as already remarked, the silence of the whole prayer about the liberation from Babylon. On the whole, then, it must be regarded as more reasonable to date 63^{7}–64 from about 525 than about 350.

Ch. 65, taken by the majority of critics as the divine answer to the prayer of 63^{7}–64, has been assigned both to Babylonia and Palestine, both to the years before the end of the Exile and to those after the Return. Some (Dillmann, in loco) argue for the former, on the ground that the idolatrous practices mentioned are all suitable to Babylonia, that Israel's occupation of the Holy Land is represented as future in v.^{9}, and that the phrase 'forget my holy mountain' (without reference to the rebuilt temple) recalls the exilic Ps 137^{4}. To this view the present writer adhered in 1891, but he does not now feel the conclusiveness of it. For the promise of v.^{9} may be naturally interpreted, not of the first return to Zion and occupation of the surrounding district, but to the full possession of Palestine as a whole, which was still unrealized long after the first return. Besides, the idolatrous customs charged may just as easily have been prevalent in Palestine as in any other country of Western Asia, and Gad and Meni (v.^{11}) were undoubtedly Syrian deities, and worshipped in Palestine from time immemorial. In the doubt in which these allusions of the prophecy leave us as to its exact date, we are not assisted either by the ideas or by the language of the passage (for details see Cheyne, Introd. 320 ff.): these cannot determine between two periods so close to each other as the years just before or the century after the Return. Cheyne, who accepts the Palestinian origin, argues that the Samaritans are the people against whom the chapter is addressed, and fixes the date as that of the troubles of the Jews with the Samaritans, which Nehemiah describes. But that the charge is against superstitious and semi-pagan Jews may also plausibly be argued, and there are really no sufficient data to fix a date. On the whole, a Palestinian* and post-exilic origin is the most probable.

Equally obscure is the question of ch. 66. The chapter is probably not a unity, and the text is unusually corrupt. There are echoes of chs. 40–55, but it is quite impossible to assign the chapter to the great evangelist of the Exile. The temple either has been rebuilt or is being rebuilt (vv.$^{1\text{-}4.\ 6.\ 20}$); the restored community has already been formed, but is not complete (v.^{9}). The language points to a post-exilic date. The attacks upon the idolatrous customs reveal a close connexion between the chapter and 65. On the whole, therefore, a date soon after the Return appears probable for the bulk of the chapter; but there are probably later insertions. On this see Dillmann, Duhm, and especially Cheyne.

XI. The Theology of Isaiah 40–66.—(a) Chapters 40–55, as we have seen, are addressed to Israel in circumstances very different from those of the generation to which Isaiah of Jerusalem spoke. Isaiah had before him a nation on their own soil: responsible for justice and social reform, for the defence of a fatherland and the conduct of a foreign policy. He appealed to kings, statesmen, and definite classes of society. But chs. 40–55 are addressed to a people in exile, without native leaders or the opportunity of developing great personalities: with no civic life and few social responsibilities; a people in the passive state, with occasion for the exercise of almost no qualities save those of penitence and faith, of memory and hope. Moreover, with Isaiah, and indeed with all prophets up to the Exile, the burden of prophesying is the people's guilt and their doom of exile. But this doom has now been fulfilled. Jeremiah limited it to 70 years. These are almost exhausted, and there are signs that the Babylonian Empire, the instrument of the doom, is approaching its fall. Cyrus, king of Anshan and Persia, having conquered the Medes (B.C. 545), and perhaps also the Lydians (542), is descending on Babylon. What is of immediate interest to Israel, therefore, is not, as formerly, the immoral state of the people and the imminence of certain events of chastisement, but the dawn of that redemption and restoration which was promised to appear after the fulfilment of God's sentence. In a word, what is now needed is not so much new predictions of the future as proofs that the fulfilment of former predictions is at hand. Consequently, while the problem before the spirit of Israel is still substantially what it was with Isaiah, viz. the survival of a people of J″, both the factors of the problem and the method of its solution are very different. Some recent critics hardly exaggerate when they say that prophecy proper ceased with the Exile. For instead of the characteristic prophet, denouncing his people upon moral grounds and predicting their doom, we have in Is 40 a commission granted to a number† of voices (whose hearers, indeed, so little feel themselves to be official prophets that they remain anonymous) to comfort Israel and proclaim that the ancient promises to her are about to be fulfilled. But the proof of this requires something more than an appeal to present facts, whether in Israel's own conduct or the general history of the world about her: the whole history and destiny of Israel are brought in, with a full and reasoned revelation of her God.

In such a scheme, it is plain, there is no need

* On this ground the chapter has been argued to be by Isaiah himself, or his disciples; and one scholar (Bredenkamp) dates it from the reign of Manasseh.

† Note the plural in the opening verse 40^{1}, 'comfort ye my people.'

for that almost exclusive insistence upon the moral attributes of J″, His demands for justice and purity, which we found in Isaiah's own teaching; but the need is rather for emphasis upon God's intention to fulfil His word, and upon His power to bend to this end the forces of history. The change is best illustrated in the altered meaning which chs. 40–55 give to the term 'righteousness.' In the authentic prophecies of Isaiah, delivered to an unjust and immoral generation, righteousness almost exclusively means the purity and justice which God demands from His people. But in chs. 40–55, in face of a generation who are not charged with the immoralities of Isaiah's, but who are in doubt or despair about their God's power and will to fulfil His word and redeem them, righteousness signifies mainly His consistency and faithfulness. In 41^{26} the adjective zaddîḳ is applied to one whose prediction turns out to be correct.* In 41^{2} the noun zedeḳ appears to be the virtue of carrying out what one has promised; it is associated with J″'s call to Cyrus, who has been called not in vain, but in good faith, and for a purpose which will certainly succeed. So in 41^{10}, taken with its context, J″'s zedeḳ is His trueness, the harmony of His present purpose with His ancient promise to redeem Israel—His good faith to the people He has called; but it includes also His power to fulfil His word: 'the right hand of my righteousness' is the phrase He uses. The whole chapter and other parallel passages (especially $43^{9.\ 10.\ 18ff.}$ $44^{7.\ 8}$ $45^{19\text{-}25}$) imply that zedeḳ or ṣĕdāḳâh (the forms are used indifferently) is J″'s fidelity to His calling of Israel—the quality by which He can neither forsake His own, nor for want of power fail in His promise to justify them to the world; and so, besides being synonymous with strength, righteousness is applied to its own results, and becomes parallel to salvation—El zaddîḳ, the Righteous God, is equivalent to Mōshîa', the Saviour (45^{21}).

The chief claim, therefore, which 40 ff. make for the God of Israel is His power to direct the history of the world in conformity to a long predicted and faithfully followed purpose. This claim starts from the proof that J″ has long before predicted events now happening or about to happen, with Cyrus as their centre. But this is much more than a proof of isolated predictions, though these imply omniscience. It is a declaration of the unity of history sweeping to the high ends which have been already revealed to Israel—an exposition, in short, of the Omnipotence, Consistence, and Faithfulness of the Providence of the one true God. But with almost equal force the chapters insist upon the Creative Power of the same sovereign Deity. Alone, without counsellor or helper, He created and sustains the world, calls all things into being, and bends them to His will.† He has made and measured earth and ocean, mountains and hills ($40^{12ff.}$). All the magnitudes and processes of nature are His: heaven, the stars, the clouds, the sea, earth, drought and floods, light and darkness, peace and calamity. Before His omnipotence, His own works and men and their works are as nothing. He is infinitely above them all, sublime and incomparable—in short, the Holy One. For holiness in these chapters is attributed to God always either in connexion with His creative power and the incomparableness to which it exalts Him (40^{25} 41^{20} 43^{15} 45^{11}), or more especially in connexion with the manifestation of that incomparable power for the redemption and glorification of His people (41^{14} $43^{3.\ 14}$ 47^{4} 48^{17} 49^{7} 54^{5} 55^{5}). He is Jehovah, and there is none else; God, and there is none beside Him ($45^{5f.}$ etc.).

From this absolute monotheism everything else follows in chs. 40 ff. What invariably kindles the reason and style of the writer is the thought of God. The breadth and force of imagination, the assurance of hope, the daring treatment of the history of the world as a whole, may be traced to the writer's sense of God's sovereignty, and are the signs of how absolutely he was possessed by this as his principal and governing truth. But that he held it not by faith alone or a partial experience, but with the whole force of his reason, is shown, not only in the exposition of J″'s articulate, clear, reasonable and consistent revelation of Himself and His purpose ($15^{10ff.}$), but also in the powerful scorn with which the author's mind sweeps down upon idolatry. If it is impossible to liken God to anything (41^{25}), then the low thoughts which Israel has of J″, the images in which the heathen figure the Godhead (41^{7} $44^{9ff.}$), their enchantments and divinations ($47^{9.\ 12ff.}$), and even the chief gods of the conquering empires ($46^{1ff.}$), are all equally absurd. The ridicule which the writer pours upon these, the delight he has in exposing their futility, and the weary trouble for no end which their religions levy upon the heathen, brilliantly exhibit the intellectual assurance of this most perfect apostle of Israel's monotheism.

But though God is thus sublime He is near to men in sympathy, and full of grace and zeal for His own ($40^{1.\ 11.\ 27ff.}$ 43^{2} $49^{14ff.}$ $51^{3.\ 12}$). Israel's maker is Israel's husband (54^{5}). No prophet is more daring in his ascription of passion to the Deity. With all this writer's overpowering sense of the transcendence of J″, he does not hesitate to picture Him as an excited and furious warrior, and as a travailing woman ($42^{13f.}$)

But as J″ is unique, so is Israel unique. Israel is His special creation, His elect, and His own. The nations are given for Israel's ransom, and the world-powers are employed as contributory to Israel's career (41^{8} $43^{3f.\ 14}$ 45^{14} etc.). Cyrus himself, in whom the power of the world is gathered up, is J″'s servant for Israel's redemption ($41^{2ff.}$ 44^{28} $45^{1.\ 4}$ etc.). Yet the creation and election of Israel are not for their own sake. 'This people I have formed for myself; they shall show forth my praise' (43^{21}). They are to be God's revealers and witnesses to the ends of the earth ($41^{8ff.}$). They are to carry His mishpaṭ and torah to the farthest coasts ($42^{4.\ 6}$). Their election is an election to service—the service of mankind in the highest matters of religion and morality. In a far higher sense than Cyrus they are the servant of J″. The picture of J″'s servant fills a large part of the prophecy. Sometimes this servant is equivalent to all Israel, the seed of Abraham (41^{8} etc.). But as a whole the nation is unworthy of the high office—deaf, blind, and spoiled ($42^{18ff.}$)—in need of forgiveness (43^{25}) and illumination. And so the conversion of Israel becomes part of the servant's work ($49^{3\text{-}6}$). He appears to be the personification of the pious remnant of the people: the true, effective Israel; and he is therefore obviously distinct from the nation, who are not conscious of the destiny God has for His people, or ready to carry it out. Though Israel as a whole be unready, this loyal Israel is glorious in J″'s eyes, and God is their strength (49^{5}). Speaking in the first person, this Servant describes his experience as the prophet of J″, and carries it to its consequence in martyrdom ($50^{4\text{-}9}$). Many have thought that in this passage the ideal is still more narrowly concentrated, and that we ought to see in the speaker an individual servant of J″. Many more agree that we have an individual presented to us at last in the classical passage 52^{13}–53. The latter opinion the present writer feels to be correct. The nation's functions of service for God are frequently concentrated by other prophets upon an individual. The experience of the individual Jeremiah, who had, in opposition to his whole people, remained faithful to J″, and in his solitary experience suffered for the people's sins, and represented them before J″, surely afforded precedent enough for the vision of a personal sufferer and sin-bearer. Yet, whether we take this view, or with many eminent critics continue to see in 52[13]–53 as in 49 the personification of the righteous remnant of Israel, the religious results remain the same. The spiritual salvation of Israel is accomplished by the vicarious conscience and sufferings of the Servant. He is not merely the prophet of 49[2ff.] and 50[4. 5], nor only the martyr of 50[6ff.], who shall be ultimately vindicated by J″. His sufferings, so misunderstood by the world, have a very practical end (52[13-15]). Disregarded or misunderstood by his own people, he naturally, as they come to see, bears their transgressions and iniquity; by his stripes they are healed (53[1ff.]). He is sinless, and therefore unjustly treated by his tyrants; but he submits in order to offer his life as a guilt-offering; and so wins righteousness for his people, and exerts immense influence on men (53[7-12]). Whether this figure be of the pious portion of Israel or of one holy sufferer, the Christian Church has been right in finding its fulfilment in Jesus Christ; in His sinless suffering, in His consciousness of His solitary distinction from His people; in His knowledge that His suffering was of God's will, and would effect the forgiveness of His people's sin, their redemption from guilt, and so His own exaltation from misunderstanding and abuse to manifest power and glory.

† To describe this creative power the author of chs. 40 ff. is the first to use the term בָּרָא = create.

The equipment of Israel, then, for the religious service of mankind is the end towards which the argument and vision of chs. 40–55 are directed. But indispensable to this is the nation's redemption from Babylonian servitude, their return to the Holy Land, and the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the temple. The deliverance is to be effected by Cyrus, through his conquest of Babylonia and the humiliation of her gods (46 f.). This being certain, J″ calls upon His people to come forth from Babylon (48[20] 52[11f.]), a call that was necessary in face of the fact that numbers of Jews were unwilling to leave a home into whose life they had deeply settled, for the hard beginnings of life again upon the desolate and comparatively barren soil of Palestine. J″ promises to make easy their way across the desert (40[3ff.] 41[18f.] 43[19f.] 48[21]). Cyrus himself shall expedite their progress and arrange for the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the temple (44[28] 45[13]). The prostrate and desolate city shall rise from her ruins (40[2] 51[17ff.] 52[1f. 9]) with a full population (44[26] 49[17-19] 54[6]): the cities of Judah shall again be inhabited (40[9] 44[26]). But even beyond these limits shall Israel break, and inherit the Gentiles (54[3]). A glory shall rest upon city and land, conscious of the presence of their God in His wonderful deeds (40[9f.] 49[18] 52[1] 54[10ff.]). The Gentiles, too, shall acknowledge this, coming to Israel with the words: Surely God is in thee (45[14] 49[7. 22f.]).

So lofty and spiritual is the prospect in chs. 40–55; and still so general when it descends to the details of the restoration. There is nothing priestly in the prospect, nothing warlike except in metaphor; no directions are given for the building of the temple, nor for the institution of sacrifice; no emphasis is laid upon the resumption of the latter, and it is not once mentioned as indispensable for the return of J″ to His people, and the renewal of His intercourse with them. To Zion J″ returns along with His people; they are His Temple, He is manifest in them (45[14]). His gifts to them are spiritual: pity, grace, forgiveness, illumination, peace; their political restoration is but the pledge of all these. His demands upon them, too, are purely ethical and in the spirit of the older prophecy—fulfilment of His torah and mishpaṭ (51[4]). And the long argument and exhortation concludes in 55 upon the keynote of its opening chapter (40) that J‴s word is omnipotent and creative. It shall bring all these things to pass. We shall see how different this atmosphere is from that of the chapters which follow (56–66).

(b) CHS. 56–66.—In passing from chs. 40–55 into 56–66 we feel, as we have already shown (see § X.), a great difference of style. Instead of one long argument and reasoned revelation, visible in the prophecy as a whole and in the series of passages on the Servant which are scattered through it, we enter a series of detached and broken oracles, which have sometimes no relation to each other, and all of which further differ from 40–55 in their style, temper, and the religious interests that they emphasize. It is true that some of the predominant notes of 40–55 are repeated, and others are developed. The argument of the sovereignty and holiness of J″ is taken for granted, and these are asserted almost in the same phrases (57[15] 60[9. 14. 16]). 'Righteousness' is occasionally used in the same sense of the exhibition of J‴s faithfulness and burning fervour in the salvation of His people (61[10f.] 62[1ff.]). The vision of the zeal and passion of J‴ is repeated and elaborated; as before, He is the strenuous and furious warrior (59[16ff.] 63[1-6]). There is one more picture of the Servant (61[1. 3]) with his mission of comfort and restoration to the people; and about this there is the same ambiguity as to whether it be the picture of the prophetic portion of Israel or of some individual endowed with the Spirit. The rebuilding of Jerusalem is described as more imminent, and the vision of her glory is developed in greater detail but with the same essential features of joy, beauty, fertility, an overflowing population of her returned sons and daughters, enrichment by the gifts of the Gentiles, and their acknowledgment of the God who resides in her (56[7] 60. 61[3ff.] 62. 65[18ff.] 66[6ff.]). But several new features are introduced, some of which contrast unfavourably with the lofty and spiritual tone of chs. 40–55, and some reveal the circumstances and duties of a people already re-established in civic responsibility upon their own soil. From 56 onwards the temple and its building bulk more largely (56[5ff.] 60[13] 63[18] 64[11] 66[1]); the sacrificial system becomes a little more prominent (56[7] 62[9] 66[20]), so do others of the institutions and ceremonies of religion; the Sabbath (56[2. 6] 58[13f.] 66[23]), the priesthood of the people (61[6]), and the orders of priests and Levites (66[21]), the perpetual worship (58[2] 62[6] 66[23]); and we find, too, directions on those matters on which the returned community, effecting its reorganization, had to legislate: e.g. the place of eunuchs in the congregation (56[2ff.]) and the question of fasts (58[2. 3]). And there is an insistence upon civic duties and the social virtues (58[6ff.] 59[4]); the sins of perverting justice and equity, uttering falsehood, and committing robbery are charged upon the people in the fashion that prophecy assumed when Israel was a State (59[12ff.] 61[8]); and righteousness is again used in its older meaning side by side with its newer meaning (65[5]). These data confirm the conclusion reached above of a difference of authorship between 40–55 and 56–66.

ISAIAH, ASCENSION OF.—i. CONTENTS OF THE ETHIOPIC BOOK.—The book falls into two parts: (A) The Martyrdom of Isaiah, (B) The Ascension of Isaiah into the Seventh Heaven. The bracketed sections are generally regarded as interpolations.

A. Hezekiah summons Manasseh, his son, to deliver to him revelations which he had received in his sickness, and writings of the prophet Isaiah. The prophet, who is present, declares that Manasseh will not regard instruction, but will cause him to be sawn asunder. After the death of Hezekiah (ch. 2), Manasseh turns to evil ways, and Isaiah retires with other prophets, first to Bethlehem, and then to the mountains beyond it. The false prophet Belkira (ch. 3) discovers his retreat, and accuses him before Manasseh on three grounds: first, that he has prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem; secondly, that whereas Moses had said, No man can see God and live, Isaiah had said, I have seen God, and, behold, I live; thirdly, that he had called Jerusalem and the princes and people of Judah by the names of Sodom and Gomorrah.

[3^{13}–5^{1} gives as a further reason for Isaiah's martyrdom the anger of Berial (or Beliar) at the visions which he had seen of the coming of the Beloved, etc. This forms an apocalyptic section in which there are many points of contact with the later part of the book, and esp. with 11^{2-22}. After the return of the Beloved to the seventh heaven the twelve apostles will preach throughout the world; but among their converts evil will multiply: and at length Berial will descend in the form of an impious king, the murderer of his mother, and will work miracles, and cause himself to be worshipped as the only God. The Lord will return and destroy him: the resurrection and judgment will follow].

While Isaiah is being martyred (ch. 5) Berial offers to release him, if he will confess that he has prophesied falsely. The prophet defies him, and is sawn asunder with a wooden saw, conversing the while with the Holy Spirit.

B. This begins with a new title: 'The vision which Isaiah the son of Amoz saw in the 20th year of the reign of Hezekiah king of Judah.' Isaiah comes from Gilgal (ch. 6), and is met by many prophets. In the presence of these, and of the king and his princes, he sits on the king's couch and prophesies. While he is speaking he falls into a trance with his eyes open. Afterwards he relates his vision to Hezekiah and the prophets, but not to the people. It is as follows:—

He is taken (ch. 7) by an angel, whose name he may not know, because he is to return to his mortal body, first up into the firmament, where he finds perpetual warfare between Satanic powers. Next he ascends into the first heaven, where he sees a throne with angels on either side; they chant a hymn of praise, which he learns is addressed to the Glory of the seventh heaven and to His Beloved. In the second heaven he finds also a throne with angels, but more glorious; he would fain fall down and worship, but is not permitted. In the third heaven he finds the like; there is there no mention of the deeds of the vain world from which he has come, but he is assured that nothing escapes observation. In the fourth heaven he again sees angels on either side of a throne, the glory of those on the right being, as before, greater than of those on the left; and all are more glorious than those below. The same in yet greater degree is true of the fifth heaven. But in the sixth heaven (ch. 8) there is no throne, and no left hand, but all are alike in splendour: it is in close connexion with the seventh heaven, and its glory makes the glory of the five heavens below seem but darkness. At length he comes (ch. 9) to the seventh heaven, where his entry is challenged, but permitted. Here he sees the just clothed in their heavenly robes, but not yet having received their thrones and crowns. These they cannot have until the descent and return of the Beloved has been accomplished. He is shown also the books which contain the transactions of the world below, and learns that all is known in the seventh heaven. He beholds the Lord of Glory, and is bidden to worship Him. He then beholds a second most glorious one, like unto Him, and again is bidden to worship; and then again a third, who is the angel of the Holy Spirit, the inspirer of the prophets. These two latter worship the ineffable Glory; and the chant of praise (ch. 10) sounds up from the sixth heaven. Then the voice of the Most High is heard speaking to the Lord the Son, bidding Him descend through the heavens to the firmament, and to the world, and even to the angel of the infernal regions; He is to assimilate Himself to those who dwell in each region in turn, so that He may not be recognized as He passes down. He will ascend at length with glory and worship from all. The prophet now beholds the descent of the Beloved. In the sixth heaven there is no change of His appearance, and the angels glorify Him. But in the fifth He is changed, and not recognized, and so in each of the lower heavens, down to the firmament, where He passes through the strife that rages there, still unrecognized. At this point the angel calls the prophet's special attention to what follows (ch. 11).

[Here follows a description of the Birth from a Virgin, and a notice of the life, death, and resurrection of the Lord, and the sending forth of the Twelve (11^{2-22}).]

Then the prophet beholds the ascent through the firmament and the six heavens: the Lord is recognized and glorified as He ascends: at length He reaches the seventh heaven, and takes His seat on the right hand of the great Glory; and the angel of the Holy Spirit sits on the left hand. The prophet is then sent back to his mortal clothing. On his return he warns Hezekiah that these things will come to pass, but that they may not be communicated to the people of Israel.

ii. DOCUMENTS AND EDITIONS.—(a) Ethiopic.—This, the fullest recension, was first published in 1819 by Laurence, Regius Professor of Hebrew at Oxford, afterwards Archbishop of Cashel, from a MS which he had bought in London, and which also contained an Ethiopic version of 4 Ezra. He accompanied his edition with translations into Latin and English, and with notes and a dissertation. In 1877 this edition was superseded by Dillmann's, which was based on Laurence's MS (now in the Bodleian) and two others in the British Museum. Dillmann gave a literal translation into Latin, which remains the most satisfactory form in which those who are not Ethiopic scholars can read the book. In 1894 a French translation was issued by M. René Basset, as No. 3 of his series Les Apocryphes Éthiopiens; but this, though convenient, is not to be relied on for the purposes of criticism.

(b) Latin.—(1) A Latin version of the second part (B), the Ascension of Isaiah proper, was printed at Venice in 1522 from a MS not now known. It was published by Antonius de Fantis in a small volume containing the visions of the Virgin Mechtild and some other pieces. It was reprinted by Gieseler in a Göttingen programme in 1832; and by Dillmann, together with the two fragments next to be mentioned, in his edition of 1877. (2) Two Latin fragments were printed by Mai (1828) in his Scriptt. Vett. Nova Collectio, iii. p. 238 f., from a Vatican palimpsest. He found them in company with certain Arian writings, recognized them as belonging to some apocryphon of the OT, but did not identify them. They are reprinted by Dillmann, and comprise chs. 2^{14}–3^{13} and ch. 7^{1-19}. They contain enough to show that they represent a form of the book in which the bracketed section of A was present, and in which A and B were combined.

(c) Greek.—In 1878, the year after the appearance of Dillmann's edition, Osc. von Gebhardt published, in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift f. wiss. Theol. (p. 330 ff.), a late recension of the book in Greek from a 12th cent. MS in Paris (Bibl. Nat. 1534), a volume of legenda (Mar.–May). Under May 9 he found: προφητεία, ἀποκάλυψις καὶ μαρτύριον τοῦ ἁγίου καὶ ἐνδόξου καὶ μεγίστου τῶν προφητῶν Ἡσαΐου τοῦ προφήτου. This is not alluded to by Dr. Salmon in his excellent article in Dict. Chr. Biogr., and it has also escaped the notice of M. Basset. Its importance lies in the fact that, in spite of its entire recasting of the work, it still gives us considerable portions of the original Greek. But there is little to be gained from it for the history of the tradition of the book. The object of the reviser has been to produce a lection for Church purposes; and he has accordingly reduced the vision of the Ascension to small compass, and has rearranged the materials so as to put the martyrdom at the end. He appends an account of the prophet's burial, and introduces some traditions about the Pool of Siloam, which find parallels in Pseudo-Dorotheus, the Paschal Chronicle, and Pseudo-Epiphanius (see the references and citations given by v. Gebhardt).

(d) Slavonic.—Three versions in Old Slavonic have been published, but they have not as yet been critically investigated. For notices of them see Bonwetsch in Harnack's Altchristliche Litteratur, i. 916, and Basset, p. 7 n.

iii. Patristic References. — The most important of these may be noted here, grouped according to the portion of the book to which they belong.

(a) Justin Martyr (Trypho, 120) accuses the Jews of having obliterated from the OT the story of the death of Isaiah, ὃν πρίονι ξυλίνῳ ἐπρίσατε. Tertullian (de Patient. 14) says: 'His patientiæ uiribus secatur Esaias, et de domino non tacet.' The phraseology in each case suggests, though it cannot be held to prove, an acquaintance with A. Origen (Comm. in Matth. 23^{34}; Ep. ad Afric. 9) refers to the story of the martyrdom as contained in an ἀπόκρυφον Ἡσαΐου; moreover, he cites (Hom. in Ies. 5) the charge of contradicting Moses ('Moses, aiunt, non uidit; et tu uidisti?'). Jerome (Comm. in Ies. 1^{10}) gives this charge and the further one, 'quod principes Sodomorum et populum Gomorrhæ eos appellauerit,' as the two causes of the prophet's death. Ambrose (in Ps. 118) gives the story of the devil's offer to release Isaiah, if he would declare his prophecies to be false. The anonymous commentary printed with Chrysostom's works (Montf. t. vi.), and known as the Opus imperfectum in Matthæum, refers to Isaiah's prophecy of the disobedience of Manasseh and of his own death, and to Hezekiah's consequent wish to slay his son (Hom. i. p. xx f.).

These references do not of necessity imply more than a knowledge of a Jewish book of the Martyrdom; some of them might be merely allusions to isolated Jewish legends (cf. Fabricius, Cod. pseudepigr. VT, p. 1088 ff.). But Cedrenus (Bonn ed. i. 120 f.) cites the calculation of the reign of Antichrist, with slightly changed figures; and it is noticeable that he speaks of the book as The Testament of Hezekiah.

(b) Jerome, in commenting on Is 64^4, expressly mentions the 'Ascensio Esaiæ,' and says that it contained the quotation cited by St. Paul in 1 Co 2^9 'Eye hath not seen,' etc. This passage is found in Asc. 11^{34}, but only in the Latin version. It is probable, therefore, that Jerome knew the book in a form which contained both A and B. In the context of this last passage he implies that it was used by heretics in Spain; and this accords with a reference in the recently recovered works of Priscillian (Tract. 3, p. 47, Schepss). Epiphanius twice refers to the Ἀναβατικὸν Ἡσαΐου, and says that it was used by Hieracas, an Egyptian teacher of the beginning of the 4th cent. (Hær. 67, 3), and by the Archontici, a sect of about the same date (Hær. 40, 2). The former of these references relates to the appearance of the Beloved (ὁ ἀγαπητός) on the right hand of God, and of the Holy Spirit on the left hand: the latter refers to the seven heavens.

There are two references in apocryphal writings which deserve special mention. In the Last Words of Baruch (ch. 9) allusion is made to the martyrdom of Isaiah in such a way as to suggest that the Ascensio in its Christian form was known to the writer (see Rendel Harris's edition, p. 20 ff.). In the Actus Petri Vercellenses (ed. Lipsius, p. 72) we have a quotation from Asc. 11^{14}. As both these books may have been written before the middle of the 2nd cent., their evidence is of special importance.

Two later writings of very small intrinsic worth seem to have used the Ascensio. One is a sermon of Potamius, printed among St. Zeno's works (Verona, 1739, p. 300): it describes the martyrdom, and mentions Belial. The other is the apocryphal Liber Johannis, an Albigensian book, printed at the end of Thilo's Codex Apocryphus NT.

For further references the student may consult Dr. Salmon's art. in Dict. Chr. Biogr., Harnack's Altchr. Litt. p. 854 ff., and Basset's Introduction: in this last he will also find a fairly complete bibliography.

iv. Critical Remarks.—In the outline given above of the Ethiopic book, Dillmann's critical dissection of it has been in the main accepted. But it may be questioned whether his theory of two separate books, A and B, as we have called them, combined and interpolated at a subsequent period, is not somewhat too rigid. It may be nearer to the truth to suppose that A does indeed reproduce a Jewish book on the Death of Isaiah, but that the whole of the remainder is due to a single Christian hand, which modified the opening section, inserted the apocalyptic vision, and added the vision of the Ascension.

There appears to be no sufficient ground for distinguishing the writer of the apocalyptic section from the author of the Ascension. The fact that the Antichrist assumes the form of a matricidal king does not of necessity take the apocalyptic section back into the 1st cent.: the reappearance of Nero as the Antichrist long haunted the imagination of the Christian apocalyptists. The calculation of the duration of his reign appears to be simply borrowed from the Book of Daniel, and gives us no guidance.

If there was a separately existing Jewish book, this may be the source of the references of Justin Martyr, of Tertullian, and even of Origen. In this case Jerome and Epiphanius (or Hieracas as quoted by the latter) would be our earliest authorities (other than anonymous) for the Christian book. Yet on internal evidence we should place it not much later than the middle of the 2nd cent. 'Elders and pastors' are the only titles applied to Christian ministers; prophecy seems spoken of as still in exercise, though failing in influence; and the description of Isaiah's ecstasy suggests that the writer had witnessed Christian trances.

The closest literary parallel may perhaps be found in the Testaments of the XII. Patriarchs, in which the narrative portions at the commencement of each Testament are directly taken from Jewish books, esp. from the Book of Jubilees, and the remainder, homiletical and apocalyptical, is the work of a Christian hand.

v. Interest for Biblical Students.—The chief points of interest are two—(1) the conception of the firmament (as the abode of evil spirits), and of the seven heavens; (2) the use of the name 'the Beloved' as a Messianic title. If these features could be regarded as directly derived from Jewish sources, without the intervention of the NT writings, they would be important illustrations of the language of St. Paul (Eph 1^2 6^{12}, 2 Co 12^{2-4}, also Eph 1^6). But on the whole it is probable that the apostle's language was familiar to the writer, and was regarded by him as giving a kind of sanction to his conceptions, if it did not actually form their starting-point.

1. For the conception of the seven heavens the student may refer to Mr. Charles' introduction to The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, p. xxx ff. Our author's idea of the seven heavens differs from other descriptions in that he introduces no physical phenomena (as, e.g., ice and snow, sun and moon, paradise, etc.) by way of differentiating them. Tradition has supplied him with nothing but the bare number of seven, and he distinguishes one from another only by a constantly increasing glory. On the other hand, he is unwilling to place any element of evil in any of the heavens, and hence he introduces the firmament as between the earth and the first heaven, so as to find a dwelling-place for the Satanic powers of the air. Perhaps his own main interest lay in the exposition of the idea that the descent of the Beloved escaped the notice of the dwellers in the lower heavens, in the firmament, and on the earth. This idea was found in St. Paul's language in 1 Co 2^8 'the hidden wisdom . . . which none of the rulers of this age knew; for, if they had known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of Glory.' 'The rulers of this age' are the powers of the firmament in our book; and the title 'the Lord of Glory' also occurs in it. The same thought is found in the well-known words of Ignatius (ad Eph. 19): καὶ ἔλαθε τὸν ἄρχοντα τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου ἡ παρθενία Μαρίας καὶ ὁ τοκετὸς αὐτῆς, ὁμοίως καὶ ὁ θάνατος τοῦ Κυρίου.

2. The name of the Messiah in every part of this book is 'the Beloved.' There is some ground for thinking that this was a pre-Christian Messianic title. For (1) it is used in the OT (ὁ ἠγαπημένος, LXX) as a title of Israel; e.g. Dt 32^{15} $33^{5.\ 26}$, where it renders 'Jeshurun,' as it does also in Is 44^2; again in Is 5, ὁ ἠγαπημένος and ὁ ἀγαπητός render יָדִיד and דּוֹד respectively. It was natural, therefore, that, like the titles 'Servant' and 'Elect,' it should be transferred from the people to the Messiah. (2) At the period when the Gospels were written 'the Beloved' and 'the Elect' were practically interchangeable terms, for Mt writes ὁ ἀγαπητός μου (12^{18}) in citing Is 42^1, where the Heb. is בְּחִירִי (LXX ὁ ἐκλεκτός μου); and Lk (9^{35}) substitutes ὁ ἐκλελεγμένος for ὁ ἀγαπητός in the words spoken at the Transfiguration. (3) These two substitutions suggest that, whatever may have been the original meaning of the phrase ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἀγαπητός (Mk 1^{11} 9^7), both Mt and Lk regarded ὁ ἀγαπητός as a separate title, and not as an epithet of υἱός; and it is interesting to note that the Old Syriac version emphasized this distinction by rendering 'My Son and My Beloved.' (4) In Eph 1^9 St. Paul uses ἐν τῷ ἠγαπημένῳ as equivalent to ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ in a context in which he is designedly using terms derived from Jewish sources. (5) Certain passages of the LXX where ὁ ἀγαπητός occurs were explained by Christian interpreters as Messianic (Ps 44 (45) tit., Zec 12^{10}). (6) Lastly, we have several passages in early Christian writings in which ὁ ἠγαπημένος is used as a title of Christ, e.g. Barn. 3^6 $4^{3.\ 8}$; cf. Clem. Rom. $59^{2.\ 3}$; Ign. Smyrn. inscr.; Herm. Sim. IX. xii. 5; Acts of Thecla, c. 1; ὁ ἀγαπητός is also used, but usually with υἱός or παῖς (Herm. Sim. V. ii. 6; Mart. Polyc. 14; Ep. ad Diogn. 8; Acts of Thecla, c. 24; in the last three cases in a liturgical formula). It is difficult to suppose that in all these instances from Christian writings the title (esp. in the form ὁ ἠγαπημένος) has for its only source the NT. And in particular the persistent use of ὁ ἀγαπητός in the present book suggests that the writer must have thought its introduction consistent with verisimilitude in a work which sought to be regarded as an ancient Jewish prophecy of Christ.

J. Armitage Robinson.

ISCAH (יִסְכָּה, Ἰεσχά, etym. uncertain).—A daughter of Haran and sister of Milcah, Gn 11^{29} (J). This is the only passage in OT where she is mentioned. There is no probability (see Dillm. ad loc.) in the identification of Iscah with Sarai (Jos. Ant. I. vi. 5, Targ. Jon., Talm., Ephraem, Jerome, Rashi, etc.), and little warrant for the conjecture of Ewald (HI i. 313) that she was the wife of Lot.

ISCARIOT.—See Judas Iscariot.

ISDAEL (Ἰσδαήλ), 1 Es 5^{33}.—In Ezr 2^{56}, Neh 7^{58}, Giddel. The form is probably due to corruption of the Greek, ΓΕΔΔΗΛ being read as ΙCΔΑΗΛ.

ISHBAH (יִשְׁבָּח).—A Judahite, the 'father' of Eshtemoa, 1 Ch 4^{17}. See Genealogy.

ISHBAK (יִשְׁבָּק).—A son of Abraham by Keturah, Gn 25^2=1 Ch 1^{32}. In Gn the LXX has, A Ἰεσβόκ (so Luc.), D Ἰεσβούκ, E Ἰεσόκ, in 1 Ch B Σοβάκ, A Ἰεσβόκ. The tribe of which he is the eponym is somewhat uncertain, although Frd. Delitzsch (ZSKF ii. 92) identifies it with Iasbuḳ of the cuneiform inscriptions, where it is mentioned as a land (māt) whose king was allied with Sangara (Shamgar?) of Gargamis (Carchemish) and others against Assur-naẓir-pal and Shalmaneser II. (c. 859 B.C.). Dillmann and Delitzsch point out that the name has nothing to do with Shanbaḳ in the Jebel esh-Shera, which is not heard of till the time of the Crusades.

ISHBI-BENOB.—One of the four Philistines of the giant stock who were slain by the mighty men of David (2 S 21^{15-17}). See, however, Gob.

ISHBOSHETH (אִישׁ־בֹּשֶׁת), who disputed the throne of Israel with David for about seven years, was the fourth son of Saul (1 Ch 8^{34} 9^{39}). His real name as preserved by the Chronicler was Eshbaal or Ishbaal (אִישׁ־בַּעַל 'man of Baal'), but he is better known to us by the name Ishbosheth (אִישׁ־בֹּשֶׁת 'man of the shameful thing'), which he bears in 2 S 2^8 and elsewhere. This double nomenclature is easily explained. Baal is most familiar to us as the name of a Tyrian or Phœn. divinity, but in its primary meaning of 'lord' it was the designation applied by the N. Shemites each to their own particular deity, and we know that at one time it was a frequent appellation even of the God of Israel (Hos $2^{16.\ 17}$). It is in this way that we must explain its use by Saul in naming his sons, for, whatever faults may be chargeable against the first king of Israel, he was certainly no idolater. In later times, when Baal had come to be regarded as a heathenish name, the words of Ex 23[13] 'Make no mention of the name of other gods,' were interpreted so literally that in reading, and finally in writing, Bosheth ('the shameful thing') was frequently substituted for Baal. (The text of Samuel must, according to Wildeboer, Litt. d. AT 82, have escaped this alteration till after B.C. 250, the date at which the Chronicler still found the original name Ishbaal written there). As Hosea apparently means to express his contempt for the impure worship of the N. kingdom by substituting (Hos 4[15] 5[8] 10[5]) Bethaven 'house of idolatry' for Bethel 'house of God,' for a similar reason the Jerubbaal of Jg 6[32] is replaced in 2 S 11[21] by Jerubbesheth. In like manner the name of Jonathan's son was not Mephibosheth but Meribbaal. In this case also it is the Chronicler that has preserved the true name (cf. 2 S 4[4] with 1 Ch 8[34] 9[40]). The offensive component Baal was occasionally got rid of in a different way. In 1 S 14[49] the name of one of Saul's sons appears as Ishvi (יִשְׁוִי), in which Wellhausen, followed by Budde (Richt u. Sam. 207), sees a corruption of Ishjo (אִישִׁיו) or Ishjahu. This is supported by the LXX (Luc.) Ἰεσσιού. In this instance the word Baal, instead of being degraded to Bosheth, is transfigured into one of the forms of the name J″, and the 'man of Baal' (Ishbaal) becomes the 'man of J″' (Ishjahu). On the same principle, David's son *Beel*iada (1 Ch 14[7]) appears in 2 S 5[16] as *El*iada (Benzinger, Heb. Archäol. 152).

According to 1 S 31[2], Saul's three eldest sons, Jonathan, Abinadab, and Malchi-shua fell with their father upon Mt. Gilboa. David's sovereignty was thereupon acknowledged by the men of Judah; but Abner, who had been Saul's general, remained faithful to the cause of his master and kinsman, and under his directions Ishbosheth was proclaimed king at Mahanaim on the E. side of the Jordan. This locality was probably selected by Abner as his headquarters, because the land of Israel proper was completely overrun by the Philistines. Presently the men of David, under the command of Joab, encountered those of I., commanded by Abner, at Gibeon (2 S 2[12ff.]). It was agreed to abide the issue of a combat between twelve champions selected on either side, but this proved indecisive, as all the twenty-four fell mortally wounded. A general engagement now ensued in which Abner's forces were completely routed. Some time thereafter I. had the misfortune to give deadly offence to Abner. Having detected his general in an intrigue with Rizpah, Saul's concubine, he reproached him with what, according to the usages of the time, amounted to an act of treason (2 S 3[6-11]). Abner hotly resented such treatment, and declared his intention of transferring his allegiance to David. The full accomplishment of his purpose was, indeed, prevented by Joab, who, in order to avenge the death of his brother Asahel, treacherously murdered Abner on the occasion of his visit to David in Hebron. The cause of I., weak before, was hopelessly ruined by the defection and death of its chief supporter, and the unfortunate claimant of his father's throne was not long afterwards murdered by two of his officers (2 S 4[5-7]). The details of the crime are obscured by the rendering of AV and text of RV, although they are correctly given in the margin of the latter, which follows the Sept. That the latter is here to be preferred to the MT needs no proof (see W. R. Smith, OTJC[2] 82). Instead of the unintelligible language and meaningless repetitions of vv.[6. 7], we read, 'And lo, the woman that kept the door was cleaning wheat, and she slumbered and slept, and the brothers Rechab and Baanah passed in unobserved and came into the house as Ishbosheth lay upon his bed, and they smote him and slew him,' etc. The assassins came to David with the head of their victim; but, instead of receiving the reward they expected, they were overwhelmed with reproaches and condemned to instant death (2 S 4[9-12]). This was the turning-point in the fortunes of David, who, although he had no complicity in the assassination, could not help profiting from the death of his rival. Seeing that he was the only possible leader against the Philistines, the whole nation of Israel now offered him their allegiance, and shortly thereafter he was able vastly to strengthen his position by wresting from the Jebusites the stronghold of Jerusalem, which city was henceforward the capital of the kingdom.

2. Ishbosheth (i.e. Ishbaal) should also prob. be read in 2 S 23[8] for Josheb-basshebeth (wh. see).

ISHHOD (אִישְׁהוֹד 'man of majesty').—A Manassite, 1 Ch 7[18] (AV Ishod). See GENEALOGY.

ISHI (יִשְׁעִי 'salutary'). — 1. A Jerahmeelite, 1 Ch 2[31]. 2. A Judahite chief, 1 Ch 4[20]. 3. A chief of East Manasseh, 1 Ch 5[24]. 4. One of the captains of the 500 men of the tribe of Simeon (which see) who smote the Amalekites at Mt. Seir, 1 Ch 4[42]. See GENEALOGY, II. 5, IV. 11, 57, VII.[a] 8.

ISHI (אִישִׁי 'my husband,' LXX ὁ ἀνήρ μου).—The name which Hosea (2[16]) recommends Israel to apply to J″ instead of Baali, 'my lord' (see HOSEA, and cf. W. R. Smith, Proph. of Isr. 171, 408 f.).

ISHMA (יִשְׁמָא).—One of the sons (acc. to LXX) of Etam, 1 Ch 4[3]. The MT is undoubtedly corrupt. See GENEALOGY.

ISHMAEL (יִשְׁמָעֵאל 'God heareth,' or better, 'May God hear'*).—The son of Abraham, by his concubine Hagar. The history of Ishmael is contained in parts of Gn 16. 17. 21[8-21] 25—chapters of which 16[1a. 3. 15. 16] 17. 25[7-11a. 12-17] belong to P, the rest (so far as it relates to Ishmael) belonging to J (ch. 16) or E (ch. 21). Sarah was barren (Gn 16[1]); so, in accordance with the manners of the age (cf. 30[3. 9], also 22[24], Ex 21[7-8]), she gives Abraham her handmaid Hagar, an Egyptian, as his concubine, in the hope that she may be 'builded up from her' (16[2]), i.e. obtain a family by her†—viz. by adopting Hagar's offspring as her own. When Hagar saw that she had conceived, a womanly feeling of superiority took possession of her, and she 'despised' Sarah (cf. 1 S 1[6f.]), who forthwith complains reproachfully to her husband, uttering the passionate wish that the indignity done to her may be visited upon him, and appealing to Jehovah to judge whether he is not to blame for permitting it. Abraham replies that Hagar is Sarah's slave, and she can do to her as she pleases. She accordingly 'deals hardly' with her, lit. 'humbles' her,‡ viz. by imposing upon her hard or degrading work, from which Hagar seeks refuge by flight (16[4-6]). Hagar was an Egyptian: so she naturally fled in the direction of Egypt; and there, in the wilderness, by 'the spring on the way to Shur'—the spring known afterwards (v.[14]) as the well Beer-laḥai-roi, and identified by many § with Muweilih, a watering-place about 25 miles W.N.W. of 'Ain Ḳadis, on the caravan route between Hebron and

* The name occurs also in early Bab. as that of a slave from the land of 'Martu' or the Amorites (Thureau Dangin, Rev. d'Assyr., 1897, p. 78) and in Minæan (Hommel, Süd.-Arab. Chrestomathie, 117, 135).

† The expression, as 30[3]. For the family being represented under the figure of a house, cf. Ru 4[11], Dt 25[9], Ex 1[21].

‡ See especially, on the word here used, Rahlfs, עָנָה und עָנִי in den Psalmen (1892), p. 67 ff. (with numerous illustrations from Arabic); more briefly, Driver, Deut. p. 246. Cf. Gn 31[50] ('afflict').

Egypt—the angel of J″ 'found' her. He addresses to her three words (16[9-11]): firstly, bidding her return to her mistress, and 'humble herself' * under her hands; secondly, encouraging her to take this step by the promise of a numerous seed; and thirdly, fixing in anticipation the name and character of her future son: 'thou shalt call his name Ishmael, because Jehovah hath heard thy affliction. And he shall be a wild-ass of a man, his hand being against all, and the hand of all being against him: and in front of all his brethren he shall dwell.' The wild-ass is a wayward, intractable creature, whose home is the prairie (see the description in Job 39[5-8]; and cf. Hos 8[9] 'going alone wilfully'). Ishmael, like many of the other characters in Gn, is an impersonation of his descendants; and the narrator draws here a true and picturesque description of the Bedawis,† and of the life led by them to the present day: now, as ever, they are the free and independent sons of the desert, owning no authority save that of their own chief, reckless of life, if occasion demands it, ever ready to plunder the hapless traveller who ventures without permission within their domain. The tribes whom the Hebrews thus regarded as descended from Ishmael, dwelt partly, it seems, on the S. of Canaan; but in the main, as the words 'in the front of all his brethren' (so 25[18b], cf. v.[6]) imply,‡ their home was on the east of Israel and Edom (see below).

The next allusion to Ishmael is in ch. 17 (P), where, after the promise of a son to Sarah, Abraham, incredulous, and still resting his hopes upon Ishmael, utters the entreaty on his behalf (17[18]), 'Oh that Ishmael might live before thee!' § In reply, God reaffirms His promise to Sarah, but adds (with a play on his name), 'And as for Ishmael, I have heard thee: behold, I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; twelve princes shall he beget, and I will make him into a great nation' (17[20]; see 25[12-16]). And at the end of the chapter, it is stated that Ishmael, being 13 years old (cf. 17[24] with 16[16], both P), was circumcised, together with the other male members of Abraham's household.

We again hear of Ishmael some three years afterwards, when Isaac was weaned‖ (21[8-21] E). Sarah 'saw the son of Hagar, the Egyptian, whom she had borne unto Abraham, playing,' or sporting, jesting (19[14] 26[8], Ex 32[6], Jg 16[25]);¶ her maternal jealousy is excited; she a second time appeals to her husband, and bids him, with some peremptoriness, 'cast out' both Ishmael and his slave-mother. Abraham, though resenting this demand,—for Ishmael was his firstborn, and had obviously also (note 'on account of his son') won his affection,—is nevertheless encouraged by God—as may be inferred from v.[14], in a nocturnal vision or dream—to yield to it: Abraham's genuine 'seed,' the inheritors of the promises, are to be in Isaac's line; and national greatness elsewhere is in store for Ishmael also. Resigned by these thoughts to the loss of his son, he sends him away with his mother, giving them a modicum of provision to support them on their journey. They wander to and fro over the dry and stony soil of the desert about Beersheba until their water is exhausted; Hagar then, faint and desperate, flings the child down under the shade of one of the bushes, and seats herself sadly some little way off, not wishing to look upon the death of her son. But God 'heard' the voice of the crying child—the word is evidently chosen with allusion to the name Ishmael, even if it be not intended as an explanation of its origin (cf. 16[11] [J], 17[20] [P]) *,—called out to his mother, reassured her with a fresh promise (see 16[10]) of Ishmael's future greatness, and showed her a well of water, which enabled her to revive the dying lad. Ishmael grew up, made his home in the wilderness on the S. of Canaan, and became famous as an archer. His wife, it is added, like his mother, was an Egyptian.

The only other incidents of Ishmael's life which are mentioned, are that he and Isaac buried their father after his death (25[9] P), and that he himself died at the age of 127 (25[17] P).

Two expressions in ch. 21 deserve to be briefly commented upon.

(1) מְצַחֵק in v.[9] was a word which lent itself readily to Haggadistic expositions. R. Akiba (on account of its use in Gn 39[14. 17]) supposed it to refer to Ishmael's unchastity, R. Ishmael (on account of its use in Ex 32[6]) to his devotion to idolatry; other Rabbis (on account of the use of שָׂחַק in 2 S 2[14], Pr 26[19]) to attempts made by him to shoot his brother (Bereshith Rabba, ad loc., p. 254 f. in Wünsche's translation; the second explanation also in Jer. Quæst. ad Gen., and in Targ. Pseud-Jon. ad loc.). There were also other stories current among the later Jews respecting Ishmael's insolence towards his brother, his disputes with him concerning the birthright, etc: see Beer, Leben Abraham's nach Auffassung der jüd. Sage, pp. 49 ff. (where other Haggadistic expansions of the narrative of Ishmael's expulsion are also given), 57, 61. St. Paul, in Gal 4[29] (ἐδίωκεν), follows some of these later traditions.

(2) 'Flung' (הִשְׁלִיךְ) in v.[15] clearly implies that hitherto Ishmael had been carried by his mother, although according to 16[16] 21[5. 8] he must have been 15 years old, if not more (see preced. col. and note ‖). Attempts have been made to remove the inconsistency: but it is in reality similar to the one in 12[11ff.] (as well as others occurring in other parts of Gn); 16[16] 21[5], the passages which fix the age of Ishmael, belong to P, whereas the present narrative belongs to a different writer, E, who took a different view of the chronology, and pictured Ishmael as still an infant (cf. v.[20] 'and he grew up').

The twelve 'princes' begotten by Ishmael (17[20]), or, in other words, the twelve eponymous ancestors of the tribes who were reputed to be descended from him, are enumerated in 25[12-16] (P): Nebaioth, Kedar, Adbeel, Mibsam, Mishma', Dumah, Massa, Ḥadad, Têma, Jeṭur, Naphish, and Ḳedemah. The first two of these are mentioned several times besides in the OT, chiefly as wealthy pastoral or trading tribes (Jer 49[28-32], Is 60[7], Ezk 27[21]; cf. Is 42[11], Jer 2[10], Ca 1[5], Ps 120[5]), Ḳedar also (Is 21[17]) as famous for its archers (cf. Gn 21[20]); Têma (about 250 miles S.E. of Edom) is mentioned Is 21[14], Jer 25[23], Job 6[19]: Jeṭur and Naphish appear from 1 Ch 5[19] to have been neighbours of Reuben on the E. of Jordan; the former in later days moved northwards, and are known in the Roman age as the wild and predatory mountain-tribe of Ituræans, skilled likewise in the use of the bow; for further particulars see the separate names in this Dictionary.† The home of Ishmael himself is in Gn 21[21] the wilderness of Paran, on the S. of Canaan, and no doubt there were Ishmaelites in that neighbourhood;‡ but the general situation of the tribes descended from him was unquestionably on the east of Palestine, Edom, and the Gulf of 'Akabah, in agreement with the expression in 16[12] and 25[18b] (cf. v.[6]) 'in the front of all his brethren': some of these tribes (25[16]) dwelt in fixed villages (חֲצֵרוֹת, cf.

‡ The terms of 25[18a] 'And they dwelt from Ḥavîlah (probably north-east Arabia) unto Shur that is in front of Egypt,' would include the wilderness of Paran. The well (and sanctuary?) of Beer-laḥai-roi may have been a common meeting-place for Ishmaelites and Israelites, at which the old traditions about Ishmael were recounted and kept alive (cf. Stade, ZAW, 1881, p. 348 f.).

the 'villages' of Kedar, Is 42[11]), others in טִירוֹת, a peculiar word, denoting, as it seems, the temporary circular encampments of nomad tribes (cf. Nu 31[10], Ezk 25[4]).* A daughter of Ishmael is also mentioned, as married by Esau, in Gn 28[9] (where she is called Maḥalath) and 36[3] (where her name is given as Basemath); no doubt this statement points to the fact that certain Edomite clans (see 36[13], compared with v.[4]) had in them an admixture of Ishmaelite blood.

Ishmaelites are mentioned by J in Gn 37[25. 27. 28] 39[1] (a caravan of Ishmaelites carrying gums from Gilead to Egypt, to whom Joseph is sold by his brethren: the parallel narrative of E speaks of Midianites, 37[28. 36]), Jg 8[24] (where, as the term is applied to Midianites, who belonged to a different branch of the Abrahamidæ, Gn 25[4], it seems to be used in a generalized sense, 'not of race, but of mode of life,' to denote itinerant caravan-traders in general), Ps 83[6]; and individual Ishmaelites are named in 1 Ch 2[17] (Jether, 'Amasa's father: read accordingly in 2 S 17[25]), 27[30] (Obil, superintendent of David's camels).

The Hebrews classified their neighbours genealogically according to the nearer or more distant relationship in which they were regarded as standing towards themselves. The Edomites were most closely related to them: they were accordingly the descendants of Esau, the twin-brother of their own immediate ancestor, Jacob. Moab and Ammon were descended from Lot, Abraham's nephew. To Naḥor, Abraham's brother, are traced twelve Aramæan tribes,—eight to a wife, Milcah, and four to a concubine, Re'umah (22[20-24]). Six tribes (one being Midian), and several sub-tribes, are the descendants of Abraham, though not by Sarah, the mother of Isaac, or by Hagar, but by a concubine, Ḳeṭurah (25[1-4]). And here twelve tribes, spread over different parts of N. Arabia and the country E. of Israel, are traced to Abraham, through a 'handmaid,' Hagar, holding an intermediate position between Sarah and Ḳeṭurah.† Historical recollections, similarities of language or civilization,‡ or other characteristics, the exact nature of which we cannot in every case determine, must have guided the Hebrew genealogists in thus forming ethnic groups, and defining the precise position occupied by each in relation to Israel. The Ishmaelites, being referred to Abraham himself, must have been regarded as belonging to an ancient stock, and evidently (cf. 17[20] 21[18] 'a great nation') enjoyed a reputation among the Hebrews, though at the same time some inferiority was implied in the fact that their ancestor was Abraham's son, not by his legitimate wife, but by a 'handmaid': the fact that Ishmael's mother and wife were both Egyptian shows, further, that his descendants were considered to have Egyptian blood in their veins.§ At a much later date, Ishmael was connected vaguely with Arabia in general: ‖ Moḥammed was supposed to have been descended from him through Ḳedar;* he is mentioned several times in the Ḳor'ān, and is said to have assisted his father in the construction of the Ka'bah at Mecca.† In the OT, however, it is important to observe, Ishmael is hardly at all associated with what we term 'Arabia':‡ the 'Arabian' peninsula (including parts in the extreme South, as Ḥadramaut and Sheba) is peopled by the Joḳtanidæ (descendants of Joḳtan, son of Abraham's sixth ancestor, "Eber,' and consequently much less closely connected with Israel), Gn 10[26-31]; the Ishmaelites are entirely distinct from these, and are limited to certain specified tribes, living almost entirely on the N. and N.W. of the Joḳtanidæ.§ The circumcision of Ishmael at the age of 13 (Gn 17[25]) is in all probability intended as an explanation of the corresponding custom among the Ishmaelite tribes. Circumcision has for long been practised by the 'Arabs'; but it is commonly performed among them at a much later age than was customary with the Jews: ‖ according to Eus. Præp. Ev. VI. xi. 49 it was performed in the 13th year by οἱ Ἰσμαηλῖται οἱ κατὰ τὴν Ἀραβίαν, and so according to Jos. Ant. I. xii. 2 by the Ἄραβες.

The personality of Ishmael must be estimated similarly to that of the other patriarchs (cf. vol. i. p. 15 f.; vol. ii. p. 533 ff.).¶ It is most reasonable to regard him as a historical character, but a character who at the same time was idealized, and whose biography, as told in the Book of Genesis, was coloured in some of its features by the characteristics, or historical relations, of the tribes who were considered to be his descendants. The racial affinity of these tribes to Israel is clearly indicated in the Biblical narratives; it is possible that the picture of Sarah's jealous opposition to Hagar and her son reflects to some extent old racial rivalries and conflicts, which ended in these tribes being obliged to separate from the ancestors of the Israelites, though they secured a successful independence elsewhere. The human passions and interests of Sarah and Abraham, of Hagar and Ishmael, the promptings, partly of natural affection, partly of religious feeling, under which they act, and the manner in which the hand of Providence guides and moulds the destinies of men, are all portrayed with the vividness and psychological truth which is generally characteristic of the Book of Genesis.

In Gal 4[21]–5[1] the narrative of Ishmael and Isaac is expounded allegorically. Hagar and Sarah represent the two covenants, the old and the new: Ishmael is the child after the flesh, born in bondage; Isaac is the child of promise, born in freedom: in the rivalries which arose between them, and ended in the triumph of the latter,

* The word for 'nations' in Gn 25[16] is also a peculiar one (אֻמּוֹת), more Arabic ('ummeh) or Aramaic (Ezr 4[10], and often in Dn; cf. in late Heb. Ps 117[1]) than Hebrew (Nu 25[15], also P, 'a head of the peoples, or clans, of a father's house [i.e. of a family] in Midian'), and no doubt adopted here as the technical term used properly of the Ishmaelite tribes.

† The recurrence of the numbers 6 and 12 in these tribal systems is an indication that they were to some extent formed artificially.

‡ In the case of Moab, we know, for instance, that its language differed only dialectically from Hebrew.

§ Burton (El-Medinah and Mecca, 1855, i. 213 f., cf. iii. 31 f.) remarks on the palpably Egyptian physiognomy of some of the Bedawi clans of Sinai, and quotes Gn 21[21]. Whether this was the case in ancient times, we do not know; but it is perhaps worth remembering that the Sinaitic peninsula was for long owned and garrisoned by the Egyptians, who worked in it mines of turquoise and copper (Maspero, Dawn of Civil. 349–358).

‖ Josephus (Ant. I. xii. 2) even calls him the κτίστης τοῦ ἔθνους τῶν Ἀράβων.

* And so, in the mediæval Jewish writers, לְשׁוֹן יִשְׁמָעֵאל and לְשׁוֹן קֵדָר both mean 'Arabic.'

‡ In the OT 'Arab' is the name simply of a single comparatively small tribe (above, vol. i. p. 135).

§ The principal Bedawi tribes are spread also over the N. and N.W. of the Arabian Peninsula (see the Encycl. Brit.[9] ii. 246–9); but it should be added, to preclude misunderstanding, that we cannot identify any of them specifically with the tribes connected in the OT with Ishmael: all that can be predicated is a general resemblance in their character and mode of life to the description in Gn 16[12].

‖ Among the Bedawis of the Sinaitic Peninsula, for instance, at the age of 8 (Palmer, in the Ordnance Survey of the Pen. of Sinai, p. 59); among those of Arabia at the age of 5-6, but sometimes ten years later (Burton, l.c. iii. 81). Ibn Athir says that among the ancient Arabians the age was from 10 to 15 years (Pococke, Spec. Hist. Arab. 319).

¶ Kuenen (ThT, May 1871, p. 296 f.) and others regard Hagar and Ishmael as simply the eponymous ancestors of the tribes known as 'HAGARENES,' and 'sons of Ishmael' or 'Ishmaelites,' the narratives of Hagar's flight and expulsion being suggested by the meaning of the names (cf. Arab. hajara, to flee; hejrah, flight). Cf. p. 534, notes.

St. Paul sees foreshadowed the conflict in the history of the nascent Church, the defeat of the spirit which clung to carnal ordinances, and the triumph of the spirit of freedom, which had the faith and the insight to see that such ordinances must pass away. The practical conclusion follows: let the Galatian converts 'stand fast' in the freedom in which Christ had set them, and not 'be entangled again in a yoke' of Jewish ordinances.

ISHMAEL.—1. See preceding article. 2. One of the six sons of Azel, a descendant of Saul through Merib-baal (Mephibosheth), 1 Ch 8^{38} 9^{44}. 3. The father or ancestor of the Zebadiah who was ruler (נָגִיד) of the house of Judah in the reign of Jehoshaphat, 2 Ch 19^{11}. 4. The son of Jehohanan, one of the 'captains of hundreds,' who assisted Jehoiada in restoring Jehoash to the throne of Judah, 2 Ch 23^{1}. 5. A priest of the family of Pashhur, who was forced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife, Ezr 10^{22}. In 1 Es 9^{22} Ismael.

6. Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, the son of Elishama, a member of the royal house of David. See Jer 40–42, and the brief summary in 2 K 25^{23-25}. After the fall of Jerusalem, Ishmael was a commander of one of the bodies of Jewish troops which maintained their independence in the country districts. Nebuchadnezzar had appointed Gedaliah (wh. see), the son of Ahikam the protector of Jeremiah (Jer 26^{24}), as governor of the remnants of the Jewish state, with his residence at Mizpah; and one of his first cares was to attempt to restore confidence among the scattered inhabitants of the land, and to induce the remains of Zedekiah's army to submit to the Babylonian conquerors. At first Gedaliah's efforts met with a certain success. The captains of the Jewish forces, and Ishmael among the number, came to Mizpah, and made their submission to the new governor. Gedaliah, promising to use his influence with the Babylonians on their behalf, exhorted them to settle quietly in the cities they had occupied, and to gather in the harvest, which was then standing neglected in the fields (Jer 40^{7-12}). But the restoration of peace and good order in the desolated country of Judah was not in accordance with the wishes of Baalis, the king of Ammon, who doubtless saw an opportunity of extending his territory at the expense of his neighbours on the west. He found a willing tool in Ishmael, whom he commissioned to assassinate Gedaliah. Ishmael may have been actuated by a fanatical hatred against a fellow-countryman who had consented to acknowledge the Chaldæan supremacy, or by jealousy of the preference given to Gedaliah over a member of the royal house. His designs, however, were not unknown; and Johanan the son of Kareah, and the other officers who had formerly acted with Ishmael but now supported Gedaliah, warned the latter of his danger. Gedaliah, unfortunately, would not listen to their warnings; and when Johanan, seeing how disastrous the death of Gedaliah would be for all the Jews, offered to kill Ishmael privately, the governor refused to consent to the proposal, and declared that the charges made against Ishmael were only calumnies (ib. $^{12-16}$).

In the seventh month, that is, about three months after the fall of Jerus. and two months after the destruction of the city, Ishmael with ten confederates came to Gedaliah at Mizpah.* Here they were hospitably entertained; but during the meal rose up against their hosts, and murdered Gedaliah and all the Jewish and Chaldæan soldiers in his retinue. Ishmael must after this have gained possession of the town, for he succeeded in preventing any news of what had taken place from being published abroad. Two days later a party of eighty pilgrims from Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria passed by Mizpah, with offerings which they intended to present at the ruined temple in Jerusalem. On account of the destruction of the sanctuary they were attired as mourners, with beards shaven, and clothes rent, and gashes on their face and hands. With feigned grief * Ishmael went out to meet them, and invited them to visit Gedaliah at Mizpah. Once inside the city, they were put to death by Ishmael and his men. Ten of them, however, were able to ransom their lives by promising to deliver up the stores of wheat, barley, oil, and honey which they had hidden in the fields. The corpses of the seventy murdered men were thrown into a great pit or cistern, which had been made by Asa at the time of his war with Baasha (cf. 1 K 15^{16-22}). The people of Mizpah, together with the royal princesses, who had been left by Nebuchadnezzar in charge of Gedaliah, Ishmael now treated as his prisoners, and attempted to carry them off to the country of the Ammonites (Jer 41^{1-10}). But tidings of the events at Mizpah had reached Johanan ben-Kareah and his companions. They collected their troops and pursued after the fugitives, whom they overtook by the great pool of Gibeon, the scene of the fight between the men of Joab and of Abner (2 S 2^{12-16}). The captives, among whom were the prophet Jeremiah and his scribe Baruch (cf. Jer 40^{6} 42^{16}· 43^{3}), gladly went over to the pursuing forces; but Ishmael with eight of his men escaped to the Ammonites. The Jewish leaders, having failed to capture Ishmael, were now afraid of suffering the vengeance of the king of Babylon for the murder of his vassal Gedaliah. Accordingly they did not venture to return to Mizpah, but moved to the neighbourhood of Bethlehem, whence they subsequently fled to Egypt, in spite of the advice and warnings of Jeremiah (Jer 41^{11}–43^{13}). A reference in Jer 52^{30} to 745 persons who were carried captive to Babylon in the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, i.e. four years after the fall of Jerus., is perhaps to be connected with fresh measures taken against the Jews in consequence of the outrage of Ishmael. The murder of Gedaliah was kept in memory by a fast instituted in the seventh month (Zec 7^{5} 8^{19}), which is celebrated on the 3rd day of Tisri (Sept.–Oct.)

ISHSECHEL, Ezr 8^{18} RVm.—It is uncertain whether אִישׁ שִׂכְלוֹ is to be regarded as a proper name (cf. LXX ἀνὴρ σαχών A, ἀν. σαχώχ B), or should be tr^{d} 'a man of discretion,' so Luc. (ἀνὴρ συνετός) and RV; AV 'a man of understanding,' cf. 1 Es 8^{47} ἄνδρα(s) ἐπιστήμονα(s). For the word שֵׂכֶל = discretion, intelligence, cf. 1 S 25^{3}, 1 Ch 22^{12}, Pr 13^{15} 16^{22}, Ps 111^{10} etc. The context leads us to expect the proper name of the representative of the sons of Mahli, and the order of the words is decidedly against the supposition that Sherebiah is meant, the conjunction having been inserted by mistake. With the name Ish-sechel we might compare Eshbaal, 1 Ch 8^{33}, Ishhod, ib. 7^{18}. But such forms are rare,

* In 41^{1} the words וְרַבֵּי הַמִּלְחָמָה should be omitted; so LXX.

* In 41^{6} LXX reads αὐτοὶ ἐπορεύοντο καὶ ἔκλαιον, 'they wept as they went,' which Cornill adopts; but the change does not seem to be necessary.

and it is probable that there is some corruption in the text; the proper name may have fallen out before the complimentary designation, or may have been wrongly corrected into the present form Ish-sechel. Cf. Ryssel and Ryle, ad loc.

ISLAND, ISLE (אִי, אִיִּים, νῆσος, νησίον) is the tr. of a Heb. word which has a much wider significance. Its root-meaning is supposed to be habitable land, and in one passage (Is 42[15]) it means undoubtedly dry land, as opposed to water: 'I will make the rivers islands, and I will dry up the pools' (RV). Accordingly, some translators (Cheyne uniformly in Psalms, and in Deutero.-Isaiah frequently) render it lands or countries, with the maritime connotation entirely left out. In by far the greater number of passages, however, it signifies coastland —land either washed or surrounded by the sea, whether belonging to continents or islands. The idea of distance is usually contained in the word, either implicitly (Ps 97[1], Is 11[11] 42[12]) or expressly (Is 66[19], Jer 31[10]), although in Is 20[6] this isle plainly means the coastland of Canaan. The isles that are in the sea (Ezk 26[18]) are the coastlands, or island-like countries on the seaboard, which profited by the traffic of Tyre; and in one instance, judging by the ivory and ebony which they had to exchange, many isles (Ezk 27[15]) may be East Africa or India. Usually, however, they are the islands and maritime countries to the West. The isles of the sea on which Ahasuerus laid tribute (Est 10[1]) are the Islands and Coastlands of the Ægean, in contrast to the inland countries of Asia, as apparently also are the isles (Dn 11[18]) of which 'the king of the North' (11[15]), Antiochus the Great, should 'take many.' The isles of the sea are elsewhere the islands of the Mediterranean and the countries on the western seaboard, with which the people of Palestine traded in later times, as when Simon Maccabæus (1 Mac 14[5] RV) 'took Joppa for a haven, and made it an entrance for the isles of the sea.' The isles of Elishah—one of the sons of Javan (Gn 10[4])—which furnish blue and purple to the people of Tyre (Ezk 27[7]), may point to Elis and the Peloponnesus generally which produced those dyes. The isles of the Gentiles (Gn 10[5], Zeph 2[11]) are the distant coastlands of the Western Mediterranean. The isles are sometimes used in Ps, in Is, and in Jer to designate the West, sometimes the distant West, in contrast to the East. Tarshish and the isles (Ps 72[10]), and Sheba and Seba, represent respectively the western and eastern boundaries of Messiah's kingdom. The isles and the inhabitants thereof (Is 42[10]), and the isles of Kittim (Jer 2[10]) are joined with Kedar to signify all lands from west to east. There are references to individual islands both in OT and in NT. The isles of Kittim (Jer 2[10], Ezk 27[6]) are the coasts of Cyprus, but the name was used later for any Western maritime people, as far even as Italy (Dn 11[30], 1 Mac 1[1] 8[5]); the isle of Caphtor (Jer 47[4] margin; comp. Am 9[7], Dt 2[23], Gn 10[14]) is held to be Crete, although some authorities identify it with the coastland of the Delta; 'the men of Dedan' (Ezk 27[15]) are in the LXX (B Ῥοδίων, A Ἀραδίων) called Rhodians (initial R being read instead of D), where the reference would be to the islanders of Rhodes, who were famous mariners; Tyre appears as an island (Is 23[2]), although the inhabitants of the isle may be the dwellers on the neighbouring seacoast of Phœnicia. Cyprus (Ac 4[37] 13[4]), Crete (Ac 27, Tit 1), Cauda (Ac 27[16], AV Clauda), Melita (Ac 28[1]), Patmos (Rev 1[9]), are islands mentioned in the NT. One reference, the island of the innocent (Job 22[30]), which for long puzzled translators and commentators, has disappeared in RV, where the rendering is him that is not innocent, the mistranslation having arisen from confusing 'i, the particle not (found in Ichabod, Jezebel), with 'i, an island. The wild beasts of the island (Is 13[22] 24[14], Jer 1[39]) have also disappeared and been replaced by wolves, AV having mistaken the derivation of the word.

The object of this article is to give an outline of the political history of Israel, leaving the religious history (as far as possible) to be dealt with in the article on the Theology of the OT, to appear in a later volume of this Dictionary. A further object has been to call attention to the most important reconstructions of parts of the history, which have been offered by recent critics.

i. THE NAME.—(a) The people themselves called themselves in OT times יִשְׂרָאֵל Yisrael * (so also they are called by Mesha, Moabite Stone, lines 5, 7), or בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל Bĕnē Yisrael. The latter form describes the people as the descendants of an ancestor Israel (Jacob), Gn 43[6. 8. 11] (J) etc. See JACOB. In an inscription of Shalmaneser II. (c. 854 B.C.) the name Sir'lai occurs coupled with the mention of Ahab. For the form Y-si-ri'l read on the stele of Merenptah, see below, p. 509[a].

(b) Foreigners, and Israelites speaking of themselves to foreigners, used the term עִבְרִי 'Ibhri, Gn 39[14. 17] (J), Ex 1[16] 2[6] (E), 1 S 4[6. 9] 13[19] 14[11]. The name is found in Tacitus (Hist. v. 2, 'Hebræasque terras'; cf. Gn 40[15a] 'the land of the Hebrews') and in Jos. in referring to the language (Ant. I. i. 1, 2, Bekker) and to the people (Ant. VI. v. 3, VII. iv. 1, Bekker). No satisfactory explanation of 'Ibhri can be given. It may be connected with the Eber of Gn 10[21. 25]; it will then be the designation of several other peoples besides Israel. Again, it may be the adjective corresponding to the substantive עֵבֶר 'Ebher 'other side,' 'beyond'; Is 7[20] 'beyond the river,' 9[1] [8[23] Heb.] 'beyond Jordan,' Jer 25[22] 'beyond the sea.' It would seem from these examples that 'Ibhri (Hebrew) designated the Israelites as not autochthonous, but as intruders in Canaan from some land 'beyond'; cf. Gn 14[13] where Abram the Hebrew (the new comer, τῷ περάτῃ, LXX) is distinguished from Mamre the Amorite (the old inhabitant). See HEBREW.

(c) Ἰουδαῖος or 'Judæus' ('Jew') was the term used by classical writers, and in part by Jos. (e.g. Ant. VII. iv. 1, 'David ὁ τῶν Ἰουδαίων βασιλεύς') in referring even to ancient times. This use is due, of course, to the great part played by the tribe of Judah and the city of Jerusalem in the post-exilic history of the people. See JEW.

ii. THE NATIONAL CHARACTERISTICS OF ISRAEL.—The character of the ancient Israelites as a nation may be gathered partly from their history, partly from a study of the facts of their history in the light of the characteristics of the modern Bedawin. The Israelites entered Canaan as nomads, and displayed, at least in the earlier period, most of the virtues and vices of tent-dwellers. They seem to have been content with the simple conditions of life under which the Bedawin live; and to have been but little attracted by the civilization (as distinguished from the flesh-pots) of Egypt, or by the culture (as distinguished from the idolatry) of Canaan. Their ideal was that of the shepherd (Gn 46^{32-34} J), which does not in practice exclude such simple agriculture as the care of a few date palms (as among the modern Arabs), or the raising of a few scattered crops of cereals (as among the Zulus before 1878). The Israelites, as revealed in their earliest literature, appear as brave, adventurous, crafty, treacherous, and vengeful in war and enmity (the careers of Gideon, David, and Joab illustrate these characteristics); pure in point of sexual morality within the limits of the polygamy allowed to all Eastern peoples (cf. Gn 39^{9}, 2 S 12^{1-14}; cf. also the laws Ex 20^{17}, and note especially the wide scope of the language used, 21^{7-11}); strong in loyalty to the clan and correspondingly weak in national cohesion (see Judges and 1 and 2 Samuel, passim). The mercantile aptitude shown by Israel so much in modern times is alluded to even by Hosea ($12^{7.\ 8=8.\ 9\ Heb.}$) and Amos ($8^{4.\ 5}$), with further allusion to cheating and fraud. Possibly Israel first learned successful trading from the Canaanites (cf. Hos 12^{7} RVm), but it is more probable that they had already practised it in their nomad period, for the nomads too were merchants, Gn 37^{25} 'Ishmaelites' J, and ^{28} 'Midianites' E, Ezk 27^{21}.

In matters of thought the Israelites were not speculative, nor systematic. They realized, in a way the Greeks never realized, that some things were too high for them. God's government of the world (assumed as existing by all but perhaps the latest thinkers) offered the chief problems of their philosophy. 'Why do the wicked prosper?' was perhaps the chief question of the Hebrew 'philosophers.' Hebrew thought was occupied with the practical problems of religion.

And here it must be said that the Israelite (unlike the nomad) was profoundly religious. The modern Bedawy, as described, e.g., by Doughty (Arabia Deserta, passim), has little sense of the moral claims of religion, though the name of Allah is constantly on his lips. The Hebrews, on the contrary, endured (sometimes well, sometimes, indeed, ill) the yoke of a faith which made strict demands upon them for a morality higher than that of their neighbours (cf. Nowack, Heb. Archäologie, i. 101, 103).

iii. THE LAND OF ISRAEL.—Although Israel was to be 'a peculiar treasure,' סְגֻלָּה sĕgullāh, Ex 19^{5} E, 'a special people' (עַם סְגֻלָּה 'am sĕgullāh, RV 'a peculiar people') Dt 7^{6}, the nation as a whole could not be isolated from other nations. Its home, Palestine, held an important place among the lands of the ancient Eastern world. The route connecting Northern Syria and (through Northern Syria) the valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris with Egypt ran along the coast of Palestine; and though this road passed for the most part through Philistine territory, its traffic must have had a great material and moral influence on Israel, whose borders lay so near it. East of Jordan ran the great road which connected Damascus with the head of the gulf of Akabah, and with the West Coast of Arabia. This road, again (if it corresponded at all with the modern Derb el-Ḥajj, i.e. the Pilgrim Road to Mecca), lay for the most part outside Israelite territory, but its nearness to Gilead for some 60 miles of its length must have exercised an important influence on the two and a half tribes east of Jordan. Towards the North the fertile plain of Esdraelon, now crossed by a railway, was traversed by a road which connected Damascus with the cities of the coast, ultimately with Tyre itself and with the Western lands beyond the Mediterranean.

With a land thus placed, Israel could not remain untouched by the movements of the great powers of Western Asia. If the Aramæans of Damascus wished to develop their trade on the Tyrian coast, or to find a new outlet for merchandise on the Red Sea, they were bound to make treaties—or war—with Israel. If the Empire of the Euphrates Valley (Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian in succession) wished to crown its conquests with the possession of the Nile, the passage of its armies must mean for Israel terror and spoiling, even if a formal submission and a seasonable payment of tribute should avert for a time worse mischief. Lastly, when Egypt desired to keep war off her own frontiers, it was Palestine which had to supply a confederacy of 'buffer states' to bear the reproach of Pharaoh's faithlessness and the main burden of his defeat.

On the other hand, two facts must be borne in mind which qualify the foregoing account of Israel's position among the nations. (1) Israel was cut off from the sea. It was Phœnicia which represented Palestine to the West. The name of Baal, not that of Jehovah, crossed the Mediterranean in early times. The civilization and religious thought which influenced the coast-lands of the West came from the Zidonians (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL pp. 26–28). (2) Though Israel as a whole was brought into close contact with the powers of Western Asia, yet the position of the Southern kingdom was comparatively isolated. It was the Northern kingdom which sustained the perpetual conflict with the Aramæans, which maintained a close intercourse with Tyre, which finally felt first the weight of the arm of Assyria, and fell first before its armies. Judah was comparatively sheltered from the world until Samaria fell before Sargon (B.C. 722).

Indeed, the territory which fell at the disruption to the Southern kingdom was fitted not only by its geographical position, but also by its physical features, to be a nursery of free men. The Land east of Jordan, the Plain of Esdraelon, and the Maritime Plain, were open to the march of conquering armies, but the Hills of Benjamin and the Hill Country of Judah together formed a Montenegro which a resolute peasantry might defend against the forces of an empire. The ruggedness of the approaches to this district can hardly be exaggerated; the sight of its ravines recalls at once the exploits of Jonathan (1 S 14^{4}), David (23^{14}), and Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac 3^{24} 4^{29-34}), and lends probability to the accounts of the victories of Asa (2 Ch $14^{9ff.}$) and of Jehoshaphat ($20^{22ff.}$). One circumstance only made against the isolation of Judah, viz. the mixed origin of the tribe of Judah itself, which seems to have contained a large Edomite element, the Calebites. (See CALEB, vol. i. p. 340).

The bearing of the physical configuration of Palestine as a whole on the history of Israel has been pointed out with great force by G. A. Smith (HGHL, ch. ii.). 'Palestine,' he writes, 'is almost as much divided into petty provinces as Greece, and far more than those of Greece are her divisions intensified by those of soil and climate.' She has been, and always will be, a land where fragments of many races live side by side. Israel at the conquest found 'seven nations' (Dt 7^1 ['four,' Jg 3^3]) occupying Canaan, and was content (after some slaughter) to settle down among them (Jg $3^{3.5}$). These nations represented racial and not merely political divisions; see the illustrations in Sayce, Races of the OT, or in Nowack, Archäologie, i. pp. 122, 126, 365. The influence of foreigners in Israel is apparent at several periods; above all, the incorporation of a mass of the old inhabitants into Israel during the time of the Judges (see JUDGES, PERIOD OF THE) had far-reaching results. The nation always had the foreigner in its midst. We hear of a 'mixed multitude' (עֶרֶב רַב 'ērebh rabh,—read perhaps עֲרָבְרֹב 'ărabhrōbh, 'a mixed people' without reference to numbers,—Ex 12^{38} E; אַסַפְסֻף 'ăṣaphṣuph, Nu 11^4 J or E) in the wilderness with Israel, of foreign wives (Jg 3^6, 1 K 11^1, Ezr $9^{1.2}$, Ru 1^4), guards (2 S 15^{18}, 2 K 11^4 RV; see GUARD), officers and mighty men (1 S 21^7, 2 S $23^{36ff.}$, Is $22^{15f.}$), task-workers (1 K $9^{20f.}$), artificers (1 K $7^{13f.}$), Rechabites (Jer $35^{2ff.}$), and Gibeonites (2 S $21^{1ff.}$, cf. Jos $9^{3ff.}$). The presence of the stranger (gēr) was recognized by law (Ex 20^{10} 23^9), and his conversion to Israel's faith was contemplated (1 K $8^{41ff.}$, Is $56^{3ff.}$). In fact, in a land like Canaan, broken up into small districts, each of which was the home of a tribe, Israel could not be kept from intermixture with foreigners. See, further, FOREIGNER, GER.

In judging of the climate and fertility of the land, the true meaning of the phrase 'a land flowing with milk and honey' (Nu 13^{27} JE) must be remembered. It is the nomad's praise of a pastoral country, and if we add to this description the additional advantages mentioned in Dt 6^{11} ('vineyards and olive trees'), we shall arrive at a just appreciation of the nature of that part of Palestine which was permanently held by Israel. It was not (with one important exception) agricultural territory. Its rocky slopes were suited for vines and olives, its hills and uplands for pasture, but only the plain of Esdraelon deserves the description of 'a land of wheat and barley' (Dt 8^8). The Maritime Plain testifies even now, under the hands of the German colonists, to its former fertility, but the plain was in the hands of the Philistines. Under these circumstances the Israelites never had a stock of corn, and famine is a frequent feature in their history (2 S 21^1, 1 K $17^{1ff.}$, 2 K $4^{38ff.}$ 8^1, Hag $1^{6ff.}$, Neh 5^3). We must remember, therefore, another description of Palestine as 'a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof,' Nu 13^{32} P (so LOT[6] p. 62, in spite of a misprint). The phrase (cf. Ezk 7^{15}) describes a land subject not only to famine, but also to pestilence. The latter also played a part in the history of Israel (1 S 5^6 6^{19}, 2 S 24^{15}, 2 K 19^{35} 20^7). The epigram quoted by Abu'l-Fida on Syria as a whole applies to Palestine, at least in part—

> 'Its atmosphere is—pestilence,
> Its dwellings are—straitness,
> Its soil is—stone,
> Its epidemics are—everlastingness.'

iv. SOURCES OF THE HISTORY.—(a) For the earliest period:—the narratives of J and E in the Hexateuch. (Unsupported statements in P are generally doubtful).

(b) For the period of the Judges:—Jg 2^6–18^{29}, apart from the editorial framework in which it is set.

(c) The undivided kingdom:—1 S 9–2 S 20^{26}. A large part of 2 S consists of a court history of David of great historical value. 2 S 21^1–24^{25} is an appendix of less value. 1 K 1^1–11^{43} (apart from additions by the Deuteronomic editor).

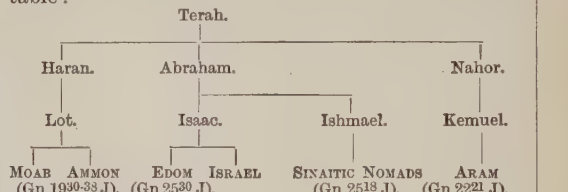
(d) The divided kingdom, (α) 1 K 13–2 K 17 (mainly concerned with the Northern kingdom); the parallel passages of Chronicles add little to our information, but much illustrative matter can be obtained from Amos and Hosea. (β) 2 Ch 11–28 (mainly concerned with the Southern kingdom, and mostly treated as a romance by modern critics). (γ) 2 K 18–25 (the fall of Judah); this part of the history receives much illustration from Isaiah (first half), Micah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. Monuments (Moabite, Egyptian, and especially Assyrian and Babylonian) give some additional light, but the statements of classical writers, e.g. Herodotus, are confused, for the most part and untrustworthy.

(e) The Persian Period. Ezra and Nehemiah are valuable in that they contain the memoirs of those two great men, but the books as a whole are ill compiled and incomplete, and it is difficult to extract a coherent story from them. Haggai and Zechariah (1–8) furnish valuable information.

(f) The Greek Period. Josephus (Ant. XI. viii.–XIII. vii.) gives some information, but his romantic stories are doubtful. For the age of the Maccabees we have a generally trustworthy guide in 1 Mac, and some hints may be gathered from 2 Mac. The Book of Daniel (written c. 167 B.C.?) is generally appealed to in illustration of this age.

v. THE HISTORY.

1. The Origins of Israel.—The relationships of the Israelite people according to the earliest source preserved in Genesis are shown in the following table:—



That Moab, Ammon, Edom, and Israel formed together a group of tribes of kindred origin, is generally acknowledged and need not be doubted. It has, however, been questioned whether Israel was really related to Aram (the Aramæans or 'Syrians'), and Wellhausen has suggested that Israel's claim to such relationship was founded not on fact, but on an ambitious desire to be reckoned to belong to 'the mighty Aramæans' (IJG[3] p. 8). Yet against this we may set the fact asserted by Kittel (Geschichte, i. 155), that it is an unchanging trait of Israelite tradition that the origins of the Hebrew people lay beyond the Euphrates, i.e. in Aram-naharaim, 'Aram of the two rivers,' the country between the Euphrates and the Ḫabor. To the passages in Genesis we may add two interesting references outside it. In Dt 26^5 (D) the Israelite is told to call his ancestor 'a wandering (or 'lost') Aramæan' (cf. RVm), and in Hos 12^{12} (12^{13} Heb.)—an interpolation acc. to Nowack (in loco), but even so, probably independent of the present form of Genesis — we have mention of Jacob's flight into 'the field of Aram' (RV), an event which surely implies some previous connexion with the people of Aram.

On the other hand, the nearness of kinship between Israel and the population of the Sinai peninsula is pronounced by Wellhausen 'very probable,' and he points out that 'the real home of the Patriarchs lay between Edom and Egypt,* where the South of Palestine merges itself in the Desert' (Geschichte, p. 9). On the whole, however, it seems best to accept both relationships of Israel, for the two are equally well attested in the earliest records. Israel was no more homogeneous than any other tribe which migrates and conquers. Abraham's grand-nephew Laban was of Ḥaran (Gn 27^{43} 29^{4}, both J), and Isaac's wife came from Aram-naharaim (so RVm Gn 24^{10} J), whence Abraham himself also derived his origin (v.^{4} J). (See art. ABRAHAM, vol. i. p. 15^{a}). On the other hand, the genealogical table given above shows a relationship between Israel and the nomads of Sinai, and the Calebite origin of a large part of the tribe of Judah has already been alluded to. The general presentation in the earliest sources of the history of the patriarchs, viz. that Israel was a tribe from the north drawn southward, falling under the spell of Egyptian influence, and leaving behind it in the Sinaitic peninsula nomads akin to it in blood, has the strongest claims to be received as true. The historical character of the lives of the patriarchs themselves is discussed elsewhere; see especially ABRAHAM, vol. i. p. 15, and JACOB, below, p. 533 ff.

2. Israel under the Egyptians. — It has been denied that Israel was ever 'in Egypt'; it is therefore necessary to ascertain exactly what is asserted in the biblical accounts. The people dwelt in Goshen apart from the Egyptians (Gn 46^{28}–47^{4} J), as indeed the narrative of the plagues presupposes (cf. Ex 8^{22} 9^{26}, both J). Such passages as Ex 3^{22} $11^{2f.}$ (both E) do not essentially disagree with this representation: Goshen (if Pithom and Rameses, Ex 1^{11} J, were in Goshen, and if the first of these cities has been correctly identified by Naville with ancient remains near the Sweet Water Canal) bordered on Egypt proper, so that the Israelites would have Egyptian 'neighbours' north and west of them. Now the fact that we find no certain mention of the Hebrews (Israelites) on the Egyptian monuments (at present known) belonging (presumably) to the period of the Oppression and of the Exodus, does not discredit this story of Israel's sojourn and servitude in Goshen. Israel was not the only people which was impressed to work on Pharaoh's buildings; the story of Israel might very well be lost to the Egyptians amid a dozen similar memories. As a matter of fact, however, one name does meet us in the Egyptian records which recalls the name of the Chosen People. Certain foreigners called 'prw (? 'Aperu) were employed on task-work under Ramses II., and as late as the time of Ramses IV. This name has been compared with 'Ibhri ('Hebrew'). The fact that the Exodus is always supposed to have taken place before the reign of the latter monarch is of small account. The name may have been passed on from the sons of Israel to their successors in the task-work. (See, however, art. EGYPT, vol. i. p. 665). If the Ḥabiri, so often mentioned on the Tel el-Amarna tablets as the foes of Egypt in Syria, be the Hebrews, then the Exodus must have taken place as early as the time of the Eighteenth Dynasty, and the same conclusion must be drawn if the Y-si-r-'l of the recently discovered stele of Merenptaḥ (Meneptaḥ) be Israel, for Y-si-r-'l appears as a Syrian people upon whom the chastisement of Pharaoh has fallen (cf. G. Steindorff, ZATW xvi. 330 ff.). Of the true date of the Exodus we still know nothing for certain (see CHRONOLOGY OF OLD TEST., vol. i. pp. 398, 399; and articles by Sayce, Hommel, etc., in Expos. Times, vols. viii. and ix.).

3. The Exodus and the Wilderness.—The Exodus was the natural revolt of a pastoral people against compulsory brick-making and building, against a system which involved a reckless expenditure of the lives of the workmen; cf. Erman, Anc. Egypt, p. 475 ff. In the earlier sources (JE) the Israelite leader is Moses, in the later (P) his leadership is somewhat obscured by the fact that Aaron is constantly co-ordinated with him. The plagues, eight in number in JE (the lice כִּנִּים kinnim or כִּנָּם kinnām, Ex 8^{16} [8^{12} Heb.], and the boils שְׁחִין shĕḥīn, 9^{9}, being due to P), are the means of forcing Pharaoh's consent. It is noteworthy that Foreign War is not reckoned among the plagues. The theory, therefore, that the Libyan invasion in the reign of Merenptaḥ facilitated the Exodus, receives no support from the biblical accounts.

With the passage of the 'Red Sea' (see EXODUS AND JOURNEY TO CANAAN, vol. i. p. 802) we arrive at contemporary history. In Ex 15^{1b-3} (Moses' Song) 'we seem,' acc. to Dillm. and Driver (LOT^{6} 30), 'to hear Moses himself speaking'; and the latter, while pointing out certain redactional additions, writes, 'Probably the greater part of the song is Mosaic.' The Passage of the Sea must retain its place among the best attested facts of history; no argument drawn from the silence of later documents can weigh against this contemporary attestation. Moreover, as Kittel well points out (Geschichte, i. 206), this event lends support on the one side to the story of a sojourn in Egypt, on the other to the story of Wilderness wandering.

Early accounts (Nu 14^{33} JE, cf. Am 5^{25}) reckon the period of the Wandering at forty years. Of the events which marked it very little is known. One thing, however, is clear. Israel was not ready at the Exodus for the immediate conquest of Canaan (Ex 13^{17} E, Nu $14^{3.\ 40ff.}$ JE, Dt 1^{27}).

The Mosaic Religion.—During these forty years some organization based on religion, and mainly of a religious character, was given to Israel (Ex $18^{25f.}$ 19^{3}–24^{14} E and J). A 'covenant' was made between J″ and the people, and the foundation stone of Israel's nationality was thereby laid (Ex 34^{10-27} E or J). Israel professed Islām (resignation to God) and prepared for a Jihād (a war of conquest undertaken in the name of God). Moses was a pre-Christian Mohammed with a more fruitful revelation in his hand.

So far all is clear, what, however, were the exact contents of the revelation given by Moses? The two passages of Exodus referred to above (19^{3}–24^{14} and 34^{10-27}) contain very ancient (probably Mosaic) material, but the relation between the two passages is uncertain (cf. Driver, LOT^{6} pp. 39, 40), and the limits of what is ancient are subject to much dispute. Critics are not even agreed as to the identity of the Ten 'Commandments' (דְּבָרִים dĕbhārīm, 'words') which seem to be the foundation of the written Law, and Wellhausen has discovered in Ex 34 'Ten Words' of mainly ceremonial contents to dispute the title of 'The Ten Words' with Ex 20^{2-17}.

Two 'Words,' however, are found in both the rival Decalogues: (1) Jehovah alone is Israel's God; (2) molten images may not be made. It seems most reasonable to say that the principles of the Mosaic religion were Monotheism (a personal relation of one God to Israel), and a Repudiation of image-worship as likely to entangle the people in polytheism like that of Egypt. (See, further, Kittel, Geschichte, i. 246 ff.).

4. The Conquest of Canaan.—That Israel obtained a firm footing east of Jordan before entering Western Palestine is generally acknowledged. The war against Sihon, however (Nu 21^{21-30} JE, according to some E, cf. Dt $2^{26ff.}$), has been questioned, and the ancient song (Nu 21^{27-30}) has been referred to a war of Israel against Moab in the 9th cent. It is more natural, however, to find in the song early testimony to a victorious war of the Amorite against the Moabite, followed by a war of retribution waged by Israel, Moab's kinsman, against the victor. Such a war as the latter could have taken place only in very early times such as those of Moses. (See G. A. Smith, HGHL, Appendix III.). The war against Og, the king of Bashan (Nu $21^{33ff.}$, Dt 3^{1-4}), is not equally well attested. See also JAIR, HAVVOTH-JAIR.

* Cf. Gn 13^{18} J (Abraham), 26^{23} J (Isaac), 37^{14} J (Jacob).

Of the conquest of Western Palestine we possess two early accounts. The first of these is contained in Jos 2^{1}–11^{9}; it is the narrative of JE (J and E cannot be accurately separated) broken and expanded by additions from a Deuteronomic Redactor (D^{2}) and from P. This narrative of JE contains all the well-known features, such as the reception of the spies by Rahab, the drying up of the waters of Jordan, the capture of Jericho, the trespass of Achan, the two attacks on Ai, the treaty with the Gibeonites, and the battles of Beth-horon and of the waters of Merom. Joshua appears as the successor of Moses and as the leader of the whole people. The conquest is represented as the work of united Israel, and its course, save for the repulse at Ai, is uniformly successful. On the other hand, generalizing passages, e.g. 10^{28-43} ('all these kings and their land did Joshua take at one time,' v.^{42}) and 11^{10-23} ('So Joshua took the whole land. . . . And the land rested from war,' v.^{23}) are assigned to D^{2}.

The second early account of the conquest of Western Palestine is found in scattered notices in the later chapters of Joshua and in ch. 1 of Judges. These notices show a similarity of style, and it is possible to make a tentative reconstruction of the narrative from which they have been taken (see Driver, LOT^{6} pp. 162, 163). This reconstructed document gives us three glimpses of the conquest, according to which the tribes fight in groups, and not as a united Israel under one leader (Joshua). (1) We first see Judah and Simeon together with nomad tribes of the Sinaitic peninsula, such as the Kenites (Jg 1^{16}), Calebites (Jos 15^{13}), and Kenizzites (Jos 15^{17}), conquering the hill-country of Judah, the 'south' of Arad (Jg 1^{16} MT, 'Descent of Arad' LXX; cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL pp. 277, 278), Hebron, and Debir (Kiriath-sepher). (2) We next see the house of Joseph establishing itself on the central ridge at Bethel (Jg 1^{22}), but failing to drive out the inhabitants of Gezer (v.^{29}), and complaining to Joshua that progress northward was stayed by the chariots of iron which the Canaanites had in the Valley of Jezreel (Jos $17^{14ff.}$). Joshua advises them to make room for themselves by clearing the jungle on the central ridge. (3) The third glimpse which the reconstructed document gives is of the limitations set to the conquests of the three northern tribes, Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali, and of the tribe of Dan, by the stiff resistance of the Canaanite and Amorite (Jg 1^{30-34}). Dan seeks by conquest a new home in the north at Leshem = Laish (Jos 19^{47}; cf. Jg $18^{27ff.}$).

In comparing these two accounts we must remember that the second is put together from fragments, and is quite incomplete. It is defective as regards Joseph and all the northern tribes, nor does it make clear to us the position of Joshua (Jos $17^{14ff.}$); does it treat him (as some think) as simply the leader of the House of Joseph? There is little in it, however, which clearly contradicts the account of JE in Jos 2^{1}–11^{9}, and by piecing together the two accounts we can construct a narrative of the conquest of Western Palestine which has strong claims to be accepted.

Israel, bereaved of Moses (as Islam of Mohammed) at the beginning of a career of conquest, accepted Joshua as Moses' Khalifa (successor), and persevered on the path of conquest (JE). The Jordan was crossed (JE). Jericho, 'the city of palm trees,' was won (JE and F*). Gibeon in a panic made terms with Israel (JE). Israel, united under Joshua, won a great victory over a southern confederacy at Beth-horon (JE). Elated by these repeated successes, Judah (perhaps a small tribe at this time) broke loose from the main body, and turned southward to join the Calebites in a division of the southern end of the central ridge (cf. F). Joshua, at the head of the strong tribe of Joseph, and followed by the tribes which afterwards settled in the north, burst in the full tide of victory across the plain of Esdraelon and defeated a northern confederacy at the Waters of Merom (JE). The Canaanites, however, after bending before the storm, recovered courage, and by their chariots and fortified cities retained control of the plain of Esdraelon and compelled the Israelites to keep to the hills (F; cf. Jg 4. 5). (On the historical probabilities considered in the light of geography, see HGHL, Appendix II.).

5. The Transformation of Israel.—This took place under the Judges (see JUDGES, PERIOD OF THE). It is clear from the earliest records of the conquest that the Canaanites were not exterminated, as the later record (D^{2}) seems sometimes to assert (Jos 10^{40} 11^{14}). The conquerors settled down in the midst of the half-conquered majority, and the question arose which stock, which civilization, which religion, Canaanite or Israelite, would survive? The result was a compromise: a mixed stock arose, over which it was possible to set up one kingdom, the kingdom of Saul and David. The Canaanite-Israelite was not a nomad, but an agriculturalist, a city-dweller, a merchant, with a wide outlook on the world, such as became the member of an empire which touched the highway of the world of Western Asia, the Euphrates. In religion also the Canaanite-Israelite was a new production. He held his monotheism somewhat loosely, and was ready to worship at Canaanite shrines. Lastly, the new nation was much more numerous than the old invading tribes. David's armies, composed of these Canaanite-Israelites, were not inconsiderable; they enabled him to found an empire. The fusion of races which made a nation capable of winning victories like those of David took place in the period of the Judges.

6. The Undivided Kingdom.—We have an express statement (Gn 36^{31}, apparently from an early document) that Edom was governed by kings before any king reigned over Israel. It is probable that the same is true of Ammon (cf. 1 S 11^{1-3}; Jg 11^{1-28}, however, seems to be late) and of Amalek (1 S $15^{8ff.}$, though the passage is not early). The first movement towards the establishment of a kingdom over Israel came from the half-Canaanite Abimelech (Jg $9^{1ff.}$), and affected only the central tribes. In fact it was only hard experience which made the Israelites (still children of the desert in nature) willing to submit to the restraint of an organized kingdom. No doubt the Canaanite leaven in the population hastened this submission.

Of the occasion of the establishment of the kingdom we have two accounts in 1 Samuel (Driver, LOT^{6} p. 175 ff.). According to the earlier account (1 S 9^{1}–10^{16} $11^{1-11, 15}$), J" chooses a king (Saul) who is to save His people from the Philistines, and commands Samuel to anoint him ($9^{16ff.}$). The language used reminds us of Ex 3^{7} (God charges Moses to lead Israel out of Egypt). Samuel promises Saul 'all that is desirable' in Israel (9^{20} RV), and encourages him to act as king, as occasion offers, in the assurance of divine support (10^{7}). The occasion for action comes in the invasion of Nahash the Ammonite, and on Saul's success the people make him king with rejoicings.

According to the later account (1 S 8. 10^{17-27} 12)

* F = Fragmentary reconstructed accounts.

the Israelites, disgusted with the corrupt administration of justice by Samuel's sons, ask Samuel to make them 'a king to judge [them] like all the nations' (8[5]). Samuel (as divinely instructed) treats this demand as a rejection of J" as king, and, while granting the request, tells the people that they will have reason to repent of it, for their king will take from them all that is desirable in his eyes (8[11-17]). Samuel describes Saul to the people after his election (12[13]) as 'the king whom ye have chosen,' and tells them (v.[17]) that their wickedness was great in asking for a king. (There may be a trace of a third account in 12[12], where, somewhat inconsistently with 8[1-5], the invasion of the Ammonites is given as the immediate occasion of the demand for a king).

The first and earliest account accords best with the known facts. Saul established his throne in the midst of a great Philistine Oppression (1 S 13[6. 19]), when the Phil. had a garrison (? נְצִיב) in the heart of Benjamite territory (ib. 14[1ff.]), and some of the 'Hebrews' were serving by constraint in the Philistine ranks (ib. v.[21]). Saul's reign (the duration of which is quite uncertain) was an almost continuous struggle against his western neighbours (1 S 13[3] 14[52] 17[1] 18[25] 23[1. 27] 28[1] 31[1]); he taught Israel to face the Philistines.

The Rise of David.—Saul was the fighting chief of an infant nation, David the founder and organizer of a powerful state. Saul was the Lascaris,* but David the Vataces of Israel. The government gained vastly in intellectual power by the accession of David. Saul perhaps could not write (1 S 11[7]); David wrote the first letter mentioned in the Bible (2 S 11[14] !), was 'prudent in speech' (1 S 16[18] RV), a poet of considerable power (2 S 1[17ff.]), if not also a Psalmist (2 S 22[1ff.], a passage belonging to the Appendix to 2 Samuel), and a man who reflected (23[1-7]). The whole history of the suppression of Absalom's rebellion stamps David as a man of the highest mental power. The king who could command and apply in the moment of his greatest need the wrathful family faithfulness of Joab and Abishai, the salt-truth of Ittai the Philistine, the friendliness of the priests Zadok and Abiathar, the allegiance of the aged counsellor Hushai, and the helpfulness of Shobi the Ammonite and Barzillai the Gileadite (2 S 17[27ff.]), must have been a man of intellectual power far above the ordinary.

David's reign was marked by three events—(a) the choice of Jerusalem as capital; (b) the rise of the tribe of Judah; and (c) the foundation of an Israelite empire.

(a) Jerusalem before David's day probably consisted of a half-Israelite town grouped round the Jebusite citadel, which stood on a hill S.E. of the present Haram hill, but probably separated from it by a depression now filled up. Such a town was unsuitable for the Israelite capital so long as it was dominated by the Jebusite fort. David's capture of this fort gave him a site from which he could build towards the North and West, taking in other hills; he thus formed a capital of ample size and of great natural strength.

(b) The rise of the tribe of Judah under David is a remarkable fact. In Judges this tribe plays hardly any part save at the Conquest (ch. 1), in which it is almost overshadowed by Calebites, Kenizzites, and Kenites. It is not mentioned in the present text of the Song of Deborah (Jg 5). The earlier leaders of Israel, Moses, Aaron, Joshua, Samuel, and Saul, all belonged to other tribes, and no judge was a Judæan. Under these circumstances it has been supposed (Stade, GVI i. 132) that Judah entered Canaan from the south before the rest of the tribes entered from the east, and that in ancient times Judah stood in no union with the rest of Israel. Be this as it may, from the time of David Judah played a great part in Israel's history.

(c) It may be surprising that so small a people as Israel was able to found an empire which stretched from the borders of Egypt to the Euphrates. In the south Egypt claimed a hegemony over Syria; in the north the Hittites (1 K 10[29], 2 K 7[6]) and the Aramæans (Syrians) were strong, and, lastly, in the east lay the great Assyrian power. But after the reign of Tiglath-pileser I. (c. 1120–1100 B.C.) Assyria was in a state of temporary decline until about the end of the 10th cent. B.C. (McCurdy, HPM i. § 181); and the Hittites had ceased to exercise an imperial sway (ib. § 179); lastly, from c. 1240 to 930 B.C., under the 20th and 21st dynasties, Egypt was weak and divided (see art. EGYPT, vol. i. 662 b). Thus room is left for an Israelite empire, c. 1017–937 B.C., the period assigned to the reigns of David and Solomon (see CHRONOLOGY OF OLD TEST. vol. i. p. 401).

The empire of David and Solomon was greater in appearance than in reality, and it was, moreover, unstable. Garrisons (or 'governors' נְצִבִים) were placed in Damascus and in Edom (2 S 8[6. 14]), but other provinces simply paid a tribute (cf. ib. v.[11f.]), the amount of which depended, no doubt, on the strength of their fears.

The reign of Solomon was magnificent and oppressive, the very opposite, in fact, of the ideal given in Dt 17[15-17]. He put 30,000 Israelites to task-work (1 K 5[13f.]; 1 K 9[22] is a later gloss), and alienated the northern tribes (12[4]), already dissatisfied with the House of Jesse (2 S 20[1f.]); he filled his harem with foreign wives for the sake of prestige and policy, and patronized foreign worship (1 K 11[5. 7]) in order to conciliate allied or subject nations. Of twenty years given to building, he devoted seven to the erection of a temple, on which he employed foreign builders (1 K 5[18]), and in which he admitted foreign devices, such as the Second Commandment condemns (1 K 6[23]). Whether Solomon had any strong religious feeling (such as his father had) we cannot tell; the Prayer of Dedication in 1 K 8[23-61] is the work of the compiler of Kings (so Driver, LOT[6] p. 191). On the whole, he reminds us of the typical Pharaoh, who built, oppressed, and boasted of Divine favour. The importance of the Temple must not be exaggerated; David had already made Jerusalem a Holy City by transferring thither the ark (2 S 6[12]).

7. The Hundred Years' War with Aram.—The disruption of Solomon's kingdom relegated the southern half ('Judah') to a comparatively safe obscurity, and imposed upon the northern half ('Israel') the task of preventing the Aramæans (Syrians) of Damascus from advancing to the shores of the Mediterranean. From a nation like the Aramæans, eager for mercantile and material advantages, Israel invited attack in three directions. (1) The short route to Tyre by Dan and Abel-beth-maacah was worth seizing (1 K 15[20]). (2) The fertile plain of Esdraelon was valuable in itself, and also because it led to the sea; hence the fortress of Aphek in the Philistine plain became a point for Aramæan armies to march on (1 K 20[26], 2 K 13[22], LXX, Lucian's text; W. R. Smith, OTJC[2] p. 435; Expositor, Dec. 1895. See also APHEK). (3) Ramoth-gilead (precise site uncertain) was surrounded by good pasture-land, and commanded one of the trade routes which ran east of Jordan leading to Arabia (1 K 22[3]).

The kings of the house of Omri (1 K 16[16]–2 K 9[26]) met the Aramæan danger with courage and skill. Alliances with Tyre (1 K 16[31]) and with

* Cf. Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ch. lxii. beginning: 'In his first efforts the fugitive Lascaris commanded only 3 cities and 2000 soldiers; his reign was the season of generous and active despair: in every military operation he staked his life and crown; and his enemies . . . were surprised by his celerity and subdued by his boldness.'

Judah (1 K 22[2-4], 2 K 3[7]) secured the left flank and rear of Israel, a new capital well situated for defence was built and fortified on the hill of Samaria (1 K 16[24]), Ahab routed Ben-hadad at Aphek (1 K 20[26]), and Joram, it seems, recovered Ramoth-gilead from Hazael (2 K 8[28], cf. 9[1]).

The fortune of war changed at first under the new dynasty, that of Jehu and his sons. The Aramæans under Hazael and his successor Ben-hadad began to prevail perhaps in the days of Jehu himself; they almost annihilated the armies of his successor Jehoahaz, and became masters of all the land east of Jordan (2 K 10[32f.] 13[3-7]). On one occasion Hazael traversed the northern kingdom, reached Philistine territory, captured Gath, and threatened Jerusalem (12[17]). The affliction of Israel in those days was 'very bitter, for there was not . . . any helper for Israel' (14[26]). A change came again under Joash, the third king of Jehu's line. He thrice defeated Ben-hadad, and recovered the cities taken by Hazael, presumably the cities east of Jordan (13[25], cf. vv.[14-19]). He even found leisure for a civil war with Amaziah of Judah, which ended in the capture of Jerusalem (14[8-14]). But if Joash was the deliverer, Jeroboam II., the son of Joash, was the avenger of Israel. Under him Israel recovered according to 2 K 14[28] 'Damascus and Hamath,' according to v.[25] 'from the entering in of Hamath unto the sea of the Arabah.'

The religious policy of Ahab (the true representative of the house of Omri in this) was to patronize the Baal-worship of his Tyrian allies and of his half-Canaanite subjects without actually rejecting the religion of J″ (1 K 18[21]). If he allowed Jezebel to slay the prophets of the Lord (18[13]), it was doubtless because these prophets were bold enough to protest against such toleration, and not merely because they were prophets of J″. The work of the great prophet Elijah and of the house of Jehu which embraced his cause (19[17]), was to inflict such blows on the worshippers of Baal that they never again hoped for any support for their religion from the heads of the Israelite state.

The Religion of the Prophets.—The reign of Jeroboam II. marked the highest point of material prosperity which Israel reached after the disruption, and perhaps the lowest point of Israel's moral degradation. Amos and Hosea, who prophesied under Jeroboam and his immediate successors, met this degradation with a revelation of God which differs in breadth and depth from the Mosaic revelation as sketched above. God, they taught, was not only Israel's God, but also the God of all the world; He would not favour Israel regardless of its moral condition, rather He would punish the sinful nation, whether that nation were Israel or another. If it be uncertain whether the Ten Commandments be Mosaic, it is at least certain that they were the code of the prophets of the 8th cent. Amos and Hosea taught Israel to worship One God, a God of Righteousness and Purity. But the manner as well as the matter of the teaching of these prophets challenges attention. Unlike Elijah and Elisha, they were 'writing prophets.' A prophet was no longer a voice only; he left a body of teaching behind him, to serve in the religious education of his people.

8. The Tyranny of Asshur (Assyria).—The contest between Israel and the Aramæans was ended by the interference of the Assyrians, who crushed both. We may pass over the victory of Shalmaneser II. over a confederate Aramæan-Israelite army in the days of Ahab (B.C. 854), and Jehu's payment of tribute to Shalmaneser (B.C. 842), as well as the boast of Ramman-nirārī III. (B.C. 811–783) that he exacted tribute from the 'land of Omri.' Assyria declined while Israel flourished under Jeroboam II. (B.C. 782–741). Unfortunately Assyria revived under Tiglath-pileser III. (B.C. 745–727). We need not believe that he had anything to do with Uzziah (Azariah) of Judah* (2 K 15[1]), but we have monumental references to his defeat of the allied kings Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus (16[5-9]), and the monuments tell us what the Bible does not, viz. that Ausi'i' (Hoshea) was confirmed as king of Israel by Tiglath-pileser. But Hoshéa succeeded to a diminished and depopulated kingdom (2 K 15[29]); the extreme north and the land east of Jordan, after being ravaged, passed perhaps into the hands of some faithful client of Asshur. It would have been well for the kingdom of Samaria, if it had had only the open foe (Assyria) to reckon with; unfortunately, however, the false friend (Egypt) played a decisive part. From the days of Thutmosis (Thothmes) III. (B.C. 1500?) of the eighteenth dynasty and Ramses II. of the nineteenth, Egypt had looked on Canaan as within the sphere of her 'influence'; and, even when lower Egypt was divided among petty princes, one of these 'So'† (2 K 17[4]) could not resist the temptation to claim a footing in Palestine by intriguing with Hoshea of Samaria against the Assyrians (see EGYPT, vol. i. p. 663[a]). Shalmaneser IV. (B.C. 727–722), the successor of Tiglath-pileser, 'found conspiracy in Hoshea,' marched against Israel, and laid siege to Samaria (2 K 17[4f.]), which was taken by Sargon (Is 20[1]), a usurper (B.C. 722–705) who succeeded Shalmaneser (KIB ii. 54, 55). Sargon tells us, 'I led forth (aślula) 27,290 of those who dwelt in the midst of it'; according to 2 K 17[6] Israel was transported to Mesopotamia and Media. In any case the land was grievously depopulated; for even after colonists had been brought in from Babylonia and northern Syria (2 K 17[24]), so much of the land still lay waste that lions increased and committed great ravages.

Israel having been crushed, Sargon marched against So (Sib'u) of Egypt and Hanun of Gaza, the confederates of Hoshea, and defeated them at Raphia (Rapiḥi) on the border of Egypt. The Pharaoh (Pir'u), plainly a different person from So, thereupon prudently paid 'tribute,' and Sargon retired.

Of the subsequent history of what had been the northern kingdom we know (until the time of the Return) only two facts. (1) Samaria was involved with Hamath, Arpad, and Damascus in a futile rising against Sargon (KIB ii. 56, 57). (2) In the decline of the Assyrian power Josiah was able to carry out his reforming measures in Bethel (2 K 23[15]), the 'chapel' of the northern kings (Am 7[13]), and in the cities of Samaria generally (2 K 23[19]).

The capture of Samaria and the march of Sargon to the Egyptian frontier revealed the danger in which Judah stood from the Assyrians.

Three policies now presented themselves to Hezekiah. (1) He might ally himself (not as Hoshea with a kinglet of lower Egypt, but) with the growing power of Ethiopia (Is 18[1f.] 20[5]), under Sabakon (B.C. 707–695), who is perhaps meant, though his successor, Tirhakah (B.C. 690–664), is named in 2 K 19[9]. Thus supported, Judah might perhaps defy Assyria. (2) He might (like his father Ahaz) throw himself without any serious invitation into the arms of the king of Assyria, and accept his protection, his yoke, and his god, or at least his altar (2 K 16[7-12]). (3) He might accept the assurance of J″ given through Isaiah of the safety of Jerusalem and of those who took refuge in it (Is 28[16] 29[7] 30[19] 31[4f.]). According to this last policy, Hezekiah would not attempt to defend cities like Lachish and Libnah, which lay more or less in the great king's path to Egypt, but would withdraw his people as much as possible into the hill country and into Jerusalem itself. Judah would thus bow before the storm, and neither resist the Assyrian king nor attempt to make friends with him.

Of course in a case in which three policies were possible, no one was consistently followed. In 701 Sennacherib, the son and successor of Sargon, marched into the west, having Egypt for his final objective (Herod. ii. 141). Hezekiah sent tribute (2 K 18^{14}), but Libnah and Lachish, fortresses which might assist the march of the Egyptians and retard that of the Assyrians, were not surrendered to Sennacherib. The Assyrian king, in accordance with his general plan, set himself with his main army to reduce these fortresses; but he sent 'a great host,' under the Turtan (Tartan), i.e. the Commander-in-chief who commanded in the absence of the king, to reduce Jerusalem (2 K 18^{17}). Hezekiah was blockaded, and derided in his helplessness by the Assyrian leaders.

Thus far the Bible and the monuments agree, but the sequel is differently told. According to 2 K 19^{35} the Angel of the Lord (no doubt the pestilence) slew 185,000 of the Assyrian army, and Sennacherib departed to his own land. According to Sennacherib's own account, fear fell on Hezekiah, and he acknowledged the majesty of Sennacherib by sending presents of every kind. It is hard to resist the impression that the Assyrian is escaping from the acknowledgment of failure in the long and wordy list of presents, and that the Hebrew account is based on a trustworthy tradition. In any case, Sennacherib does not claim to have taken Jerusalem, nor to have inflicted any personal chastisement on Hezekiah. The strange tradition with which Herodotus explains the retreat of 'Sanacharibus, king of the Arabians and of the Assyrians' from the frontiers of Egypt, supports as far as it goes the biblical account (ii. 141).

The retreat of Sennacherib, however,—be it remembered,—meant the escape of Jerusalem from the horrors of a sack by the Assyrians, and not the permanent deliverance of Judah from Assyrian vassalage. Esar-haddon (B.C. 681–669), continuing the work of his predecessor, conquered Egypt (B.C. 671), and we may believe him when he tells us that he demanded building materials for his palace from twenty-two kings of the west, including Manasseh, king of Judah, if Mi-na-si-i sar (maḫāzu) Ja-u-di be he (KIB ii. 148, 149). The next king, Assur-bani-pal (the Osnappar of Ezr 4^{10}), also made successful expeditions against Egypt, and it is not improbable that on one of these occasions Manasseh was carried off, as the chronicler says (2 Ch 33^{11}), bound in fetters to Babylon.

Religion in Judah during the Assyrian Period.—The religious conflict was hardly less severe than the political. Under Ahaz (2 K $16^{3f.\ 10f.}$) and Manasseh (ib. $21^{3ff.}$) foreign worships and foreign superstitions were practised (cf. Is 2^{7} 8^{19} etc.), and against these Isaiah and Micah prophesied with fearless invective and threatening. Supported by the prophets, Hezekiah (according to 2 K $18^{4.\ 22}$) made some sweeping reforms, including the destruction of the brazen serpent, the removal of the high-places, and the centralization of the cultus in Jerusalem.

Wellhausen (IJG^{3} p. 90 f.) doubts whether the last two measures were carried out, supporting his doubt by a reference to 2 K 23^{13}, where, however, the defilement (not the destruction) of Solomon's high-places is ascribed to Josiah. Practical religion must have been at a very low ebb during this whole period, if we may judge from the denunciations uttered by Isaiah and Micah (esp. Mic $3^{10ff.}$), and from Isaiah's favourite thought that only a remnant can survive God's judgment on Judah and Jerusalem.

9. The Fall of Judah.—Under Josiah (B.C. 639–608), Judah had a brief breathing space. Assur-bani-pal, the last great sovereign of Assyria, died in 626, and the Assyrian power rapidly declined. Josiah took courage to repair the temple (2 K $22^{3ff.}$), to destroy the high-places, removing the priests attached to them, and even to extend his activity northwards to Bethel and to 'the cities of Samaria' (ib. 23^{19}). Under him also was published 'the book of the law' (i.e. the Book of Deuteronomy), and the people entered into a covenant to obey its morality, and to worship J″ only in the one place which He had chosen for his sanctuary (cf. Dt $12^{5f.}$). Josiah himself set an example of kingly virtue (Jer $22^{15f.}$) as well as of Deuteronomic orthodoxy (cf. 2 K 23^{21}), and the removal of the yoke of Asshur seemed to promise an era of comparative prosperity for Judah.

Unfortunately the fall of Assyria involved a contest for the spoils between Egypt under Neco(h) (AV Necho(h)) and Babylon under Nabopolassar. Necoh 'went up against the king of Assyria to the river Euphrates' (2 K 23^{29}), passing through Megiddo (somewhere near Mount Carmel) on his march, and at Megiddo Josiah met his death at the hands of the Egyptian king. Of the circumstances of his death we have two accounts. According to 2 Kings (cited above), Josiah went to meet (Heb. not EV) Necoh, doubtless in order to come to some understanding with him, perhaps to do homage to him. Necoh, however, judging perhaps that Josiah was too strong a man to be a good vassal, had him slain at the audience ('when he saw him'). According to 2 Ch $35^{20ff.}$ (=1 Es $1^{25ff.}$), on the contrary, Josiah's fate is precisely that of Ahab. He fights against Necoh in spite of a Divine warning, and is mortally wounded by an archer. (An obscure passage in Herodotus, ii. 159, gives no help). The sequel, however, is clear: Judah became a vassal to Egypt, and Necoh appointed the infamous Jehoiakim (2 K 23^{34}, Jer $22^{13ff.}$) to be king.

Egypt's triumph was short. Nebuchadrezzar, the son of Nabopolassar, swept Necoh out of Syria, and made Judah transfer its allegiance to Babylon. Twice Judah proved faithless to its new lord. The first revolt was punished heavily enough. Jerusalem was taken, the golden vessels of the temple were made a spoil, and Jehoiakim's son and successor Jehoiachin was carried into captivity to Babylon with his officers, his mighty men, and all the skilled artificers—10,000 captives in all (cf. Jer 24^{1-7}). Nebuchadrezzar appointed as king in Judah Zedekiah (a son of Josiah), and bound him with an oath of fealty (cf. Ezk $17^{12ff.}$). But Zedekiah was too unstable to keep an oath, and too weak to resist the temptation of an alliance with Egypt. After a disordered reign of eleven years, during which the princes ruled rather than the king (Jer $38^{5.\ 25}$), the Babylonians took Jerusalem by blockade, blinded Zedekiah, slew his officers, burned the temple, broke down the city walls, and carried away a number of captives (Jer 52^{28-30}, Heb. not LXX B). A poor remnant of the people was left to prevent the land from relapsing into desert, and Gedaliah, son of Ahikam (the patron of Jeremiah), was appointed 'overseer' ('governor' would have been too grand a title) over them (Jer $40^{5ff.}$).

This—the catastrophe of Jerusalem—took place c. 587 B.C., but it must be remembered that Judah had been falling ever since the days of Ahaz. In fact the Southern kingdom slowly bled to death from the moment when its isolation was broken down by the dying struggles of the Northern kingdom under Pekah (2 K 15^{29} 16^{5}, cf. Is $7^{1ff.}$). In particular, Judah never recovered from the brutal devastation wrought by Sennacherib, when 46 fortified towns were taken and 200,150 persons led captive (KIB p. 94 f.; cf. 2 K $18^{13.23}$). We cannot form any satisfactory estimate of the numbers carried off at various times by the Chaldæans, for the passage (Jer 52^{28-30}) which contains the most precise statements on this point is absent from LXX BNA, and is in conflict with 2 K 24^{14}; but it seems probable that the Chaldæan ravages were less extensive than the Assyrian, because the population had dwindled, and prosperity had diminished in the meantime. (See, further, Kosters, ThT xxxi. (1897) 518 ff.).

10. The Exile and the Return.—The captivity of Judah, reckoned from the fall of Jehoiachin (B.C. 597), lasted 59 years, or from the fall of Zedekiah (B.C. 587), 49 years, reckoning B.C. 538 as the probable terminus ad quem. The 'seventy' years of Jer 25^{12} is a round number. Of the condition of the Jews in exile we have contradictory indications, from which we may conclude that the circumstances varied in different places and at different times. The first band of exiles were allowed to 'build houses and plant gardens' (Jer $29^{5f.}$), and to live in communities of their own (Ezr 8^{17}, Ezk 1^{1}) under their own elders (Ezk 8^{1} 14^{1} 20^{1}). Jehoiachin, after thirty-six years of captivity, received special marks of favour from Evil-Merodach (Amil-Marduk), the successor of Nebuchadrezzar (2 K $25^{27ff.}$). On the other hand, seditious prophets from time to time provoked the Chaldæans to cruel acts of repression (Jer $29^{21f.}$), and it is probable that some at least of the Jews were put to task-work, for the 'hard service' (Is $14^{3f.}$) wherein Israel was made to serve, looks like an allusion to Nebuchadrezzar's canal-works or temple-restoration, or to like undertakings of his successors, especially Nabuna'id (Nabonidus) (KIB iii. 2, p. 60 ff., p. 96 ff.). Yet that the lot of many Jewish families (after the first bitterness of expatriation was past) was at least tolerable in Babylonia, is clear from the fact that a considerable number of Jews (the vast majority, according to some critics) did not take part in the First Return under Sheshbazzar.

With regard to the Return a good deal has been written of late years (particularly since 1889) tending towards a reconstruction of the whole narrative. It will, however, be most convenient in this article to reproduce the account given in Ezra-Nehemiah, while pointing out from time to time how critics propose to correct and supplement it. In the first year, then, of Cyrus (Ezr 1^{1}), i.e. c. 538 B.C., the 'Persian' (see CYRUS, vol. i. p. 541 f.) king issued an edict for the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem, and invited the Jews to undertake the work. [We may compare with this the mutilated inscription in which Cyrus speaks of his restoration to the cities of Babylonia of gods which Nabonidus had carried off to Babylon (KIB iii. 2, p. 126 f.).] The heads of Judah and Benjamin, together with the Levites, responded to the invitation, and Cyrus gave up the golden vessels of the temple, which had been carried away by Nebuchadrezzar, to Sheshbazzar (τῷ Σαβανασάρ LXX B, τῷ Σασαβασσάρῳ A, Ezr 1^{8}; Σαναμασσάρῳ, 1 Es 2^{11} LXX B, but Σαναβασσάρῳ, LXX A^{a}), 'prince (נְשִׂיא nāsī) of Judah,' who brought them back to Jerusalem, together with a band of returning exiles. This—the First Return—resulted, we learn indirectly, in the laying of the foundation of the temple (Ezr 5^{16}, but cf. $3^{9f.}$), but we do not know the number of those who accompanied Sheshbazzar, nor any other particulars. It is, however, negatively clear that the movement was not a success. In Babylonia the edict (in spite of the prophecies of Deutero-Isaiah) probably took the Jews by surprise, while in Judah (cf. Ezr $4^{4f.}$, a misplaced passage) there were 'many adversaries.' The time, as the Jews said even sixteen years later (Hag 1^{2}), was not yet come for so important an undertaking as the rebuilding of the temple. Some critics, indeed, smile altogether at the story of this 'First Return,' and reduce it to a conciliatory appointment by Cyrus of a prince of the house of David (Sanabassar) to be governor in Judæa (cf. Cheyne, Jewish Religious Life, pp. 5–7).

At the beginning of the reign of Darius Hystaspis (c. 522 B.C.), however, the Jewish exiles were prepared for a great movement, and there was, it seems, a Second Return under Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, a descendant of David, and Jeshua the son of Jozadak the priest (Ezr 2^{2}). The whole 'congregation' numbered 42,360, exclusive of servants and handmaids (ib. $2^{64f.}$). Of this great immigration, and of Zerubbabel and Jeshua who led it, much was expected, imprimis the rebuilding of the temple (Zec 6^{15}), but the realization of the hope was delayed. The people went up 'unto Jerusalem and Judah, every one to his own city' (Ezr 2^{1}), and, after the heads had relieved their consciences by making a money-offering for the work of rebuilding, all the exiles 'dwelt in their cities' (ib. v.^{70}), or, as Haggai complained, they ran 'every man to his own house,' and allowed God's House to lie waste (Hag 1^{9}). In the autumn (Ezr $3^{1ff.}$) they did indeed gather themselves as one man to Jerusalem for the erection of an altar of burnt-offering, 'but the foundation of the temple of the Lord was not yet laid' (ib. v.^{6}).

How did the work of the temple begin at last in earnest? We have two answers, one in a 'prophetical' passage of Ezra (4^{24} $5^{1f.}$), written in the Aramaic tongue, and another in a 'priestly' passage, written in Hebrew by the compiler of the same book (3^{8-13}). The former treats the foundation as already laid (cf. 5^{16}), and reckons the date by the year of Darius characteristically, for the prophet's eye always noted political changes; the second, on the contrary, describes in touching detail the laying of the foundation, and mentions as the date 'the second year of their coming to the House of God,' again characteristically, for the priest's eye was all for the holy place. The discrepancy between the two passages is one of words only—(1) as regards date, if the Return of Zerubbabel and Jeshua took place, as suggested above, at the beginning of the reign of Darius; and (2) as regards the nature of the work, if we assume that after sixteen years of malice, neglect, and weather, the foundations needed some attention, which might be popularly described as relaying.

Ezr 3^{8-13}, however, has a great omission, it says nothing of the activity of Haggai and Zechariah. Yet there can be no doubt that the voice of these two prophets was the deciding factor in the work; words such as Hag 1^{4} 2^{9}, Zec 4^{6-10} were not uttered in vain. In the second year of Darius, the second year of their return to Palestine, the exiles began to build, and in spite of an interruption by Tattenai, governor of Syria (Ezr $5^{3ff.}$), the house was finished in the 6th year of Darius (6^{15}).

This account is traversed and disputed by some modern critics. It is urged that Haggai and Zechariah never mention the Great Return of 42,000 persons, and consequently it is maintained that no considerable body of exiles (the Gōla) did return till the mission of Ezra, c. 432 B.C. (so Cheyne, Introd. to Is. p. xxxix). From this it follows that the temple which was completed c. 516 B.C. was built, not by the returned exiles, but by 'the people of the land,' the descendants of those left by Nebuzar-adan. But what if Haggai and Zechariah do not dwell upon the Return because they took part in it, and spoke to those who took part in it? What if they do speak, at least once (Zec 6^{15}), as the forerunners of a mighty host advancing from Babylon?

One subject remains to be noticed, viz. the attitude of the builders of the temple towards the Samaritans. According to Ezr $4^{2f.}$ (a passage due to the compiler of the book) Zerubbabel and Jeshua peremptorily rejected the offer of the 'adversaries (צָרֵי ṣārîm, 'rivals') of Judah and Benjamin' to co-operate in the rebuilding. Cheyne, on the contrary, characterizes the story of rejection as 'pure imagination,' and asserts that the Samaritans maintained their connexion with the holy place 'till Nehemiah, armed with a Persian firman, interposed' (JRL p. 26).

After the completion of the temple a break of nearly sixty years occurs in our records, and when they speak again the Davidic line which Zerubbabel had represented has disappeared. Some critics (e.g. Cheyne and Sellin) partly fill the gap with a reconstruction which represents Zerubbabel as the accepted Messiah of the Jews, a rebel against Persian authority, and a martyr whose martyrdom ruined all the political prospects of the house of David. Cheyne refers Zec 6^{11-13} (in a revised text) to the coronation and reign of Zerubbabel (JRL p. 14 f.), and Sellin thinks that he is meant by the Suffering Servant of Is 52^{13}–53^{12}. The ruin of the walls of Jerusalem, which Nehemiah deplored (Neh 1^3), may have been part of the vengeance taken by the Persians (or their deputies) on the Messianic kingdom of Zerubbabel.

The biblical records begin again in 'the seventh year of Artaxerxes' (Ezr 7^8), i.e., if Artaxerxes Longimanus be meant, in B.C. 458. In that year Ezra the scribe, a man of high-priestly family, went up to Jerusalem armed with a decree (given in Aramaic, ib. vv.$^{12-26}$) entrusting him with large powers, and ordering a large offering to be made in the king's name for the support of the worship of the temple. Strangely enough all that we know of the exercise of these powers is that Ezra called an assembly of the whole people in order to deal with the question of mixed marriages, that the people acknowledged the duty of putting away foreign wives, but pleaded for delay, and that a formidable list was drawn up (including the names of men of high-priestly family) of those who had taken foreign wives. Out of this list four persons (priests) actually 'gave their hands' to put away their foreign wives (Ezr 10^{6-44}).

In the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (Neh $2^{1, 9}$), i.e. in B.C. 445, came the mission of Nehemiah. He, unlike Ezra, was a layman and an officer at the Persian Court, and, unlike Ezra (Ezr 8^{22}), enjoyed the prestige of arriving with an escort of Persian officers and horsemen (Neh 2^9). In spirit, however, Ezra and Nehemiah were one. Both aimed at reforming the religion of their people on lines stricter than any which had hitherto been laid down. To Ezra (or to the school of which he is the most conspicuous member) is probably due that rewriting with increased stringency and particularity of the earlier codes of the Hexateuch, which resulted in the formation of that which is commonly called the Priestly Code. The object which Ezra and his adherents set before themselves was the holiness of Israel (i.e. its separation from other peoples, and its greater strictness in the service of God).

Nehemiah worked on practical lines. He first made the separation of Israel possible by rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem 'in fifty and two days' (Neh 6^{15}). He next removed the causes of disaffection among the poorer Jews by compelling the richer sort to restore lands and houses taken in pledge, and to forbear the exaction of usury (ib. 5^{1-13}). Ezra's edition of the book of the Law was recited and explained before an assembly of the whole people (ib. 8^{-8}). At a great Day of Humiliation the people, headed by Nehemiah, vowed to separate themselves from the 'people of the land,' and to forbear from mixed marriages and from buying and selling on the Sabbath; they also undertook to observe the seventh year as a year of release, and to pay a third part of a shekel* for the maintenance of the sanctuary and its services (Neh $9^{1ff.}$ $10^{1ff.}$). Lastly, Nehemiah took measures for increasing the population of Jerusalem (Neh $11^{1ff.}$).

Nehemiah's second mission to Jerusalem, 'in the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes' (ib. 13^6), i.e. c. 433 B.C., apparently lasted only a short time. He found some of the old abuses still existing, and acted with his accustomed vigour against them. Some critics believe that Ezra's caravan of exiles (Ezr $8^{1ff.}$) returned not in B.C. 458 (see above), but in connexion with this second mission of Nehemiah.

Of the fortunes of the Jews in the later days of the Persian empire we know next to nothing for certain, but it is probable that they took part in the rising against Artaxerxes III. 'Ochus' (B.C. 361–338), and were punished for it by a partial captivity to Hyrcania. The miseries of the times of Ochus are, it is sometimes supposed, alluded to in Is 24–27 and in several of the Psalms. On the other side, Wellhausen (IJG^{3} p. 160) believes that the Jews increased greatly in numbers under Persian rule, and that they assimilated to themselves a large element from 'the people of the land' whom Ezra and Nehemiah had tried to exclude.

11. The Greek Period.—The victory of Alexander the Great over Darius at Issus (B.C. 333) put an end to Persian rule in Syria. Greek influence was now brought to bear upon Palestine from two great centres, viz. Alexandria and Antioch. Moreover, the Jewish people was forced by the stress of outward events to leaven itself with foreign thoughts and foreign customs. A great dispersion took place. When at the beginning of the 3rd cent. B.C. Syria was under the rule of Egypt, Ptolemy the son of Lagus transported thousands of Jews to Egypt, to serve as colonists and as a support to his dynasty. Moreover, the Jews had learned to trade, and the openings for world-wide traffic which Alexander's conquests had made for the Greeks, attracted the Jews also. Yet the Jews who spread themselves abroad, left their hearts at home; from time to time they returned on visits to Jerusalem, themselves Hellenized, and exerting a subtle Hellenizing influence in the Holy City itself.
